33. Who were in his front when that chastiser of foes Bhisma achieved great feats in battle for the good of Duryodhana?

34. Who were they that protected the right of that immeasurably powerful warrior? Who were they that resisted the enemy's warriors from his rear with patience and energy?

Tanganas, the further Tunganas. The Mlecchas, the Krurus, the Yavanas, the Chinas, the Kamvojas, the Darunas, the Sukritvahas, the Kulathas, the Hunas, the Parasikas, the Ramanas, and the Dasamalikas. Besides this country is the abode of many Kshatryas, Vaisyas and Sudra.

67—70. There are the Sudraviras, the Daradas, the Kasmeras, the Pattis, the Kasiras, the Atriyas, the Bharadwajas, the Stanopi Shikas, the Poshakas, the Kalingas and many other Kiratas, the Tomeras, the Hansamargas and Karamanjakas. These and other kingdoms are in the east and in the north.

71—72. O lord, I have briefly mentioned them. If the resources of the earth are properly developed, she is then like an all-yielding cow, from which the threefold objects of Dharma, Artha and Kama might be milked. Brave kings, learned in Dharma and Artha have become covetous of earth.

73. From the thirst of wealth, they would even abandon their lives in battle. Earth is the stay of creatures endued with celestial bodies as well as human bodies.

74. O foremost of the Bharata race, with the desire of enjoying earth they have become like dogs that snatch meat from one another.

75—76. O descendant of Bharata, their ambition is unlimited; it is for this the Kurus and the Pandavas are trying, to get possession of the earth by negotiations, by disunion, by gift and by battle. O foremost of men, if earth be properly treated, she becomes the father, the mother, the children, the sky and the heaven of all creatures.

Thus ends the ninth chapte[r] … tion of Bharata in … Vinirmana of th[e]…

4. The first of the Yugas is Krita. O lord, after the expiry of the Krita comes Treta, after Treta comes Dwapara. After that last of all comes Kali.

5. O foremost of the Kurus, O best of kings, the length of life in the Krita Yuga is four thousand years.

1. O ruler of men, the length of life in Treta is three thousand. In the present age, in this Dwapara, persons remain on earth for two thousand years.

7. O best of the Bharata race, in Kali there will be no fixed period for men's life on earth, they will die even in the womb or after birth.

8—11. O king, in the Krita Yuga, men are born and beget children by hundreds and thousands; they possess great strength and power and wisdom, wealth and beauty. Great ascetic Rishis, capable of great deeds and possessing high-souls, virtuous, and truthful are born in that age. The Khashtriyas of that age are handsome, able-bodied, greatly energetic, accomplished in archery, highly skilled in battle and very brave. O king, in the Krita Yuga, all the Kshatriya kings were lords paramount.

12. In Treta age are born brave Khashtryas who are subject to none who are long lived, who are heroic, and who wield the bow in battle with great skill.

13. O king, when Dwapara comes in, all the four orders of men become capable of great exertions. They possess great energy and they desire to … quer one another.

CHAPTER XI.

(BHUMI PARVA).

Dhritarashtra said:—

1. O Sanjaya, you have described to me Jamvukhanda. Tell me now its dimensions and extent.

2. O Sanjaya, tell me also of the extent of the oceans, of Sakadwipa, and of Kusadwipa,

3. Of Salmali Dwipa and of Krauncha-dwipa. O son of Gavalgani, tell me also of Rahu, Soma and Surya.

Sanjaya said:—

4. O king, there are many islands in this earth. But I shall describe to you only seven islands and also the moon, and the sun and the planets.

5. O king, the Jamvu mountain extends for full eighteen thousand and six hundred Yojanas.

6. The extent of the salt sea is said to be double of it. This sea is covered with many kingdoms. It is adorned with gems and corals.

7. It is adorned with many mountains that are variegated with metals of various kinds. It is circular in form like a sea, and is thickly peopled by the Siddhas and the Charanas.

8. O descendant of Bharata, O scion of the Kuru race, I shall now speak to you in detail of Sakadwipa. Hear as I discribe it.

of mything in detail.

Sanjaya said:—

13. O king, there are seven mountains in that island. They are decked with jewels, there are mines of gems and precious nes. There are many rivers in that nd. Hear, as I tell you their names.

14. O king, every thing there is charming and delightful. The first of those mountains is called Meru. It is the abode of the celestials, the Rishis and the Gandharvas.

15. O king, the next mountain stretching eastward is called the Malaya. It is there that the clouds are born, and it is from that place that they disperse on all sides.

16. O descendant of Kuru, the next is the large mountain, called Jaladhara. From it, Indra daily takes water of the best quality.

17—18. O ruler of men, it is from that water that we get showers in the rains. Next is the great mountain, called Raivataka, over which has been permanently placed in the sky the constellation Rohini. This arrangememt has been made by the Grandsire (Bramha) himself. O great king, on the north of this mountain, is one called Syama.

19. It is as bright as the newly risen clouds. It is high, beautiful and bright. O king, as the colour of that mountain is black, all the people that live there are dark.

Dhritarashtra said:—

20. O Sanjava, a great doubt has arisen in my mind. Why, O son of Suta, people of that country are dark?

Sanjaya said:—

21. O great king, O descendant of Kuru in all islands men may be found who are fair and those who are dark, and those also who are born by the mixture of the white and the black races.

22. But because the people are all dark there, that mountain is called the Dark mountain. O chief of the Kurus, next to this is the great mountain, called Durgasaila.

23. Then is the mountain, called Keshari. The breezes, that blow from that mountain, are all charged with effluvia. The height of this mountain is double of the one just mentioned.

24. O descendant of Kuru, it is said by the learned that there are seven Varsas in that istand. The Varsa of Meru is called Mahakasha, that of the water-giver (Malaya) is called Kumudattra.

25. That of Jaladhara is called Sukumara and that of Syama, called Manikanchana.

26—27. That of Keshara is called Mandaki and that of the next mountain is called Mahapunam. In the midst of that island is a large tree called Saka. In height and breadth that tree is equal to that of the Jamvu tree in Jamvudwipa. The people always worship that tree.

28. In that island there are many charming countries in which Siva is worshipped. The Siddhas, the Charanas and the celestial go there.

29. O king, the people there are all virtuous. O descendant of Bharata, all the four orders of men there are engaged in their respective duties. There occurs not a case of theft.

30. O king, being free from old age and death, and possessing long life, the people there grow like rivers in the rains.

31. The rivers there are all full of sacred water. Ganga herself, distributed as she is in various countries, is also there. Sukumari, Kumari, Sita and Kaviraka,

32. Mahanadi, the Manijala, Chakshas, and the river Vardanika, O descendant of Kuru, O best of the Bharata race,

33. These and many other rivers by hundreds and thousands all full of sacred water are there. O perpetuator of the Kuru race, Vasava (Indra) draws water from them to shower as rain.

34. It is impossible to mention the names and lengths of these rivers. All of them are the foremost of all rivers, and they are all sin-cleansing.

35. As every body has heard, in the island of Saka there are four sacred countries. They are the Mrigas, the Masakas, the Manasas and the Mandagas.

36. The Mrigas are generally Brahmanas engaged in the duties of their own. Many virtuous Kshatriyas are among the Masakas who grant every wish of the Brahmanas.

37. O king, the Manasas follow the duties of the Vrisyus. Having all their desires gratified, they are brave and firmly devoted to Dharma and Artha.

38. The Mandagas are all brave Sudras and they are all virtuous. O king, in these countries, there is no king, no punishment, and no person who deserves to be punished.

39. They are all engaged in the practice of their respective duties and they all protect one another. So much can be said of the Saka island and so much only could be heard of that greatly powerful island.

Thus ends the eleventh chapter, the description of Saka dwipa in the Bhumi of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XII.

(BHUMI PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O descendant of Kuru, O great king, I shall tell you what is heard of the islands in the north. Hear.

2. There is that ocean the water of which is Ghee. Next to it is the ocean, the water of which is curd. Next is the ocean, the water of which is wine, and then comes a ocean of water.

3. O king, the islands are double in area of one another as they proceed further towards the north. O king, they are surrounded by these oceans.

4. In the middle island, there is a large mountain called Goura which is made of red arsenic. O king, on the western island there is a mountain, called Krishna; it is a favourite abode of Narayana.

5. There Keshava protects celestial gems. From that place, when gracious, he bestows happiness on creatures.

6. O king, along with the kingdoms in these islands, Kusa grass in Kusadwipa and the Salmali tree in Salmalikadwipa a[re] worshipped.

7. O king, in the Krauncha islan[d] the mountain called Maha Krauncha whic[h] is a mine of all kinds of gems is always worshipped by all the four orders of men.

12. The intervening spaces betwee[n] [one] another of these six mountains incr[ease] in the ratio of one to two, as they proc[eed] further and further towards the north. [The] first Varsa is called Audbhida, the seco[nd] is Venumandala,

13. The third is Suratha, the fourt[h] Kamvala, the fifth is called Dhritimat, the sixth is named Probhakara.

14—15. The seventh is called Kapila. These are the seven successive Varsas. The celestials and the Gandharvas and other creatures of the universe take pleasure to sport in them. The dwellers of these Varsas never die. O king, there is not any robber or any Mlechha race there.

16—17. O king, all the dwellers are generally white in complexion. They are very delicate. O ruler of men, I shall describe all that has been heard by me. O king, hear with attention. O great king, there is a great mountain called Krauncha in the Krauncha island.

18. Next to Krauncha is Vamanaka, next to Vamanaka is Andhakaraka, next to Andhakaraka is that foremost of all mountains which is called Mainaka.

19—20. O king, next to Mainaka is that best of mountains called Govinda, next to Govinda is the Navida mountain. O perpetuator of the Kuru race, the intervening spaces between one another of these mountains increase in the ratio of one to two. I shall speak of the countries that are situated there. Hear as I tell of them.

21. The country near Krauncha is called ... that near Vairana is Mohanuga ... next to Mohanuga, O perpetuator of the Kuru race, is called Ushna.

22. Next to Ushna is Pravarka, next to Pravarka is Andhakaraka, next to Andhakaraka is named Munidesha,

23. Next to Manidesha is Dhunduvisana frequented by the Siddhas and the Charanas. O king, the people of this regions are white.

24. O king, all these countries are inhabited by the celestials and the Gandharvas. In Pushkara (island) there is a mountain called Pushkara, full of gems and jewels.

25. There dwells the divine creator of the worlds himself. All the celestials and great Rishis always worship him,

26. With gratifying words and respectful adoration. O king, various gems from Jambudwipa are used there.

27—28. O king, in all these islands Brahmacharjya, truth, self-control, also health and length of life are in the ratio of one to two as the island are more and more remote northwards. O king, O descendant of Bharata, the land in all these islands is but one country.

29—30 For it is said to be the one country in which is seen but one religion. The supreme lord of creation himself, lifting up the rod of chastisement always lives there and protects these islands. O king, he is their ruler, he is their source of happiness, he is their father, he is their grandfather.

31—32. O foremost of men, it is he who protects there all mobile and immobile creatures. O descendant of Kuru, cooked food comes there of itself and all creatures eat it every day. O mighty-armed hero, next to these regions is seen the region named Syama.

33-34. It is like a star in shape having four corners. O king, it has thirty three Mandalas. O descendant of Kuru, there live four great elephants adored by all. O best among the Bharata race, they are Vamana, Airavata, Supratika with rent temples and also another.

35. I cannot venture to calculate the proportions of these four elephants. Their length, breadth and thickness have ever remained unascertained.

36—37. O king, winds blow in these regions irregularly from all directions. These winds are seized by these elephants with the tips of their trunks, which are like the lotus in complexion, which are very bright and which they are capable of drawing up in this way. As soon as they seize them, they let them out.

38. O king, having been thus let out by these elephants, these winds come over to this earth, and for their coming creatures breathe and live.

Dhritarastra said :—

39. O Sanjaya, you have told me in detail about the first subject. You have also told me the position of the islands. O Sanjaya, tell me now the rest.

Sanjaya said :—

40. O great king, I have described to you all the islands. O Kuru chief, now also the what I say about the heavenly bodies late the about Sarbhanu. ot being

O sinless one, O descendant of Bharata, these are all the calculations of Arka.

47. The planet Rahu on account of its great bulk covers both the sun and the moon in due time (during eclipses). I tell you all this in brief.

48. O great king, with the help of the eye of science, I have told you all that you asked me. Be blessed.

49. I shall now tell you of the construction of the universe as narrated in the Shastras. Therefore, O descendant of Kuru, pacify your son Duryodhana.

50. O best of the Bharata race, hearing this delightful Bhumi Parva, a Kshatriya obtains prosperity, the fruition of all his desires and the approbation of the pious.

51—52. The king who hears this on the full-moon or the new-moon day and observes the vows with care, obtains long life, fame, and prowess. His ancestral manes become pleased. You have now heard of all the merits that flow from this Bharata Varsa in which we live.

Thus ends the twelveth chapter, the Uttara Kurus in the Bhumi of the Bhisma Parva.

Do not grieve. All this was pre-ordained.

7—10. Bowing down my head to your father (Vyasa) that wise son of Parasara, through whose grace I have acquired excellent and celestial vision, the power of seeing and hearing from a great distance, and knowing other peoples' hearts and also the past and the future,—the delightful power of going through the sky, also the knowledge of all the persons that violate the ordinances and also the power of not being cut by weapons in battle, I shall narrate to you the romantic and the highly wonderful and hair-stirring battle that was fought amongst the Bharatas,—now listen to me.

11. When the troops were arrayed according to the rule, when they were all ready for battle, O king, Duryodhana thus spoke to Dushasana.

12. "O Dushasana, let cars be immediately ordered for the protection of Bhisma. Speedily urge all our troops to advance.

13. What I have been thinking for many years has now come to me;—namely the meeting of the Pandavas and the Kurus at the head of their respective armies.

35. Who placed themselves just in front of him to protect him? Who were the heroes that protected the front of that brave warrior when he fought?

36. Who were they that placed themselves on his left and attacked the Srinjayas? Who were they that protected the irresistible ranks of his advanced guard?

37. Who protected the wings of that warrior who has gone away to his last journey? O Sanjaya, who were they that fought with the enemy's warriors in general engagement?

38. If he was protected by our warriors and if they protected by him, how is it that he could not defeat in battle the Pandava army,—invincible though it was?

39. O Sanjaya, how could the Pandavas succeed in striking Bhisma who was like Parameshti himself, that lord and creator of all creatures?

40. O Sanjaya, you tell me of the disappearance of Bhisma, that foremost of men who was our main stay and relying on whom, the Kurus were fighting with their Kurumen the L

' has that greatly powerful

49. That great intelligent one, who was not killed even by that slayer of hostile heroes, that Rama, the son of Jamadagni who defeated in battle all the Kshatriyas, has now been killed by Shikhandin.

50—52. There is no doubt the son of Drupada Shikhandin, who has killed in battle that best of the Bharata race, that hero skilled in the greatest of weapons, that brave and accomplished warrior learned in every weapon, is therefore superior to the invincible and greatly powerful son of Vrigu (Parashuram) in energy, prowess and might. (Now tell me) who were the warriors that followed that chastiser of foes in that great battle?

53. Tell me how the battle was fought between the Pandavas and Bhisma? O Sanjaya, my army, deprived of its hero, is now like a woman without a protector.

54—55. That army is now like a panic-stricken herd of kine deprived of its herdsman. When he who possessed prowess superior to that of every man, has fallen in the field of battle, (I guess) what is the mind of my army. O Sanjaya, what power is there in our life kings who are on my side and those who are on the side of the enemy, those that have joined the opposite parties of the battle. Alas, cruel are the Kshatriya duties as fixed by the Rishis, for the Pandavas desire to obtain the sovereignty by even causing the death of Shantanu's son and we too desire to obtain sovereignty by offering that great vow-observing hero as a sacrifice.

66. The sons of Pritha, as well as my sons are all performing the duties of Kshatriyas. Therefore none of them incurs any sin. O Sanjaya, even a very virtuous man should do it when a great calamity comes.

67—68. The display of prowess and the great strength has been considered to be the duty of a Kshatriya. How did the Pandavas oppose my father Bhisma, the son of Shantanu, that invincible but modest hero when he was destroying the troops of the enemy? How were the troops arranged and how did he fight with the illustrious enemies?

CHAPTER XV.

(BHAGAVATGITA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. O great king, you are in every way a deserving person. This question is worthy of you. You should not however lay blame on Duryodhana.

2. The man who suffers evil for his own misconduct should not attribute it to others.

3. O king of kings, the man who does all sorts of harm to other men deserves to be killed by all men for his these censurable deeds.

4. The Pandavas are thoroughly unacquainted with the ways of wickedness. For a long time looking up to your face, they (silently) suffered the injury and forgave them though exiled in the forest.

5--6. O king, O lord of the earth, hear of the Kuru army, ... and immeasurably the sun himself. ... has been seen

19. O best of the Bhârata race, O king, according to the orders issued by the son of Shantanu, Bhisma, all the great bowmen of royal birth who were on your side took up their respective positions.

20. Saivya, the ruler of the Govasanas accompanied by the chiefs marched on a great elephant worthy to be used by kings. It had a banner flying from its back.

21. The lotus-complexioned Ashwathama ever ready for emergency marched at the very head of all the troops with his standard that bore the device of a lion's tail.

22. Srutayudha, Chritasena, Purumitra, Vivinsati, Salya, Bhurisrava, and the car-warrior Vikarna,

23. These seven great bowmen clad in excellent armour and riding on their excellent cars followed the son of Drona but marched in front of Bhisma.

24. The golden standards of these warriors, beautifully placed at the flag-staff of their excellent cars looked highly effulgent.

25. The standard of Drona, that foremost of preceptors, bore the device of a golden altar, adorned with a water pot and a figure of a bow.

14. I do not think there is any thing more important in this battle than the protection of Bhisma. If properly protected he will kill the Pandavas, the Somokas and the Srinjayas.

15. That pure-souled warrior (Bhisma) has said, "I shall not kill Shikhandin. I have heard he was a woman before. For this reason he should be renounced by me in battle."

16. For this, Bhisma should be specially protected. Let all my soldiers take up their respective positions and resolve to kill Shikhandin.

17. Let all the troops for the east, west, north and south skilled in all weapons protect the grand father (Bhisma),

18. Even a highly powerful lion may be killed, if left unprotected, by an wolf. Let us not therefore allow (by any means) Bhisma to be killed by Shikhandin as a lion killed by a jackal.

19. Yudhamanyu protects the left and Uttamanjas protects the right of Phalguna (Arjuna). Thus protected by these two Phalguna himself protects Shikhandin.

20. O Dushashana, act in such a way that Shikhandin, who is protected by Arjuna and whom Bhishma will avoid may not (finally) kill the son of Ganga (Bhisma).

26—27. The seven divisions of the Pandava army were also protected by foremost of men. The two armies facing each other looked like two mighty oceans at the end of Yuga, oceans agitated by fearful Makaras and huge crocodiles. O king, we never before saw or heard of two such armies meeting each other as these two armies of the Kurus.

Thus ends the sixteenth chapter, the description of the troops in the Bhagavat Gita of the Bhisma Para.

CHAPTER XVII.

(BHAGAVAT GITA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Just as the holy Rishi Krishna Daipayana Vyasa said, so exactly in that manner those rulers of earth who had assembled there met together.

2. On the day on which the battle commenced the moon approached the constellation Magha. The seven large planets appeared in the sky like so many blazing fires.

3. When the sun rose, he appeared as if he had been divided into two parts. When that luminary rose in the sky he appeared to blaze forth in flames.

4. Carnivorous animals, jackals and crows cried from all directions which appeared in a blaze expecting to feed on (dead) bodies.

5—6. Every day the venerable grandfather of the Kurus (Bhisma) and the son of Bharadwaja (Drona) when they rose in the morning with concentrated mind, said "Victory to the Pandavas" Those chastisers of foes fought for your sake only because they had given the pledge.

7. Your father Devavrata learned in the rules of war duly calling all the kings before him thus spoke to them these words.

8. "O Khashtryas, this broad door is wide open for you to enter heaven. Go through it to the abodes of Indra and Bramha.

9. The ancient Rishis have pointed out to you these eternal paths. However fight in the battle with all attention.

10. Nabhago, Yayati, Mandhata, Nahusa and Vrigu all secured success and obtained the highest region of bliss by such feats.

11. In a Kshatrya to die of a disease is a sin. To die in the field of battle is his eternal duty.

12, O best of the Bharata race, having been thus addressed by Bhishma, the kings looked beautiful in their excellent cars. They then went to the heads of their respective troops.

13. O best of the Bharata race, the son of Vikartana Karna, with his friends and relatives, however, laid aside his weapons for Bhisma.

14. Then your sons and all the kings that were on his side without Karna marched making the ten points of horizon resound with their warcries.

15. O king, their troops looked splendid with white umbrellas, banners, standards, elephants, horses, cars and foot-soldiers.

16. The earth trembled with loud sounds of drums, tabors and cymbals and also with the clatter of the wheels of cars.

17. The great car-warriors adorned with golden bracelets and armlets looked as effulgent as so many hills of fire.

18. With his large palmyra standard with five stars, Bhisma, the Generalissimo of the Kuru army, looked as resplendent as the sun himself.

19. O best of the Bhārata race, O king, according to the orders issued by the son of Shantanu, Bhisma, all the great bowmen of royal birth who were on your side took up their respective positions.

20. Saivya, the ruler of the Govasanas accompanied by the chiefs marched on a great elephant worthy to be used by kings. It had a banner flying from its back.

21. The lotus-complexioned Ashwathama ever ready for emergency marched at the very head of all the troops with his standard that bore the device of a lion's tail.

22. Srutayudha, Chritasena, Purumitra, Vivinsati, Salya, Bhurisrava, and the car-warrior Vikarna,

23. These seven great bowmen clad in excellent armour and riding on their excellent cars followed the son of Drona but marched in front of Bhisma.

24. The golden standards of these warriors, beautifully placed at the flag-staff of their excellent cars looked highly effulgent.

25. The standard of Drona, that foremost of preceptors, bore the device of a golden altar, adorned with a water pot and a figure of a bow.

26. The standard of Duryodhana, that guided many hundreds and thousands of troops bore the device of an elephant made in gems and jewels.

27. Paurava, the ruler of Kalingas, Sudakshina, the ruler of the Komvojas, Kshemadhanyan, and Salya,—those great car-warriors took up their positions in front of Duryodhana.

28. Taking a position in the very front in a costly car with his standard that bore the device of a bull, the king of the Maghadhas marched against the enemy.

29. The large force of the people of the east which looked like the fleecy clouds of autumn was protected by the Anga prince and the greatly powerful Kripa.

30. Placing himself at the head of his troops with his beautiful silver standard which bore the device of the boar, the illustrious Jayadhratha looked highly effulgent.

31. One hundred thousand cars, eight thousand elephants and sixty thousand horsemen were under his command.

32. That large army with innumerable cars and elephants and horses under the command of the king of the Sindhus looked very grand.

33. With sixty thousand cars and ten thousand elephants the king of the Kalingas with Ketumat marched.

34. His elephants each looking like a hill adorned with machines, lances, and standards looked very beautiful.

35. The king of the Kalingas with his high fire-like effulgent standard, with his white umbrella and charanas looked exceedingly beautiful.

36. Ketumat also, O king, riding an elephant with a highly excellent and beautiful hook stood in the battle like the sun amidst the clouds.

37. King Bhagadatta, blazing in his own effulgence, marched on an elephant like the weilder of thunder (Indra).

38. The two princes of Avanti, named Vinda and Anuvinda who were considered as equal to Bhagadatta followed Ketumat on two elephants.

39—40. O king, Vuhas (particular formation), consisting of many cars were arrayed by Drona and the royal son of Shantanu and Drona's son and Valhika and Kripa ; the elephants formed the bodies, the wng, the heads and the horses the kiings. With face towards all sides, that fearful Vuha seemed to smile. It appeared to be ready to leap forward.

Thus ends the seventeenth chapter, the description of the troops in the Bhagavatgita of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XVIII.

(BHAGAVATGITA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O king, a loud uproar was soon after heard. It was made by the combatants ready to fight. It made alll hearts tremble.

2. With the sounds of conchs and drums, the roarings of elephants and the clatter of the car-wheels, the earth seemed to be rent into two.

3. The sky and the earth were soon filled with the neighing of horses and the shouts of the soldiers.

4. O invincible hero, the troops of your sons and those of the Pandavas both trembled when they met each other.

5. Elephants and cars decked with gold looked beautiful as clouds decked with lightning.

6. O king, the standards of various forms belonging to the warriors on your side, adorned with golden rings, looked like blazing fire.

7. O descendant of Bharata, these standards on your side and those on their side resembled the banners of Indra in his celestial mansions.

8. Those heroic warriors, all clad in golden armours and endued with the effulgence of the blazing sun looked like the fire or the sun.

9. O king, all the foremost warriors amonght the Kurus with excellent bows and arrows, with leathern fences in their hands and with standards

10. Those great bowmen with large eyes as those of the bulls all stood at the head of their respective troops. The following (heroes) of your side protected Bhisma from behind

11. . Namely Dushasana, Durvishaha, Durmukha, Dussaha, Viomsati and Chitrasena and that great car-warrior Vikarna.

12. Amongst them were Satyavrata, Purumitra, Jaya, Bhuresrava, and Sala. Twenty thousand car-warriors followed them.

13—14. The Avishahas, the Surasenas, the Sivis, the Vasatis, the Salyas, the Matsas, the Amvastas, the Trigarttas, the Kekayas, the Sanviras, the Kitavas, and the people of the eastern, western and the northern countries,— these twelve brave races, even reckless of their life, marched with the firm resolve to fight.

15. These heroes protected the grandfather (Bhisma) with a grand array of cars: with an army that consisted of ten thousand strong elephants.

16—18. The Magadha king followed that large array of cars. Those that protected the cars and those that protected the elephants, numbered six millions. The foot-soldiers, who marched in advance, armed with bows, swords and shields, numbered many hundred thousands. They fought with their nails and darts. O descendant of Bharata, O great king, your son's eleven Akshauhini of soldiers looked like Ganga separated from the Jamuna.

Thus ends the eighteenth chapter, the description of troops in the Bhagavatgita of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XIX.

(BHAGAVATGITA PARVA)—
Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. Having seen our eleven Akshauhinis placed in battle-array, how did Yudhisthira, the son of Pandu, make his counter-array with his troops which were smaller than ours?

2. O Sanjaya, how did the son of Kunti form his counter array of troops against Bhisma who knew all kinds of Vyuhas, those of the celestials, the Gandharvas, the Asuras and the men.

Sanjaya said :—

3. Seeing the troops of the Kurus placed in battle-array, the virtuous-minded son of Pandu, Dharmaraja Yudhisthira, thus spoke to Dhananjaya (Arjuna).

4. "We know from the words of Vrihaspati that few (troops) must be made to fight by forming them in a solid array, and many may be expanded according to pleasure.

5. When a few have to fight with many, the Vyuha should be made the Needle-mouthed. Our troops in comparison to those of our enemies are but few.

6. O son of Pandu, keeping always in mind this precept of the great Rishi, array our troops." Having heard this, that Pandava thus spoke to Dharmaraja Yudhisthira.

7. O foremost of kings, that immoveable Vyuha called Vajra which was designed by the wielder of thunderbolt (Indra), —that impenetrable Vyuha I shall make to-day.

8. He who is like a raging tempest, he who is irresistible in battle by any foe, that foremost of heroes, Bhima, will fight at the head of our troops.

9. That foremost of men who knows all the appliances of battle, becoming our leader, will stand in front of our army, and crush the prowess of the enemy's troops.

10—11. That foremost of all warriors, Bhima, will lead us,—seeing whom all the warriors, headed by Duryodhana, will fly in terror as small animals fly at the sight of a lion. Our fears being all dispelled, we shall all seek his shelter as if he were a wall, as the celestials seek the shelter of Indra."

12. There breathes none in the world who can cast his eye on that foremost of men, Vrikodara of fearful deeds, when he is enraged.

13. Having said this, the mighty-armed Dhananjaya (Arjuna), did as he said. Falguna (Arjuna), quickly placing his troops in battle-array, marched against the enemy.

14. Seeing the Kuru army on the march, the great Pandava army appeared like the full, immoveable and rolling and surging Ganga.

15. Bhimasena, the greatly powerful Dhristadyumna, Nakula and Sahadeva and king Dhrishtaketu become the several leaders of the (Pandava) force.

16. The king Virata, accompanied by his brothers and sons, and surrounded by one Akshauhini of soldiers, marched in the rear, and protected the army from behind.

17. The greatly effulgent twin sons of Madri (Nakula and Sahadeva) became the protectors of Bhima's chariot. The sons of Draupadi and the son of Subhadra—all possessing great heroism—protected him from behind.

18. Behind him stood Shikhandin, who was protected by Arjuna. O best of the Bharata race, he advanced with the firm determination to kill Bhisma.

19. Behind Arjuna stood the mighty Yuyudhana; and the two Panchala princes, Yudhamanyu add Uttamaunjas protected Arjuna's chariot, 20—23. Along with the Kekaya brothers and Dhristaketu and the greatly courageous Chekitana. Bhimasena, the wielder of the mace made of the hardest metal, moving with fearful speed, can dry up even the sea. " O king, (look) the sons of Dhritarashtra with their counsellors look on him". O King, pointing out Bhimasena, this was what Vibhatsu (Arjuna) spoke.

24. O descendant of Bharata, when Partha (Arjuna) was thus speaking, all the troops worshiped him on the field of battle with congratulatory words.

25. Then king Yudhisthira, surrounded by huge and various elephants each resembling a moving hill, took up his position in the centre of the army.

26. The illustrious Yajnasena the greatly powerful Panchala king placed himself behind Virata (king) with one Akshauhini of soldiers.

27. O king, the standards of those kings' cars bore various devices. They were all adorned with excellent ornaments of gold. They were as effulgent as the moon or the sun.

28. Asking the kings to move onward, the great car-warrior Dhristadyumna, accompanied by his brothers and sons, protected Yudhisthira from behind.

29. Shadowing all the great standards of the cars on your side, a huge ape stood (as standard) on Arjuna's car.

30. Many hundreds and thousands of foot-soldiers, armed with swords, spears and scimitars, marched ahead protecting Bhimasena.

31—32. Ten thousand elephants with juice trickling down their cheeks and mouth, each endued with great courage, each as huge as a hill, each blazing with golden caparisons, each emitting the fragrance of lotuses, followed the king like so many moving mountains.

33. The illustrious and invincible Bhimasena, whirling his fearful mace looking like a parigha (weapon), seemed to crush your son's army.

34. He was incapable of being looked at like the sun. He was scorching, as it were, the enemy's army. None of the warriors could even look at him from a near point.

35. This Vyuha, called Vajra, with its face turned to all sides, had, as it were, the bows (of the warriors) as its lightnings. This extremely fearful Vyuha was protected by the wielder of Gandiva (Arjuna).

36. Thus placing their troops in this counter-array, the Pandavas waited for battle. Protected as it was by the Pandavas, that Vyuha became impenetrable in the world.

37. At the dawn of day when the armies were waiting for the sunrise, a wind began to blow with drops of water. Though there were no clouds, yet the roars of thunder were heard.

38. Dry winds began to blow from all sides, carrying showers of sharp pointed stones and pebbles. A thick dust rose and covered the world with darkness.

39. O best of the Bharata race, large meteors fell ; and striking against the rising sun, they fell in fragments with loud noise.

40—41. O foremost of the Bharata race, when the armies thus stood in battle-array, the sun rose bereft of its splendour, and the earth trembled with loud sounds. The roars of thunder were again and again heard on all sides.

42—45. So thick was the dust that rose that nothing could be seen. The high standards (on the cars) adorned with strings of bells, decked with golden ornaments, garlands of flowers and rich cloths and graced with banners, and looking like the sun in splendour, being suddenly shaken by the wind, gave out a loud jingling noise like that of a forest of palmyra trees. Having thus placed their troops in battle-array against the army of your son, and sucking, as it were, the marrow of our warriors and looking at Bhimasena who stood at the head of the army with his mace in hand, it was thus that those foremost of men, the Pandavas, who ever take delight in battle, stood.

Thus ends the nineteenth chapter, the array of the Pandava troops in the Bhagavatgita of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XX.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. O Sanjaya, when the sun rose, of the two armies, one commanded by Bhisma and the other by Bhima, which first cheerfully met the other, desirous as they were both to fight ?

2. To which side were the sun, the moon and the wind adverse ? Against whom did the beasts of prey utter inauspicious sounds ? Who were those young heroes whose countenances were ever cheerful ? Tell me all this in detail.

Sanjaya said :—

3. O king, when placed in battle-array, both the armies were equally cheerful. Both the armies looked equally beautiful. They looked like two blossoming woods, and they were full of elephants, cars and horses.

4. O descendant of Bharata, both the armies were huge and fearful. None of them could bear the other. Both of them were arrayed as if they would conquer the very heavens. Both of them consisted of excellent soldiers.

5. The armies of Dhritarashtra's party stood facing the west, the Pandavas stood facing the east,—all ready for fight. The Kuru troops looked like the army of the Danava chief, while the Pandava troops looked like the army of the celestials.

6. The wind blew from behind the Pandavas. The beasts of prey yelled, from behind the troops of your sons. The elephants, belonging to your son, could not bear the strong odour of the juice emitted by the large (Pandava) elephants.

7. Duryodhana rode on a lotus-complexioned elephant with its temples rent, adorned with a golden Kaksha and clad in steel armour. He was in the very centre of the Kurus. He was being adored by eulogists and bards.

8—9. A white umbrella adorned with a golden chain, as effulgent as the moon, was held over his head. The ruler of Gandhara, Sukani, followed him with innumerable mountaineers of Gandhara. The venerable Bhisma was at the head of the army. With a white umbrella held over his head, with a white head dress (on his head) with a white bow and sword (in his hand), with a white banner (on his car) and with white horses (yoked to his car) he looked like a (great) white mountain.

10. In the division that was under Bhisma's direct command, were all the sons of Dhritarashtra, also Sala who was a countryman of the Valhikas, also all those Kshatriyas called Amvastas, also the heroic dwellers of the couutry of the five rivers.

11. The illustrious Drona, the preceptor of almost all the kings, with a bow in hand, and with never-failing heart, stationed on a golden car yoked with red horses, remained behind all the troops thus protecting them like Indra.

12. In the midst of all the troops fought Vardhakshatri, Bhurisrava, Purumitra, Jaya, and the Salyas, the Matsyas and all the Kekeyas with their elephant corps.

13. The son of Saradwata, the warrior who ever fights in the front, that illustrious great bow-man called Gautama, learned in all the modes of warfare, took up his position in the northern portion of the army with the Sakas, the Kiratas, the Yavanas and the Palavas.

14. That large force which was well protected by the great car-warriors of the Vrishni and the Bhoja races and also by the warriors of Saurashtra,—all well-armed and well-skilled in the use of arms,—the force which was under the command of Kritavarmana marched to the south of your army.

15. Ten thousand Sansaptaka car-warriors who were created for either the death or the fame of Arjuna, who were all greatly accomplished in arms, who intended to follow Arjuna at every step, marched out with the Trigarttas.

16—17. O descendant of Bharata, in your army, there were one hundred thousand elephants of the greatest fighting powers. To each elephant was assigned one hundred car-warriors, to each car was assigned one hundred horse men, to each horse man, ten bowmen, to each bow-man, ten soldiers armed with shield. Thus, O descendant of Bharata, were your troops placed by Bhisma in battle-array.

18. On every succeeding morning your generalissimo Bhisma, the son of Shantanu, sometimes placed your troops in the human, sometimes in the celestial, sometimes in the Gandharva and sometimes in the Asura Vyuhas.

19. With innumerable great car-warriors, roaring like the very ocean, the army of Dhritarashtra's son, arrayed by Bhisma, stood ready for battle, facing the west.

20. O king, your army looked terrible, but the Pandava army appeared to me very large and invincible, for Arjuna and Krishna were its leaders.

Thus ends the twentieth chapter, the description of troops in the Bhagavatgita of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XXI.

(BHAGAVAT GITA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Seeing the vast army of Dhritarashtra's son, the son of Kunti, king Yudhisthira, was filled with grief.

2. Having seen the impenetrable Vyuhas formed by Bhisma and having concluded it to be really impenetrable, the king became pale and he thus spoke to Arjuna.

3. "O mighty-armed hero, O Dhananjaya, how shall we be able to fight with the Dhritarashtra's son's army when the grandfather himself commands it.

4. Immovable and impenetrable is this Vyuha, formed according to the rules of the Shastras, by that chastiser of foes, Bhisma, of unfading glory.

5. O chastiser of foes, we are doubtful of success. How can victory be ours in the face of this (Kuru) army?"

6. O king, that chastiser of foes, Arjuna, thus spoke of your army to the son of Pritha, Yudhisthira, who was in great grief.

7. "O king, hear how a few men, endued with every quality can defeat a large army.

8. O king, you are without malice, I shall therefore tell you of the means. The Rishi Narada as well as Bhisma and Drona know it.

9. In the days of yore, at the battle between the celestials and the Danavas, the Grandfather himself said (the following) to Indra and the other celestials.

10. 'They that are desirous of victory do not so much conquer by might and prowess as by truth, compassion, piety and virtue.'

11. Therefore knowing the difference between piety and impiety and understanding what is meant by covetousness and having recourse to only exertion, fight without any arrogance; for victory is certain to be there, where righteousness is.

12. O king, for this reason, know that victory is certain to us in this battle. Narada said, 'Victory is certainly there where Krishna is.'

13. Victory is inherent to Krishna; it follows Madhava (Krishna); victory is one of his attributes, so is humility.

14. Govinda (Krishna) possesses might which is infinite. Even in the midst of countless foes, he is without and beyond all pains. He is the most eternal Purusha. Victory is certainly there where Krishna is.

15—16. In the days of yore, undestructible and invincible Hari appeared and thus spoke loudly to the celestials and the Asuras, 'Who amongst you would be victorious?' The conquered (the celestials) said, 'With Krishna in front we shall win victory.' It was through the grace of Hari that the celestials headed by Indra obtained (the sovereignty) of the three worlds.

17. Therefore I do not find any cause for sorrow. You have the lord of the universe and the lord of the celestials to wish victory to you."

Thus ends the twenty-first chapter, the colloquy between Arjuna and Yudhisthira in the Bhagavatg Gita of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XXII.

(BHAGAVAT GITA PARVA).—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O best of the Bharata race, then king Yudhisthira, after placing his troops duly in battle-array against the army of Bhisma, thus spoke,

2. "The Pandavas have now placed their troops in counter-array in the way laid down in the Shastras. O sinless ones, fight with fairness with the desire of obtaining the highest heaven."

3. In the centre stood Shikandin and his men protected by Arjuna. Dhristadyumna was in the front protected by Bhima.

4. O king, the southern division of the army was protected by that great bowman, the handsome Yuyudhana, that foremost of the Satwata heroes, who was equal to Indra himself.

5. Yudhisthira was on a car which was worthy of carrying Indra himself. It was adorned with an excellent standard decked with gold and gems. It was furnished with golden traces. He stood in the midst of his elephant corps.

6. His milk-white umbrella, with ivory handle, held over his head, looked exceedingly beautiful. Many great Rishis walked round the king uttering the words of praise.

7. Many priests, Brahmanas, Rishis, Siddhas, as they walked round him, chanted hymns in his praise. They wished him the destruction of his enemies by the help of Japas and mantras, efficacious drugs and various propitiatory ceremonies.

8. The illustrious Kuru chief then gave away to the Bramhanas kine, fruits, flowers, golden coins and cloths. He marched like Indra, the chief of the celestials.

9. Arjuna's car, furnished with hundreds of bells, decked with gold, fitted with excellent wheels, endued with the effulgence of fire and yoked with best steeds, looked as brilliant as one thousand suns.

10. On this (grand) car, which was driven by Keshava (Krishna) stood the ape-bannered hero with Gandiva (bow) and arrows in his hand,—a great bow man whose equal there is none on earth or none will be.

11—13. He who assumes the most terrible appearance for crushing your sons, he who without any weapon but only with his bare arms pounds to dust men, horses and elephants,—that mighty-armed Bhimasena, that Vrikodara, accompanied by the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva) protected the (Pandava) car-warriors. Seeing the invincible Vrikodara like a fearful lion of sportive gait, like a proud leader of a herd of elephants, like the great Indra himself, your soldiers, with their strength weakened by fear, began to tremble like elephants sunk in mud.

14. O best of the Bharata race, then Janardana (Krishna) thus spoke to that invincible hero Gudakesha standing in the midst of his troops.

15. "He who scorches us with his wrath, he who stays in the midst of his forces, he who will attack our troops like a lion, he who has performed three hundred Ashwamedha sacrifices, that banner of the Kuru race, that Bhisma, is yonder.

16. Innumerable troops cover him on all sides as the clouds cover the bright luminary, the sun. O best of men, killing the troops, fight with that foremost chief of the Bharata race.

Thus ends the twenty-second chapter, the colloquy between Krishna and Arjuna in the Bhagavatgita of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XXIII.

(BHAGAVATGITA PARVA).—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Having seen the army of Dhritarashtra's son approach with the desire to fight, Krishna spoke these words to Arjuna for his benefit.

The Deity said :—

2. "O mighty-armed hero, purifying yourself, utter, on the eve of battle, the hymn to Durga, so that you may defeat the foe."

Sanjaya said :—

3. Being thus addressed by the greatly wise Vasudeva, the son of Pritha, Arjuna alighted from his car and chaunted the following hymn with joined hands.

Arjuna said :—

4. O lord of the Yogins, O dweller of the Mandara forest, O identified Deity with Bramha, I bow to you. O Goddess free from decrepitude and decay, O Kali, O wife of Kapala, O Deity of black and brown colour,

5. I bow to you. O giver of benefits to your devotees, O Mahakali, I bow to you. O wife of the universal destroyer, I bow to you. O proud one, O rescuer from dangers, O possessor of every auspicious attribute, I bow to you.

6. O goddess who has sprung from the Katar ace, O worshiped of all, O fearful one, O giver of victory, O victory itself, O bearer of the banner of peacocks' plumes, O wearer of ornaments,

7. O wielder of fearful spear, O holder of sword and shield, O the younger sister of the cowherd chief, O eldest one, O goddess born in the race of Nanda gopa,

8. O lover of buffalo's blood, O deity born in the race of Kusika, O wearer of yellow robes, O devourer of Asuras, O lover of battle, I bow to you.

9—10. O Uma, O Sakamvari, O white-coloured deity, O black-coloured goddess, O destroyer of Kaitava Asura, O yellow-eyed one, O various eyed one, O smoke-coloured eyed one, I bow to you. You are the Vedas, you are the Srutis, you are the highest virtue. You are propitious to Brahmanas who are engaged in sacrifices, you possess the knowledge of the past, you are ever present in the sacred abodes erected in your honour in the Jamvudwipa.

11. You are the science of Brahma among sciences, you are that sleep of creatures, which has no waking, O mother of Skanda, O possessor of the six attributes, O Durga, O dweller of inaccessible regions,

12. You are described as swaha, as sadha as Kala, as kashta, as Saraswati, as Savitri, the mother of the vedas and as the science of the Vedanta.

13. O great goddess, with my inner soul purified, I adore you. Let, through your grace, victory always attend me in the field of battle.

14. You always live in inaccessible regions where there is fear, in places of difficulty, in the abodes of your worshippers and in the nether region. You always vanquish the Asuras.

15. You are consciousness, you are sleep, you are illusion, you are modesty, you are beauty. You are the twilights, you are the day, you are Savitri, you are the mother.

16. You are contentment, you are growth, you are light, you support the sun and the moon, you make them shine. You are the prosperity of those that are prosperous. The Sidhas and the Charanas see you in the Samadhi.

Sanjaya said :—

17. Knowing Partha's (Arjuna's) great devotion, Durga, who is always graciously inclined towards mankind, appeared in the sky. In the presence of Govinda (Krishna) she thus spoke to Arjuna.

The goddess said :—

18. "O son of Pandu, you will vanquish your enemy in no time. O invincible one, you have Narayana himself to help you.

19. You are incapable of being defeated by any foe, not even by the wielder of thunder-bolt (Indra).

Sanjaya said :—

Having said this, that boon-giving goddess disappeared.

20. The son of Kunti, (Arjuna), considered himself blessed by obtaining that boon. Partha then mounted his excellent chariot.

21. Then Krishna and Arjuna, both seated in one car, blew their celestial conchs. The man, who chants this hymn in the morning,

22—23. Has nothing to fear from the Yakshas, the Rakshasas and Pishachas. He will have no enemies. He will have no fear from snakes and all animals that have poisonous stings and teeth, and also from kings. He is certain to win victory in all disputes. If bound, he will be freed from the bonds.

24. He is certain to get over all difficulties, he is certain to be freed from thieves. He will ever win victory, and the goddess of prosperity.

25. He will live with health and strength for one hundred years. I have known all this through the grace of the greatly wise Vyasa.

26. Your wicked sons, however, having been entangled in the meshes of death do not, out of ignorance, know them to be Nara and Narayana.

27—28. Entangled in the net of death, they do not know that the last hour of their kingdom has come. Dwaipayana (Vyasa) Narada, Kanwa, the sinless Rama had dissuaded your son. But he did not accept their words. Where there is piety there are glory and beauty. Where there is modesty there are intelligence and prosperity. Where there is righteousness, there is Krishna, and where there is Krishna, there is victory.

Thus ends the twenty-third chapter, the hymn to Durga in the Bhagavat Gita of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. O Sanjaya, the warriors of which side first advanced to the fight? Whose hearts were filled with confidence and who were spiritless from melancholy?

2. In that great battle that makes every one's heart tremble, who were they who struck the first blow; were they my men or did they belong to the Pandavas? O Sanjaya, tell me all this in detail.

3. Among whose troops did the garlands of flowers and unguents emit fragrant scents? Whose troops with fearful roars uttered merciful words?

Sanjaya said :—

4—5. The warriors of both the armies were cheerful in the beginning. The garlands of flowers and unguents emitted equal fragrance. O best of the Bharata race, fearful was the encounter that took place between the troops arrayed for battle.

6. The loud sounds of musical instruments, mingled with that of the conchs and drums,and the shouts of brave warriors, that rose fearfully roaring at one another, were awful.

7. O best of the Bharata race, dreadful was the battle fought by the troops of both parties all staring at one another and all filled with joy. The elephants uttered terrible roars.

Thus ends the twenty-fourth chapter, the colloquy between Dhritarashtra and Sanjaya in the Bhagavat Gita of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XXV.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. What did my sons and the Pandavas do, O Sanjaya, when desirous of battle they all assembled on the holy field of Kukukshetra ?

Sanjaya said :—

2. Seeing the Pandava army in battle-array, Duryodhayana came to the Preceptor and said :—

3. " Behold, O Preceptor, the grand army of the Pandavas, drawn up in battle-array by your intelligent pupil the son of Drupada.

4. There are in it mighty bowmen, equals of Bhima and Arjuna in battle. There are Yujudhana, Virata and the great car-warrior Drupada.

5. There are Dhristaketu, Chekitan and valiant king of Kashi , Purujit, Kunti-Bhoja and that king of men, Sabhbya.

6. There are mighty Yudhamanyu, heroic Uttamaujas, Subhadra's son and sons of Draupadi, all great car-warriors.

7. O best of Brahmanas, learn, I shall tell you also for your information who are the most distinguished amongst us, and who are the leaders of my army.

8. Yourself, and Bhisma, and Karna, and ever-victorious Kripa ; Ashwathama, Vikarna and the son of Shaumadatta.

9. There are (besides these) many warriors, all well-skilled in the art of war and (all) armed with various weapons, ready to die for me.

10. Our army protected by Bhisma is unlimited (more than sufficient) ; their army protected by Bhima is limited, (may be sufficient).

11. Therefore all of you, place yourselves at the head of your respective phalanx, and protect (and support) Bhisma only."

12. Then the oldest of the Kurus, the mighty grandsire Bhisma, roaring like a lion, blew his conch, thus affording him (Duryodhana) great delight.

13. And then conchs, drums, trumpets and cymbals were all at once sounded, and there rose a great uproar (from all sides).

14. Then Madhaba (Srikrishna) and the son of Pandu (Arjuna) seated in a great car yoked with white steeds, blew their celestial conchs.

15. Hrishikesha blew the Panchajanya, Dhananjaya Debdatta, and the doer of fearful deeds, Bhima his great conch Paundra,

16. The son of Kunti, king Yudhisthira, Ananta Bejaya, and Nakul and Shahadeva Sughosha and Mani Pushpaka respectively.

17. The great bowman the king of Kashi, the mighty car-warrior Shikhandin, Dristadyumna, Virata, and ever-victorious Shatyaki,

18. Drupada, and the sons of Draupadi, and the mighty armed son of Subhadra, O king of all the world, each blew his conch seperately.

19. Echoing heaven and earth, the tumultous din rent the hearts of Dhritarashtra's people.

20. O king of the world, the ape-standard son of Pandu seeing Dhritarashtra's people marshalled in battle bent, and missiles having been just began to be discharged, raised up his bow, and spoke thus to Hrishikesh :—

21. " O undeteriorating one, place my car between the two armies,

22. While I see those who stand here desirous of battle, and with whom I shall have to fight in this war-struggle.

23. I shall see those who have assembled here to fight, wishing to do good to the evil-minded son of Dhritarashtra."

Sanjaya said :—

24. O Bharata, thus addressed by Gudakesh (Arjuna), Hrishikesh, placing the excellent car between the two armies,

25. In front of Bhisma, Drona and all the kings of the earth, said, " Behold, Partha, the assembled Kauravas."

26. Partha saw in the two armies fathers, grand-fathers, preceptors, maternal uncles, brothers, sons, grandsons, friends, fathers-in-law, and well-wishers.

27. Seeing in the two armies all friends and kinsmen (present), the son of Kunti was overcome with pity, and with great despondency said :—

28. " Seeing, O Hrishikesh, these kinsmen present here with the desire to do battle my limbs are languid, my mouth is dried up.

29. My body trembles, my hairs stand on end, my Gandiva (bow) slips from my hand and my skin burns.

30. I am unable to stand, my mind is whirling and I see, O Keshub, evil omens.

31. I don't see any good by killing kinsmen in this battle. I desire, O Krishna, neither victory nor sovereignty, nor pleasures.

32. What is sovereignty, what is enjoyment, what is even life to us, O Govinda, when those, for whose sake we wish to have sovereignty, enjoyments and pleasures (in this world),

33. Are all present here in this battle, giving up all hopes of life and wealth! Preceptors, fathers, grand-fathers and sons,

34. Maternal uncles, fathers-in-law. grandsons, brothers-in-law and relatives,—I do not desire to kill them, O Madhusudana, even if they kill me;

55. Not even for the sake of the sovereignty over the three worlds, much less for that of this earth! What pleasure will be ours, O Janardana, by killing Dhritarashtra's sons!

36. Even killing these felons, we shall incur sin. Therefore, it is not proper that we shall kill our own kinsmen, these sons of Dhritarashtra. How can we, O Madhava, be happy by killing our own relatives?

37. If they, blinded by avarice, cannot see the sin they commit by exterminating the (Kuru) race, and playing enmity with friends,

38. Why should we not, O Janardana, who know that sin is the result of exterminating the race, learn to desist from it?

39. On the extinction of a family, the old and ever continuing family-rites are destroyed, (no body being alive to solemnise them). When religious rites are thus destroyed, sin predominates over all.

40. From the pedominance of sin, O Krishna, women become corrupt, and then O descendant of Vrishni, cross-breeds (mixed-castes) are born.

41. Such cross-breeding leads both the exterminator of the race and the race itself to hell. The (deceased) ancestors whose sradha ceremonies have ceased, (to whom children have stopped to give food and water), fall (from heaven to hell).

42. Both the caste and family-rites of the exterminators of the race, (who are) guilty of the sin of cross-breeding, are destroyed.

43. We have heard, O Janardana, that those whose family-rites are thus destroyed, live for ever in hell.

44. Alas, we are engaged in committing a great sin! We are to kill our own kinsmen for the greed of the pleasures of sovereignty!

45. Better would it be if unretaliating and unarmed myself, the armed sons of Dhritarashtra kill in battle!"

Sanjaya said :—

46. Having thus spoken on the field of battle, Arjuna, with a sorrowful heart, sat down on the car, casting aside his bow and arrows.

Thus ends the twenty-fifth chapter, Arjuna's dejection of mind in the Bhagavatgita of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XXVI.

(BHAGAVAT GITA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. To him, whose heart was overcome with pity, whose eyes were full of tears, who was dejected and despondin g, the slayer of Madhu (Krishna) spoke thus :—

2. "Whence, O Arjuna, has come upon you in this great crisis such delusion,—a delusion unworthy of the Aryans, irreligious (undeserving of heaven) and breeder of infamy?

3. Be not effeminate, Partha. It does not suit you. Arise, O terror of foes, shake off this mean weakness of heart."

Arjuna said :—

4. "O slayer of enemies, O slayer of Madhu, how shall I attack in this battle with arrows Bhisma and Drona, deserving of my worship?

5. It is better for one to live on alms than to kill (such) preceptors of great glory. By killing preceptors, even if they are eager for worldly gains, it would be enjoying blood-stained pleasures.

6. We do not know which of the two is better for us,—to vanquish or to be vanquished? Even those, whom having killed we do not desire to live, those sons of Dhritarashtra, stand before us!

7. I am afraid of the sin of race extermination. I am confounded about my duty. I ask you,—tell me what is assuredly good for me. I am your disciple, instruct me; I am at your disposal.

8. Even if I get the undisputed sovereignty over the most prosperous kingdom of the world, or that over the celestials, I do not see that which can remove my grief most painful (killing) to my senses!"

Sanjaya said :—

9. Having spoken thus to Hrishikesh, O terror of foes, Gudakesh said to Govinda, "I shall not fight"; and remained silent.

10. To him, who was overcome with despondency in the midst of the two armies, Hrishikesha thus spoke smiling.

The great one said :—

11. "You grieve for those that deserve no grief; and (at the same time) you utter words of wisdom. (But) men of knowledge do not grieve for the living or for the dead,

12. Neither I, nor you, nor these kings were ever non-existent; (and again) none of us will hereafter cease to exist.

13. As childhood, youth and old age are (changes) in the body of man, so death is but a change of this body to another. A man of knowledge is not deluded by it.

14. The contacts of senses (with external objects), O son of Kunti, which produce cold, heat, pleasure and pain, are not permanent, having beginning and end. Therefore, O Bharata, bear them.

15. The man, who is learned in true knowledge, whom they (contact of senses) afflict not, and to whom pain and pleasure are alike, merits Moksha (final emancipation).

16. There is no existence of that which is Ashat (unreal), and there is no non-existence of that which is Sat (real). The truly learned men perceive the correct conclusion of the both.

17. Know, that which pervades all this (universe) is indestructible. None can destroy that imperishable (principle).

18. The (material) body (only) of the everlasting, indestructible, infinite and embodied Self is said to be perishable. Therefore, O Bharata, engage in battle.

19. He, who thinks that It (the great Self in man) is the killer and he who thinks that It is killed, both know nothing. It neither kills, nor is killed.

20. It is never born, It never dies; having existed, It does not exist no more. Unborn, everlasting, unchangeable, ancient, It is not killed, Its body being killed.

21. How and whom can that man, O Partha, who knows It (self) to be unborn, indestructible, everlasting and imperishable, kill or cause to be killed?

22. As a man, casting off worn-out clothes, puts on other new ones, so embodied Self, casting off old bodies, enters into other new ones.

23. Weapon does not cut It; fire does not burn It; water does not moist It, and wind does not dry It.

24. It is said that It is not to be cut, not to be burnt, not to be moistened and not to be dried up. It is everlasting, all-pervading, stable, firm, eternal, ever-continuing, not perceivable, inconceivable and unchangeable.

25. Therefore knowing It (the great Soul in man) to be such, you ought not to grieve.

26. (And again) if you think, O mighty armed, that It (Self) constantly takes birth and constantly dies, even then you ought not thus to grieve.

27. For, death is certain to one who is born; and birth is certain to one who is dead. Therefore, for such unavoidable things, you ought not to grieve.

28. In the beginning, O Bharata, all beings are unmanifest; in the middle they are manifest, and after destruction, they are unmanifest again. What lamentation could there be then for it?

29. One sees it as a wonder, another speaks of it as a wonder; others again hear of it as a wonder; but even hearing of it, no one understands it.

30. This indestructible embodied Self, O Bharata, is in the bodies of every one; therefore, you ought not to grieve for (the death of) all beings.

31. (And again) looking to your own duty pertaining to your caste, you ought not to waver; for there is nothing better for a Kshatrya than a righteous battle.

32. Happy are those Kshatrya who obtain such battle to fight,—a battle coming of itself and being the open gate to heaven.

33. If you will not fight this righteous battle, you will incur sin for abandoning your own duty and fame;

34. And all men will proclaim your everlasting infamy. To him, who is honoured, infamy is a greater (calamity) than death.

35. And all great car-warriors will think that you abstain from the battle through fear. You will be lightly thought of by those who honoured you before.

36. Decrying your power, your enemies will say things unutterable. What can be more painful than this!

37. If killed, you will attain to heaven; and if victorious, you will enjoy the whole world. Therefore, being resolved to fight, arise, O son of Kunti.

38. Considering pleasure and pain, gain and loss, victory and defeat, all the same, be ready for fight; and then, you will incur no sin.

39. The knowledge now imparted to you is relating to Sankhya (the mystery of knowing Self). Now listen to Yoga, (the mystery of living in Self), which, if well-possessed, O Partha, cuts off Karma bandhana (the law of re-births, resulting from the effects of actions).

40. In this (Yoga) even the first attempt is not fruitless; there are no obstacles in it. Even a little of this delivers one from the great danger (of worldly births).

41. In this, O son of Kuru, there is mind's but one state, consisting of firm devotion; whereas undevotional men's minds are many-branched and attached to endless pursuits.

42—43. Those that are not learned, those that delight in the Vedas, those that say that there is nothing else, those that are fond of worldly pleasures, those that regard heaven as the highest object for acquisition, say flowery words on the birth resulting from the fruits of actions, and on multifarious rites that promise to give wealth and enjoyments.

44. Devotional feelings never arise in those, whose minds have been stolen by the words of the lovers of enjoyment and wealth.

45. The Vedas, O Arjuna, relate of the three qualities. Be free from them,—by being unaffected by the pairs of opposites i. e., (heat and cold; pain and pleasure); by preserving courage; by being free from anxiety for new acquisitions; or from anxiety for the protection of old ones; and by being self-possessed.

46. The (water of the) small tank serves the same purposes as (that of) the great lake. Like the above, the Bramhana, learned in devotion, serves the same purposes as those of all the Vedas.

47. Your concern is only with actions, never with their fruits. Let not the fruits of actions be your motive. (At the same time) let not your inclination be towards naction.

48. Casting off all attachments, considering success and non-success the same, O Dhananjaya, perform actions. Such equanimity is called Yoga.

49. Religious rites, O Dhananjaya, is far inferior to devotion; therefore take shelter in devotion. The men who look to the fruits of their actions are pitiable.

50. Devotional men do not see the difference between good and bad works in this world. Therefore apply yourself to devotion. Cleverness in action is devotion.

51. The wise, possessed of devotion, giving up the fruits of action and being freed from shackles of births, repair to the place where there is no unhappiness.

52. When your understanding (mind) has gone beyond all delusion, then will you attain to the indifference to all that you have heard or will hear.

53. When your mind, confounded by (all) that you have heard, will stand firm in contemplation, then will you acquire devotion.

Arjuna said :—

54. "What are the characteristics, O Keshava, of one whose mind is steady, and whose understanding is devotional? How does the man of steady-mind speak, how does he sit, how does he move?"

The great One said :—

55. "When a man, O Partha, abandons all his mental desires, and becomes pleased in his self by his own self, is called one of Steady-Mind.

56. Who is not moved in misery, who has no cravings for pleasure, and who is freed from attachment, anger and fear, is called the Sage of Steady-Mind.

57. His mind is steady who has no attachment for any thing; and who neither feels exultation, nor aversion on receiving either the good or the bad.

58. His mind is steady who withdraws all his senses from all the (worldly) objects of senses, as a tortoise withdraws his limbs.

59. The objects of senses draw back from an abstinent person, but not so his passions. But the passions fly from him who has seen the Supreme.

60. The madly boisterous senses, O son of Kunti, steal by force the mind of even that wise man who is striving (for emancipation).

61. The man of Yoga solely depends upon Me, keeping all his senses under control. His mind is steady who has controlled his senses.

62. Pondering over worldly matters breeds attachment for them; from this attachment desire is produce; from desire anger is begot.

63. From anger is produced the want of indiscrimination; from want of indiscrimination, confusion of memory; from the confusion of memory, loss of reason ; and from loss of reason, final destruction (ruin).

64. The self-controlled man, who moves among the objects of senses, having his senses under his control, and being free from affection or aversion, attains to peace.

65. Peace being attained, all his miseries are destroyed. He, whose mind has attained to peace, soon becomes steady.

66. Undevotional man has no understanding, he has no contemplation, he has no peace. And where is happiness for him who has no peace ?

67. The understanding of that man is destroyed whose mind follows the roving senses, as the wind destroys a boat in a sea.

68. Therefore, O mighty armed, his mind is steady whose senses are brought under control from all objects of senses.

69. When it is night for all beings, the self-controlled man is wide awake ; when all men are awake, then such sages would see night.

70. He, in whom all objects of senses enter,—like the ocean in which various waters enter, but do not make any increase or decrease,—attains to peace, but not he who desire to have objects of senses.

71. The man, who moves about casting off all desires, and being freed from attachments, cravings for things, and egoism (pride), attains to peace.

72. This is, O Partha, living in Self (God.) After attaining it, no delusion exists ; and remaining in this state at the time of one's death, one attains to Brahma Nirvana."

CHAPTER XXVII

(BHAGAVATGITA PARVA)—

Continued.

Arjuna said :—

1. "If knowledge, O Janardana, O Keshava, is considered by you superior to action why then do you prompt me to this fearful action ?

2. You confound my mind by equivocal words, (praising action once and praising knowledge next). Tell me definitely what is good for me."

The great one said :—

3. "I have told you, O sinless one, there are two paths in this world, that of the Sankhyas by Jnana-yoga (knowledge) and that of Yogees by Karma-yoga (action).

4. Man does not attain freedom from action by not performing action. By asceticism also, he does not attain to final emancipation.

5. None ever remains for a moment without performing some action. All perform actions impelled by the qualities (laws) of Nature.

6. The deluded man, who, controlling his organs of actions, ponders in his mind over the objects of senses, is a hypocrite.

7. But he, who restraining his senses by his mind, performs Karma-yoga by the organs of actions, is superior (to all).

8. Therefore, always perform action, for action is better than inaction ; and your body cannot be supported (kept alive) without performing action.

9. The world is bound in (by the laws) of action, except the action of Sacrifice. Therefore, O son of Kunti, being free from attachment, perform actions.

10. In olden times, Creator, having created men with Sacrifice, said :—"Multiply by this. May it be the giver of all that you desire.

11. Please the celestials by this (Sacrifice) ; may the celestials please you. Thus pleasing each other you will attain to the highest good."

12. Being pleased by the Sacrifice, the celestials will give you your desired enjoyments. Therefore, he who enjoys himself without giving to the givers (celestials) is a thief.

13. The good men, who eat the leavings of the Sacrifice, are freed from all sins, but the bad men, who cook food for themselves, incur sin.

14. Creatures are the out-come of food. Food is produced by rain. The rain is produced by Sacrifice. The Sacrifice is produced by action.

15. Action is produced from Brahma ; Brahma is produced from the Imperishable. Therefore, all-pervading Brahma is always in the Sacrifice.

16. The sensual sinful man, who does not conform, O Partha, to this Revolving Wheel, lives in vain.

17. But the man, who is attached to his own Self, who is pleased with his own Self, and who is contented with his own Self, has no actions to perform.

18. He has no concern in actions done or not done in this world. Nor has he any dependence on any being.

19. Therefore, being freed from all attachments, perform actions. For, the man who performs actions without attachment, attains to the Supreme.

20. By performing actions alone, Janaka and others attained to final emancipation (Sidhwi). (And again) having regard to keeping the people to their rites, you ought to perform actions.

21. Whatever a great man does, so do the mass. What great men consider authorities, the mass follow.

22. There is, O Partha, nothing to do for Me in the three worlds. I have nothing to acquire which has not been (already) acquired ; still I do perform actions.

23. If, O Partha, out of idleness I do not engage in actions, all men would follow my example.

24. If I do not perform actions, all the worlds will be destroyed. I shall be the cause of cross-breedings, and I should be the ruining of the people.

25. Ignorant men act with attachment to actions ; but the learned act without attachment to actions. Desiring to stick men to their duties,

26. A wise man should not confuse the mind of the ignorant who are attached to actions. He should make them take to actions, by himself acting without attachments.

27. Every thing in every way is done by the qualities (laws) of Nature (alone). He whose mind is deluded by egoism considers himself the doer of actions.

28. But, O mighty-armed, the wise men, who know the difference (of Self) from qualities (laws of Nature) and from actions, feels no egoism, knowing that qualities deal with qualities.

29. The man of perfect knowledge should not shake the belief of the men of imperfect knowledge, who, being deluded by the qualities of Nature, form attachments to the actions done by the qualities (laws) of Nature.

30. Therefore, dedicating all actions to Me, and knowing the Mystery of Self, engage in battle without desires, without any feelings (for any body) and without any mental trouble.

31. Those men who without cavil always follow my this opinion, being full of faith, are released from Karmabandhanam.

32. Know, those men, that carp at my opinion and do not follow it, are devoid of conscience and bereft of all knowledge and ruined.

33. Even a man of knowledge acts according to his own nature. All beings follow Nature. What then restraints (of the organs of action) will avail ?

34. All senses have each their likes and dislikes for respective fixed objects. But no one should be under their control, for they are one's (great) opponents, (hinderances to final emancipation).

35. One's own Dharma, even if imperfectly performed, is superior to the perfectly performed Dharma of others. Death is preferable in performing one's own Dharma for the Dharma of others is dangerous."

Arjuna said :—

36. "Then, O descendant of Vrishni, by whom impelled does man commit sin, though unwilling, as if driven by (some mysterious) force ?"

The great One said :—

37. "It is desire, it is wrath, born of the qualities of Passion (Raja Guna). It is greatly ravenous; it is greatly sinful. Know this to be the great enemy in this world (for final emancipation).

38. As fire is enveloped by smoke, a mirror by dust, the fœtus by the womb, so this (true knowledge) is enveloped by Desire.

39. O son of Kunti, the knowledge is always enveloped by this constant enemy of the man of knowledge. Desire, is like an insatiable fire.

40. It is said that its seat is in the senses, in the mind and in the understanding. By their help it deludes man, enveloping his knowledge.

41. Therefore, O best of the Bharata race, bringing your senses under control, cast off this sinful thing which destroys both Knowledge and Science (experience).

42. It is said, great are the senses (over material body) ; greater than the senses is the mind ; greater than the mind is the understanding. That which is greater than the understanding is the (Self.)

43. Thus, O mighty-armed, knowing that which is greater than understanding, (i. e., Self), restraining Self by Self, destroy this unconquerable enemy, Desire.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

(BHAGAVATGITA PARVA)—

Continued.

The great One Said :—

1. "I told this imperishable (system of) Yoga to Vivaswata ; Vivaswata declared it to Manu ; Manu declared it to Ikshaku.

2. Coming down thus, from generation to generation, it became known to the royal sages. But, O terror of foes, this Yoga was lost to the world by long lapse of time.

3. You are my devotee and friend; I have, therefore, told you that old Yoga to-day, for it is a great Mystery."

Arjuna said:—

4. "Later is Your birth; prior is the birth of Vivaswata. How then shall I know that you first told it?"

The great one said:—

5. "Many births of yours and mine, O Arjuna, have taken place. I know them all, O terror of foes, but you know not.

6. Though I am unborn (having no birth); though I am imperishable, though I am master of the elements, yet out of my Maya (power of illusion) I take birth, resting on (material) Nature.

7. Whensoever, O Bharata, virtue languishes and sin predominates, I create myself.

8. I take birth, age after age, for the protection of the good and the destruction of the wicked, and for the establishment of piety (true religion).

9. He, who truly knows my these (wilful) births and wonderful deeds, after casting off his body, is not born again. He comes to Me.

10. Many holy sages, who are freed from attachment, fear and wrath, who are full of Me and who depend upon Me, have attained to my essence.

11. I bestow my favours (on all men) in the way in which they worship Me. All men, O Partha, follow in my path, in every way.

12. Desiring success of actions, men worship the Celestials (such as Indra &c), for in this world the success of action is soon attained.

13. According to qualities and (fruits of) actions, I have created four castes. Though I am their Creator, yet know me as being not a Creator and not perishable.

14. Actions do not touch me. I have no attachment in the fruits of actions. He who knows me as such is not tied down by actions.

15. Knowing this, men of old, desirous of emancipation, performed actions. Therefore, you too perform action, as was done by men of old in olden times.

16. Even men of true knowledge is confused about what is action and what is inaction. I shall speak to you about that action, learning which you will be freed from the (worldly) evils.

17. One must know what is action, one must also know what is forbidden action, and one must again know what is inaction. The nature of action is abstruse.

18. He, who sees inaction in action, and action in inaction, is a wise man, a Yogee, and a doer of all actions.

19. The learned men call him wise whose all actions are free from desires and will; and whose actions are burnt down by the fire of knowledge.

20. Getting rid of the attachment (desire) for the fruits of actions,—being ever contented, and depending on none, although (such men) engages in action, they do nothing at all.

21. Being devoid of desires and having the mind and the senses under control, casting off all concerns, he, who performs action for the preservation of the body, incurs no sin.

22. Being contented with what is earned spontaneously, rising superior to the pairs of opposites, being free from all jealousy, (such a man), being equable in success or failures, is not fettered by actions, although he performs actions.

23. The acts of the man who is devoid of attachment, who is free from passions and whose mind is steady in knowledge, are all destroyed.

24. Brahma is the vessel of libation, Brahma is the libation itself, Brahma is the fire, Brahma is the pourer of libation to him who thus meditates upon Brahma in all his actions, Brahma is the goal to which he proceeds.

25. Some Yogees perform the Sacrifice to the Celestials; others (however) offer up (such) Sacrifice in the Sacrifice of Brahma-Fire.

26. Others offer up in the fire of Self-restraint all his senses, such as the senses of hearing and others. Others again offer up the objects of sense, such as sound into the fire of senses.

27. Others offer up all the actions of the senses, and those of the life-breaths, into the Yoga-fire of self-restraint, kindled by knowledge.

28. Some perform the Sacrifice for gaining possessions, some the Sacrifice of penance; others again Sacrifice of concentration of mind; some perform the Sacrifice of Vedic study, some that of knowledge, others again the Sacrifice of asceticism of rigid vows.

29. Some offer up the upward life-breaths to downward life-breaths, and the downward life-breaths to upward life-breaths. Stopping up the motions of both the upward and downward life-breaths, some devote themselves to the restraint of the life-breath itself. Others, who take limited food, offer the life-breath to life-breath.

30. All these men, learned in the (various) Sacrifices, having their sins destroyed by Sacrifice, and eating the remnants of the Sacrifice, which is ambrosia, go to the eternal Brahma.

31. O best of Kurus, this world is not for those who do not perform any Sacrifice, what to speak of the future world!

32. Thus Sacrifices of various sorts are in the Vedas. Know them all as the results of actions; and knowing this, you will be freed (from the fetters of the world).

33. The Sacrifice of knowledge, O terror of foes, is superior to the Sacrifice for gaining possessions (in this world or in the future), for, O Partha, all actions are wholly and fully comprehended by knowledge.

34. Learn knowledge by reverently saluting the learned, by asking them questions, by doing service to them. The men of knowledge and the men that know the Truth, will teach you knowledge.

35. Having learnt it, O son of Pandu, you will not again fall into delusion. And by means of it, you will see all beings first in yourself and then in Me.

36. If you be the greatest sinner amongst all sinful men, you will (still) cross over the ocean of your sin by means of the boat of knowledge.

37. As, O Arjuna, a blazing fire reduces all wood to ashes, so the fire of knowledge reduces all actions to ashes.

38. There is nothing in this world which so much purifies (man) as knowledge. The man, perfected by Yoga, learns it within himself in time.

39. The man of faith, the man of assiduousness, the man of self-restraint, obtains knowledge; and obtaining knowledge, he gains the highest tranquillity (Mukti) without delay.

40. He, who is ignorant, who has no faith, and whose mind is full of misgivings and doubt, is lost. Not this world, not the next, not (any) happiness is for him whose mind is full of doubts.

41. Actions, O Dhananjaya, do not fetter him, who is self-possessed, whose doubts have been removed by knowledge and who has placed all his actions in Yoga.

42. Therefore, Oh descendant of Bharata, destroying with the sword of knowledge these misgivings of yours produced from ignorance, engage in Yoga of action,—Arise."

CHAPTER XXIX.

(BHAGAVATGITA PARVA)—

Continued.

Arjuna said :—

1. "O Krishna, you praise Karma Sanyasa (renunciation of action) and also Karma Yoga (the pursuit of action). Tell me definitely, which of the two is superior?"

The great One said :—

2. "Both renunciation of action and pursuit of action are means for emancipation. But of these two, pursuit of action is superior to renunciation of action.

3. He, who has no aversion and no desire, should for all times be considered an ascetic. For, O mighty-armed, he, who is free from the pairs of opposites, is easily released from the fetters of the world.

4. Fools, not wise men, say that Shankhya (renunciation of action to know God) and Yoga (pursuit of action living in God) are distinct. He who practises one, fully earns the fruits of the both.

5. The place which the follower of Shankhya obtains ; is also gained by the followers of Yoga. He sees truly who sees the Sankhya and the Yoga as one and the same.

6. O mighty-armed, asceticism is difficult to be attained without the Yoga of action. The sage, possessed of Yoga of action, attains to Brahma without delay.

7. He, who is possessed of Yoga, whose mind is pure, who is self-restrained, who has controlled his senses and who sees his self in every being, is not fettered by performing actions.

8—9. The man of knowledge, the man of Yoga, thinks,—I am doing nothing. When he sees, hears, touches, smells, eats, moves, sleeps, breathes, talks, throws out excretions, takes, opens and closes his eye-lids, he thinks that his senses (merely) deal with the objects of senses.

10. He, who performs actions, dedicating them to Brahma and casting off all attachments for their fruits, is not touched by sin, as the lotus-leaf is never wet with water.

11. The Yogees perform actions, attaining purity of self, the body, the mind, the understanding, even the senses, being free from all attachments.

12. The Yogee, abandoning the desire for the fruits of actions, attains to the highest tranquility, and the Non-yogee, being attached to the fruits of action, is tied down (to re-births) on account of desire.

13. The self-restrained embodied self (man), renouncing all actions by his mind, (but performing actions by his body) lives at ease within the city of mine gates, (his body) doing nothing and causing nothing to be done.

14. The Lord does neither create the capacity of action in man, nor the cause of actions, nor the connection of action and its fruits. The Nature only works.

15. The Lord receives no one's sins, nor virtues of any. Knowledge is enveloped by ignorance. For this reason creatures are deluded.

16. To those who have destroyed this ignorance by the knowledge of Self, this knowledge like the Sun shows forth the Supreme.

17. Those, whose mind is in Him, whose very self is He, who is devoted to Him, whose goal is He, depart, never to return, their sins having been destroyed by knowledge.

18. The truly wise men look on a Brahmana, endued with learning and humility, and on a cow, an elephant, a dog and a Chandala, as all alike.

19. Even here the material world is conquered by those whose minds rest on equability. As Brahma is faultless and equable, therefore they rest in Brahma.

20. The man, who rest in Brahma, whose mind is steady, and who is not deluded, does not exult on obtaining any thing agreeable or does not grieve for getting any thing disagreeable.

21. One, whose self is not attached to external objects, obtains the happiness that is in one's self; and he, having his self united with Brahma, obtains the happiness which is imperishable.

22. The pleasures, derived from objects of sense, are the sources of misery, and they have a beginning as well as an end. Therefore, O son of Kunti, a wise man does not feel any pleasure in them.

23. He who is able to bear the agitation of desire and wrath, even in this world, before the dissolution of the body, is united with God; he is happy.

24. That Yogee, whose happiness is within himself, whose recreations are within himself, and whose light comes from within himself, becoming one with Brahma, obtains Brahma Nirvana (Self extinction in God.)

25. The Rishis, whose sins are destroyed, whose misgivings are perished, who are self-restraint and who are engaged in doing good to all beings, obtain Brahma Nirvana.

26. Absorption in Brahma here in this world and hereafter in the next is obtained by those Yogees who are free from wrath and desire, whose minds are under control and who have the knowledge of Self.

27—28. The Yogee, who being intent to obtain emancipation, has restrained his senses, mind and understanding, who is freed from desire, wrath and fear, who, excluding from his mind all external objects of sense, directing his sight between the brows, mingles into one the upward and the downward life-breaths and make them pass through the nostril, is sure to obtain emancipation.

29. He, who knows Me as the enjoyer of all sacrifices and penances, the great Lord of all the worlds and the friend of all creatures, obtains peace."

CHAPTER XXX.

(BHAGAVATGITA PARVA)—

Continued.

The great One said:—

1. He, who performs actions that ought to be performed, regardless of their fruits, is a Sanyasi or Yogee, but not he who discards the sacrificial fire and abstains from all actions.

2. To the devotees who are free from desire and wrath, and a Yogee who has not renounced all his resolves,

3. To the sage who desires to rise to Yoga, action is said to be the means; and when he has risen to Yoga, Shamadhi (cessation of all actions) is said to be the means.

4. When one is no longer attached to the objects of sense, nor to actions, and when one renounces all his resolves, then is he said to have risen to Yoga.

5. One should elevate his self by self; one should not degrade his self; a man's self is his friend; and his own self is also his enemy.

6. To him, who has subjugated his self, his self has become a friend; but to him, who has not subjugated his self, his self behaves like an enemy.

7. The self of one who has subjugated his self, and who has attained peace, is absolutely fixed in itself in the midst of cold and heat, pleasure and pain, honour and dishonour.

8. That Yogee is said to have risen to Yoga, whose self is contented with knowledge and science (experience), who is unmoved, who is self-restrained, and to whom clay, stone and gold are alike

9. He is distinguished above all others who considers alike his well-wishers, friends and enemies, and those that are indifferent, and those that take part with both sides, and those who are objects of hatred and those that are related to him and those that are good and those that are wicked.

10. A devotee, remaining in a secluded place, should always devote his mind in contemplation, along with his mind, and self-restrained, with no expectations, and with no concern (with any thing.)

11—12. Fixing his seat firmly on a clean spot, not too high and not too low, and spreading over it a piece of cloth, a deer-skin and kusa (grass),—there, seated on that seat, with his mind fixed on one point, and restraining his mind and senses, one should practise contemplation for the purification of his self.

13. Holding body, head and neck even, unmoved and steady, and fixing his sight on the tip of his own nose, and without looking about in all directions,

14. With his self in tranquillity, freed from fear, adhering to the practices of Brahmacharies, he should restrain his mind, fix his heart on Me and sit down, regarding Me as his final goal.

15. Thus constantly devoting his self to abstraction and contemplation, the Yogee, whose mind is restrained, attains that peace which culminates in final absorption and assimilation with Me.

16. Devotion is not achieved by the man, O Arjuna, who eats too much, or eats nothing, who is addicted to too much sleep, or is always awake.

17. The devotion that destroys misery is achieved by the man who is temperate in food and amusements, who toils duly in all his works and who is temperate in both sleep and vigils.

18. When his mind, having been well restrained, becomes fixed on one's own self, then, that man, being indifferent to all objects of desire, is called a Yogee.

19. A light, in a place where there is no air, flickers not : this has been cited as a simile to a Yogee whose mind has been restrained, and who devotes himself to abstraction.

20. That (state) in which mind, being restrained, ceases to work, in which one, seeing the self by self, is pleased in self,

21. In which one experiences that infinite felicity which is beyond the sphere of the senses, and which Budhi (understanding) can only grasp, and adhering to which one never swerve from the truth,

22. Acquiring which one considers no other acquisition higher than it, and adhering to which, one is not moved even in the greatest misery,

23. That state should be understood to be called Yoga, in which there is a complete severence of all connection with pain. Such Yoga should be practised with steadiness, and with an undesponding heart.

24. Abandoning without exception all desires, that are produced from resolves, and restraining by mind only the entire group of the senses,

25. One should, by slow degrees, cease to think the objects of senses, with the help of his understanding, and controlled by patience, and then directing his mind to self.

26. Whereas the restless and unsteady mind wants to stray away, one should always restrain it and fix it steadily on the self alone.

27. To such a Yogee, whose mind is in peace, whose passions have been suppressed, who has become one with Brahma, and who is free from sin, highest felicity indeed comes by itself.

28. Thus constantly devoting his self to abstraction, a Yogee, being freed from sin, easily acheives the supreme happiness, —namely the contact with Brahma.

29. I am never lost to him, and he is never lost to Me, who sees Me in everything, and sees every thing in Me.

30. He, who has devoted his self to abstraction, looking alike on everything, sees his self in all creatures in his self.

31. He, who worships Me abiding in all creatures, and thinking that all is one, lives in Me, whatever may be the mode of his living.

32. The Yogee, O Arjuna, who casts an equal eye everywhere, looking alike pain and pleasure, and considering all things as his own self, and the happiness and the misery of others as his own, is deemed to be the best."

Arjuna said :—

33–34. "I cannot see, O destroyer of Madhu, how can this Yoga by-Equanimity, which you have declared to me, be made to have a continual existence. For, O Krishna, mind is fickle, boisterous, perverse and obstinate; and I think to restrain it is as difficult as to restrain the wind."

The great One said :—

35. "The mind, O mighty-armed, is surely difficult to be restrained, and it is restless. With constant practice, however, and with the abandonment of desire, O son of Kunti, it may be restrained.

36. It is my belief that devotion is difficult to be achieved by one who does not restrain his self. But it can be achieved through proper expedients by one whose mind is restrained and who is assiduous."

Arjuna said :—

37. "What is the end of him, O Krishna who has not earned success in devotion, being not assiduous, and having a mind shaken off from devotion, though full of faith?

38. Does he, O mighty-armed, having fallen from both, go to ruin like a broken cloud, being without support and deluded of the path to Brahma ?

39. It is you, O Krishna, who can entirely destroy this doubt of mine; for none else can destroy it."

The great one said :—

40. "O Partha, neither in this world, nor in the next such a man is ruined, for, O dear friend, none, who performs good deeds, comes to an evil end.

41. He, who has not been able to achieve Yoga, goes to the worlds of those who perform good acts. He lives there for many years, and is then born into a family of holy and rich men;

42. Or he is born into a family of intelligent devotees; for, such a birth as this is difficult to attain to this world.

43. There comes he in contact with the knowledge of Brahma, which belonged to him in his former life; and then, O descendant of Kuru, he works again for perfection.

44. Even though unwilling, he is led to work on for perfection on account of the devotional practice practised in his former birth. Although he only wishes to learn Yoga, he still rises above the fruits of action, laid down in the sacred word, the Vedas.

45. The devotee, having been cleared of his sins, attains to perfection after many births, by working with great efforts, and he then reaches the supreme goal.

46. The Yogee is considered to be superior to the ascetics who perform penances,—superior even to a man of true-knowledge; he is higher than the men of action. Therefore, O Arjuna, become a Yogee.

47. Even amongst all Yogees, he, who being full of faith, worships Me with his inmost self being intent on Me, is considered by Me, to be the most devout.

CHAPTER XXXI.

(BHAGAVATGITA PARVA)

Continued.

The great One said:—

1. "Now hear, O Partha, how you can, without doubt, know Me fully, by fixing your mind on Me, practising Yoga, and taking refuge in Me.

2. I shall now tell you exhaustively about Knowledge together with science (experience) knowing which there will remain nothing more (for you) in this world to know.

3. One only among thousands of men tries to get perfection; and even among those that are assiduous and have achieved perfection, only very few know Me truly.

4. (Earth, Water, Fire, Air, Space, Mind, Understanding, and Consciousness) thus is My Nature divided eight-fold.

5. But this is lower form of My Nature. Know there is another form of My Nature higher than this, which is animate and by which, O mighty-armed, the universe is upheld.

6. Know, that all things have these (Earth, Water &c.) for their source. I am the productive Cause and the destroying Agent of all the Universe.

7. There is, O Dhananjaya, nothing higher than Myself. All this is woven on Me like a row of pearls in a string.

8. I am the taste in water, I am the light in the Sun and the Moon; I am "Om" in all the Vedas, the sound in space, and manliness in man.

9. I am the fragrance in the earth, the refulgence in the fire; I am the life in all beings, and the penance in ascetics.

10. Know Me, O Partha, to be the ever-lasting seed of all beings. I am the intelligence of all intelligent men, and the glory of all glorious objects.

11. I am the strength of the strong who are freed from desire and thirst. And I am the love, O the Best of Bharata race, among all beings, unopposed to virture.

12. And all existing things of Satya, Raja and Tama Gunas (the qualities of goodness, of passion and of darkness), are all from Me. I am, however, not in them; they are in Me.

13. This whole universe, deluded by these three qualities, does not know Me, who am beyond them, and undecaying.

14. The Illusion of Mine, developed from the said three qualities, is marvellous; and difficult to transcend. Those, that resort to Me alone, cross beyond this Illusion.

15. Ignorant men, the doers of evil, and the worst of their species, being deprived of their knowledge by this Illusion and wedded to the state of demons, do not resort to Me.

16. O Arjuna, four classses of doers of good acts worship me, namely he who is distressed, he who seeks after knowledge, he who wants wealth and he who is possessed of knowledge.

17. Amongst these (four classes of men) he, who is the possessor of knowledge, being devoted, and having faith on only the One, is considered to be superior to the rest. For to a man of (true) knowledge, I am dear above every thing and he is dear to Me.

18. All these four classes of men are noble, but, a man, who is possessed of knowledge, is considered by Me as My own self. For he, with his self devoted to abstraction, has taken Me to be the goal than which there is nothing higher.

19. The man of knowledge reaches Me at the end of many lives, believing that Vasudeva is all this, (everything and all things of the universe). But such a high-souled man is exceedingly rare.

20. Those, that are deprived of knowledge by desire, reach other gods (divinities), by observing various (religious) regulations, and by being uncontrolled by their own nature.

21. Whichever form (of deity) a worshipper wishes to worship with faith, I make his faith steady in that form.

22. Endued with this faith, such a worshipper adores the deity (in that form), and obtains from it all that he desires, though they are really given by Me.

23. But the fruits thus obtained by men of no knowledge are perishable. Those that worship the divinities (gods) go to the divinities; while those that worship Me come to Me.

24. The undiscerning ones regard Me, who am really unmanifest, to have become manifest; because they do not know My transcendent and inexhaustible state, than which there is nothing higher.

25. Shrouded by the delusion of My inconceivable power, I am not manifest to all. This deluded world, knows not Me who am unborn and undecaying.

26. O Arjuna, I know the things that are past; I know all things that are present, and (I know also) all things that will be in the future. But there is none who knows Me.

27. All beings, O terror of foes, at the time of their birth, are deluded by this delusion arising, O Bharata, from the pairs of opposites, and from the results of desire and aversion.

28. But the men of meritorious acts, whose sins have all come to an end, worship Me, being freed from the pairs of opposites and firm in their faith.

29. Those, who depending on me, tries to obtain release from decay and death, know Brahma, the entire Adhyatma and all actions.

30. And they, who know Me with Adhibhuta, the Adhidaiva and the Adhiyajna, having their minds fixed in abstraction, know Me at the time of their departure (from this world)."

CHAPTER XXXII.

(BHAGAVATGITA PARVA)—

Continued.

Arjuna said :—

1. "What is Brahma, what is Adhyatma and what is, O best of men, Action? And again, what is (meant by) Adhibhuta, Adidaiva,

2. And Adhiyajna, and how (they are in this body), O destroyer of Madhu? And how, too, are you to be known by those who restrain their selves, at the time of their death."

The great one said :—

3. "The Brahma is the supreme, and the indestructible. Adhyatma is called Its manifestation, and the offering (to the divinities), which is the cause of the production and the development of all things, is called Action.

4. Adhibhuta is all perishable things. Adhidaiba is the (primal) Male-Being. And O best of men, Adhiyajna is I myself in this body.

5. He, who casts off this body and departs from this world, remembering Me in his last moments, comes to My essence. There is no doubt in it.

6. And again, whichever form of divinity he remembers when he finally leaves this body and departs from this world, to him, O son of Kunti, he goes, having habitually meditated upon him.

7. Therefore, think and remember Me at all times, and engage in battle. Fixing your mind and understanding on Me, you will surely come to Me. There is no doubt in it.

8. He, who thinks of the Supreme Divine Being, O Partha, with a mind not running to other objects, and possessing of concentration of mind in continuous meditation, goes to the Supreme Being.

9—10. He attains to that transcendent and Divine Being, who, possessed of reverence for Him, with a steady mind and power of devotion, properly concentrating the life-breath between the brows, meditates on that ancient Seer,—the ruler of all the minutest of the minute, the supporter of all,—whose form is inconcievable, whose brilliance is that of the sun and who is beyond all darkness.

11. I shall tell you briefly about the seat which the persons, learned in the Vedas, say indestructible, which is entered by ascetics, who are freed from all desires, and which, wishing to obtain, men follow the path of Brahmacharis.

12—13. He reaches the highest goal who casts off his body and departs, by stopping all passages (senses), confining the mind within itself, placing his own life-breath between the eye-brows, adhering to uninterrupted meditation, uttering the one syllable Om, which is Brahma, and thinking Me.

14. To that Yogee, O Partha, I am easy of access who always meditate on Me, by withdrawing his mind from all other objects, and who constantly practises abstraction.

15. Those high-souled men, who achieve the highest perfection, attaining to Me, do not again take birth, which is the abode of sorrow, and transient.

16. All (beings of all) the worlds, O Arjuna, from the world of Brahma, have to take rebirth. But, O son of Kunti, after attaining to Me, there is no rebirth.

17. Those who know the day of Brahma, as being of one thousand ages, and a night of his, as being of one thousand ages (yuga) know Day and Night.

18. On the advent of Day, all things that are manifest are produced from the unmanifest, and on the advent of Night, all things dissolve into that which is called unmanifest.

19. The same assemblage of beings, being manifest (born), again and again, dissolves on the advent of Night, and O Partha, on the advent of Day, they spring forth again, being constrained by the force of actions.

20. But there is another entity, unmanifest and eternal, which is beyond the unmanifest beings, and which is not destroyed when all entities are destroyed.

21. It is called unmanifest and indestructible; they call it the highest goal. Attaining to it, none has to come back.

22. The Supreme Being, O Partha, in which all beings dwell, and by whom an beings are permeated, is to be attained by faith, undirected to any other objects.

23. I will state the times, O best of the Bharata race, at which Yogees, departing from this world, go—never to return, or, to return.

24. Departing from the world in the Fire, the Flame, the Day, the Bright-Fortnight, the Six months of the norther Solstice, one, if he knows Him, goes to Brahma, (never to return again).

25. Departing from this world in Smoke, Night, the Dark-Fortnight, the Six months of the southern Solstice, one goes to the Lunar Light and returns to the world again.

26. The Bright and the Dark, these two paths are considered to be eternal paths in this world. By the one, one goes never to return; by the other, one goes to come back.

27. Knowing these two paths, O Partha, no Yogee is deluded, and therefore, O Arjuna, at all times, be possessed of oYga.

28. The meritorious fruits, prescribed in the Vedas, for sacrifices, for penances, for gifts,—knowing all this, a Yogee attains to it, the highest and primeval seat."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

(BHAGAVATGITA PARVA)—

Continued.

The great one said:—

1. "I shall now speak to you, O enviless one, all that mysterious knowledge, along with experience, by knowing which you will be freed from evil.

2. It is the chief science and the chief mystery; it is the chief means of purification. It is consistent with the sacred laws, easy to practise, directly apprehensible, and imperishable.

3. Those men, O terror of foes, who have no faith in this sacred doctrine, return to this mortal world without attaining to Me.

4. This whole universe is pervaded by Me in My unmanifest form. All things live in it.

5. And again all things are not in Me. See my divine power. Supporting all entities and producing all entities, My Self does not live in those entities.

6. As the great and ubiquitous atmosphere (without tainting) live, occupying space, so similarly all things live in Me.

7. All entities, O son of Kunti, attain to My nature at the end of a Kalpa. And again at the beginning of a Kalpa I bring them forth.

8. Controlling My Nature Myself, I bring forth again and again this whole assemblage of entities, which has no will of its own.

9. But, Arjuna, these acts of mine do not fetter me, I sit like one unconcerned and unattached to those actions.

10. Through Me, the supervisor, primal Nature produces all movables and unmoveables. Thus, O son of Kunti, the universe revolves.

11-12. Not knowing My supreme Nature, the deluded people of vain hopes, vain acts, vain knowledge, of confounded minds, of the delusive nature of Ashuras and Rakshashas, disregard Me as I have assumed a human body.

13. But high-souled and divine-natured devotees, O Partha, knowing Me as the origin of all things, worship Me with minds directed to nothing else.

14. Always glorifying Me, exerting themselves with firm vows, bowing down to Me with reverence, being always devoted to Me, they worship Me,

15. Others again, performing the Sacrifice of knowledge, worship Me as one, as distinct, as pervading the universe in many forms.

16. I am the Vedic Sacrifice; I am the Sacrifice laid down in the Smriti; I am the Sabda (mantra); I am the sacrificial libation; I am the fire; I am the offering.

17. I am the Father of the universe, its Mother, its Creator, its Grandsire. I am the Thing to be known, and the Means by which every thing is purified. I am the Om, the Rik, Saman and Yajus (Vedas).

18. I am the goal, the supporter, the lord, the on-looker, the asylum, the friend, the source, the support, the receptacle and the imperishable seed.

19. I produce heat; I produce and stop showers. I am immortality, and I am also death. I am, O Arjuna, that which exists and which does not exist.

20. Those, who know the three knowledges, who drink the Shoma juice, who offer sacrifices, and whose sins are washed away, seek admission into heaven. Reaching the holy world of the lord of the celestials, they enjoy the celestial pleasures of the gods in the celestial world.

21. And having enjoyed the pleasures of the extensive heaven, when their merits are exhausted, they again enter into the mortal world. Those that wish for the objects of desire, and act according to the doctrines of these Vedas, obtain going and coming (births and deaths).

22. I give new gifts to those men,—and preserve those that have been already acquired,—who worship Me, meditating on Me and who are constantly devoted to Me.

23. Even those, O son of Kunti, who endued with faith, worship other gods, worship Me though not in the regular way.

24. For I am the enjoyer, as well as the giver of fruits of all sacrifices. But they do not know Me truly, and therefore they fall from heaven.

25. Those who worship the Pitris, go to the Pitris, those who worship the Bhutas, go to the Bhutas, but those who worship Me, come to Me.

26. I accept leaf, flowers, fruit, water, from him who is pure, and who with faith offers them to Me, if they are presented with devotion.

27. Whatever you do, O son of Kunti, whatever you eat, whatever you sacrifice, whatever you give, whatever penance you perform, do it in a way which may be an offering to Me.

28. Thus will you be freed from the bonds of action, the fruits of which are both good and bad. With your self endued with renunciation and devotion, you will be freed (from the laws of rebirth), and you will come to Me.

29. I am alike to all beings. No one is hateful, none is dear to Me. In whatever way they worship, if they worship with reverence, they are in Me, and I am in them.

30. If even an exceedingly wicked man worship Me, without worshipping any one else, he should certainly be regarded as a good (man), for his efforts are well-directed.

31. Such a man soon becomes devout and virtuous-minded, and attains eternal peace. Learn, O son of Kunti, he, who is devoted to Me, is never lost.

32. Even those persons, Partha, who are of sinful birth, who are women, Vaishyas or Sudras, attain to the supreme goal, if they come to Me.

33. What then should I speak of holy Bramhins and royal sages who are my devotees? Having come to this miserable and mortal world, O Partha, worship Me.

34. Fix your mind on Me, become My worshipper, become My devotee, bow to Me. Thus making Me your goal, and devoting yourself to abstraction, you will certainly come to Me."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

(BHAGAVATGITA PARVA)—

Continued.

The great one said :—

1. "And again, O mighty-armed, listen to My words relating to the great Self. I tell them to you out of a wish for your welfare, and you, too, will be delighted with them.

2. The hosts of gods and great sages do not know my origin, for I am in every way the source of the gods and sages.

3. He, who knows Me to be unborn, free from delusion, without beginning, the supreme Lord of all the world, is released from all sins.

4. Intelligence, knowledge, absence from delusion, forgiveness, truth, self-restraint, tranquility, pleasure, pain, birth, fear and also security,

5. Harmlessness, equanimity of mind; contentment, penance, offering gifts, fame, infamy,—all these attributes of being arise from Me alone.

6. The seven great Rishis, and also the four ancient Manus, pertaining my nature, were all born from my mind, (by My mere thinking). From them are all things born.

7. He, who knows correctly these emanations and mystic powers of Mine, becomes possessed of unswerving devotion,—there is no doubt about it.

8. The truly wise man, endued with My nature, worship Me, believing that I am the origin of all, and from Me all things proceed.

9. Such men placing their minds on Me, devoting their lives to Me, instructing each other and speaking about Me, are always contented and happy.

10. To such men I give that knowledge by which they attain to Me.

11. Out of compassion for them I, remaining in their hearts, destroy, in such men, the darkness of ignorance, with the lamp of knowledge."

Arjuna said :—

12. "You are the supreme Brahma, the supreme asylum, the holiest of the holy, the everlasting divine Being, the first of gods, unborn, the great Lord.

13. All the Rishis, as well as the divine sages Narada, Asita, Devala, are thus. And you too, O Keshava, tell me yourself that it is so.

14. I believe all that you tell me, O holy one, for neither the gods nor the demons understand your manifestations.

15. O best of beings, Creator of all things, God of gods, Lord of the universe, you only know yourself by your great Self.

16. Kindly tell me without reservation your divine emanations, by which emanation you remain pervading all these worlds.

17. O you of mystic powers, how shall I know you by always meditating on you. In what particular entity (manifestation), should I meditate on you?

18. O Janardana, declare to me yourself, your powers and emanations, for hearing this ambrosia, I am not satiated."

The great One said :—

19. "Well, O best of Kurus, I shall declare to you my divine emanations, but I shall only tell you the chief ones, for there is no end of emanations.

20. O Gudakesh, I am the Self in the heart of every being. I am the beginning, the middle and the end of every thing.

21. I am Vishnu amongst the Adityas, all-resplendent Sun among all shining bodies. I am Marichi among Maruts, and the Moon among constellations.

22. I am the Shama Veda among the Vedas, I am Indra among the celestials. I am mind among the senses, I am the consciousness of all living things.

23. I am Shankara among the Rudras, I am the lord of treasures among Yakshas, I am Pavaka among the Vasus, and I am the Meru amongst the mountain peaks.

24. Know me, Partha, as Vrihaspati among family priests, and Skanda among commanders of forces. I am ocean among all waters.

25. I am Bhrigu among the great Rishis; I am Om among all words, I am Japa Sacrifice among all sacrifices. I am the Himalaya among mountains;

26. And the fig tree among all trees; I am Narada among celestial Rishis, and Chitraratha among Gandharvas. I am Kapila among all ascetics successful in Yoga.

27. Know me to be Uchaisraba amomg all horses, produced by the churning for ambrosia, and Airavata among the great elephants. I am king among men.

28. I am thunder among weapons; I am Kamadhuka among cows; I am Kandarpa that generates. I am Vasuki among serpents;

29. I am Ananta among Nags. I am Varuna among aquatic beings, I am Aryaman among the Pitris, and Yama among the dispensers of justice and punishment.

30. I am Pralhad among Daityas, and the Kala among those who count. I am lion among the beasts of prey, and Gadura among birds.

31. I am the wind among those that move, Rama among the wielders of weapons. I am Makara among fishes, I am the Ganges among all rivers and streams.

32. O Arjuna, I am the beginning, the middle and the end of all created things. I am the knowledge of the Supreme Self among all kinds of knowledge, and I am the argument of all debators.

33. I am the first letter of the Alphabet and Danda (copulative) among all Shamashes (compounds). I am the Eternal Time, I am the Creator with face turned to every side.

34. I am the Source of all that is to be. Among females, I am Fame, Fortune, Speech, Memory, Intellect, Courage, and Forgiveness.

35. I am Vrihat Saman among Sam hymns, and Gayetri among metres. I am Margasirsha among months, and among seasons I am the spring that is full of flowers.

36. I am the dice-game among cheats, I am the glory among the glorious. I am victory, I am industry, I am the goodness of the good.

37. I am Vasudeva among Vrishnis and Arjuna among the Pandavas. I am Vyasa among Rishis, and Ushanas among the Seers.

38. I am the rod of the chastisers, and the policy of those that seek victory. I am silence in secrets, and the knowledge of the learned.

39. I am, O Arjuna, that which is the seed of all things. There is nothing movable or immovable which can exist without Me.

40. O terror of foes, there is no end of my divine emanations; the extent of my emanations in part has only been declared to you to cite instances.

41. Whatever thing there is of power or glory or splendour, know them to be produced from portions of my energy.

42. O Arjuna, what have you to do, knowing all this at large? Know, I stand, supporting this entire universe with only a portion of my Self.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Arjuna said —

1. "The excellent and mysterious words, relating to the Supreme Self and the individual Self, which you have spoken to me, have removed my delusion.

2. O lotus-eyed one, I have heard elaborately from you the mystery of production and dissolution of things, and also about your inexhaustible greatness.

3. O great Lord, what you have said of yourself is even so (perfectly true). I desire to see, O best of beings, your divine form.

4. If, O Lord, you think that I am competent to see that form, then, O Lord of mystic powers, show me your inexhaustible form."

The Great One Said :—

5. "Behold, Partha, my forms by hundreds and thousands. They are various, divine, and different in colour and form.

6. Behold the Adityas, the Vasus, the Rudras, the Aswins, and the Maruts. Behold, O Bharata, innumerable wonders, not seen by you before.

7. Behold, Gudakesh, the entire universe of movables and immovables and whatever else you wish to see, all collected together in my this body.

8. But you are not fit to see Me with your these eyes. Therefore, I give you divine sight. Behold now my great mystic nature."

9. O great king, having said this, the mighty lord of mystic powers, Hari, revealed to Partha his great divine form.

10. With many mouths and eyes, with many wonderful aspects, with many celestial ornaments, with many upraised celestial weapons,

11. Adorned with celestial garlands and robes, embalmed with celestial fragrance, and full of every wonder; it is resplendent and infinite with faces turned on all sides.

12. If splendour of one thousand suns burst forth all at once in the sky, that would be something like the splendour of that great One.

13. Then the son of Pandu (Arjuna) saw the entire universe, divided and subdivided into many parts, but all collected together in the body of that God of all gods.

14. Then filled with amazement, Dhananjaya, with his hairs standing on end, his head lowly bowed down and his hands joined together, addressed the great God thus :—

Arjuna said :—

15. "I behold, O Great God, all the celestials and all the varied hosts of creatures. I behold Brahma seated on his lotus-seat; I behold all the great Rishis and divine Nagas.

16. O you of infinite forms, I behold you on every side with innumerable arms, bellies, mouths, and eyes. O Lord of the universe, O you of universal form, I do see neither your end, nor middle, nor the beginning.

17. I behold you immeasurable,—you whom it is difficult to look at. I behold you, bearing your diadem, mace and discus glowing on all sides, possessing a mass of energy, and being subdued with the effulgence of the blazing fire of the sun.

18. You are imperishable and the Supreme object of this universe. You are undecaying and the guardian of everlasting virtue. I find you the eternal great Being.

19. I behold you without beginning, middle and end. I behold you possessing infinite prowess and innumerable arms, having the sun and the moon as your two eyes, and the blazing fire as your mouth; I behold you heating the universe with your own great energy.

20. The space between heaven and earth and all the points of the horizon are pervaded by you alone. The three worlds tremble, O Supreme Self, at the sight of your this marvellous and fierce form.

21. Hosts of celestials enter into you; some perhaps being afraid pray with joined hands, saying Hail to thee. Hosts of great Rishis and Sidhyas praise you with innumerable hymns of praise.

22. The Rudras, the Adityas, the Vasus, the Saddhyas, the Viswas, the Aswins, the Maruts, the Ushmapas, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the Asuras, and hosts of Sidhyas see you; and they are all amazed.

23. O mighty-armed, all creatures are frightened, and I am seeing also your mighty form with many mouths and eyes, with innumerable arms, thighs, feet and bellies, and terrible on account of many tusks.

24. I can no longer command courage, or enjoy peace of mind, seeing your mighty form which is touching the very skies, which is fiery radiant, many winged, widely open-mouthed and with large and blazing eyes.

25. Seeing your mouth terrible with tusks and fearful as the all-destroying Fire at the final end of the Yuga, I cannot recognise the points of the horizon or command my peace of mind.

26. All the son of Dhritarashtra, together with the host of kings, Bhisma Drona and Suta's son, Karna, with even the principle warriors of our side, 27 Are quickly entering your terrible mouths, rendered more terrible by thy tusks. Some, with their heads crushed, stick at the interstices of your teeth.

28. As many currents of waters, flowing through different channels, roll rapidly into the ocean, so these heroes of the world enter into your blazing mouth.

29. As insects for their own destruction rush in increasing speed into the blazing fire, so these men, with unceasing speed enter into your mouth for their own destruction.

30. Devouring all these men from every side, you lick them with your flaming mouths. O Vishnu, your fearful splendour, filling the whole universe with your great energy, heat everything.

31. Tell me who are you with this fearful form. I bow down my head to you; be gracious to me, O chief of the gods. I desire to know you, Primeval One; for I do not understand your actions.

The Great One said :—

32. "I am (now) the full manifestation of Death, the Destroyer of the worlds. All these warriors, standing in different divisions, will cease to be, even if you do not kill them.

33. Therefore, arise and gain glory. Vanquishing the foe, enjoy this great kingdom. All these men are already slain by me. Be my instrument only.

34. Kill Drona, Bhisma. Jayadratha Karna and all these brave warriors, they are already killed by me. Do not be dismayed. Fight,—you will conquer your foes in battle."

Sanjaya said :—

35. Hearing these words the diadem-decked Arjuna, trembling, and with joined hands, bowed to Krishna. Making his salutations, overwhelmed with fear, he once more with chocked voice said to him.

Arjuna said :—

36. "It is quite natural, O Hrishikesha, that the universe is delighted and charmed in singing your praise, and Rakshasas are scattered away in fear and hosts of Siddhyas are bowing (at your feet).

37. And why should they not bow down to you, O Supreme Self, for you are greater than Brahma, you are the primal Cause. O Infinite One, O God of the gods, O Refuge of the universe, you are indestructible, you are that which is and that which is not, and that which is beyond both the existent and non-existents.

38. You are the First God, the Ancient Being; you are the Supreme Refuge of the world. You are the Knower and the Object to be known; you are the highest abode. O Infinite One, the whole universe is pervaded by you.

39. You are Vayu, Yama, Agni, Varuna Chandra, Prajapati and Grandsire. I bow down my head to you a thousand times. Again and yet again I bow down my head to you.

40. My salutation to you in front; my salutation to you from behind. O you All, my salutation to you from every side. You are all, your energy infinite, your prowess immeasurable; you embrace all.

41—42. O Krishna, O Jadava, O friend, O undecaying One, O Infinite one, I beg your pardon for whatever has been said carelessly by me, and whatever disrespect has been shown to you not knowing your greatness, and considering you friend from want of judgment or from love, either out of mirth or on occasions of play lying, sitting or at meals, while alone or in the presence of others.

43. You are the Father of the universe, of movables and immovables; you are the great Master deserving of all worship. There is none equal to you. How can there be one greater than you whose power is matchless in these worlds.

44. Therefore, O Lord, O adorable One, bowing to you, prostrating before you, I ask your grace. You should overlook my faults, O God, as father does his son's, a friend his friend's, a lover his lover's.

45. Seeing your this form unseen before, I have been delighted, but my mind has been frightened. Show me your ordinary form, O God. Be gracious, O Lord of the gods, O Refuge of the universe.

46. I desire to see you as before, with diadem, discus and mace. O you of thousand arms, O you of universal form, be of that four-armed form."

The great One said :—

47. "Being pleased with you, O Arjuna, I have by my mystic powers, shown to you this my Supreme form, glorious, universal, infinite and Primeval, which has been seen by none before, except now by you.

48. Except by you only, O Kuru warrior, I cannot be seen in this form by any one in this word,—not even by the study of the Vedas, or by sacrifices, gifts, actions or severest penances.

49. Have no fear or perplexity of mind at seeing my this fearful form. Freed from fear, with a joyful heart, behold my other form."

Sanjaya said :—

50. Having said all this to Arjuna, Vasudeva once more showed him his own ordinary form. The high-soulded One, once more assuming his gentle form, comforted Arjuna who was much agitated.

Arjuna said :—

51. "Seeing your this gentle human form, O Janardana, I have come to my right mind and to my normal state."

The great One said :—

52. "The form of mine, which you have (just now) seen, is difficult to be seen. Even the celestials are always eager to see my this great form.

53. Not by the study of the Vedas, not by penances, gifts or sacrifices, can I be seen in this form of mine which you have seen.

54. But by exclusive devotion to me, O Arjuna, O chastiser of foes, I can, in this form, be known, truly seen and attained to.

55. O Arjuna, he who does everything for Me, who has only Me for his supreme objects, who is freed from all attachments and who is without enmity towards any beings, comes to Me.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Arjuna said :—

1. "Of those worshipers, who constantly adore you and who meditate on you as Imperishable and Unmanifest, who are the best acquainted with devotion ?"

The great One said :—

2. "Those that constantly adore me, fixing their minds on me, and being endued with the highest faith, are considered by me as men having the greastest devoton.

3. Those, however, who worship the Imperishable, the All-pervading, Inconcievable, the Indifferent, the Immutable, the Eterenal,

4. Who, restraining the entire groups of senses, are equal-minded in respect of all things, and are engaged in doing good to all creature, come to Me.

5. Difficulty to attain me is greater to those who seek for the Unmanifest, for, the way to the Unmanifest is hard to find by man.

6—7. I, without delay, become deliverer from the ocean of this world of those, who, reposing all actions on Me and considering Me the highest object of attainment, worship Me, meditating on Me with exclusive devotion, and fixing their minds on Me.

8. Fix your mind on Me alone; place your understanding also on Me. You will thus, after death, live in Me; there is not the least doubt in it.

9. If, however, O Dhananjaya, you are unable thus to fix your mind on Me, then, try to obtain Me by devotion arising from continued application.

10. If you are not able even to have continued application, let your actions be performed for Me with your highest aim. For, by performing acts for My sake, you will attain to perfection.

11. If even this you are unable to do, then resort to devotion in Me. Subduing your Self, abandon the desire for the fruits of actions.

12. Knowledge is superior to application; meditation is better than knowledge; abandonment of the desire for the fruits of action is better than meditation; peace is the immediate result of such abandonment.

13—14. He is dear to Me who has no hatred for anything, who is friendly and compassionate, who is free fron egoism, who has no vanity, who is alike in pleasure and pain, who is forgiving, contented, always devoted, whose self is subdued, purpose is firm, mind and understanding are fixed on Me.

15. He is dear to Me, who is not troubled by the world, and the world is not troubled by him; and who is free from joy, fear and anxieties.

16. He is dear to Me who is pure, diligent, unconcerned, and free from all distress, and desireless for the fruits of actions.

17. He is dear to Me who has no joy, and no aversion, who neither grieves nor desires, who renounces both good and evil, and who is full of faith in Me.

18. He is dear to Me who is alike to friend and foe, in honour and dishonour, in cold and heat, in pleasure and pain, and who is free from attachments.

19. He is dear to Me who is taciturn, who is contented with anything that come to him, who is homeless, steady-minded, full of faith, and to whom censure and praise are the same.

20. Those who resort to this righteousness that leds to immortality, and which has been declared to you by Me,—such devotees of faith, who regard Me as the highest object for attainment, are the most dear to Me."

CHAPTER XXXVII.

(BHAGAVATGITA PARVA)--Contd.

The Great One said :—

1. "This body, O son of Kunti, is called Kshetra. The learned call him who knows it, Kshetrajna.

2. Know me, O Bharata, as Kshetrajna in all Kshetras. I consider the knowledge of Kshetra and Kshetrajna to be the true knowledge.

3. Hear from Me in brief what is Kshetra what it is like, what changes it undergoes, and whence it comes. Know also what is Kshetrajna, and what are his powers.

4. All this has, in many ways, been sung by many Rishis in various verses and well-settled texts, full of reason and indicating Brahma.

5. The elements, egoism, intellect, Nature, ten senses, the mind, the five objects of senses,

6. Desire, aversion, pleasure, pain, body consciousness, courage,—all these five have been declared to be Kshetra in its modified form.

7—8. Purity, constancy, self-restraint, forgiveness, uprightness, absence of vanity, ostentation and egoism, abstention from fear, indifference to objects of senses, perception of misery and evil of birth, death decrepitude and disease,

9. Freedom from attachment, absence of love for son, wife, home and the rest, and constant equanimity of heart in good and evil,

10. Unswerving devotion to Me without meditation on anything else, frequenting of lonely places and hatred for concourse of men,

11. The firm knowledge of the relation between the great Self and the Individual Self, perception of the object of true knowledge,—all this is called Knowledge; and all that is contrary to this is called Ignorance.

12. I shall now declare to you that which is the object of knowledge, and knowing which one obtains immortality. It is the Supreme Brahma, having no beginning, and who is neither existent nor non-existent.

13. (It is the Supreme Brahma) whose hands and feet are on all sides, whose eyes, heads and faces, are on all sides, who hears on all sides, who dwells pervading all in this world;

14. Who, being devoid of the senses, is possessed of all the qualities of the senses, who sustains all things but has no attachment for any thing, who having no attributes, possesses all attributes,

15. Who is within and without all creatures, immobile and mobile, who is not knowable, on account of his subtlety, who is remote yet near;

16. Who, being undistributed in any thing, remain as if distributed in every thing; who is the sustainer of all beings, and the destroyer and the creator of all;

17. Who is the light of all luminous bodies, who is beyond all darkness; who is knowledge, the object of knowledge and the end of knowledge; who is seated in the hearts of all.

18. Thus in brief Kshetra, Knowledge, and the object of knowledge are declared to you. Knowing all this, O my friend and devotee, attain to Yoga (assimilation with Me.)

19. Know that Prakriti and Purusha are both without beginnings; and know all modifications (of matter) and all qualities (pleasure and pain &c.) spring from Prakriti (Nature).

20. Prakriti is the source of the workings of causes and effects. Prakriti is the source of the capacity of enjoying pleasures and pains.

21. Self, dwelling in Nature (having a material body), enjoys the qualities that are born in Nature. The cause of the birth in good or in evil works is its connection with such qualities.

22. The Supreme Purusha in the (human) body is the surveyor, adviser, supporter, and enjoyer; he is the mighty Lord and Supreme Self.

23. He who thus knows Prakriti and Purusha with the qualities, in whatever state he may be, is never born again.

24. Some by meditation see the Self in his (own) self by (his own) Self. Some again (see) by Sankhya Yoga and some again by Karma Yoga.

25. Others again worship Him, hearing of Him from others, although they do not know this (Mystery of Yoga.) Even these men, if devoted to what is heard of the true Knowledge, pass over death, (and attain to final emancipation.)

26. O best of the Bharata race, know whatever entity, movable and immovable, comes into existence, it is out of the connection of Kshetra and Kshetrajna.

27. He sees truly who sees the Supreme Lord alike in all beings and who sees the Imperishable in the perishable.

28. For he who sees the Great Lord, dwelling alike in every thing and every where, does not destroy himelf by himself, and thus reaches the highest goal.

26. He sees truly who sees all actions worked by Nature alone, and self not to be the doer.

30. When one sees the various entities existing in One, and the birth of every thing from that One, he is then said to attain to Brahma.

31. This inexhaustible Supreme Self, O son of Kunti, without having beginning, and without having attributes, does not act at all. It is in no way stained, even when it remains in (human body.)

32. As Space for its subtility—and as it is ubiquitous—is never tainted, so Self, stationed in every body, is never tainted.

33. As the single sun, O Bharata, lights up all this entire world, so Purusha lights up the entire sphere of matters.

34. Those who, by the eye of Knowledge, know the distinction between Prakriti and Purusha, and the release from the nature of all entities, attain to the Supreme."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

The Great one said:—

1. "I shall again speak to you that great Science of all Sciences, that excellent Science, knowing which all the Rishis have attained to the highest (and final) emancipation from this body.

2. Resorting to this great Science, and thus attaining to My Nature, men have no more rebirths, not even at the time of a new Creation. They are not disturbed even at the dissolution of the universe.

3. The Great Brahma is the womb in which I place the germ. Thence, O Bharata, take place the births of all beings.

4. Whatever is born, O son of Kunti, of them is Brahma the womb, and I the seed-imparting Sire.

5. Satya, Raja and Tama, these three qualities of Nature, O mighty-armed, bind down the Eternal Self in the body of beings.

6. Amongst the three, Satya, from its untainted nature, from its being enlightening, and as it is free from mysery, keeps the Self bound with the attachment of happiness and knowledge.

7. Raja, having desire for its essence, is born of thirst and attachment; therefore, O son of Kunti, it binds the embodied Self with the attachment of work.

8. Tama is born of ignorance, and therefore it deludes all embodied selves. O Bharata, it binds the Self with error, indolence, and sleep.

9. Satya unites the Self with pleasure, Raja, with work; but, O Bharata, Tama, shadowing knowledge, binds Self with error.

10. Satya remains if Raja and Tama are repressed; Tama remains if Satya and Raja are repressed; and, Oh Bharata, Raja remains if Tama and Satya are repressed.

11. When in this body knowledge pervades all, then should one know that Satya has been developed.

12. When, O chief of Bharata's race, avarice, activity, fondness of works, want of tranquillity, and desire, are born in this body, then should one know that Raja has been developed.

13. When, O son of the Kuru race, gloom, inactivity, error, and delusion, are born in this body, then should one know that Tama has been developed.

14. When a man dies when his Satya is developed, he goes to the sinless region of those that know the Supreme.

15. Dying, when Raja prevails, he goes among those who are attached to works. Dying in Tama he is born in the womb that produces ignorant men.

16. The fruit of Satya is good and untainted; the fruit of Raja is misery, and that of Tama is ignorance.

17. From Satya is produced knowledge, from Raja avarice, and from [illegible] error, delusion and ignorance.

18. Those that live in Satya [illegible] those that are addicted to Raja live in the middle; and those that are of Tama, having the lowest quality, go down.

19. When an observing man comes to know these three qualities to be the only agents of all works, and recognises Him who is beyond all qualities, he then attains to My Nature.

20. The embodied self (man) by transcending three qualities, which are the sources of all bodies, attains immortality, being freed from birth, death, old age, decay and misery."

Arjuna said:—

21. "What are the characteristics, O Lord, of that man who has transcended the three qualities? What is his conduct? How can a man transcend these three qualities?"

The great One said:—

22. "He who has no aversion for knowledge, work [illegible] ignorance (the results of the three qualiti[illegible]) when they are present, and he who does not desire them when they are absent, has transcended the three qualities.

23. He, who remains all unconcerned, being not shaken by the three qualities, who sits and moves not, thinking that it is the qualities and not he, who is engaged in their functions, has transcended the three qualities.

24. He, to whom pain and pleasure are alike, who is self-restrained, to whom a sod of earth, a stone, a piece of gold, are all alike; to whom agreeable and the disagreeable are the same, to whom praise and censure are alike, has transcended the three qualities.

25. He, to whom honour and dishonour are the same, to whom friends and foes are alike; who has discernment, and who has renounced all self-exertion, has transcended the three qualities.

26. He who worships Me with exclusive devotion, transcends the three qualities and becomes fit for admission into the nature of Brahma.

27. For, I am the embodiment of Brahma of immortality, of imperishability, of eternal piety and ever-continuing felicity."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

The great One said :—

1. "They say that the Aswattha tree with its roots above and branches below is (like the) eternal. Its leaves are the Chhandas. He who knows it knows the Vedas.

2. Its branches which are enlarged by the qualities are stretched upwards and downwards; its sprouts are the objects of senses. Its roots, leading to actions, are extended downward to this world of men.

3—4. Its form cannot be known in this world, nor its end, its beginning, nor its support. Cutting this Aswattha of strong roots with a sharp weapon, one should seek for that place going whither none returns again,—resolving—"I shall seek the protection of that Primeval Sire from whom the original course of this worldy life has flowed."

5. Those that are free from delusion and pride, that have subdued the evil of attachments, that are steady in contemplation of the relation of the Supreme to the individual Self, from whom desires have gone away, and who is free from the pairs of opposites, go undeluded to that eternal seat.

6. The Sun lights not that place, nor the Moon, nor the fire. Going there none returns,—that is my Supreme seat.

7. An everlasting portion of Me (My Self), becoming an individual Self in this world, draws to itself the five senses with the mind as the sixth. They all depend on Nature.

8. When (this Self) the king of the body, assumes or quits the body, it departs taking them away, as the wind takes away the fragrance.

9. Presiding over the ear, the eye, the organs of touch, taste and smell, and the mind, It (the Self) enjoys all objects of senses.

10. Those that are deluded do not see It when It remains in the body, or when It quits it, when It enjoys, or when It is joined with qualities. But those see It who have the eye of knowledge.

11. Devotees who are trying to attain to emancipation see It in their own bodies. But those that are senseless, and whose minds are not restrained, do not see It, although they too are trying for emancipation.

12. The refulgence in the Sun which illuminates the vast universe, that which is in the Moon, and in the Fire, know It to be mine.

13. Entering into the earth I uphold every thing by My Force, and becoming savoury Moon, I nourish all plants.

14. Becoming the vital heat in the bodies of creatures, and mixing with the upward and downward breaths, I digest the four kinds of food.

15. I am in the hearts of all. Memory, and knowledge, and the loss of both, are all from Me. I am the objects of knowledge to be known from the Vedas. I am the author of the Vedantas, and again I alone am the object to be known of the Vedas.

16. There are two entities in this universe,—namely the Perishable and the Imperishable. All creatures are the Perishable, and the unconcerned One is the Imperishable.

17. But there is another, namely the Supreme Being, called Paramatma, who being the everlasting Lord, and pervading the three worlds, sustains them.

18. As I transcend the Perishable, and as I am higher than even the Imperishable, I am celebrated in the world and sung in the Vedas as Purushattama.

19. He, who without being deluded, knows Me to be this Highest Being, O

Bharata, knowing all this, worships Me with all thoughts.

20. I have thus, O holy one, declared to you this knowledge, the greatest of all mysteries. Knowing this, O Bharata, one becomes gifted with intelligence, and he has done all that he needs do."

CHAPTER XL.

(BHAGAVATGITA PARVA)—
Continued.

The Great one said :—

1. "Fearlessness, purity of heart, perseverence, Yoga meditation, gifts, self-restraint, sacrifice, study of the Vedas, penances, uprightness,

2. Non-doing of injury, truth, freedom from anger, renunciation, tranquillity, freedom from fault-finding, compassion for all, absence of covetousness, gentleness, modesty, absence of restlessness,

3. Vigour, forgiveness, firmness, cleanliness, absence of quarrelsomeness, freedom from vanity,—O Bharata, all these belong to him who is god-like.

4. Hypocrisy, pride, conceit, wrath, rudeness, and ignorance, O Partha, belong to him who is demoniac.

5. Godliness is considered to be the means for emancipation, and demoniacness for bondage of births. You need not grieve, O son of Pandu, for you are born to be god-like.

6. There are two kinds of created beings in this world, namely God-like and demoniac.

7. The Godlike has been fully described by me. Now hear from me, Partha, something of the demoniac. Persons of demoniac nature know not what is action and what is inaction. Neither purity, nor good conduct, nor truth exists in them.

8. The demoniac say, the universe is void of truth, of a guiding principle and of a ruler. They say universe has been produced only by the union of one another, and by lust.

9. Believing and depending on this, these men of lost self, of little intelligence, and of fearful deeds, these enemies of the world, are born for the destruction of the piety of the universe.

10. Being endued with hypocrisy, conceit and folly, and cherishing insatiable desires, they believe in false things, and perform sinful practices.

11. Cherishing boundless thoughts,—thoughts which are limited by death only,—and considering the enjoyment of their desires as the highest aim of life,—they believe that this is all.

12. Bound in hundred nooses of Hope, and addicted to lust and wrath,—they eagerly desire to possess unfair hoards of wealth, so that they may gratify their desires.

13. This is obtained to-day by Me,—I shall obtain this to-morrow,—I have this wealth,—this wealth again will be mine in addition to what I already possess,—

14. This enemy of mine has been killed by Me,—I shall kill other enemies also,—I am the lord,—I am the enjoyer,—I am successful,—I am powerful and happy,—

15. I am wealthy,—I am nobly born,—who is there in this world as I am,—I shall sacrifice,—I shall make gifts,—I shall be merry,—(thus say the demoniac), deluded by ignorance.

16. Tossed about by innumerable thoughts, enveloped by delusion, and attached to the enjoyment of desires, these men sink into the lowliest hell.

17. These men, being self-conceited, stubborn, and full of pride and intoxication of wealth, perform Sacrifices, that are nominal, that rest on hypocrisy, and do not follow the prescribed rules.

18. These men, the servitors, being full of vanity, power, pride, lust and wrath, hate Me in their own bodies as well as in those of others.

19. These cruel haters of Me, these sinful, vilest men among men, are hurled continually down by Me into demoniac wombs (to be demoniac in their next births).

20. O son of Kunti, these men, taking births into demoniac womb, deluded birth after birth, go down to the vilest state.

21. Threefold is the way to hell, ever ruinous to self, namely, lust, wrath and avarice. Therefore, one should, above all, renounce these three.

22. Being freed from these three gates of darkness, O son of Kunti, a man works out his own good. He then reaches the highest goal.

28. He who renounces the ordinances of the Vedas, acts only under the impulse of desire. Such a man can never attain to perfection, happiness, or the highest goal.

24. Therefore, the Vedas should be your authority in determining what you should do, and what you should not do. It is your duty to work in this world, having ascertained what are the ordinances of the Vedas."

CHAPTER XLI.

(BHAGAVATGITA PARVA)—
Continued.

Arjuna said:—

1. "What is the state, Krishna, of those that neglects the ordinance of the scriptures, and perform sacrifices with faith? Is it one of Satya, Raja, or Tama?"

The great one said:—

2. "The faith of man is of three kinds. They are born according to his individual nature. They are also of Satya, Raja, and Tama. Hear what they are.

3. The faith of man, O Bharata, is according to his own nature. A man may be full of faith, and as his faith is, so he will be.

4. Those who are of the Satya quality worship the celestials; those of Raja worship Yakshas and Rakshas, and those of Tama do the same to departed spirits and ghosts.

5. Those who practise severe penances not ordained by the Vedas, who are full of hypocrisy and pride, desire, attachment and violence,

6. Who has no discernment, but who torture their physical organs, thereby torturing Me who seat within the body, should be known to be of demoniac nature.

7. Food which is dear to all is also of three kinds. Sacrifice, penance, and gifts are also of three kinds. Hear from Me their distinction.

8. The food that increases longivity, energy, strength, health, and well-being and joy, and which is savoury, indigenous, nutritive and agreeable, is liked by men of Satya nature.

9. The food which is bitter, sour, salted, over-hot, pungent, dry and burning, and which produces pain, grief and disease, is desired by a man of Raja temperament.

10. The food which is cold, not savoury, stinky, corrupt, filthy and a refuse, is liked by men of Tama.

11. Satya Sacrifice is one which, being prescribed by the Shastras, is performed by a man who desires no fruit from it, and who performs it by believing it to be only a duty.

12. But, O chief son of Bharata, Raja Sacrifice is that which is performed in expectation of receiving fruits from it and for ostentatious show.

13. And Tama sacrifice is that which is performed against the ordinances of the Shastras in which food is not distributed; Mantras are not recited, fees are not paid to the assisting priests and which is void of faith.

14. Reverence to Celestials, regenerate ones, preceptors, and learned men, and purity, uprightness, the practices of a Brahmachari, and abstention from injury, constitute the penance of body.

15. The words that does not disturb any body and which is agreeable, true and beneficial, and the diligent study of the Vedas, is the penance of speech.

16. Serenity of mind, gentleness, taciturnity, self-restraint, and purity of disposition, constitute the penance of mind.

17. Now Satya Penance is that in which this three-fold penance is performed with perfect faith, with devotion and without the desire for fruit.

18. Raja Penance is that which is performed with hypocrisy for gaining respect, honour, and revenue, and which is unstable and transient.

19. Tama Penance is that which is performed under a deluded belief, and with torture of one's self, and for the destruction of another.

20. Satya gift is that which is given because it ought to be given; it is given to one who cannot return it in any way; it is given in a proper place, at a proper time, and to a proper person.

21. Raja gift is that which is given reluctantly, for return of some sort of service or benefit, and with an eye to fruit.

22. Tama gift is that which is given without respect and with contempt to an unworthy object in an improper place and at an improper time.

23. OM, TAT, SAT, these are the three-fold designation of Brahma. The Brahmanas, the Vedas and the Jagmas are all ordained in ancient time by Brahma.

24. Therefore, uttering the syllable OM, all utterers of Brahma begin their sacrifices, gifts and penances, as ordained in the Shastras.

25. Uttering TAT, the various sacrifices, gifts and penances are performed by those who desire emancipation, and who do it without expectation of fruit.

26. SAT denotes existence and goodness, O Partha; it is used in any suspicious acts.

27. Constancy in sacrifices, penances and gifts is also called SAT. For its sake an act is also called SAT.

28. Whatever oblation is offered in a sacrifice, whatever is given away, whatever penance is performed, and whatever is done, if done without faith, is, O Partha, the opposite of SAT. It (opposite of SAT,) will do no good to the life in this world or hereafter in the next."

CHAPTER XLII.

(BHAGAVATGITA PARVA)—Contd.

Arjuna said:—

1. "O mighty-armed, I desire to know the true nature of Sanyasa (Renunciation) and Tyaga (Abandonment). O slayer of Keshi, I want to know them distinctly."

The great one said:—

2. "Rejection of works with some desire is known by the learned as Sanyasa. But the abandonment of the desire for the fruit of all works, is called Tyaga, by the discerning man.

3. Some wise men say that work itself should be abandoned considering it to be evil; others say that the works of sacrifice, gifts and penance should not be renounced.

4. O best of Bharata's son, listen to my opinion about Tyaga, for O powerful of men, Tyaga is of three kinds.

5. The works of sacrifice, gifts and penance should not be renounced. They should indeed be performed, for, sacrifices, gifts and penances are the means for the purification of the wise.

6. But these works should be performed without attachment and without the desire for fruit. Partha, this is my decided opinion.

7. The Renunciation of work is not proper. It is the result of delusion and arises from Tama.

8. When work is abandoned from bodily fear and from the consideration of pain, such abandonment arises from Raja, and one who makes such abandonment never obtains the fruit of Tyaga.

9. The abandonment of attachment and the fruit of actions which are performed, because they are prescribed in the Shastras, O Arjuna, is considered to be of the quality of Satya.

10. He, who has such Tyaga, being possessed of intelligence and with doubts dispelled, has no aversion for an unpleasant action, and has no attachment for pleasant ones.

11. Actions cannot be absolutely abandoned by man; therefore he, who abandons the fruit of actions, is a true Tyagee.

12. Those, that do not abandon the desire for the fruit of actions, have after death threefold fruits,—good, bad and indifferent.

13. Listen to me, O mighty-armed, (I shall declare to you) the five causes for the completion of actions, as told in the Sankhya which treats with the annihilation of actions.

14. Substratum (body), Agent (mind), Organs (physical), Efforts (vital breaths), and Duties (senses),—these are the five causes.

15. With body, speech or mind, whatever work, good or bad, a man performs, these five are their causes.

16. Such being the case, he who, owing to his uncultivated understanding and dull mind, sees his own self as the sole agent of all actions, sees nothing.

17. He who has no egoism, and whose mind is not sullied, does not kill,—or fettered by action,—if he kills all these people.

18. Knowledge, the object of Knowledge and the Knower, form the threefold impulse of action. Instrument, action and the [illegible] Agent form the threefold con[illegible] of action.

19. Knowledge, Action and Agent have threefold enumeration, according to the difference of qualities. Listen to them now.

20. Satya Knowledge is that by which One Eternal Essence undivided in the divided is seen in all things.

21. Raja Knowledge is that which sees various Essences of different things, on account of their separateness.

22. Tama Knowledge is that which sees each single object as if it were the whole, which is without reason, and without truth, and which is mean and low.

23. Satya Action is that which is prescibed in the Shastras, which is performed without attachment, desire or aversion, and without the desire for any fruit by the performer.

24. Raja Action is that which is attended with great trouble and which is performed by one who desires for the fruit of action, and who is filled with egoism.

25. Tama Action is that which is performed from delusion, without regard to consequences, and with one's own loss and injury as well as of others.

26. Satya Agent is he who is free from attachment, and egoism, who is full of constancy and energy, and who is unmoved both in success and failure.

27. Raja Agent is he who is full of affections, who desires for the fruit of actions, who is covetous, cruel and impure, and feels both joy and sorrow.

28. Tama Agent is he who is void of application, who is without discernment, who is obstinate, deceitful malicious, idle, desponding, and procrastinating.

29. Listen to the three-fold division of intellect and constancy. O Dhananjaya, I shall exhaustively and distinctly speak to you on this matter.

30. Satya Intellect, O Partha, is that which knows action and inaction, what ought to be done and what ought not to be done, and which knows fear and fearfulness, bondage and deliverance.

31. Raja Intellect, O Partha, is that by which one imperfectly discerns right and wrong, and what ought to be done and what ought not to be done.

32. Tama Intellect, O Partha, is that by which, being one covered by ignorance, considers wrong to be right, and sees all things in a reverse state.

33. Satya Constancy, O Partha, is that by which through devotion one controls the function of the mind, the life-breaths and the senses.

34. Raja Constancy, O Partha, is that by which through attachment one holds to religion, and profit, wishing for fruit.

35. Tama Constancy, O Partha, is that through which undiscerning person does not abandons sleep, fear, sorrow, dependency and folly.

36—37. Now hear from Me, O best of Bharata race, what are the three kinds of happiness. Satya Happiness is that in which one finds pleasure from repetition of enjoyment, which brings an end to all pain, which is like poison in the beginning, but ambrosia afterwards, which is born out of serenity, and is produced by knowledge.

38. Raja Happiness is that which arises from the contact of the senses with their objects, and which resembles ambrosia in the beginning and poison next.

39. Tama Happiness is that which deludes the self in the beginning and in its consequences, and which arises from sleep, indolence and foolishness.

40. There is none, either among the beings on earth or among the celestials in heaven, which is free from these three qualities born of Nature.

41. O chastiser of foes, the duties of Brahmanas, Kshatryas, Vaisyas, and Sudras are each distinguished by these three qualities, born of nature.

42. Tranquillity, self restraint, penances purity, forgiveness, rectitude, knowledge, experience and faith, these are the distinctive features of a Brahmana.

43. Bravery, energy, firmness, skill, firmness in battle, liberality, majesty,—these are distinctive features of a Kshatrya.

44. Agriculture, tending of cattle and trade,—these are the duties of a Vaisya. The natural duty of a Sudra is service.

45. Every man, if he engages in his own natural duty, attains to perfection. Hear, how man attains to perfection by performing his own natural duties.

46. Worshiping Him, from whom are the life of beings, and by whom all the universe is pervaded, by the performance of his own duty man is sure to attain to perfection.

47. Better is one's own duty, though performed imperfectly, than another's duty well-performed. Man incurs no sin by performing his duty prescribed by Nature.

48. Man must not, O son of Kunti, abandon his natural duties, however bad they might be—for all actions are enveloped by error as fire by smoke.

49. He whose mind is unattached to any thing, who has subdued his self, and whose desire is gone, through Sanyasa, obtains the supreme perfection of freedom from action.

50. Learn in brief, O son of Kunti, how a man, obtaining perfection, attains to Brahma, the Supreme End of Knowledge.

51. Having a pure mind, restraining his self by constancy, renouncing all objects of sense, and casting off affection and aversion,

52. He who resides in a lonely place, eats little, restrains his speech, body and mind, who is ever intent on meditation and abstraction, who is unconcerned,

53. Who is free from egoism, violence, pride, lust, wrath, surroundings, who is devoid of selfishness and is tranquil, becomes fit for assimilation with Brahma.

54. Becoming one with Brahma, and obtaining tranquillity in spirit, man grieves not and desires not. Seeing all beings alike, he obtains the highest devotion to Me.

55. By devotion he truly knows Me, truly what I am and who I am. Then knowing Me truly, he forthwith enters into Me.

56. Even performing all actions at all times, such a man, having his refuge in Me, obtains through My favour that state which is eternal and imperishable.

57. Mentally dedicating all actions to Me, resorting to mental abstraction, being devoted to Me, fix your thoughts constantly on Me.

58. Fixing your thoughts on Me, you will surmount all difficulties through My favour. But if from self-conceit you do not listen to Me, you will surely perish.

59. If out of self-conceit you think. "I will not fight,"—Your this resolution will be in vain, for surely will Nature rule you.

60. Bound by your own Duty, ordained by Nature, you will involuntarily do that, which, out of delusion, you do not wish to do.

61. The Lord, O Arjuna, as if mounted on a machine, sits in the heart of all beings, turning them as He pleases by His illusive power.

62. O Bharata, seek shelter under Him in every way. By his favour, you will get Supreme Peace and the Eternal Seat.

63. I have thus declared to you the knowledge which is more mysterious than any other mystery. Reflect on it fully, and then act as you like.

64. Once more hear My supernatural words, the most mysterious mystery of all. You are very dear to Me; therefore, I tell you what is good for you.

65. Fix your heart on Me, become My devotee, sacrifice to Me, bow down to Me,—you will then come to Me. I tell you the truth, for you are very dear to Me.

66. Forsaking all religious duties, come to Me,—come to Me as thy sole refuge. I shall deliver you from all your sins. Do not grieve.

67. This knowledge that I have told you must not be declared by you to one who does not practise penances, who is not a devotee, who never waits on a preceptor, and who always culminates Me.

68. He, who will inculcate this supreme knowledge to those who are devoted to Me, offering Me his highest devotion, being freed from all doubts, will come to Me.

69. Amongst men none can be dearer to Me than such a man. None on earth can do Me greater service also than he.

70. And he, who will study this holy conversation between us, will offer to Me the sacrifice of Knowledge. This is my opinion.

71. Even he, who, with faith and without evil, will hear it, being freed from (the bond of births), will obtain the blessed seat of those that perform pious acts.

72. Have you heard, O Partha, this knowledge with mind undirected to any other object? Has, O Dhananjaya, your delusion, caused by ignorance, been destroyed?"

Arjuna said :—

73. "O undecaying One, through your favour my delusion is gone, I now know what I am. I am now firm. My doubts have been dispelled. I will obey you. I will do thy bidding."

Sanjaya said :—

74. O king, I heard this wonderful and hair-stirring words of Vasudeva and Partha.

75. Through the favour of Vyasa, I myself heard this mysterious, great and best words from the very lips of the Lord of Yoga, Srikrishna.

76. O king, I am feeling more and more pleasure as much as I am remembering the holy and wonderful words between Srikrishna and Arjuna.

77. O king, I am feeling more and more pleasure as much as I am remembering the wonderful manifestation of Srikrishna.

78. Wherever exist the Lord of Yoga Srikrishna and the great bowman Arjuna, there certainly do wealth, victory and glory exist.

Thus ends the forty-second chapter, the conversation between Krishna and Arjuna, in the Bhagavat-Gita of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XLIII.

(BHISMAVADHA PARVA).

Sanjaya said :—

1. Seeing Dhananjaya (Arjuna) take up once again his Gandiva and arrows, the great car-warriors (of the Pandava army) sent up a tremendous shout.

2. Those heroes, the Pandavas, and the Somakas, and those that followed them, blew their sea-born conchs in great delight.

3. Drums and Pasis and Krakachas and cow-horns were beat and blown together and the uproar made was very loud.

4. O ruler of men, then there came the celestials, the Gandharvas, the Pitris, the Siddhas and the Charanas with the desire of witnessing (the battle).

5. The highly blessed Rishis came there in a body with Satakratu (Indra) at their head, so that they might see the great slaughter.

6—8. O king, seeing the two armies, which resembled two oceans, ready for the battle and marching continually forward, the brave king Yudhisthira, Dharmaraja, put off his armour and cast aside his excellent weapons. Then soon alighting from his chariot, he proceeded with joined hands, and with restrained speech towards the direction where the hostile host stood looking at the grand father and facing the east.

9. Seeing him proceed, the son of Kunti, Dhananjaya, soon alighted from his car and followed him accompanied by all his brothers.

10. The lord Vasudeva also followed him. The chief kings also (of Yudhisthira's army) followed him in great anxiety.

Arjuna said :—

11. "O king, what is this you are doing that abandoning us you proceed on foot, face eastwards to the enemy's army."

Bhima said :—

"O great king, where are you going, O ruler of earth, putting aside your armour and weapons, you go towards the enemy's warriors clad in armour, thus abandoning your brothers.

Nakula said :—

13. O descendant of Bharata, you are my eldest brother. Fear troubles my heart on account of your this proceeding (towards the enemy) : Tell us where you are going.

Sahadeva said :—

14. O king, when these hostile troops, both numerous and terrible, stand here to fight with us, where do you go to their directions ?

Sanjaya said :—

15. O descendant of Kuru, though he was thus addressed by his brothers, yet he continued to proceed without uttering a word.

16. To them then the high-souled and the greatly wise Vasudeva thus smilingly spoke " His intention is known to me."

17. Having (first) paid his respects to all the Gurus, such as Bhisma, Drona, Kripa and Salya, he will fight with the enemy.

18—21. It is heard in the old history that he, who, having paid his respects to his reverend preceptors and relatives, according to the Shastras, fights with those that are his superiors, is certain to win victory in battle. This is my opinion. When Krishna was saying this, a loud uproar of " Alas " and " Oh " rose in the ranks of the troops of Dhritarashtra's son ; but the others remained quiet. Seeing Yudhishthira, the heroic warriors of Dhritarashtra's son thus talked amongst themselves, " This fellow is an infamous wretch of his race. It is apparent that this king is coming in terror to Bhisma.

22—24. Yudhishthira with his brothers has become a seeker after Bhisma's protection. When Dhananjaya is protector and the sons of Pandu, Vrikodara (Bhima), Nakula and Sahadeva, why does this Pandava (Yudhishthira) come (to Bhisma) in fear. Though celebrated in the world, this one could never have been born in the Kshatriya order, for he is weak and his heart is filled with fear of battle." Then those warriors all praised the Kurus.

25—27. Becoming greatly pleased, all of them waved their garments with cheerful hearts, O king, all the warriors then blamed Yudhisthira with his brothers along with Keshava (Krishna). O king, then the Kuru army crying shame to Yudhisthira again became quiet. What will this king say ? What will Bhisma say in reply ?

28—30. What will Bhima who is ever boastful of his prowess in battle and what Krishna and Arjuna say ? What has Yudhisthira to say ? O great king, the curiosity of both the armies in respect of Yudhisthira was great. (In the mean time) the king entered the hostile army full of arrows and darts. He then quickly proceeded towards Bhisma, surrounded by his brothers. Seizing his feet with his two hands, the king (Yudhisthira), the son of Pandu, then thus spoke to Bhisma, the son of Shantanu, who was then ready for battle.

Yudhisthira said :—

31. O invincible one, I bow to you. We shall fight with you. Grant us your permission ; give us your blessings.

Bhisma said :—

32. O ruler of earth, O great king, O descendant of Bharata, if you had not come to me in this battle, I would have cursed you for bringing about your defeat.

33. O son, I am pleased with you. O son of Pandu, fight and obtain victory. Whatever else you have desired to obtain, get them all in this battle.

34. O s[illegible]n of Pritha, ask for a boon which you desire to get. O great king, if it so happens, then defeat will not be yours.

35. O king, a man is the slave of wealth, but wealth [illegible] no one's slave. This is very true. I am bound to the Kurus by wealth.

36. O descendant of Kuru, it is for this I am, like a eunuch, uttering these words that I am bound to the Kurus by wealth. Except battle,—What do you desire?

Yudhisthira said :—

37. O greatly wise one, desiring my welfare from day to day look after my interests. Fight for the sake of the Kurus,—this is my prayer.

Bhisma said :—

38. O king, O descendant of Kuru, what can I do for you. I shall of course fght on behalf of your enemies. Tell me what can I do for you?

Yudhisthira said :—

39. O sire, I bow to you, I ask you (tell us) how we shall be able to vanquish you who are invincible. Tell me this, it is for my benefit,—if you see any good in it.

Bhisma said :—

40. O son of Kunti, I do not see the person who,—even if he be the lord of the celestials—can defeat me in battle when I fight.

Yudhisthira said :—

41. O grandfather, I bow to you. I ask you,—tell us how your death might be caused by your enemy.

Bhisma said :—

42. O sire, I do not find the man who can defeat me in battle. The time for my death is not yet come. (On some future occasion) come to me.

Sanjaya said :—

43. O descendant of Kuru, Yudhisthira then once more saluted him and accepted his words with bent head.

44. That mighty-armed hero surrounded by his brother then went towards the chariot of the preceptor (Drona) through the lines of soldiers who all looked at him.

45. Then bowing down to Drona and walking round him, he spoke these words to that invincible hero,—words beneficial to him.

Yudhisthira said :—

46. 'O invincible hero, I ask you, (tell me) how I may fight without incurrring any sin, and how, O Brahmana, with your permission I may vanquish all my enemies'.

Drona said :—

47. O king, if, having resolved to fight, you failed to have come to me, I would have cursed you for bringing about your defeat.

48. O Yudhisthira, O sinless one, I am now pleased and honoured by you. I give you permission. Fight and win victory.

49. I shall also fulfil your desire. Tell me what you have to say. Battle excepted, tell me what you desire to get.

50. A man is the slave of wealth; but wealth is the slave of none. O king, this is a great truth. I am bound to the Kurus by their wealth.

51. It is for this like a eunuch I am telling you the following—"Battle excepted, what do you wish to get?" I shall fight on behalf of the Kurus; but I shall pray for your victory.

Yudhisthira said :—

52. O Brahmana, pray for my victory and advise me what is good to me. Fight for the Kurus. This is the boon I ask from you.

Drona said :—

53. O king, victory is certain to you,—who have Krishna as y[illegible]unsellor. I wish that you will defeat yo[illegible] [illegible] this battle. [illegible] and [illegible]

54. Where there is righteousness there is Krishna. Where there is Krishna, victory is certain to be there. O son of Kunti, go and fight. Ask me, what shall I speak to you?

Yudhisthira said :—

55. O foremost of Brahmanas, I ask you, hear what I have to say. How shall we in battle defeat you who are invincible?

Drona said :—

56. As long as I fight, so long victory cannot be yours. O king, therefore with the help of your brothers try to kill me soon.

Yudhisthira said :—

57. O mighty-armed one, tell us the means of your death. O preceptor, prostrating myself to your feet I ask you this. I bow to you.

Drona said :—

58. O son, I cannot see such an antagonist who may kill me when I stand in battle, when I fight with my anger excited and when I scatter incessantly shower of arrows.

59. O king, except when I shall be prepared for death, having abandoned my arms and withdrawing myself from all surrounding sights, none will be able to kill me. What I tell you is true.

60. I tell you also that having heard something very disagreeable from some creditable source, I will abandon my arms in the battle.

Sanjaya said :—

61. O king, having heard these words of the wise son of Bharadwaja and also having honoured the preceptor, he (Yudhisthira) went towards the son of Saradwata (Kripa).

62. Bowing down to Kripa and walking round him, O king, Yudhisthira, accomplished in speech, thus spoke to that greatly brave warrior.

Yudhisthira said :—

63. "O preceptor, with your permission I will fight without incurring sin. O sinless one, if I get your permission, I shall (certainly) defeat my enemy."

Kripa said :—

64. "If having resolved to fight, you failed to have come to me, I would have cursed you, O king, for bringing about your defeat.

65. A man is the slave of wealth, but wealth is the slave of none. O king, this is the truth. I am bound to the Kurus by wealth.

66. O king, I must fight for them. I therefore speak like a eunuch in telling you, "Battle excepted, what do you desire to get?"

Yudhisthira said :—

67. O preceptor, I ask you therefore, listen to me.

Sanjaya said :—

Saying this, the king became greatly agitated. Being deprived of his sense, he stood silent.

68. Knowing however what he desired to say, the son of Gautama (Kripa) thus spoke to him, "O king, I am incapable of being killed. Fight and win victory.

69. I am pleased by your coming. O king, rising every day (from my bed), I shall pray for your victory. I truly speak this to you.

70. O king, having heard these words of Gautama (Kripa) and after having paid him due respect, the king went to the place where the Madra king was.

71. Bowing to Salya and walking round him, the king spoke to that invincible warrior these words beneficial to him.

Yudhisthira said :—

72. O invincible hero, if I fight with your permission, I will not incur sin. With your permission I shall defeat my enemies.

Salya said :—

73. If having resolved to fight, O king, you failed to have come to me, I would have then cursed you for bringing about your defeat.

74. I am very much pleased with you. I am much honoured by you. Let it be as you desire, I give you permission, fight and win victory.

75. O hero, speak, what do you want? What shall I give you. O king, battle excepted, what do you desire to get?

76. A man is the slave of wealth, but wealth is the slave of none. O king, this is the truth. I am bound to the Kurus by wealth.

77. O nephew, it is for this I am speaking to you like a eunuch. I shall do as you desire. Battle excepted, what do you wish to get?

Yudhisthira said :—

78. O king, think daily of what is beneficial to me. Fight as you please with the foes. This is the boon I ask from you'

Salya said :—

79. O fire of kings, in the present circumstance what help can I render to you? I shall of course fight on behalf of your enemy, for I have been made one of their party by the Kurus with their wealth.

Yudhisthira said :—

80. O Salya, this was the boon I asked during the preparations for this battle. The prowess of the Suta's son (Karna) should be weakened by you in battle.

Salya said :—

81. O Yudhisthira, O son of Kunti, your this desire will be fulfilled. Go, fight as you please. I shall pray for your victory.

Sanjaya said :—

82. Having received the permission of his maternal uncle (Salya) the king of the Madra, the son of Kunti (Yudhisthira), surrounded by his brothers, came out of the vast (Kuru) army.

83. Vasudeva (Krishna) then went to Radha's son (Karna) on the field of battle. For the sake of the Pandavas, the eldest brother of Gada, then, thus spoke to Karna :

84. "O Karna, I have heard that from the hatred you bear for Bhisma you will not fight. O son of Radha, come to our side, so long Bhisma is not killed.

85. O son of Radha, when Bhisma will be killed, you may come back and fight on Duryodhana's side, if you have no particular leaning for any party.

Karna said :—

86. O Keshava, I shall not do anything that is disagreeable to Dhritarashtra's son (Duryodhana), I am ever devoted to him, know, that my life has been cast off for him.

Sanjaya said :—

87. Having heard these words, Krishna stopped, O descendant of Bharata, he then returned to the Pandavas headed by Yudhisthira.

88. Then, in the midst of all the warriors, the eldest Pandava thus loudly exclaimed "He, who will choose us, will be considered by us as our ally."

89. Thereupon Yuyutsu thus spoke with a cheerful heart to the son of Kunti, Dharmaraja Yudhisthira.

90. I shall fight under you in this battle, O sinless one. I shall fight on your side, if you accept me.

Yudhisthira said :—

91. Come, come, all of us will fight with your foolish brothers. O Yuyutsu, both Vasudeva and all of us say.

22. "I accept you, O mighty-armed hero, fight for my cause. It appears the thread of Dhritarashtra's line, as well as his funeral cake, will rest on you.

93. O prince, O effulgent one, accept us that accept you; the wrathful and foolish Duryodhana will not live.

Sanjaya said :—

94. Then abandoning the Kurus, your son, Yuyutsu, went over to the army of the Pandavas with the beat of drums and cymbals.

95—96. Those foremost of men then all ascended their respective chariots. They placed their troops in battle-array.

97. They ordered thousands of drums and cymbals to be played. Those foremost of men themselves also sent up lion-like roars.

98. Seeing those foremost of men, the Pandavas, seated on their cars, the kings with Dhrishtadyumna and others once more sent up shouts of joy.

99. Seeing the nobleness of the Pandavas, who had paid due honour to those that deserved it, all the kings highly praised them.

100. They talked amongst themselves about the friendship, compassion and kindness to kinsmen displayed on every occasion by those high-minded men.

101. "Excellent"—Excellent"—were the words shouted everywhere. Eulogistic hymns for those illustrious men were chaunted by all. The minds and hearts of every one were attracted towards them.

102. Both the Aryas and the Mlechhas that saw or heard of this conduct of the Pandavas all wept with their voice choked with tears.

103. Those greatly powerful also ordered hundreds and hundreds of large drums and Pushkaras to be sounded and thousands and thousands of conchs all as white as the milk of the cows to be loudly blown.

Thus ends the forty-third chapter, going to Bhisma &c, in the Bhismavadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XLIV.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. When the troops of my side and those of the foe were thus placed in battle-array, who struck first, the Kurus or the Pandavas?

Sanjaya said :—

2. Having heard the words of his brother, your son Dushasana advanced with his forces with Bhisma at their head.

3. Desiring to fight with Bhisma, the Pandavas cheerfully advanced with Bhimasena at their head.

4—5. Thereupon lion-like roars, clamorous shouts, the noise of Krakachas, the blare of cow-horns and the sounds of drum, cymbals and tabors arose in both the armies. The soldiers of the enemy rushed upon us and we also rushed upon them with loud shouts.

6. The vast armies of the Kurus and the Pandavas shook in that fearful and bloody battle by the sounds of conchs and cymbals, as a forest is shaken by the wind.

7. The great noise,made by those troops consisting of kings, elephants and horses, rushing upon one another in an evil hour, was like that of the ocean in a tempest.

8. When that loud and hair-stirring noise rose, the mighty Bhimasena roared like a bull.

9. Bhimasena's roars rose above the sounds of conchs, and drums, the roarings of elephants and the lion-like shouts of the warriors.

10. The shouts of Bhimasena drowned the neighings of thousands of horses in both the armies.

11. Hearing those shouts of Bhimasena whose roarings resembled that of the clouds and the report of the thunder, your soldiers were filled with fear.

12. Hearing those roars of that hero (Bhima), the horses and the elephants (of both the armies) ejected urine and excreta, as other animals do at the roars of the lion.

13. Roaring like a deep mass of clouds and assuming a fearful appearance, that hero filled your sons with great alarm and then rushed upon them.

14—17. Then all the brothers, your sons Duryodhana, Durmukha, Durshaha, that great car-warrior Dushashan-Durmar-shana, Vivingsati, Chi[illegible]na, the great car-warrior Vikarna[illegible]d also Purumitra, Jaya, Bhoja, the[illegible]ve son of Somadatta,— all [illegible], shaking their bows which [illegible]ooked like so many masses of clouds charged with flashes of lightning, and taking out long arrows looking like so many snakes that have cast off their sloughs, surrounded that great bowman (Bhima) and covered him with a shower of arrows, as clouds cover the sun.

18—19. The sons of Draupadi, the great car-warrior (Abhimanyu) son of Subhadra, Nakula and Sahadeva, Dhrishtadyumna, the son of Prishata, all rushed against the warriors of Dhritarashtra's son and tore them asunder with sharp arrows as the summits of mountains are broken down by the thunder-bolt.

20. In that first encounter that resounded with the terrible twang of the bow and flappings of the leathern fences,none of your party or of that of the enemy turned them back.

21. O best of the Bharata race, O king, I saw the lightness of hands of the disciples of Drona who shot countless arrows and always succeeded in hitting the marks.

22. The twang of the bows did not stop for a moment and the blazing arrows flashed through the air like meteor falling from the sky.

23. O descendant of Bharata, all the kings stood like spectators and saw the interesting and awful battle between kinsmen.

24. O king,then those great car-warriors' remembering the great injuries they had suffered, challenged one another in anger and tried their utmost (to win victory).

25. The two armies of the Kurus and the Pandavas, full of elephants, horses and cars, looked exceedingly beautiful on the field of battle, like painted figures on canvas.

26. Then all the kings took up their bows. The sun was covered by the dust raised by the combatants.

27—30. Under the command of your son, they rushed upon the enemy at the head of their respective troops. Fearful was the uproar made by the elephants and horses of the kings rushing to the charge, mingled with the lion-like shouts of the warriors and the din made by the sounds of conchs and drums. The uproar of that ocean (the battle field), which had arrows for its crocodiles bows for its snakes, sword[illegible] tortoises and the forward leaps of the warriors for its tempest, look[illegible]ed like a real ocean agitated by a tempest. Thousands of kings commanded by Yudhisthira attacked the ranks of your son with their respective troops.

31—32. While fighting, or retreating, or rallying again, neither the men of our side nor those of the enemy's could be distinguished. But your father (Bhisma) shone transcending all that countless host in that fearful and terrible battle.

Thus ends the forty-fourth chapter, the commencement of the battle, in the Bhisma-vadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XLV.

(BHISMAVADHA PARVA.)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O king, in the morning of that awful day commenced the fearful battle that mangled the bodies of so many kings.

2. Desiring victory in battle, the loud shouts that the Kurus and the Srinjaya made, resembling those of so many lions, caused the earth and the sky to be resounded.

3. A tremendous uproar was heard mingled with the flappings of the leathern fences and the blare of conchs. Lion-like roars rose from men shouting at one another.

4. O best of the Bharata race, the twang of the bow-strings, the heavy tread of infantry, the furious neighing of horses,

5. The falling of sticks and iron hooks, the clash of weapons, the jingle of bells round the necks of elephants rushing upon one another,

6. The clatter of the wheels of cars that resembled the roars of clouds,—all these mingled together,—produced a hair-stirring uproar.

7. All the Kuru warriors, reckless of their lives, with cruel intentions, rushed upon the Pandavas with their standards upraised.

8. O king, taking up a fearful bow that resembled the rod of death himself, the son of Shantanu, Bhisma, rushed upon Dhananjaya (Arjuna) on the field of battle.

9. The greatly powerful Arjuna also, taking up the bow Gandiva which is celebrated all over the world, rushed upon the son of Ganga (Bhisma) on the field of battle.

10. Both those two foremost heroes of the Kuru race desired to kill each other. Though the mighty son of Ganga pierced Partha with his arrows, yet he could not make him waver.

11. O king, that son of Pandu (Arjuna) also could not make Bhisma waver in battle. The great bowman Satyaki rushed against Kritavarmana, 12-14. The fight between these two (heroes) was extremely fearful and hairr-stiring. Satyaki wounded Kritavarmana and Kritavarmana wounded Satyaki with loud shouts and thus they weakened each other. Pierced all over the body with arrows, those two great warriors shone like two blossoming Kinsukas, when they are adorned with flowers in spring. The great bowman Abhimanyu fought with Vrihadvala.

15. O king, the ruler of Kosala, soon, in that battle, cut off the standard and overthrew the charioteer of the son of Subhadra, (Abhimanyu).

16. When his charioteer was overthrown, Subhadra's son was filled with wrath. O king, he pierced Vrihadvala with nine arrows.

17. That chastiser of foes, (Abhimanyu) with a couple of sharp arrows cut off his standard, with one (arrow) he cut down one of the protectors of his car-wheels and with another his charioteer.

18—19. Those (two) chastisers of foes fought on and weakened each other with sharp arrows. Bhimasena fought with your son Duryodhana, that great car-warrior who had injured (the Pandavas) in pride. Both of those Kuru chiefs are foremost of men and both of them are great car-warriors.

20—23. They covered each other, on the field of battle, with showers of arrows. O descendant of Bharata, seeing the fight between these two illustrious and accomplished warriors learned in all the modes of warfare, all creatures were filled with amazement. Dushasana rushed against the great car-warrior Nakula and pierced him with many sharp arrows. The son of Madri laughingly cut off with his sharp arrows the standard and the bow of his adversary. He then wounded him with twenty-five small-headed arrows.

24. Your son who is ever difficult to be vanquished then killed in that fearful battle Nakula's horses and then cut down his standard.

25. Durmukha rushed upon the mighty Sahadeva. He fought with him in that terrible battle and pierced him with a shower of arrows.

26. The heroic Shahadeva soon overthrew in that fearful battle Durmukha's charioteer with a sharp arrow.

27. Both of them were irresistible in fight. Each, attacking the other, and ... desirous of warding off each other's attack, struck terror into each other with fearful arrows.

28. The king Yudhisthira himself fought with the ruler of the Madra. The Madra king cut off the bow of Yudhisthira.

29. Thereupon, the son of Kunti, took up another bow which was stronger and capable of inparting greater velocity.

30. The king, then saying in great wrath "Wait" "Wait" covered the king of Madra with straight arrows.

31—34. O descendant of Bharata, Dhristadyumna rushed against Drona. In great anger Drona cut off in that battle the hard bow of the illustrious Panchala prince,—the bow which was ever capable of taking the lives of the foes. He shot in that battle a fearful arrow which was like the second rod of Yama. The arrow thus shot penetrated into the body of the prince. Taking up another bow and fourteen arrows, the son of Drupada pierced Drona with his arrows. Enraged with each other they fought on.

35. O king, the impetuous Sankha met Somadatt'a son who was equally impetuous in battle and he shouted out to him "Wait" "Wait".

36. That hero then pierced his right arm in that fight. Thereupon the son of Somadatta wounded Sankha on the shoulders.

37. O king, the battle that was fought between these two proud heroes soon became as fearful as the battle between the celestials and the Asuras.

38. O king, that high-souled great car-warrior Dhristaketu angrily rushed upon Valhika who was the very embodiment of anger.

39. O king, great Valhika, sending up a lion-like roar, weakened the wrathful Dhristaketu with countless arrows.

40—41. The king of the Chedis, then becoming exceedingly angry, quickly pierced Valhika with nine arrows in that battle. Like an infuriated elephant attacking another infuriated elephant, they roaerd against each other in great anger. They fought in great wrath and they looked like the planets Angaraka and Vudha.

42. The doer of cruel deeds, Ghatatkacha, O descendant of Bharata, wounded that mighty and angry Rakshasha (Alambusha with ninety sharp arrows.

43. Alambusha, in that great battle, wounded the mighty son of Bhimasena (Ghatatkacha) in many places with straight arrows.

44. Wounded with arrows they appeared in that battle like the mighty Indra and the powerful Vala in the battle between the celestials and the Danavas.

45. O king, the mighty Shikhandin attacked Drona's son. But Aswathama severely wounded Shikhandin with a sharp arrow and thus made him tremble.

46. O king, Shikhandin also wounded the son of Drona (Ashwathama) with a sharp and excellent weapon.

47—48. They brought on striking each other with various kinds of arrows. O king, Virata, that commander of an army, rushed against the heroic Bhagadatta in battle. Becoming exceedingly angry, Virata shot at Bhagadatta a shower of arrows, as the clouds shower rain on a mountain. But that ruler of earth, Bhagadatta, soon covered Virata with arrows as clouds cover the sun. The son of Saradwata, Kripa, attacked the ruler of the Kaikeyas named Vrihadkshatra.

52. O descendant of Bharata, Kripa covered him with a shower of arrows. Vrihadkshatra also covered the angry son of Gautama with a shower of arrows.

53. Having killed each other's steeds and cut off each other's bows, those (two) warriors were both deprived of their cars. Becoming exceedingly angry, they attacked each other with swords.

54—56. The battle they then fought was fearful and unparalled. That chastiser of foes, king Drupada, angrily rushed on the ruler of Sindhu, Jayadratha. The Sindhu king wounded Drupada in that battle with three arrows, and Drupada too wounded him in return. The battle they fought was fearful and terrible.

57—58. It gave satisfaction to the hearts of all spectators; it was like the conflict between the planets Sukra and Angaraka your son Vikarna with fleet steeds attacked the greatly powerful Sutasoma and they began to fight. Though Vikarna wounded Sutasoma with many arrows, yet he failed to make him waver.

59—61. Sutasoma also could not make Vikarna waver. It was a wonderful sight. That great car-warrior, that foremost of men, that greatly powerful Chekitan rushed upon Susarman for the sake of the Pandavas. O king of kings, Susarman however checked the advance of that great car-warrior Chekitan with heavy showerof arrows. Chekitana also becoming exceedingly angry showered on Susarman a shower of arrows as a mass of clouds shower rains on a mountain.

62. O king, the greatly powerful Sakuni attacked the mighty Prativindhya as a lion attacks an infuriated elephant.

93. The son of Yudhisthira in great anger wounded Suvala's son with many sharp arrows as Maghavat (Indra) mangles a Danava.

64. In that terrible battle, Sukuni also wounded Prativindhya and mangled the body of that greatly intelligent warrior with sharp arrows.

65. O great king, Srutakarman attacked in that battle the great car-warrior, the mighty Sudhakshina, the king of the Kambhojas.

66. O king of kings, Sudhakshina wounded that great car-warrior the son of Sahadeva, but he could not make him waver; he stood as the Mainaka mountain.

67. Thereupon Srutakarman in great anger weakened that great car-warrior of the Kambhojas with countless arrows and mangled him in many parts of his body.

68. That chastiser of foes, Iravan rushed in great anger on the wrathful Srutayush in that great battle.

69. The mighty son of Arjuna, that great car-warrior, then killing the horses of his adversary, sent up a loud roar. O king, all the kings praised him (by his this great feat).

70. Srutayusha, in great anger, killed in that battle the horses of the son of Arjuna with a great mace and then they fought on.

71. The two princes of Avanti, Vinda and Anuvinda attacked in that battle the great car-warrior the brave Kuntibhoja who was with his son at the head of his troops.

72. We saw wonderful prowess in those two princes, for they fought with great coolness, though they had to fight with a very large number of troops.

73. Anuvinda hurled a mace at Kuntibhoja, but he (Kuntibhoja) soon covered him with a shower of arrows.

74. The son of Kuntibhoja wounded Vinda with many arrows but he too wounded him in return. The battle they fought was wonderful.

75. O respected one, the Kekaya brothers at the head of their troops attacked in that battle the five Gandharva princes with their troops.

76. Your son Viravahu fought with that foremost of car-warriors, Uttara, the son of Virata and wounded him with nine arrows.

77. Uttara also wounded him with many sharp arrows; O king, the ruler of Chedi attacked in that battle Uluka.

78. He wounded Uluka with a shower of arrows and Uluka too wounded him with sharp arrows with excellent wings.

79. O king, the battle they fought was fearful in the extreme, for, being unable to defeat each other, they fearfully mangled each others body.

80. Thus in that great battle thousands of single combats were fought between car-warriors, elephant-men, horse-men and foot-soldiers of both the sides.

81. For a short time the battle looked beautiful, but O king, it soon grew furious and nothing could be seen.

82. In that battle elephants rushed against elephants, car-warriors against car-warriors, horsemen against horsmen and foot-soldiers against foot-soldiers.

88. The battle then became confused and fearful in the extreme. The heroes rushed against one another in a great number;

84. The celestial Rishis, the Siddhas and Charanas who were present, saw that battle as if it were the battle between the gods and the demons.

85. Thousands of elephants and cars, countless horsemen and foot-soldiers, appeared to have altered their character.

86. O foremost of men, it was seen that car-warriors, elephants, horsemen and foot-soldiers, all fought with one another, again and again, on the same places.

Thus ends the forty-fifth chapter, the single combats, in the Bhismavadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XLVI.

(BHISMAVADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O king, O descendant of Bharata, I shall now describe to you the fight of hundreds and thousands of foot-soldiers, who were in utter forgetfulness of all considerations for others.

2. The son did not recognise the father and the father the son. The brother did not recognise his own brother and the sister's son did not recognise his maternal uncle.

3. The maternal uncle did not recognise his sister's son, and the friend did not recognise the friend. The Pandava and the Kuru forces fought as if they had been possessed by demons.

4. O foremost of men, some warriors attacked with their cars the cars of the enemies, and crushed the yokes of those cars to pieces.

5. The shafts of cars broke dashing against shafts of other cars, the spikes of car-yokes broke against spikes of car-yokes. Some unitedly attacked others that were united but all were eager to take one another's life.

6—8. Some cars were obstructed by other cars and they were unable to move. Huge elephants with rent temples fell upon other huge elephants. They angrily tore one another's body with their tusks. O king, others, again, attacking other impetuous and huge ones with huge standards on their backs, being wounded by tusks, roared in great agony.

9. Disciplined by training and urged on by pikes and hooks, elephants not in rut attacked those that were in rut.

10. Huge elephants, attacked by those that were in rut, ran away in all directions, uttering cries like those of cranes.

11—12. Many huge elephants, well-trained and with juice trickling down from their rent temples and mouth, having been wounded by swords, lances and arrows, shrieked aloud. Pierced in their vital parts they fell down and expired. Uttering fearfu cries, some ran away in all directions.

13--15. O king, the foot-soldiers, that protected the elephants, that possessed broad chests, that were capable of effectually striking the foe, armed with pikes, bows, bright battle-axes, maces, clubs, arrows, lances, shafts and heavy iron-mounted bludgeons and swords of the brightest polish, ran in every direction with the firm resolve of taking one another's life.

16. The swords of brave combatants who rushed against one another having been steeped in blood shone with great brilliancy.

17. The whizing noise of the swords, made by their whirling and falling by heroic arms, became very loud.

18—19. O descendant of Bharata, crushed with maces and clubs, cut off with tempered swords, pierced and grinded by the tusks of elephants, the combatants sent forth heart-rending wails as those of men doomed to hell.

20. Horsemen on fleet horses with tails like the plumes of swans, rushed upon one another.

21. Hurled by them, long, fleet and polished and sharp-pointed darts, decked with gold, fell (on all sides) like so many snakes.

22. Some heroic horsemen on fleet [illegible] leaped up and cut off the heads [illegible] car-warriors who were [illegible] on their cars.

23. [illegible]-warrior, getting a body [illegible] within shooting distance, killed many with straight arrows furnished with broad heads.

24. Many infuriated elephants adorned with gold trappings and looking like newly-risen clouds threw down the horses and crushed them with their legs.

25. Being struck on their frontal globes and flanks, and mangled by lances, many elephants roared aloud in great agony.

26. In the bewildering confusion of the melee, many elephants threw steeds with their riders and crushed them down.

27. Overthrowing with their tusks steeds and their riders, some elephants roved about and crushed cars with their standards.

18. Some huge male elephants, from excess of energy and with the temporal juice gushing down from their temples in large quantities, killed horses with their riders by their trunks and legs.

29. Polished, sharp-pointed and fleet arrows resembling snakes fell upon the heads, the temples and the flanks and the limbs of elephants.

30. O king, fearful, polished javelins resembling large meteoric flashes being hurled by heroic arms fell everywhere piercing through bodies of men and horses, and cutting through coats of mail.

31. Taking out their sharp swords from sheathes made of leopard's and tiger's skins, many killed their adversaries in battle.

32. Many warriors, though attacked and their bodies cut open, fell upon their antagonists with swords, shields and battle-axes.

33. Dragging down and overthrowing cars with their horses by their trunks, some elephants roved about in all directions, guided by the cries of those behind them.

34—36. Some pierced by javelins, some cut down by battle-axes, some crushed by elephants, some trodden down by horses, some cut by the car-wheels and some by axes, O king, loudly called for their kinsmen. Some called upon their sons, some upon their fathers, some upon their brothers some upon their relatives, some upon their meternal uncles, some upon their sister's sons, and some upon their friends and others.

37. O descendant of Bharata, a large number of combatants lost their weapons, many had their [illegible] broken [illegible] some were seen to cry piteously for their desire for life; with arms torn off or sides pierced or cut open.

98. O king, some having but little strength, and lying on the field of battle asked for water from excessive thirst.

39. O descendant of Bharata, some, weltering in blood and becoming greatly weakened, censured themselves and your sons assembled (in that battle.)

40. O exalted one, but there were others,—the brave Kshatriyas, who having wounded one another, did not abandon their weapons nor did they set up any wails.

41—44. There were some, who, lying on those places where they lay, roared in joy, and bitting from wrath their own lips with their teeth, looked at one another with faces rendered fearful by the contraction of their eye-brows. Others, possessing great strength and tenacity, wounded with arrow, remained perfectly silent smarting under their pains. Other brave car-warriors, deprived of their own cars in battle and thrown down and wounded by huge elephants, asked to be taken up on the cars of others. O king, many looked beautiful like blossoming kinsukas.

45—47. In that fearful battle, destructive of heroes, the father killed the son and the son killed the father, the sister's son killed the meternal uncle, the meternal uncle killed the sister's son Friends killed friends and kinsmen killed kinsmen. Thus took place the great slaughter in that great battle between the Kurus and the Pandavas.

48. In that fearful and terrible battle in which no consideration was shown, the Pandavas (at last) began to waver before Bhisma.

49—50. O best of the Bharata race, O king, the mighty-armed Bhisma, with his great standard made of silver and adorned with the device of a palmyra with five stars, sitting upon his excellent car, shone like the moon on the Meru mountain.

Thus ends the forty-sixth chapter, the great slaughter, in the Bhismavadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XLVII.

(BHISMAVADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1—2. O king, when the greater part of that fearful day passed away, Durmukha, Kritavarmana, Kripa, Salya and Vivingsati, urged by your son, came to Bhisma and began to protect him in that fearful battle which was so destructive of the foremost of men.

3. O best of the Bharata race, protected by those five great car-warriors, that great hero penetrated the Pandava army.

4. O descendant of Bharata, the palmyra standard of Bhisma was seen to glide continuously through the Chedis, the Kashis, the Karushas and the Panchalas.

5. That hero (Bhisma) cut off the heads (of the foes) and their cars with yokes and standards with broad-headed, swift and perfectly straight arrows.

6. O best of the Bharata race, Bhisma seemed to dance on his car as it moved about. Some elephants vitally wounded by him, shrieked in great agony.

7. Thereupon Abhimanyu angrily rushed towards Bhisma's car on his own car yoked with excellent horses of brown colour,

8. And adorned with a standard decked with pure gold and resembling a Karnikara tree, he attacked Bhisma and those five foremost of car-warriors.

9. Striking with a sharp arrow the palmyra standard (of Bhisma) that hero fought with Bhisma and those other warriors who were protecting him.

10. Wounding Kritavarmana with one arrow and Salya with five, he weakened his great grandfather with nine arrows.

11. With one arrow shot from his bow drawn to its fullest extent, he cut off (Bhisma's) standard adorned with gold.

12. With one broad-headed and straight arrow capable of penetrating every thing, he cut off the head of Durmukha's charioteer.

13—14. With another sharp arrow, he cut down the gold-decked bow of Kripa. With many sharp arrows that great car-warrior wounded them all. Seeing his lightness of hand, even the celestials were pleased.

15. Seeing the great exactness of Abhimanyu's aim, all the car-warriors with Bhisma at their head, considered that he possessed the great capacity (of his father) Dhananjaya.

16. His bow, sending forth sound like the twang of Gandiva while stretched and restretched, seemed to revolve like a circle of fire.

17. Then that chastiser of foes, Bhisma rushing on him with great impetuosity, soon, wounded the son of Arjuna with nine arrows.

18. He too with three broad-headed arrows cut off the standard of that greatly powerful warrior. Of rigid vows, Bhisma also struck his adversary's charioteer.

19. O sire, Kritavarmana, Kripa and Salya, piercing Arjuna's son, all failed to make him, waver for he stood firm like the Mainaka mountain.

20. Though surrounded by those great car-warriors of Dhritarashtra's army, the heroic son of Arjuna still showered, on those five car-warriors, a down pour of arrows.

21. Baffling their great weapons by a shower of arrows and pouring on Bhisma a shower of his arrows, the mighty son of Arjuna sent up a loud roar.

22. When he was thus struggling in the battle, and afflicting Bhisma with (his) arrows, the strength of his arms we saw then was very great.

23. Possessed of such great power, Bhisma shot his arrows at him. But he (Abhimanyu) cut off in the fight all the arrows shot from Bhisma's bow.

24. Then that brave bowman cut off, with nine arrows, the standard of Bhisma in that great battle. When this great deed was done, the people sent forth a loud shout.

25. Adorned with jewels and made of silver, that tall palmyra-deviced standard, O descendant of Bharata, cut off by the arrows of Subhadra's son, fell down on the ground.

26. O best of the Bharata race, seeing that standard cut down by the arrows of Subhadra's son, the proud Bhima sent up a loud shout to cheer up the son of Subhadra.

27. Then in that great battle, the mighty Bhimasena caused many powerful celestial weapons to appear.

28. The high-souled great grandsire (Bhisma) then covered Subhadra's son with thousands of arrows.

29. Thereupon ten great bowmen and mighty car-warriors of the Pandava (army) soon rushed on their cars to protect the son of Subhadra.

30. O king, these were Virata and his son, the descendant of Prishata, Dhrishtadyumna, Bhima, the five Kekaya brothers, and Satyaki.

31. As they were rushing upon him with great impetuosity, the son of Shantanu, Bhisma, in that great battle, wounded the Panchala princes with three arrows and Satyaki with ten.

32. With one winged arrow as sharp as a razor shot from his bow drawn to its fullest stretch, he cut off the standard of Bhimasena.

33. O foremost of men, the lion-deviced standard of Bhimasena, made of gold, being cut off by Bhisma, fell from the car.

34. Thereupon Bhima wounded the son of Shantanu with three arrows, Kripa with one and Kritavarmana with eight.

35. The son of Virata, Uttara, also riding on an elephant with upraised trunk attacked the king of Madra.

36. But Salya checked the great impetuosity of that foremost of elephants rushing towards his car.

37. But that foremost of elephants angrily placed his leg on the yoke of (Salya's) car and killed his four large and swift horses.

38. The king of Madra, staying on the car the horses of which had been killed, hurled an iron dart, which resembled a snake, in order to kill Uttara.

39. His armour being cut through by the dart, he lost consciousness and fell from the elephant, the hook and the lance also fell loosened from his grasp.

40. Salya then took up his sword, and jumping down from his excellent car, he with great force cut off the large trunk of that great elephant.

41. His armour pierced all over with a shower of arrows and his trunk cut off, that elephant sent forth a loud shriek. He then fell down and expired.

42. O king, performing this great feat, the Madra king soon got on the car of Kritavarmana.

43—47. Seeing his brother Uttara killed and seeing Salya on the Kritavarmana's car, Virata's son Sweta blazed up in anger as fire blazes forth with Ghee. That great warrior stretching his large bow that looked like that of Indra, rushed upon Salya, the king of Madra with the desire of killing him. Surrounded on all sides with innumerable car-warriors, he advanced towards Salya's chariot and poured upon him a shower of arrows. Seeing him rush to the fight with the prowess of an infuriated elephant, seven car-warriors of your side surrounded him on all sides with the desire of protecting the ruler of Madras who seemed to be already within the jaws of death.

48—49. Those seven warriors were Brihadvala, the king of the Kosalas, Jayatsena of Magadha, Rukmaratha, the brave son of Salya, Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, Sudakshina the king of the Kambhojas, and Jayadratha, the king of the Sindhus and the kinsman of Vrihadkshatra.

50. The stretched bow of these illustrious warriors, decorated with various colours, looked like the flashes of lightning in the clouds.

51. They all poured on the head of Sweta a continuous shower of arrows as the clouds, tossed by the wind, pour rain on the mountain breast when summer is passed.

52. That great bowman, that commander of the forces, being greatly enraged at this, struck their bows with seven broad-headed arrows of great impetuosity.

53. O descendant of Bharata, we saw those bows were cut off. Then within half the time of a wink of the eye they took up other bows.

54. That mighty-armed and high-souled warrior then with seven swift arrows again cut off the bows of those bowmen.

55. Those heroes, those great car-warriors whose large bows had been cut down, swelled in wrath, and grasping darts, sent forth a loud shout.

56—58. O best of the Bharata race, they hurled these seven darts on Sweta's chariot. Those blazing darts, which flew like large meteors with the sound of thunder, were all cut down by that great warrior with seven broad-headed arrows before they could reach him. O best of the Bharata race, then taking up an arrow which was capable of penetrating into every part of their body, he hurled it on Rukma ratha. That great arrow penetrated into his body.

59. Then, O king, being thus struck by the arrow, Rukmaratha sat down on his car and lost all consciousness.

60. His charioteer, however, without betraying any fear, carried him away, senseless and fainted, from the field of battle.

61. Then taking up six other arrows decked with gold, Sweta cut off the standards of his six adversaries.

62. Wounding their horses and charioteers also and covering those six warriors with a continuous shower of arrows, that chastiser of foes, went towards the car of Salya.

63. O descendant of Bharata, when that great general (Sweta) was rushing with great force towards the car of Salya, loud cries of "Oh" "Alas," rose in your army.

64. Then your great son, with Bhisma, at the head and with many other heroic warriors and troops, went towards Sweta's car.

65—67. He thus rescued the Madra king who was at the point of death. Then a fearful and hair-stirring battle was fought between your troops and those of the enemy in which cars and elephants all got mixed up in confusion. The old grandfather of the Kurus poured showers of arrows on Subhadra's son, on Bhimasena and on that great car-warrior Satyaki and also upon the king of the Kekayas, on Virata, on the descendant of Prishata, Dhrishtadyumna, and also upon the Chedi troops.

Thus ends the forty-seventh chapter, the fight with Sweta, in the Bhismavadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. O Sanjaya, when that great bow-man Sweta went towards Salya's chariot, what did the Kurus and the Pandavas do ? What did Bhisma, the son of Shantanu do ? Tell me all this, I ask you.

2. O king, hundreds and thousands of the foremost of Kshatriyas, all brave great car-warriors placed their general Sweta in their front,

3. And displaying their prowess to your royal son, O descendant of Bharata, desired to rescue Sweta, with Shikhandin at their head.

4. Those great-car-warriors rushed towards Bhisma's car decked with gold, with the intention of killing that foremost of warriors. The battle that was then fought was fearful.

5. I shall describe to you that wonderful and fearful battle that was fought between your warriors and those of the enemy.

6. The son of Shantanu made many cars empty, for that foremost of all car-warriors cut off many heads by showering his arrows.

7. Possessing the prowess of the sun, he covered the very sun with his arrows. As the rising sun dispels the darkness from around him, so did he remove the foe from around him in that great battle.

8. O king, in that great battle, hundreds and thousands of arrows were shot by him. They were very powerful and they possessed great impetuosity. They killed countless Kshatriyas in that battle.

9. O king, in that great battle, he cut off the heads of hundreds of heroic warriors and elephants clad in thorny mail as summits of mountains are felled by thunderbolt.

10. O king, cars were seen to mingle with cars. One car was seen upon another car and a horse upon another horse.

11. O king, impetuous horses carried here and there the youthful riders killed and hung from their saddle with their bows till in their hands.

12. With swords and quivers stil attached to their person and their armours loosened, hundreds of dead warriors lay on the ground sleeping on beds worthy of heroes.

13. Rushing upon one another, falling down and rising up again, and rushing again having risen up, the combatants fought hand to hand.

14. Struck by one another, many rolled on the field of battle. Infuriated elephants ran in all directions and hundreds of car-warrior's were killed.

15. Car-warriors, with their cars, were crushed (by the elephants). Some warriors fell on their cars killed by other warriors with their arrows.

16—17. Many great car-warriors were seen to fall down from high, their charioteers being killed. A thick dust covered all sides. Then the warriors knew their adversaries by the twang of the bow. From the pressure also on their bodies the combatants guessed their enemies.

18. O king, the warriors fought on with arrows guided by the twang of the bow-strings. Even the very his sing sound of the arrows shot by the combatants at one another could not be heard.

19—20. So loud was the sound of drums that it seemed to pierce the cars. In that tumultuous and hair-stirring uproar, even the names of the combatants could not be heard. Even the father could not recognise his own son.

21. One of the wheels being broken, the yoke being torn off, one of the steeds being killed, the brave car-warrior was overthrown from the car along with his charioteer.

22. Thus many brave warriors, deprived of their cars, were seen to run (in all directions.)

23. He, who was killed, had his head cut off; he, who was not killed, was mortally wounded. When Bhisma attacked, there was none who was not wounded.

24. In that fearful battle Sweta killed innumerable Kurus. He killed hundreds of noble princes.

25. He cut off with his arrows the heads of hundreds of car-warriors and also their arms decked with Angadas, and also their bows.

26—27. O king, O best of the Bharata race, car-warriors and car-wheels, the cars themselves, both small and costly standards, many horses and innumerable men and hundreds of elephants were destroyed by Sweta.

28. From fear of Sweta, we abandoned Bhisma that foremost of warriors; we left the battle and retreated to the rear and therefore we now see your exalted self.

29. O descendant of Kuru, retreating beyond the range of arrows and abandoning the son of Shantanu, Bhisma, in that battle, all the Kurus stood (as spectators), though armed for the battle.

30. Ever cheerful even in the hour of cheerlessness, that foremost of men, Bhisma, alone, of our army, stood in that fearful battle as immovable as the mountain Meru.

31. Killing the foes like the sun at the end of the winter, he stood effulgent with the golden rays of his car, as the sun shines with his rays.

32. That great bow-man shot showers of arrows and struck down his enemies in that battle as Vishnu, armed with the discus, struck down the Asuras.

33. While being thus slaughtered (by Bhisma) in that fearful battle, the warriors broke away from their ranks and fled from him (Bhisma) as if he was a fire fed with fuels.

34. While fighting with the great warrior (Sweta), that chastiser of foes, Bhisma, was the only one who was cheerful. Ever devoted to the welfare of Duryodhana, he began to consume the warrior (Sweta.)

35. O King, reckless of his own life, abandoning all fear, he slaughtered the Pandava troops in that great battle.

36. Seeing that (Pandava) general striking Duryodhana's troops, your father Bhisma, also called Devavrata, rushed upon him.

37. Thereupon Sweta covered Bhisma with a great net of arrows. Bhisma also covered Sweta with a shower of arrows.

38. Roaring like two bulls, they rushed against each other like two gigantic mad elephants or like two angry tigers.

39. Baffling each other's weapons by means of their weapons those (two) foremost of men, Bhisma and Sweta fought with each other with the desire of taking each other's life.

40. If Sweta did not protect it, in one single day Bhisma could have in anger consumed the Pandava army with his arrows.

41. Seeing the grandfather made to retreat by Sweta, the Pandavas grew exceedingly delighted, but your son became very much cheerless.

42. Thereupon Duryodhana surrounded by many kings, rushed in anger against the Pandava troops in that great battle.

43. Then Sweta abandoned the son of Ganga, Bhisma, and began to slaughter your son's troops with great impetuosity as the wind up-roots trees with great violence.

44. O king, having routed your army, Virata's son (Sweta) senseless in anger again rushed towards the place where Bhisma stood.

45—46. Those two mighty and great warriors, both blazing with their arrows, fought with each other like Vritra and Vasava in the days of yore, both eager to kill each other. Having drawn his bow to the fullest stretch, Sweta wounded Bhisma with seven arrows.

47. The brave one (Bhisma) then put forth his prowess; he quickly checked his adversary's valour as a mad elephant checks another mad elephant.

48. That delighter of the Kshatriyas, Sweta, then struck Bhisma; and the son of Shantanu pierced him in return with ten arrows.

49—53. Though thus wounded, that great warrior stood as unmoved as a mountain. Sweta again wounded the son of Shantanu with twenty-five straight arrows at which every one was astonished. Then smiling and licking with his tongue the corners of the mouth, Sweta cut down Bhisma's bow into ten parts with ten arrows. Then taking up a winged arrow made of iron, he crushed the palmyra on the top of the standard of that exalted one (Bhisma). Seeing the standard of Bhisma cut down, your sons thought that Bhisma was killed. The Pandavas in great delight blew their conchs.

54. Seeing the palmyra-standard of the illustrious Bhisma cut down, Duryodhana, in great anger, urged his army to the battle.

55—64. They all carefully protected Bhisma who was then in great distress. To them that stood there as spectators, the king (Duryodhana) thus exclaimed. "Either Sweta or Bhisma will die (to day)". Having heard the words of the king, the great car-warriors soon with four kinds of troops advanced to protect the son of Ganga. O descendant of Bharata, Valhika, Kritavarmana, Kripa, Salya, the son of Jarasandha, Vikarna, Chitrasenaand Vivingsati, all, with great speed, surrounded him on all sides and poured a continuous shower of arrows. That high-souled and mighty warrior then soon checked those wrathful warriors with sharp arrows by displaying his own lightness of hands. Checking them all as a lion checks a herd of elephants, Sweta cut off Bhisma's bow with a thick shower of arrows. Then the son of Shantanu, Bhisma, took up another bow in that battle and wounded Sweta with arrows furnished with the feather of Kanka birds. Then that commander (Sweta) in great anger wounded Bhisma in that battle with innumerable arrows in the very sight of all. Seeing Bhisma, that foremost of all the warriors, checked in the battle by Sweta, the king (Duryodhana) became exceedingly cheerless, and your whole army felt themselves in great distress.

65. Seeing the heroic Bhisma checked and wounded by Sweta with his arrows, all thought that Bhisma had been killed.

66—71. Thereupon your father Devavrata, seeing his standard cut down and the army checked, grew greatly enraged and shot at Sweta innumerable arrows. O king, that foremost of heroes Sweta however baffled all those arrows of Bhisma, and he once more cut off with a broad-headed arrow the bow of your father. O king, throwing aside that bow, the son of Ganga took up in great anger another strong and large bow, and aiming seven large broad-headed arrows, killed the four horses of the general Sweta, then he cut down his standard and then the head of his charioteer. Thereupon that great car-warrior jumped down from his car the horses and the charrioteer of which had been killed.

72—77. Seeing Sweta, that foremost of car-wariors, deprived of his car, the grandsire began to strike him on all sides with showers of arrows. Wounded in this great battle with arrows shot from Bhisma's bow, leaving his bow on his car, he took up a dart decked with gold, and, taking up that terrible and fearful dart which resembled the fatal rod of Death and which was capable of killing even Death himself, Sweta thus spoke in anger to the son of Shantanu, Bhisma. "O foremost of men, wait a little and see my prowess." Having said this to Bhisma that greatly powerful and high-souled bow-man hurled that dart resembling a snake.

78. O king, then loud cries of "Oh" and "Alas" rose among your sons when they saw that fearful dart which was as effulgent as the rod of death.

79. Having been hurled from Sweta's hand,—that dart which resembled a snake that had just cast off its slough, fell with great force like a meteor from the sky.

80—81. Your father Devavrata, then, without the slightest fear, with eight sharp and winged arrows, cut down into nine parts that fearful dart which was decked with pure gold and which appeared to be covered with flames of fire.

82. All your troops, O best of the Bharata race, then sent up a loud shout of joy. Virata's son, however, having seen his dart cut down into fragments, lost all sense in anger.

83. Like one whose heart was overcome by the approaching death, he could not settle what to do. O king, deprived of his senses by anger, Virata's son, with smiles,

84. Took up in great cheerfulness a fearful mace for Bhisma's destruction. With eyes red in anger, and looking like a second Yama armed with the rod,

85. He rushed upon Bhisma as a swollen river rushes upon a rock. Considering his great impetuosity as incapable of being checked, the greatly fearful Bhisma,

86. Who is ever skilful in knowing the prowess of others, suddenly jumped down on the ground to avoid that blow. O king, Sweta, however, whirling that heavy mace in anger,

87—88. Hurled it on Bhisma's car like the deity Maheswara (Siva). By the fall of that mace intended for Bhisma's destruction, that car, with its standard, charioteer and horses, was reduced to ashes. Seeing Bhisma, that foremost of car-warriors fighting on foot, 89—91. Many car-warriors, Salya and others soon came to his help. Getting up on another car and stretching his bow, Bhisma slowly advanced towards Sweta. In the meantime he heard a voice in the sky. It was celestial and fraught with his own good. It said, "O Bhisma, O Bhisma, O mighty armed hero, fight without losing a moment.

92. This is the moment fixed by the creator for getting success over this one." Having heard these words uttered by the celestial messenger,

93—94. Bhisma carefully determined to kill Sweta. Seeing that foremost of car-warriors fighting on foot, many great car-warriors rushed unitedly to his rescue. They were Satyaki, Bhimasena, and that descendant of Prishata, Dhristadyumna,

95. The Kekaya brothers, Dhrishtaketu and the greatly powerful Abhimanyu. Seeing them coming to his rescue, with Drona, Salya, and Kripa,

96. That high-souled hero (Bhisma) stopped them all as a mountain resists the wind. When the illustrious warriors of the Pandava army were thus checked,

97—98. Sweta took up a sword and cut off Bhisma's bow. Throwing off that bow the (Kuru) grandfather having heard the words of the celestial messenger set his heart to destroy Sweta as soon as possible. Though baffled, your father Devavrata,

99. That great car-warrior, soon took up another bow as effulgent as the bow of Indra. He stringed it in a moment.

100. O best of the Bharata race, then your father, seeing that great car-warrior Sweta,—though he was then surrounded by those foremost of men (the Pandava warriors) with Bhimasena at their head, 101—103. The son of Ganga (Bhisma), rushed forward to attack Sweta alone. Seeing Bhishma coming, the greatly powerful Bhimasena wounded him with sixty arrows. But that great car-warrior, your father Devavrata, checked Bhimasena, Abhimanyu and other car-warriors with some fearful arrows. He then struck him (Sweta) with three straight arrows.

104. The (Kuru) grandfather, struck Satyaki in that great battle with one hundred arrows, Dhristadyumna with twenty and the Kekaya brothers with five.

105. Having thus checked all those great bowmen with fearful arrows, your father Devavrata rushed towards Sweta alone.

106. Then taking up an arrow which resembled Death himself which was capable of bearing a great strain and which was incapable of being resisted, the mighty Bhisma placed it on his bow-string.

107. That winged arrow, endued with the force of the Brahma weapon, was seen by the celestials, the Gandharvas, the Pishachas, the Uragas and the Rakshashas.

108. That arrow, as effulgent as the fire went through his armour and struck into the earth with a flash like that of the thunder-bolt.

109. As the sun hurriedly retires to his western chamber taking with him the rays of light, so did it pass away out of Sweta's body taking with it his life.

110. When he was thus killed by Bhisma in that battle, we saw him fall down like a loosened peak of a mountain.

111. All the great Kshatrya car-warriors, on the Pandava side, lamented (for his death). But your son and all the Kurus were filled with great delight.

112. O king, seeing Sweta killed, Dushashana danced in joy over the field of battle in accompaniment of the loud music of conchs and drums.

113. When that great bowman, was killed by that ornament of battle, Bhisma, the great bowmen of the Pandava side, with Shakhandin at their head, trembled in fear.

114. O king, when the general (Sweta) was killed, Dhananjaya (Arjuna) and the Vrishni chief (Krishna) slowly withdrew their troops.

115. O descendant of Bharata, both your troops and theirs withdrew and both your troops and theirs frequently sent up loud shouts.

116. O chastiser of foes the great (Pandava) car-warriors entered their camp in great cheerlessness, thinking of the great slaughter made by their general (Sweta) in that great single combat.

Thus ends the forty-eighth chapter, the death of Sweta, in the Bhismavadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XLIX.

(BHISMAVADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. O Sanjaya, when their general Sweta was killed by the foe in that battle, what did those great bowmen, the Panchalas and the Pandavas do ?

2. When they heard that their general Sweta had been killed, what took place between those that fought to kill him and those that retreated before them.

3. O Sanjaya, your words please me for they speak of our victory. My heart does not feel any shame in remembering our transgression.

4—5. The old Kuru chief (Bhisma) is ever cheerful and devoted to us. Though he (Duryodhana) provoked hostilities with that intelligent son of his uncle, (Yudhisthira), yet he once sought the protection of the Pandavas. At that time abandoning everything, he lived in misery.

6—7. In consequence of the prowess of the Pandavas and in consequence of receiving checks everywhere, and also in consequence of placing himself amid entanglement, Duryodhana had (for sometime) recourse to honourable behaviour. Once that wicked-minded prince had to seek their protection, why, therefore, O Sanjaya, had Sweta, who was devoted to Yudhisthira, been killed?

8. This narrow-minded prince (Duryodhana) with all his prosperity has been hurled to the nether regions by a number of wretches. Bhisma did not like this war, nor did the preceptor (Drona),

9. Nor did Kripa, nor Gandhari ; nor did I, O Sanjaya, like it. Nor did the Vrishni chief, Vasudeva (Krishna), nor that son of Pandu, Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira),

10—12. Nor did Bhima, nor Arjuna, nor those two foremost of men, the twins Nakula and Sahadeva. Though always forbidden by me, by Gandhari, by Vidura, by Rama the son of Jamadagni, and by the illustrious Vyasa, yet, O Sanjaya, the wicked-minded and sinful Duryodhana with Dushasana always followed the evil counsels of Karna and Suvala's son (Sakuni), and behaved maliciously with the Pandavas.

13—14. O Sanjaya, I think that he has fallen into great distress. After the death of Sweta and the victory of Bhisma, what did Partha, accompained by Krishna, in anger do ? O child, it is Arjuna whom I fear, and my that fear cannot be dispelled.

15. The son of Kunti, Dhananjaya, is brave, and he possesses great activity. I have no doubt he will, with his arrows, cut into fragments the bodies of his enemies.

16. Seeing that son of Indra, who is equal in battle to Upendra, the younger brother of Indra,—who is a warrior whose wrath and purposes are never futile,—what became the state of your mind?

17. He is brave, he is learned in the Vedas, he is as effulgent as the fire and the sun. He possesses the knowledge of Aindra weapon ; that high-souled warrior is ever victorious when he falls upon his foe.

18. His weapons always fall on the foe with the force of the thunder-bolt. His arms are astonishingly quick to draw the bow-string. That son of Kunti is a great car-warrior.

19. O Sanjaya, the invincible son of Drupada also is exceedingly wise. What did Dhristadyumna do when Sweta had been killed in battle.

20. I have no doubt that in consequence of the wrongs they suffered before,and in consequence of the death of their general, the hearts of the Pandavas blazed up.

21. O Sanjaya, thinking of their anger, I never, by day or by night, enjoy any peace of mind on account of Duryodhana. How did the great battle take place ? Tell me all about it.

Sanjaya said :—

22. O king, hear about your great transgressions. You should not put all blame on Duryodhana.

23. Your understanding is like building an embankment when the waters have escaped. It is like the digging of a well when the house is on fire.

24. O descendant of Bharata, when the forenoon had passed away and the general Sweta had been killed by Bhisma in that great fearful battle,

25. That chastiser of foes, Sankha, the son of Virata, that hero who always took delight in battle, seeing Salya stationed with Kritavarman,

26. Blazed up in anger as fire with Ghee. That great car-warrior, having stretched his bow that resembled the bow of Indra himself,

27. Rushed upon the Madra king with the intention of killing him. He was supported on all sides by innumerable car-warriors.

28—29. Pouring a shower of arrows, Sankha rushed towards the car of Salya. Seeing him advance like a mad elephant, seven great car-warriors on your side surronnded him in order to rescue the Madra king who was almost within the jaws of death.

30. Roaring like the clouds and taking up a bow full six cubits long, the mighty-armed Bhisma rushed upon Sankha in battle.

31. Seeing that great car-warrior and great bowman thus rush (towards) Sankha, the Pandava army began to tremble like a boat tossed by the tempest.

32. Then Arjuna quickly advanced and placed himself in front of Sankha in order to protect him from Bhisma. Then a great battle was fought between Bhisma and Arjuna.

33. O best of the Bharata race, then Salya jumped down from his large car with his mace in hand, and killed the four horses of Sankha's car.

34. Sankha leaped down from his car thus deprived of its horses, and taking a sword, he ran towards the car of Vibhatsu. He then got on it and once more was at his ease.

36. There were shot from Bhisma's car innumerable arrows with which both the sky and the earth were covered.

37. That foremost of heroes, Bhisma killed with his arrows innumerable troops of the Panchalas, the Matsyas, the Kekayas and the Prabhadraka hosts.

38. Abandoning the battle with the son of Pandu viz., Sabyasachin (Arjuna), Bhisma rushed towards Drupada, the Panchala king, who stood surrounded by his troops.

39—41. As a forest is consumed by fire at the end of winter, so were the troops of Drupada seen to be consumed (by Bhisma). Bhisma stood in that battle like a blazing fire without smoke, or like the sun at mid-day, scorching every thing around. The Pandava troops could not even look at Bhisma.

42. Afflicted with fear, the Pandava troops looked around, and not finding any protector, they appeared like a herd of kine afflicted with cold.

43. O descendant of Bharata, being slaughtered in great numbers and crushed when retreating, the Pandava troops cried "Oh" and "Alas."

44—45. Then the son of Shantanu, Bhisma, with his bow always drawn to a circle, poured a continuous shower of arrows that resembled so many poisonous snakes. Creating continuous lines of arrows in all directions, that vow-observing hero killed innumerable car-warriors of the Pandava's.

46. When the Pandava troops were thus routed and crushed all over the field, the sun set, the night came, and nothing could be seen.

47. O best of the Bharata race, seeing Bhisma still proudly standing in battle, the sons of Pritha withdrew their forces.

Thus ends the forty-ninth chapter, First day's battle, in the Bhismavadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER L.

(BHISMAVADHA PARVA),—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O best of the Bharata race, when the troops were withdrawn on the first day (of battle) and when Duryodhana was exceedingly glad in seeing Bhisma angry in the field of battle,

2. Dharmaraja Yudhisthira soon went to Janardana with all his brothers and with all the kings on his side.

3. Being greatly afflicted with the defeat and seeing Bhisma's prowess, O king, he thus spoke to the Vrishni chief (Krishna).

4. "O Krishna, behold that greatly powerful and mighty bowman Bhisma. He consumes my troops with his arrows as fire consumes dry grass.

5. How shall we even look at that illustrious one who is consuming my troops like fire fed with Ghee.

6. Seeing that foremost of men, that great warrior, armed with bow, my troops afflicted with his arrows, fly away (in all directions).

7. Even angry Yama himself, or the wielder of the thunder-bolt (Indra) or the wielder of the noose, Varuna, or the holder of the mace, Kubera, may be defeated in battle;

8. But the greatly effulgent and mighty car-warrior Bhisma is incapable of being defeated. Such being the case, I am sinking in the fathomless ocean (Bhisma) without a boat.

9—10. O Keshava, O Govinda, when Bhisma is my foe, it is preferable for me to retire into the forest and live there. It is wrong to sacrifice these rulers of earth to death in the person of Bhisma. Learned as he is in all weapons, O Krishna, he will annihilate my army.

11. As insects rush into the blazing fire for their own destruction, so do my troops in this fearful battle.

12—14. O Vrishni chief, using prowess for the sake of acquiring a kingdom, I am being (unconsciously) led to destruction. My heroic brothers are all wounded with arrows for my sake. They are deprived of both sovereignty and happiness only through the great love they bear for their eldest brother. We highly regard life, for, under the circumstances, life is very precious. During the remainder of my days I will practise the severest asceticism. O Keshava, I shall not bring about the destruction of my friends.

15. The mighty Bhisma continuously kills with his celestial weapons many thousands of my car-warriors who are foremost of heroes.

16. O Madhava, tell me soon what should be done for my good. As regards Arjuna, I see he is indifferent in this battle, he behaves like a spectator.

17. The greatly powerful Bhisma alone, remembering Kshatriya duties, fights with all the prowess of his arms and to the utmost of his power.

18. With his great mace that kills the heroes, this illustrious one (Bhisma), with the best of his powers, achieves the most difficult feats on foot-soldiers, horses, cars and elephants.

19. O sire, this hero, however, is incapable of destroying in a fair fight the troops of our army if he tries for one hundred years.

20. This your friend (Arjuna) alone is learned in all weapons. Seeing us consumed by Bhisma and the illustrious Drona, he only looks on us with indifference.

21. The celestial weapons of Bhisma and those of the illustrious Drona are continuously consuming all the Kshatriyas.

22. O Krishna, such is the prowess of Bhisma: if he is angry, he will, with the help of the kings (on his side), certainly annihilate us.

23. O lord of Yoga, search out that great bow-man, that mighty car-warrior who will be able to extinguish Bhisma's prowess, as rain-charged clouds extinguish a forest-fire.

24. O Govinda, through your grace the Pandavas will recover their kingdom when their enemies will be killed, and they will be happy with their kinsmen."

25. Having said this, the high-souled son of Pritha, in great grief, remained silent for a long time in a reflected mood.

26. Seeing the Pandava (Yudhisthira) afflicted with grief and deprived of his senses by sorrow, Govinda thus spoke, giving excessive delight to all.

27. "O best of the Bharata race, do not grieve. You should not grieve, when all your brothers are heroes and illustrious bow-men.

28. I am also engaged in doing good to you, so are the great car-warriors Satyaki, the revered Virata and Drupada and also the descendant of Prishata, Dhristadyumna.

29. O best of kings, O monarch, all these kings with their troops are all in your favour. They are all devoted to you.

30. This great car-warrior, this descendant of Prishata, this Dhristadyumna, who had been placed in command of your troops, is always desirous of your welfare. He is ever engaged in doing what is agreeable to you.

31. O mighty-armed hero, so also is Shikhandin who is certain to be the slayer of Bhisma." Having heard this the king (Yudhisthira) thus spoke to that great car-warrior Dhristadyumna, 32. In that assembly and in the hearing of Vasudeva. "O Dhristadyumna, O descendant of Prishata, mark the words I speak to you.

33. The words uttered by me should not be transgressed. You have been appointed the commander of our forces with the approval of Vasudeva.

34. O foremost of men, as in the days of yore, Kartikeya was the commander of the celestial army, so are you the commander of the Pandava army.

35. O foremost of men, putting forth your prowess, kill the Kurus. O sire, I shall follow you Bhima and Krishna,

36. The sons of Madri, the sons of Draupadi clad in armour and also all the other foremost of kings, O best of men, (will also follow you)."

37. Then giving delight to all who heard him, Dhristadyumna thus spoke; "O son of Pritha, I am the ordained slayer of Drona.

38. I shall now fight with Bhisma, Drona, Kripa, Salya, Jayadratha, and all the other proud kings."

39. When that chastiser of foes, that foremost of princes, that descendant of Prishata (Dhristadyumna) defiantly spoke thus, the Pandava warriors, who were all greatly powerful, who were all incapable of being defeated, sent forth a loud shout.

40. Then the son of Pritha, Yudhisthira, thus spoke to the descendant of Prishata (Dhristadyumna), the commander of his army. "A Vyuha called Krauncharuna which is destructive of all foes

41. And which was spoken of by Vrihaspati to Indra in the days of old when the celestials and the Asuras fought, —kindly now form that Vyuha destructive of the hostile troops.

42. It was never before seen by any one. Now let the kings see it with the Kurus." Having been thus addressed by that foremost of men, as Vishnu is addressed by the wielder of thunder-bolt, 43—45. He (Dhristadyumna) placed Dhananjaya in front of the whole army in the next morning. The standard of Dhananjaya, (Arjuna) which had been made by the celestial artificer at the command of Indra, looked exceedingly beautiful when it moved through the sky. Adorned with banners of the rain-bow colours, when it coursed through the air like a ranger of the skies, looking like a fleeting vapoury mansion in the sky, O sire, it appeared to glide dancingly along the path by which the car went.

46. The wielder of Gandiva with that jewelled standard, and that standard itself with the wielder of Gandiva, looked exceedingly grand, as the self-create (Brahma) with the sun.

47. The king Drupada, surrounded by a large number of troops, stood at the head of that Vyuha, becoming as if its head. The two kings Kuntibhoja and Saivya became its two eyes.

48. O best of the Bharata race, the ruler of the Dasarhas, the Prayagas, the Daserakas, the Anupakas and the Kiratas were placed in its neck.

49. O king, Yudhisthira with the Patacharas, the Hundas, the Puravakas, and the Nishadas, became its back.

50. Bhimasena, the descendant of Prishata Dhristadumna, the sons of Draupadi, Abhimanyu, and that great car-warrior Satyaki became its two wings.

51—52. They were backed, O descendant of Bharata, by the Pishachas, the Daradas, the Pandras, the Kundavisas, the Mandakas, the Ladakas, the Tanganas, the further Tanganas, the Valhikas, the Tittiras, the Pandyas, the Uddras, the Saravas, Tumbhumas, the Vatsas, and the Nakulas.

53—54. Nakula and Sahadeva stood in the left wing. On the joints of the wings stood ten thousand car-warriors and on the head stood one hundred thousand and on the back one hundred millions and on the neck one hundred and seventy thousand.

55. On the joints of the wings, on the wings and the extremeties of the wings, stood innumerable elephants looking like so many blazing mountains.

56. The rear was protected by Viratas backed by the Kekayas, the ruler of the Kasis, and with the king of the Chedi, with thirty thousand cars.

57. O descendant of Bharata, thus forming this great Vyuha the Pandavas, all clad in armour waited for the morning.

58. Their clean, costly and white umbrellas, as brilliant as the sun, shone on the back of their elephants and over their chariots.

Thus ends the fiftieth chapter, Krauncha Vyuha making of the Pandavas, in the Bhismavadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LI.

(BHISMAVADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:

1—5. O Sire, O descendant of Bharata, seeing that great and fearful Vyuha, formed by the immeasurably powerful Pandava, your son (Duryodhana) came to the preceptor, Kripa, Salya, Somadatta's son, Vikarna, Aswatthaman and all his brothers headed by Dushasana, and also all other mighty heroes, assembled there for battle, spoke these words giving great pleasure to all, "You are armed with various kinds of weapons, you are learned in the Shastras. O great car-warriors, each of you singly is capable of destroying the Pandavas with all their troops.

6. How easy it is for you then (to destroy them) when you are united. Our army protected by Bhisma is unlimited and their army protected by Bhima is limited.

7—9. Let the Samsthanas, the Surasenas, the Venikas, the Kukkuras, the Rechakas, the Trigarttas, the Madrakas, the Yavanas, with Satrunjaya and Dushasana, and with also that great hero Vikarna, Nanda, Upananda, and Chitrasena, with the Manibhadrakas protect Bhisma with their respective troops."

10. O Sire, then Bhisma, Drona and your sons formed a great Vyuha to resist that of the sons of Pritha.

11. Then, like the lord of the celestials (Indra), Bhisma surrounded by innumerable troops, advanced at the head of a mighty army.

12—14. O king, that great bowman, that greatly powerful son of Bharadwaja (Drona) followed him with the Kuntalas, the Dasarnas, the Magadhas, the Vidarbhas, the Melakas, the Karnas, and the Paravarnas, the Gandharvas, the Sindhusauviras, the Sivis, and the Vasatis with their all combatants. Sakuni with all his troops protected the son of Bharadwaja.

15—16. Then king Duryodhana with all his brothers accompanied by the Aswalakas, the Vikarnas, the Vamanas, the Kosalas, the Daradas, the Vrikas, the Kshudrakas and the Malavas, cheerfully advanced against the Pandava army.

17. O sire, Bhurisrava, Sala and Salya, Bhagadatta, Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti protected the left wing.

18. Somadatta, Susarman, the ruler of Kambhojas, Sudhakshina, Satayus and Srutayus protected the right wing.

19. Aswatthaman, Kripa, the Satwata hero Kritavarmanan, with large number of troops, protected the rear.

20. Behind them stood many chiefs, Ketumat, Vasudana and the powerful prince of Kashi.

20. O descendant of Bharata, then all your troops, when they were cheerfully waiting for battle, blew their conchs and sent forth lion-like roars.

22. Hearing these shouts, the greatly powerful and the venerable Kuru grandsire uttered a lion-like roar and then blew his conch in great delight.

23. Their conchs, drums, Peshis and cymbals were sounded by all, which created a fearful din all over the field of battle.

24. Krishna and Arjuna, riding on the same car yoked with (four) white horses, blew their excellent conchs adorned with gold and jewel.

25. Hrishikesha (Krishna) blew the conch called Panchajanya and Dhananjaya Devadatta. That doer of fearful deeds, Vrikodara (Bhima) blew his huge conch, called Paundra.

26. The son of Kunti, Yudhisthira, blew the conch called Anantavijaya, Nakula and Sahadeva blew Sughosha and Manipushpaka.

27—28. The King of Kashi, and Saivya and Shikhandin, the great car-warrior Dhristadyumna and Virata and the great car-warrior Satyaki and that great bowman the Panchala king, and also the five sons of Draupadi, all blew their large conchs and sent forth lion-like roars.

29—30. That great uproar, thus uttered by those heroes resounded through the sky. O great king, thus again the Kurus and the Pandavas advanced against each other with the intention of fighting a great battle.

Thus ends the fifty-first chapter, Kuru Vyuha, in the Bhismavadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LII.

(BHISMA VADHA PARVA)—

Continued

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. When my troops and the troops of our foe were thus placed in battle-array, how did then the foremost of warriors Bhisma begin to strike?

Sanjaya said :—

2. When all the troops were thus placed in battle-array, the warriors all clad in armours waited with their excellent standards upraised.

3. O king, seeing his army look like the infinite ocean, your son Duryodhana, who stood within it, spoke thus to all his troops "You are all clad in armour. Now begin the fight".

4. Then all the (Kuru) warriors, full of cruel intentions and devoid of the desire of living, rushed upon the Pandavas with their standards all upraised.

5. Then a fearful hair-stirring battle took place. The cars and elephants all go mixed up.

6. Arrows with beautiful feathers and with sharp points shot by the car-warriors fell on the elephants and the horses.

7—9. When the battle thus began, the venerable Kuru grandfather, the mighty-armed and terribly powerful Bhisma, clad in armour, took up his bow and rushed upon them. He poured a shower of arrows on the heroic son of Subhadra, on Bhimasena, on the great car-warrior Arjuna, on the ruler of the Kekayas, Virata, Prishata prince Dhristadyumna and also on the Chedi and the Matsya warriors.

10. The great (Pandava) Vyuha wavered at that great attack made by that (Kuru) hero. The battle that was then fought by the combatants was fearful.

11. Many horsemen and car-warriors and best of horses fell in quick succession. Many car-warriors of the Pandava began to run away.

12. Then that foremost of men, Arjuna, seeing the great car-warrior Bhisma (destroying the Pandava troops) thus angrily spoke to the Vrishni prince (Krishna his charioteer) "Go to the place where the grandfather is."

13. "O descendant of Vrishni, it is apparent that Bhisma, in anger, will annihilate our troops for the good of Duryodhana.

14—15. O Janardana, Drona, Kripa, Salya, Vikarna with the sons of Dhritarashtra headed by Duryodhana and protected by this great bowman (Bhisma) will destroy the Panchalas. O Janardana, I shall, therefore, kill Bhisma for the good of my troops."

16. To him thus spoke Vamdeva. "O Dhananjaya, O hero, be careful, for I shall soon take you near the grandfather's car."

17. O king, having said this, Sourin (Krishna) took that world-renowned chariot in front of Bhisma's car.

18—19. With countless banners flying, with horses as handsome as a flight of cranes, with the standard upraised; with the ape (on that standard) roaring fearfully, that son of Pandu (Arjuna) came slaughtering the Kurus and the Surasenas on his large car as effulgent as the sun; the rattle of the car-wheel of which resembled that of the clouds.

20—23. That enhancer of the joy of his friends soon came to the fight. The son of Shantanu, Bhisma, protected by the warriors headed by the Sindhu king and by the warriors of the east and also by the Kekayas impetuously met him who was rushing like a mad elephant, thus frightening the brave warriors and destroying the troops with his sharp arrows. Except the Kuru grandsire, and those car-warriors, Drona and Vikartana's son, who else was able to withstand in battle the wielder of Gandiva? O king of kings, Bhisma, the grandfather of the Kurus,

24. Struck Arjuna with seventy-seven arrows, Drona struck him with twenty-five, Kripa with fifty,

25. Duryodhana with sixty-four, Salya with nine, Drona's son (Aswatthama) that foremost of men, with sixty, Vikarna with three, the Sindhu king with nine, and Sakuni with five; O king, Artayani struck the Pandava with three broad-headed arrows. Though struck on all sides, with sharp arrows, that great bowman,

26—31. That mighty-armed one, stood unmoved as a mountain. Thereupon, that greatly powerful hero (Arjuna), of immeasurable strength, pierced Bhisma with twenty-five, Kripa with nine, Drona with sixty, Vikarna with three, Artayani with three and also the king (Duryodhana) with five arrows. Then Satyaki, Virata, Prishata prince Dhistadyumna, the sons of Draupadi, and Abhimanyu all came there to help him. Then the Panchala prince, supported by the Somakas, rushed upon the great bowman Drona who was aiding the son of Ganga (Bhisma). Then Bhisma, that best of all car-warriors, soon wounded that son of Pandu

32—36. With eighty sharp arrows, on seeing which your warriors were all very much delighted. Having heard the joyous shouts of the warriors, that foremost of car-warriors, that greatly powerful Dhananjaya rushed amongst those foremost of car-warriors. O king, he sported with his bow aiming (with success) his arrows at those great car-warriors. Then, that ruler of men, Duryodhana, seeing his troops much afflicted by that son of Pandu, spoke thus to Bhisma, "O sire, O son of Ganga, this mighty Pandava, accompanied by Krishna, cuts down our roots by destroying our troops though you and that foremost of car-warriors, Drona, are alive.

37. O king, it is only for you that Karna has laid aside his weapons and does not fight with the sons of Pritha, though he is a great friend of mine.

38. O son of Ganga, therefore do that by which this Falguna (Arjuna) might be killed." O king, having been thus addressed, your father Devavrata

39—40. Said "Fie to Khastriya usage" and then he went towards the car of Partha. O king, all the chiefs, then seeing both those two warriors face to face for fight with white horses yoked to their chariots, sent up a lion-like roar. They also blew their conchs. Then Drona's son and your son, Duryodhana and Vikarna

41—42. All stood, O sire, surrounding Bhisma in that great battle. So did the Pandavas also stand surrounding Dhananjaya in that fearful battle. The fight then began. The son of Ganga wounded Partha with nine arrows.

43—48. Arjuna wounded him in return with ten arrows. Then with one thousand arrows well-shot, the Pandava Arjuna, ever celebrated for his skill in arms, covered Bhisma on all sides. That net of arrows of Partha, O king, was soon dispelled by another counter-net of arrows shot by the son of Shantanu, Bhisma. Both being well-pleased and both taking delight in battle, fought with each other, none of them gaining any advantage over the other. The continuous downpour of arrows shot from Bhisma's bow were all baffled by those shot from the bow of Arjuna. So also the shower of arrows shot by Arjuna, was all cut down to the ground by the Ganga's son. Arjuna then wounded Bhisma with twenty-five sharp arrows. Bhisma also in that battle wounded Partha in return with nine arrows.

49—50. Those two great warriors, those two chastisers of foes, wounded each other's horses, and cut down each other's car-wheels and shafts. Then, O king, Bhisma, that best of heroes,

51—52. Struck Vasudeva on his breast with three arrows. O king, struck with three arrows the slayer of Madhu (Krishna) shone like a budded Kinsuka tree. Then seeing Madhava thus pierced, Arjuna

53—56. Wounded the charioteer of the son of Ganga with three arrows. Trying to strike each other's charioteers, they could not take aim at each other in that fight. O king, for the great ability and dexterity of the charioteers of both those warriors, their cars made beautiful circles by advancing and retreating. O king, seeking opportunity to strike each other, they often changed their positions to take aim at each other. Both of them blew their conchs and often sent forth lion-like roars.

57—58. With the sound of their conchs and the rattle of their car-wheels, the very earth appeared to be rent asunder. She began to tremble. Subterranean noise was heard. O foremost of the Bharata race, none could detect any defect in any of them.

59. Both of them possessed great prowess and great courage in battle. Each was other's match. Seeing his (Bhisma's) standard alone, the Kurus could come near him;

60—62. So could the Pandavas also come to Partha by recognising his standard alone. O king, seeing the prowess thus displayed by those two foremost of men, O descendant of Bharata, all persons in that great battle were filled with wonder. None marked any difference between the two. Both of them were perfectly invisible by their continuous showers of arrows.

63—65. Soon again both of them became visible. Seeing their great prowess, the Gandharvas, the Charanas, the great Rishis and the celestials thus spoke to one another, "Those (two) great car-warriors, when angry, are incapable of being vanquished even by all the worlds including the celestials, the Gandharvas and the Asuras. This exceedingly wonderful battle will be considered wonderful by all the worlds,"

66—68. Such a battle as this will never take place again. Bhisma is incapable of being vanquished in battle by the greatly wise Partha though he showers his arrows on the bow, car and steed of the forms. So also is that great bowman, the Pandava (Arjuna), incapable of being vanquished in battle by even the celestials. Bhisma is not competent to defeat him. As long as the world would last, so long would this battle be fought equally on both the sides."

69. O king, we heard these words full of praise of both the son of Ganga and the son of Pritha.

70—71. O descendant of Bharata, when these two were fighting with each other, other warriors of your side and of that of the Pandavas killed one another with sharp swords and polished battle-axes, with innumerable arrows and various kinds of other weapons.

72. So long that fearful battle continued, heroic warriors of both sides cut one another down. O king, the battle that was fought between Drona and the Panchala prince was also very fearful.

Thus ends the fifty-second chapter, fight between Bhisma and Arjuna, in the Bhismavadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LIII.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. O Sanjaya, tell me how that great bowman Drona and the Panchala prince, the scion of the Prishata race, fought with each other in that great battle.

2. When Shantanu's son, Bhisma, could not escape the son of Pandu (Arjuna) in battle, O Sanjaya, I consider Destiny to be supreme over exertion.

3. When enraged in battle Bhisma could destroy all the mobile and immobile creatures; O Sanjaya, why could he not then escape the Pandava (Arjuna) in battle with his great prowess?

Sanjaya said :—

4. O king, hear about this fearful battle. The son of Pandu (Arjuna) is incapable of being vanquished by even the celestials with Indra at their head.

5. With various kinds of arrows, Drona wounded Dhristadyumna and he cut down his charioteer from his place on the car.

6. O sire, the angry warrior, (Drona) also with four arrows, wounded the four excellent horses of Dhristadyumna.

7. The brave Dhristadyumna also wounded Drona with nine sharp arrows, exclaiming "Wait" "Wait."

8. Thereupon the greatly powerful and high-souled son of Bharadwaja (Drona) covered with his arrows the angry Dhristadyumna.

9. He then took up a terrible arrow for the destruction of the Prishata prince. It resembled in force the thunder-bolt of Sakra. It looked like a second rod of Yama.

10. O descendant of Bharata, seeing that arrow aimed by the son of Bharadwaja, all the troops cried "Oh" and "Alas".

11. But we then saw the great prowess of Dhristadyumna. He stood immovable like a mountain in that battle.

12. He cut down that terrible and blazing arrow which was rushing towards him like his own death. He then poured a shower of arrows on the son of Bharadwaja.

13. Seeing that very great difficult feat achieved by Dhristadyumna, the Panchalas and the Pandavas were all filled with delight. They, again and again, sent forth loud shouts.

14. Then with the desire of killing him, that greatly powerful prince shot at Drona a dart of great force adorned with gold and Vaidurja gems.

15. Thereupon the son of Bharadwaja smilingly cut down into three parts that dart adorned with gold and gems that was coming towards him with great force.

16. O king, having seen his dart thus baffled, the greatly powerful Dhristadyumna poured a shower of arrows on Drona.

17. Then that great car-warrior, Drona, baffling that shower of arrows, cut off the bow of the son of Drupada at a favourable opportunity.

18. When his bow was thus cut off in that battle, that highly and illustrious warrior hurled on Drona a mace with the firmness of a mountain.

19. Having been thus hurled by his hand, that fearful mace flew through the sky for the destruction of Drona. Then again we saw the wonderful prowess of Bharadwaja's son.

20.—21. He baffled that mace decked with gold, and having baffled it, he shot at the Prishata prince many sharp arrows well-tempered, and furnished with golden wings. Penetrating the armour of the Prishata prince, they drank his blood.

22. Then the illustrious Dhristadyumna took up another bow, and with all his strength he wounded Drona with five arrows.

23. Then those two foremost of men, covered with blood, looked as beautiful as the Kinsuka flowers in spring.

24—25. Then that high-souled hero, (Drona) cut down his bow and with countless arrows covered the Prishah prince (Dhristadyumna) on all sides as clouds shower rains on a mountain.

26—27. He felled his adversary's charioteer from his place, he also cut down his four horses with four sharp arrows. With another arrow he cut off the leathern fence of Dristadyumna's hand.

28. When his bow was thus cut down again, when he was thus deprived of his car and when his steeds were thus killed and his charioteer overthrown, the Panchala prince, displaying great prowess, jumped down from his car with a mace in hand.

29. But, O descendant of Bharata, before he could come down from his car, Drona cut down his mace into many fragments. It was a wonderful feat.

30. Then the mighty-armed Panchala prince took up a large and beautiful shield decked with hundred (golden) moons and also a large sword of excellent make.

31. He, then with great impetuosity, rushed towards Drona with the intention of killing him, as a hungry lion runs towards a mad elephant in the forest.

32—33. Then we again saw the wonderful prowess of Bharadwaja's son,—wonderful was the lightness of hands in using the weapon, and also his strength of arms. He alone checked the Prishata prince with a shower of arrows. Though he possessed great prowess, he could not proceed further.

34. We then saw that the great car-warrior Dhristadyumna stood where he was. He warded off those showers of arrows using his arms with great dexterity.

35. Then the greatly strong and mighty Bhimasena soon came there with the desire of helping the Prishata prince in that combat.

36. O king, he wounded Drona with seven sharp arrows. He soon took up the Prishata prince on a car.

37. Then king Duryodhana asked the ruler of Kalinga to go to the rescue of Bharadwaja's son with a large number of troops.

38. O lord of men, then those countless Kalingas rushed against Bhima at the command of your son.

39. Then that foremost of car-warriors, Drona abandoned the Panchala prince and met Virata and Drupada, both together.

40. Dhristadyumna then went to support Yudhisthira in battle. Then a fearful and hair-stirring battle was fought

41. Between the Kalingas and the illustrious Bhima,—a battle which was fearful and all-destroying.

Thus ends the fifty-third chapter, fight between Dhristadyumna and Drona, in the Bhismavadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LIV.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1—2. How did the Kalinga king, that commander of a large army, having been asked by my son and supported by his troops, fight in battle with that doer of wonderful deeds, the mighty Bhimasena, that hero who roved over the field of battle with his club ?

Sanjaya said :—

3. O great king, thus asked by your son, the mighty Kalinga king accompanied by large army, advanced towards the chariot of Bhima.

4—5. O descendant of Bharata, Bhimasena, then, supported by the Chedis, rushed towards that large and mighty Kalinga army consisting of many cars, horses, and elephants. It was armed with great weapons. It was advancing towards him with Ketumat, the son of the Nishadha king, at its head.

6. Inflamed in anger, Srutayush, clad in armour, followed by his troops in battle-array and accompanied by king Ketumat, came in front of Bhima.

7. The Kalinga king with many thousand cars, and Ketumat with ten thousand elephants and also the Nishadas,

8. All, O king, surrounded Bhimasena on all sides. Then the Chedis, the Matsyas, and the Karushas with Bhimasena at their head,

9. And with many other kings, rushed with great force against the Nishadas. Then took place a fearful and terrible battle

10. Between the warriors of both the sides,—all rushing forward with the desire to kill one another. Fearful was the battle that was fought between Bhima and his adversaries.

11—13. O great king, it resembled the battle that was fought between Indra and the great host of the Danavas. O descendant of Bharata, loud uproar rose from that mighty army fighting in that battle. It resembled the sound of the roaring ocean. O king, they cut down one another and made the whole field resemble a crematorium strewn with flesh and blood. Impelled by the desire to kill, they could not distinguish friends from foes.

14. Those brave warriors who were incapable of being easily defeated, cut down even their own friends. Fierce was the struggle that took place between the few and the many,

15. Between the Chedis and the Kalingas with the Nishadas. Displaying their prowess to the best of their power, the powerful

16—17. Chedis abandoned Bhimasena and turned back. When the Chedis turned back, that son of Pandu, Bhimasena met all the Kalingas. He did not turn back depending on the strength of his own arms. The greatly powerful Bhimasena did not move; from his car,

18. He covered the Kalingas with showers of sharp arrows. Then that great bowman, the Kalinga king and that car-warrior, his son,

19. Named Sakradeva, both attacked the Pandava (Bhima) with ten arrows. But shaking his beautiful bow, the mighty-armed Bhimasena,

20. Fought with the Kalinga king, depending only on his own prowess of arms. Sakradeva shot innumerable arrows in that battle,

21. And killed Bhimasena's horses with them. Seeing that chastiser of foes deprived of his car,

22. Sakradeva rushed upon him; and shot many sharp arrows, O great king, on Bhimasena; the mighty Sakradeva poured a shower of arrows as clouds pour rain after the summer is gone.

23. But the greatly strong Bhima stayed on that car, the horses of which had been killed. He hurled from it at Sakradeva a mace made of the hardest iron.

24—25. Killed by that fearful mace, O king, the son of the Kalinga king fell down with his standard and charioteer. Then that great car-warrior the Kalinga king, seeing his son killed, 26—27. Surrounded Bhima on all sides with innumerable troops; then the greatly strong and mighty-armed Bhima took up a sword with the desire of performing a great feat. O king, that foremost of men also took up a matchless shield made of the hide of a bull.

28—29. It was adorned with stars and crescents made of gold. The Kalinga king also in great anger rubbed his bow-string and took up a poisoned Sakti. He shot it at Bhimasena with the desire of killing him.

30. O king, Bhimsena however soon with his big sword cut down that sharp arrow which was rushing towards him with great impetuousity.

31. He then in great delight sent up a loud shout which filled the troops with terror. The Kalinga king, being very much enraged in fighting with Bhimasena,

32—33. Soon hurled upon him fourteen darts with heads made of stone. The mighty-armed Pandava (Bhima) soon cut them down into many fragments, O king, before they could reach him. Having cut down in that battle those fourteen arrows, Bhima, 34—35. That foremost of men, on seeing Bhanumat rushed upon him. Bhanumat thereupon covered Bhima with a shower of arrows. He set up a loud shout making the sky resound with it. Bhima however could not bear that lion-like shout in that battle.

36. Possessing as he does a fearfully loud voice, he also sent up a very loud shout. At his fearful shouts, the Kalingas were filled with great alarm.

37. O best of men, they no longer considered Bhima as a human being. O king of kings, then setting up a loud shout, Bhima,

38—39. With a sword in his hand, jumped upon the excellent elephant (of Bhanumat); and with the help of the tusk of that great elephant, he got on its back. Then with his huge sword, he cut down Bhanumat in two distinct parts. Having killed the Kalinga prince, that chastiser of foes,

40. Made his huge sword, which was capable of bearing a great strain, discend on the neck of the elephant. His head thus cut off, that great elephant fell with a tremendous roar,

41. As a mountain peak falls when eaten up by (the waves of the) sea. O descendant of Bharata, jumping down from that falling elephant, that descendant of Bharata, 42—45. Clad in armour, stood on the ground with his sword in his hand. Cutting down many elephants on all sides, he roved about making his way (through the troops of the enemy). He appeared to be like a moving wheel of fire. He slaughtered innumerable horsemen, elephants and car-warriors and foot soldiers. That foremost of men, the mighty Bhima was seen to move about the field with the speed of the hawk, cutting off with his sharp sword the bodies and heads of countless men (on foot) and also of those who were on elephant.

46. Thus fighting on foot in great rage like Yama himself at the universal dissolution, he struck terror into the hearts of his enemies. Those brave warriors all became confounded.

47. Only those that were foolish came rushing at him who was roving about that field of battle with sword in his hand.

48. That mighty chastiser of foes, cut off the shafts and yokes of those warriors on their cars, and he then killed them.

49. O descendant of Bharata, Bhimasena was seen to display various kinds of motions. He wheeled about and whirled about on high. He made side-thrusts, jumped forward, ran above and leapt high.

50. O descendant of Bharata, he was seen to rush forward and rush upward. Some, mangled by that illustrious son of Pandu with his sword, 51—52. Shrieked aloud; some, mortally wounded, fell down and was killed. O discendant of Bharata, many elephants, some with their trunks and the tusks cut off, others with their temporal globes cut open, fell down uttering fearful cries.

53—57. O king, broken lances, heads of elephant-drivers, beautiful housing of elephants, chords as shining as gold, collars, darts, mallets, quivers, various kinds of machines, beautiful bows, short arrows with polished heads, hooks and screws, various sorts of bells and belts decked with gold,—these were seen falling or already fallen on the field of battle. With elephants having the fore parts and hind parts of their bodies and trunks cut off or entirly killed, the battle field appeared to be strewn with fallen cliffs. Having thus killed many huge elephants that foremost of men then began to destroy the horses.

58. O descendant of Bharata, that hero felled many foremost of horse-men. O sire that battle that was fought between him and those soldiers was exceedingly fearful.

59—60. Hilts, traces, golden saddles, girths, covers for the horses, bearded darts, costly swords, armours, shields, and beautiful ornaments, were seen by us strewn over the ground in that great battle.

61—63. He caused ... rth to be covered with blood, thus ... ing her look as if she were variegated with lilies. The mighty Pandava, jumping high and dragging down some car-warriors, cut them down with their standards. Often jumping up and frequently rushing on all sides, that greatly powerful hero roved about and filled all the troops with wonder. Some he killed by his legs, some he dragged down and pressed them into the earth.

64. Others he cut down with his sword, others again he frightened with his terrible roars. Others he threw down by the force of his thighs.

65—68. Others again fled away on simply seeing him. It was thus that the great and powerful army of the Kalingas surrounded Bhimasena and rushed upon him. O best of the Bharata race, seeing Srutayush at the head of the Kalinga troops, Bhimasena rushed at him. Seeing him come, the Kalinga king wounded Bhimasena with nine arrows. Wounded by those arrows shot by the Kalinga king, like an elephant pierced by the hook, 69—70. Bhimasena blazed up in wrath like a fire fed with fuels. Then that best of charioteers, Asoka, soon brought a car decked with gold, and he caused Bhima to mount upon it. Therupon that chastiser of foes, the son of Kunti (Bhima) soon mounted on that car.

71—73. Then he rushed towards the Kalinga king, shouting "Wait" "Wait". Then the greatly powerful Srutayush, in great anger, shot at Bhima many sharp arrows and thus displayed his great lightness of hands. O king, thus wounded by those nine sharp arrows shot by the Kalinga king from his exeellent bow, that great warrior Bhima blazed up in anger like a snake struck with a rod.

74. Then that foremost of powerful men, that son of Pritha, Bhima in great anger drew his bow to its highest stretch, and killed the Kalinga king with seven iron arrows.

75. With two arrows he killed the two powerful protectors of his car-wheels; he also killed Satyadeva and Satya.

76. The high-souled Bhima then with many sharp arrows caused the destruction of Ketumat.

77. Thereupon the Kalinga warriors in great anger met the angry Bhimasena in battle backed by many thousands of combatants.

78. O king, armed with darts and maces and swords and lances and scimitars and battle-axes, the Kalingas by hundreds and thousands surrounded Bhimasena.

79. Resisting that shower of arrows, that great warrior (Bhima) then took up his fearful mace. He then jumped down from his car in great speed.

80—83. Bhima then killed seven hundred heroes; that chastiser of foes then sent two thousand Kalingas to the region of Death. It was a wonderful feat; it was thus that the heroic and the fearfully strong Bhima again and again killed in that battle a very large number of the Kalingas. Elephants were deprived of their riders by that son of Pandu. Afflicted with arrows they roved about the field, treading down innumerable troops and uttering roars like those of the clouds.

84. Then the mighty-armed Bhima with his sword in his hand blew in great delight his fearfully roaring conch.

85. With that tremendous sound the hearts of the Kalinga troops began to tremble in fear. O chastiser of foes, the Kalingas appeared to have lost all consciousness.

86—88. All the combatants and all the animals trembled in fear. By Bhimasena's roving about over the field of battle like an infuriated elephant, and by his frequent jumping up,—a short of trance came over the foe. The whole Kalinga army trembled in fear like a large lake agitated by an aligator.

89—90. Struck with panic, the Kalingas, fled away in all directions. When they were rallied again, the commander of the Pandava army (Dhristadyumna) then ordered his troops, exclaiming "fight".

91. Having heard the word of their commander, many heroes headed by Shikhandin came to the help of Bhima, supported by many well-skilled car-warriors.

92. The Pandava, king Yudisthira Dharmaraja followed all of them behind with a large force of elephants, each of the colour of clouds.

93. Thus urging all his troops, the Prishata prince surrounded by many great warriors went to protect one of the wings of Bhima's troops.

94. To the Panchala prince, there was none dearer than life on earth except Satyaki and Bhima.

95. That slayer of hostile heroes, the Prishata prince saw that chastiser of foes, the mighty-armed Bhimasena fighting among the Kalingas.

96. O chastiser of foes, O king, He sent forth many loud shouts and filled all his troops with delight. He blew his conch and uttered a lion-like roar.

97. Seeing the red standard of Dhristadyumna's car decked with gold and yoked with milk white steeds, Bhimasena became much encouraged.

98. The high-souled Dhristadyumna, seeing Bhimasena attacked by the innumerable Kalingas rushed to his rescue.

99. Seeing Satyaki at a distance, those two greatly powerful heroes Dhistadyumna and Vrikodara furiously fell upon the Kalingas.

100. The foremost of men, the descendant of (Sini), that best of all warriors (Satyaki) also soon came to the spot and defended the wings of both Bhima and the Prishata prince.

101. With his big bow in his hand, he created a great havoc. Making himself fierce in the extreme, he began to kill the enemy.

102. Bhima caused a river of blood to flow,—it was made of the flesh and blood of the Kalingas.

103. O king, seeing Bhima in this fearful fight, all the troops exclaimed, "This one who is fighting in Bhima's shape with the Kalingas is Yama himself."

104. Having heard their cries, the son of Santanu, Bhisma, surrounded on all sides by many warriors, soon came to Bhima.

105. Thereupon Satyaki, Bhima, and the Prishata prince Dhristadyumna all rushed towards Bhisma's car decked with gold.

106. All of them soon surrounded the son of Ganga. Without losing a moment they wounded Bhisma each with three fearful arrows.

107. Your father Devavrata, wounded each of these mighty bowmen with three straight arrows in return.

108. Having checked those mighty car-warriors with thousands of arrows, he killed with his arrows the horses of Bhima clad in golden armour.

109. The greatly strong Bhima however stood on the car, the horses of which were killed. He then with great force hurled a dart at Bhisma.

110. Your father Devavrata cut off in that battle that dart before it could reach his car. It then fell in fragments on the ground.

111. Then that foremost of men, Bhimasena took up a heavy and mighty mace made of Saikya iron. He then jumped down from his car.

112. But Dhristadyumna soon took up that foremost of car warriors on his own car. He then took away that illustrious hero in the sight of all the warriors.

113. Satyaki however, in order to do what is agreeable to Bhima, cut down with his arrows the charioteer of the revered Kuru grandfather.

114. When his charioteer was thus killed, that foremost of car-warriors Bhisma was borne away from the battle field by his horses which ran with the speed of wind.

115. O king, when that great car-warrior was thus carried away from the field of battle, Bhima blazed up like a great fire when it consumes dry grass.

116. Having killed all the Kalingas, O best of the Bharata race, he stood in the midst of the troops, and none dared to withstand him.

117. O best of the Bharata race, praised by the Pandavas and the Matsyas, he embraced Dhristadyumna and then went to Satyaki.

118. That foremost of the Yadus, that irresistible hero Satyaki then thus spoke to Bhimasena in the presence of Dhristadyumna.

119. "By good luck the Kalinga king, also the Kalinga prince Ketumat and also Sakradeva of that country and also all the Kalingas have been killed by you in this battle.

120. The army of the Kalingas, consisting of many thousands of cars, elephants, horses, noble warriors and heroic combatants, has been destroyed by your prowess of arms alone".

121. Having said this, the mighty-armed grandson of Sini the chastiser of foes embraced the son of Pandu (Bhima). He then quickly got upon his car. Then that great car-warrior began to kill the troops in anger, thus strengthening the hands of Bhima.

Thus ends the fifty-fourth chapter, the death of the Kalinga king, in the Bhismavadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LV.

(BHISMAVADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O descendant of Bharata, when that day passed away, when the destruction of cars, elephants, horses, foot-soldiers and horsemen went apace,

2. The Panchala prince fought with Drona's son (Ashwathaman), Salya, and the illustrious Kripa.

3. The mighty heir-apparent of the king of Panchala with many sharp arrows killed the horses of Drona's son, who is celebrated all over the world.

4. Deprived of his horses, Drona's son soon got upon the car of Salya and showered his arrows on the Panchala prince.

5. O descendant of Bharata, seeing Dhrishtadyumna fighting with Drona's son, the son of Subhadra (Abhimanyu) ran up showering his fearful arrows.

6. O best of the Bharata race, he wounded Salya with twenty-five arrows and Kripa with nine arrows and Ashwathaman with eight.

7. Drona's son also soon wounded Arjuna's son with many winged arrows ; Salya also pierced him with twelve arrows,—Kripa shot at him three sharp arrows.

8. Your grandson Lakshmana then rushed at Subhadra's son in anger, and a fearful battle began between the two.

9. In that fight Duryodhana's son in anger wounded Subhadra's son with many sharp arrows. O king, it was a wonderful feat.

10. O best of the Bharata race, the light-handed Abhimanyu, also being very much enraged, soon wounded his cousin with five hundred arrows.

11. O king, Lakshmana also with his arrows cut down (his adversary's) bow staff, on seeing which all the troops sent up a loud shout.

12. Then that slayer of hostile heroes, Subhadra's son, throwing aside the broken bow, took up another beautiful and tough bow.

13. Thereupon those two foremost of men, thus fighting together with the desire of counteracting each other's feats, wounded each other with innumerable sharp arrows.

14. O king, Duryodhana, on seeing his mighty son thus hard pressed by your grand son ran towards the spot.

15. When your son went to the spot, all the kings surrounded Arjuna's son with many thousands of cars.

16. O king, being as invincible and powerful as Krishna himself, that hero, being thus surrounded by those heroes, was not the least agitated.

17. Seeing Subhadra's son fighting, Dhananjaya (Arjuna) hastened to the spot in great anger, with the intention of rescuing his son.

18. Thereupon the kings headed by Bhisma and Drona and accopompanied by many elephants, horses and cars rushed with great force on Sabyasachin (Arjuna).

19. Then a thick shower of dust, being raised by foot-soldiers, horses and cars and cavalry-men, covered the sky.

20. When those thousands of elephants and hundreds of kings came within the reach of Arjuna's arrows, they could not make any further advance.

21. All the troops sent up loud shouts, and all directions became dark. Then the army of the Kurus assumed a fearful and dreadful aspect.

22. Neither the sky, nor the sun, nor the cardinal points, nor the earth, O best of men, could be distinguished, in consequence of the continuous showers of arrows shot by Kiritin (Arjuna).

23. Many elephants were deprived of their standards, and many car-warriors were also deprived of their horses. Having abandoned their cars, many car-warriors were seen wandering (over the field).

24. Many other car-warriors, deprived of their cars, were seen to rove about with their weapons in their hands and other arms adorned with Angadas.

25. O king, horsemen, urging their horses and elephant-men urging their elephants fled away in all directions from the fear of Arjuna.

26. Kings were seen falling form their cars ; elephants and horses were also seen to fall cut down by Arjuna's arrows.

27—28. Assuming a fierce countenance, Arjuna cut down with fearful arrows the upraised arms of warriors with maces in their hands, also with swords, darts, quivers arrows, bows, hooks and standards.

29—32. O sire, O descendant of Bharata, spiked maces broken in fragment, mallets, bearded darts, short arrows, swords, sharp edged battle-axes, lances, broken shields, armours, standards, every sort of weapons, umbrellas with golden staves, iron-hooks, goads, whips, and traces were all seen strewn over the field of battle in heaps.

33. O sire, there was none in your army who could advance against Arjuna in battle.

34. O king, whoever advanced against that son of Pritha, was immedeately shot down and sent to the abode of Yama.

35. When all your troops broke down and fled away, Arjuna and Vasudeva blew their excellent conchs.

36. Your sire Devavrata then, on seeing the Kuru army routed, smilingly thus spoke to the heroic son of Bharadwaja (Drona) on that field of battle.

37. "This mighty and heroic son of Pandu Dhananjaya, accompanied as he is by Krishna, is treating our troops as he alone is able to deal with them.

38. Seeing him resemble to-day the destroyer himself at the universal dissolution, we find that he is invincible to-day.

39. This our vast army is now impossible to be rallied. Behold, looking at me, they are running away.

40. Robbing the vision of the world, the sun is going down that best of mountains, called Asits.

41. O foremost of men, I think, the time has come now to withdraw our army. The troops will never fight, they are tired and struck with panic."

42—43. Having said this to Drona that foremost of all preceptors, that great car-warrior Bhisma withdrew his army. Then when the sun went down, O sire, both the armies were withdrawn and twilight came in.

Thus ends the fifty-fifth chapter, second day's battle, in the Bhismavadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LVI.

(BHISMAVADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. When night passed away and morning dawned, the son of Santanu Bhishma, the revered grand-sire of the Kurus gave the order for the Kuru army to be ready for fight.

2. That chastiser of foes, the son of Santanu, with the desire to win victory for your son then formed that great Vyuha called Garuda.

3. On the back of that Garuda (the king of the bird) your father Devavrata himself stood. Its two eyes were made by the son of Bharadwaja (Drona) and the Satwata Kritavarman.

4. Those two illustrious heroes, Ashwathaman and Kripa, backed by the Trigarthas, the Matsyas, the Kekayas and the Vatadhanas stood at its head.

5—6. O sire, Bhurisravas, Sala, Salya Bhagadatta, the Madrakas, the Sindhu-arvaras, the Panchanadas with Jayadrhatha stood at its neck. At its back stood king Duryodhana with all his followers.

7. O great king, Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, the Kamvojas with the Sahas and also the Surasenas formed its tail.

8. The Magadhas, the Kalingas with all the Daserakas clad in armour, formed the right wing of that Vyuha.

9. The Karushas, the Vikanjas, the Mundas, the Kanadivrishas, with Vrihadvala formed its left wing.

10. That chastiser of foes, Sabyasachin (Arjuna) seeing the enemy's troops formed into a Vyuha, with the assistance of Dhristadyumna formed his troops into a counter Vyuha.

11. In opposition to your Vyuha, that son of Pandu formed a Vyuha after the shape of the half-moon.

12. On its right side stood Bhimasena surrounded by kings of various countries all abundantly provided with arrows.

13. Next to him stood those two great car-warriors Virata and Drupada; next to them was Nila armed with poisonous weapons.

14. Next to Nila stood the great car-warrior Dhrishtaketu backed by the Chedis the Kasis, the Karushas and the Pandavas.

15. Dhrishtadyumna with Shikhandin with the Panchalas and the Pravadrakas and also with other troops stood in the middle.

16. Dharmaraja Yudhisthira was also there surrounded by his innumerable elephants. Next to them, O king, stood Satyaki and the five sons of Draupadi.

17. Next to them was Iravan. Next to Iravan was Bhimasena's son (Ghatotkacha) with the great Kekaya car-warriors.

18. Next to them, on the left side, was that foremost of men, Arjuna who had as his protector Janardana (Krishna) the protector of the whole universe.

19. It was thus the Pandavas formed their Vyuha for the destruction of your sons and those who have taken your side.

20. Then commenced the battle between your troops and the foes; all struck at one another; elephants and cars mixed up in one confusion.

21. O king, innumerable elephants and cars were seen everywhere. They rushed upon one another for the purpose of slaughter.

22. The rattle of innumerable car-wheels mingled with the beat of drums created a tremendous din.

23. O descendant of Bharata, the shouts of the heroic combatants of your army and those of your enemies when killing one another, reached the very heavens.

Thus ends the fifty-sixth chapter, Garuda and half-moon Vyuha making, in the Bhismavadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LVII.

(BHISMAVADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1—4. When your troops and those of the Pandavas were placed in battle array, that great car-warrior Dhananjaya made a great slaughter by cutting down with his arrows many leaders of car-warriors ; your troops though thus slaughtered in the battle by the son of Pritha who resembled the destroyer himself at the end of a Yuga, yet fought with the Pandavas with perseverance. Desiring to win blazing glory and making death their final goal with minds undirected to anything else, they broke the Pandava ranks in many places, but their ranks also were in many places broken.

5. Then both the Kuru and the Pandava army broke and fled away. Nothing could then be distinguished.

6. A thick cloud of dust rose covering the sun. No body could distinguish any of the cardinal points.

7. O king, everywhere the battle raged the combatants were guided only by the indications afforded by colours, by watchwords, by names and by tribal distinctions.

8. O sire, O king, the Vyuha protected as it was by the son of Bharadwaja (Drona) could by no means be broken.

9. So did the formidable Pandava vyuha remain unbroken, protected as it was by Sabyasachin (Arjuna), and well-guarded by Bhima.

10. O king, the cars and the elephants of both the armies and other combatants came out of their respective arrays and engaged in the fight.

11. In that fearful battle, horse-men cut down horsemen with sharp and polished swords and long lances.

12. Car-warriors getting car-warriors within reach cut them down with their arrows decked with golden wings.

13. Elephant-riders of both the armies cut down one another when they got them in close quarters with their broad-headed arrows and lances.

14. Innumerable foot-soldiers angrily and at the same time cheerfully cut down one another with short arrows and battle axes.

15. O king, car-warriors, getting elephant riders within reach cut them down with the elephants. Elephant riders also cut down car-warriors.

16. O best of the Bharata race, horsemen with their lance cut down car-warriors in that battle ; car-warriors also cut down horse-men.

17. In both the armies, foot-soldiers cut down many car-wsrriors, many car-warriors cut down innumerable foot-soldiers with their sharp weapons.

18. Elephant-riders cut down horse-men and horse-men cut down warriors who were on the back of elephants ; every thing appeard to be exceedingly wonderful.

19. Foot soldiers were seen to be cut down by the foremost of elephant-riders and the elephant-riders were also to be seen cut down by the foot-soldiers.

20. Hundreds and thousands of foot soldiers were seen to be cut down by horsemen, and horsemen by foot-soldiers.

21—23. O best of the Bharata race the battle field, strewn with broken standards bows, lances, housings of elephants, costly blankets, bearded darts, maces, clubs with iron spikes, Kampanas, various sorts of armours, arrows with golden wings, looked as if it werecovered with garlands of flowers.

24. The ground becoming muddy with flesh and blood, became impassable with the bodies of men, horses and elephants, that were killed in that fearful battle.

25. O descendant of Bharata, saturated with human blood, all dust disappeared. All the cardinal points became perfectly clear.

26. O descendant of Bharata, innumerable headless bodies were seen rising from the ground, an omen to indicate that the destruction of the world is near.

27—29. In that fearful and terrible battle, car warriors were seen to run away in all directions; then Bhisma, Drona, Jayadhratha the king of the Sindhus, Purumitra, Vikarna, the son of Suvala Sakuni, these invincible and lion-like heroes broke the Pandava rank.

30—31. O descendant of Bharata, Bhimasena, the Rakshasha Gatotkacha, Satyaki, Chekitana, the sons of Draupadi, backed by all the kings, chastised your troops and your sons, as the celestials did the Danavas.

32. Those foremost of Khashtriyas struck one another in battle. They became terrible to look at. Covered with blood, they shone like the kinsuka flowers.

33. O king, vanquishing their adversaries, those foremost of warriors of both the armies looked like the brilliant stars in the sky.

34. Then your son Duryodhana supported by one thousand car-warriors rushed to battle with the sons of Pandu and the Rakshasha (Ghatotkacha).

35. The Pandavas also with many thousand troops rushed in battle against those chastiser of foes, the heroic Bhisma and Drona.

36. The diadem-decked hero (Arjuna) also rushed in anger against those foremost of kings. Then the son of Arjuna, Abhimanyu and Satyaki both rushed against the forces of the son of Suvala, Sakuni.

37. Then again commenced a fearful and hair-stirring battle between the troops of both the sides,—both parties being eager to defeat one other.

Thus ends the fifty-seventh chapter, commencement of the third day's battle, in the Bhismavadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LVIII.

(BHISMAVADHA PARVA.)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Having seen Arjuna in battle, the kings angrily surrounded him on all sides with many thousands of cars.

2. O descendant of Bharata, having surrounded him with many thousand cars, they covered him from all sides with many hundreds of arrows.

3—6. They angrily hurled at Falguna's (Arjuna's) car bright and sharp pointed lances, maces, clubs with spikes, bearded darts, battle-axes, mallets, and bludgeons. That shower of weapons came to him like a flight of locusts. But Pritha's son checked it with his gold decked arrows. Seeing on that occasion the extraordinary lightness of the hands of Vivatsu (Arjuna), the celestials, the Danavas, the Gandharvas, the Pishachas the Uragas and the Rakshashas praised Falguna, exclaiming "Excellent" "Excellent."

7. The heroic Gandharas with Suvala's son at their head surrounded Satyaki and Abhimanyu.

8. Then those brave warriors led by Suvala's son angrily cut down into fragments the excellent car of the Vrishni hero (Satyaki) with various kinds of weapons.

9. O chastiser of foes, in that fearful battle, Satyaki abandoned his own car and mounted on that of Abhimanyu.

10. Then those two heroes, mounting on the same car, began to slaughter the army of Suvala's son (Sukani) with innumerable sharp-pointed arrows.

11. Drona and Bhisma fighting bravely began to slaughter the troops under Dharmaraja Yudhisthira with sharp arrows furnished with feathers of Kanka bird.

12. Then the son of Dharma (Yudhisthira) and the two sons of Madri, in the very sight of the whole army, began to chastise the troops of Drona.

13. Then the battle that was fought was fearful and terrible, like the one that was fought in the days of yore between the celestials and the Danavas.

14. Bhimasena and Ghatotkacha both performed great feats. Then Duryodhana came and checked them both.

15. O descendant of Bharata, the prowess that we saw displayed by the son of Hirimva was exceedingly wonderful ; for he transcended even his father (Bhima).

16. Then the Pandava Bhimasena angrily and smilingly wounded the vindictive Duryodhana in the breast with an arrow.

17. Then king Duryodhana, mortally wounded by that arrow, sat down on his car and fainted.

18. O king, seeing him senseless, his charioteer speedily carried him away from the field of battle. Then the troops that supported Duryodhana broke and fled away.

19. Then striking those flying Kuru troops with his sharp-pointed arrows Bhima pursued them.

20. Then that foremost of warriors, the Prishata prince and the Pandava king Dharmaraja Yudhisthira, O descendant of Bharata, in the very sight of Drona and Ganga's son (Bhisma),

21. Slaughtered their troops with sharp arrows, each capable of destroying hostile heroes. Your those troops thus fled from the battle ;

22. And those two great car-warriors Bhisma and Drona could not stop them. Though attempted to be stopped by Bhisma and the high-souled Drona,

23. Those troops fled away in the very sight of Drona and Bhisma. When those thousands of car-warriors fled away in all directions.

24. O chastiser of foes, then Subhadra's son (Abhimanyu) and that best of the Sini's race, both mounting the same car began to slaughter the army of the son of Suvala.

25. Sini's grandson and that foremost of the Kuru race looked as effulgent as the sun and the moon when they are seen both in the sky after the last lunation of the dark fort-night has passed away.

26. O king, then Arjuna angrily poured shower of arrows on your army as clouds pour rain in torrents.

27. Thus slaughtered in the battle with the arrows of Partha, the Kuru army, trembling in grief and fear fled away.

28. Seeing the army flying, the mighty Bhisma and Drona botn enraged and both eager to do Duryodhana's good tried to stop them.

29. Then king Duryodhana himself cheering his troops stopped them from flying away in all directions.

30. Thereupon all the Khashtriya car-warriors stopped, each on the spot from which they saw your son.

31. O king, then the common soldiers, having seen them stop, stopped of their own accord from shame and from the desire of displaying their prowess.

32. O king, the army thus rallied appeared then like the surging sea at the time of moon's rising.

33. Having seen his army railled for fight, king Suyodhana soon went to the son of Santanu and thus spoke to him.

34—35. "O grandfather, hear what I say; O descendant of Bharata, O scion of the Kuru race, when you, and that foremost of men learned in arms, Drona, with his son and with all our other friends, and also the great bowman Kripa are alive, I do not consider it creditable that my troops should run away.

36. I do not consider the Pandavas a match for you, or for Drona or for Drona's son or for Kripa.

37. O grandfather, the Pandavas are certainly being favoured by you. O hero, therefore you forgive them this slaughter of my troops.

38. O king, you should have told me, before this battle began, that you would not fight with the Pandavas.

39. O descendant of Bharata, hearing such words from you and from the preceptor (Drona), I would have then with Karna reflected what we should have done.

40. O foremost of men, if I do not deserve to be abandoned by you two, then fight at the utmost of your power."

41. Having heard these words, Bhisma laughed and turned his eyes in anger. He then thus spoke to your son.

42. "O king, I have innumerable times said to you words worthy of your acceptance and fraught with your good. The Pandavas are invincible even to the celestials with Vasava at their head.

43. O foremost of kings, what I am capable of doing, aged as I am, I shall certainly do in this battle to the utmost of my power. See it now with your kinsmen.

44. In the sight of all I shall today alone chastise the Pandavas with their troops and with all their kinsmen."

45. Haviug been thus addressed by Bhisma, O king, your son was filled with delight. He ordered conchs to be blown and drums to be beat.

46. O king, having heard the loud uproar, the Pandavas blew their conchs and ordered their drums and cymbals to be sounded.

Thus ends the fifty-eighth Chapter, colloquy between Bhisma and Duryodhona, in the Bhismavadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LIX.

Dhritarashtra said:—

1—2. When enraged by the words of my son, O Sanjaya, Bhisma took that fearful vow in the battle, what did he do to the Pandavas, and what did the Panchalas do to the grandsire? O Sanjaya, tell me all this.

Sanjaya said:—

3. O descendant of Bharata, when the morning of that day passed away and when the sun in his westward course had gone some portion of his path,

4. And when the illustrious Pandavas had won the victory, your father Devavrata learned in the precepts of morality,

5. Rushed on the fleetest steed towards the Pandava army, followed by a very large force and by all your sons.

6. Then O descendant of Bharata, a fearful and hair-stirring battle between ourselves and the Pandavas began in consequence of your sinful policy.

7. The twang of bows and the flapping of bowstrings mingling together, made a loud uproar which resembled the noise of splitting hills.

8. "Stay", "Hear stand I", "Turn back" "Stand" "I wait for you" "Strike" these were the words that were heard everywhere.

9. The sound of the fall of armours, of crowns and diadems and of standards, resembled the sound of falling stones on hard grounds.

10. Hundreds and thousands of heads and arms adorned with ornaments, fell on the ground and moved in convulsions.

11. Some brave combatants with heads cut off still stood with weapons in their grasp and with bows.

12. A fearful river of blood began to run there. It was of impetuous current, it was miry with flesh and blood and the dead bodies of elephants appeared in it like (sub-marine) rocks.

13. It flowed from the bodies of horses, men and elephants. It was delightful to vultures and jackals. It ran towards the ocean of after-life.

14. O king, O descendant of Bharata, a battle like the one that was faught between your sons and the Pandavas was never before seen or heard of.

15. Chariots could not makes their way, for the way was blocked by the bodies of combatants. The field of battle with the bodies of the killed elephants appeared to be strewn over with blew peaks of hills.

16. O sire, strewn with various coloured armours and turbans, the battle field looked beautiful like the autumn sky.

17. Though mortally wounded, some warriors were seen to rush upon the enemy in battle with cheerfulness and pride.

18. Many, fallen on the field of battle, cried aloud, "O father, O brother, O friend, O kinsman, O companion, O maternal uncle, do not abandon me."

19. Others cried, "Come, come to this side, why are you frightened? Where do you go? I stand in battle. Do not be afraid."

20. In that great battle, the son of Santanu, Bhisma, with his bow drawn to a circle, shot arrows with blazing points which resembled snakes of virulent poison.

21. O descendant of Bharata, showering continuous arrows in all directions, that hero of rigid vows (Bhisma) struck the Pandava warriors calling each by name.

22. O king, displaying his great lightness of hands and dancing as it were along the track of his car, he appeared to be present everywhere like a circle of fire.

23. In consequence of his great lightness of hands, the Pandavas and the Srinjayas saw that hero in that battle multiplied to one thousand fold, though he was really alone.

24. Everyone present there considered Bhisma as having multipled his self by illussion. They now saw him on the east, and on the very next moment, they saw him on the west.

25. Now they beheld him on the North, and on the next moment they beheld him on the South. Thus the son of Ganga was seen to fight on all directions (simultaneously).

26. There was none amongst the Pandavas who was able even to look at him. What they all saw were only innumerable arrows shot from his bow.

27. Having seen him achieve such great feats and slaughter their ranks, the heroic warriors (of the pandava side) uttered many lamentations.

28—36. Thousands of kings came in contact with your father who was thus roving over the field in a super-human way. They fell into that fire Bhisma as flights of senseless insects fall on a blazing fire for their own destruction. Not a single arrow of that light-handed hero was futile. They cut down innumerable men, elepahants and steeds. With one single straight arrow he felled down one big elephant, as a hill is brought down by the thunder-bolt. Your sire, with sharp arrows, pierced at a time two or three elephant riders clad in armour. Whoever came near that foremost of men Bhisma in that battle, was seen the very next moment to fall down on the ground. The vast army of Dharmaraja Yudhisthira, having been thus slaughtered by the greatly powerful Bhisma, gave way in one thousand directions. Thus afflicted by that shower of arrows, that vast army began to tremble even in the presence of Vasudeva (Krishna) and the illustrious Partha (Arjuna). Though the heroic leaders of the Pandu army tried their utmost, yet they could not prevent the great car-warriors of their side from running away. The prowess with which Bhisma routed that vast army was equal to that of the lord of the celestials himself.

37. O great king, that great army was so completely routed that no two persons were seen together; cars, elephants, and horses were pierced all over their bodies, and the standards and arrows were strewn over the field.

38—42. The Pandava army cried "Oh" and "Alas", and became deprived of its senses. Father struck the son and the son struck the father ; friends fought with dearest friends as if all were under the influence of fate. O descendant of Bharata, many men of the Pandava army were seen with dishevelled hair to run away throwing aside their armours. The Pandava army uttered loud lamentations. Even the very leaders of their car-warriors were seen to be as confounded as a very herd of kine. Having seen the army thus routed, that delighter of the Yudu race (Krishna) stopped that best of car (belonging to Arjuna) and thus spoke to Partha :—"O son of Pritha, the honr has now come which was desired by you.

43—45. O foremost of men, strike Bhisma or else you will lose your senses. O hero, formerly in the assembly of the kings you said, "I will kill all the warriors of the sons of Dhritarastra, headed by Bhisma and Drona, all who will fight me in battle. O Vivatsu, O son of Kunti, O chastiser of foes, make your words now true. Your army is routed on all sides.

46. Behold, all the kings of Yudhisthira's army are flying away, on seeing Bhisma in battle who looks like the destroyer himself with his wide open mouth.

47—48. Having been afflicted with fear, they are running away, as do the small animals at the sight of the lion." Having been thus addressed, Dhananjaya thus spoke to Vasudeva. "Plunging through this sea of the hostile army, drive the horses to the spot where Bhisma is. I shall fell down (today) that invincible warrior, the revered Kuru grandsire.

49. O king, then Madhava drove those silver-white steeds to the place where the car of Bhisma was,—the car which like the very sun was incapable of being gazed at.

50. Having seen the mighty-armed son of Pritha thus rush to fight with Bhisma, the great army of Yudhisthira rallied for battle.

51. Then that foremost of Kuru warriors Bhisma again and again roared like a lion. He then covered the car of Dhananjaya with a shower of arrows.

52. In a moment (Arjuna's) car with its standard and charioteer became invisible, having been covered with that shower of arrows.

53. The greatly powerful Vasudeva however, fearlessly and patiently drove the horses now wounded by Bhisma's arrow.

54. Then Partha took up his celestial bow whose twang resembled the roar of the clouds, and cut down Bhisma's bow with his sharp arrows.

55. Your father, the Kuru hero, took up another bow when he saw the one in his hand cut down. He strung it within the twinkling of an eye.

56. He drew that bow, the twang of which resembled the roar of the clouds, with his two hands. But Arjuna, now excited with anger, again cut down that bow.

57. Thereupon the son of Santanu (Bhisma) praised his lightness of hand by saying, "O Partha, O son of Pandu, O mighty-armed hero, 'Excellent, Excellent.'

58. O Dhananjaya, such a great feat is indeed worthy of you. I have been pleased with you. O son, fight hard with me."

59. Having thus praised Partha, and having taken up a large bow, that great hero hurled his arrows at Partha's car.

60. Vasudeva then displayed his great skill in the guiding the horses. He baffled those arrows by driving the car in quick circles.

61. Then, O sire, Bhisma with great force pierced both Vasudeva and Dhananjaya with keen arrows all over their bodies.

62. Wounded by those arrows of Bhisma those foremost of men looked like two roaring bulls with scratches of horns on their bodies.

63. Excited with wrath, Bhisma covered the two Krishnas on all sides with hundreds and thousands of arrows.

64. With his sharp arrows the angry Bhisma made the Vrishni chief (Krishna) to shiver ; laughing loudly also he made Krishna very much astonished.

65—66. Then seeing the great prowess of Bhisma and the mildness with which Arjuna fought, and also seeing that Bhisma was showering a continuous shower of arrows in that battle and that he was appearing like the all consuming sun in the midst of the two armies,

67. And marking also that that hero (Bhisma) was killing the foremost warriors of Yudhisthira's army and that he was making a great havoc amongst the troops as if the hour of dessolution had come,

68. The exalted Keshava, that slayer of hostile heroes, that high-souled one became unable to see what he saw. He thought that the army of Yudhisthira could not survive that slaughter.

69. Bhisma was capable of destroying all the Daityas and Danavas in a single day ; with how much ease then could he kill the Pandavas with all their soldiers and followers.

70—71. The vast army of the illustrious Pandava (Yudhisthira) again began to fly away. Having seen the Somakas routed, the Kurus, gladdening the heart of the grandsire rushed to battle with great cheerfulness. (Seeing) all this, Krishna reflected :—"Clad in armour I will kill Bhisma today for the sake of the Pandavas.

72—73. I will lighten the burden of the Pandavas. Though struck with keen arrows in the battle, Arjuna does not what he should do, from respect for Bhisma." While Krishna was thus reflecting the grandsire again hurled his arrows on Partha's car.

74. In consequence of those various arrows flying in all directions, all sides were completely enshrouded. Neither the sky, nor the directions, nor the earth, nor the brilliant sun could be seen.

75—82. The winds that blew appeared to be mixed with smoke; all the directions seemed to be agitated. Drona, Vikarna, Jayadhratha, Bhurisrava, Kritavarman, Kripa, Srutayusha, the ruler of Amvartha, Vinda and Anuvinda, Sudhashkhina, the people of the westsrn country, the various tribes of Souviras, the Vasistas, the Khudrakas, and the Malavas,—all these at the command of the Gautamas royal son soon came to Kiritin (Arjuna) for battle. The grandson of Sini saw that Kiritin was surrounded by many thousands of horse and footsoldiers and car-warriors and great elephants. Having seen Vasudeva and Arjuna thus surrounded by infantry and elephants and horses and cars on all sides, that foremost of all wielders of arms, that chief of the Sinis, soon went to that place. That foremost of bowmen, the Sini chief quickly rushed upon those troops and soon came to Arjuna's aid, as Vishnu came to the slayer Vritra. That foremost of Sini warriors cheerfully thus addressed the troops of Yudhisthira who were all frightened by Bhisma, and whose elephants, horses cars and numberless standards had been mangled and broken into pieces and who were all flying away from the battle-field "O Khastriyas, where do you go? This is not the duty of virtuous men as declared by the ancients.

83—84. O foremost of heroes, do not violate your pledges; observe your own duties as heroes." Having seen that the foremost of kings were flying away from the field of battle and having also marked the mildness with which Partha fought and seeing also that Bhisma was exerting himself with all his powers and that the Kurus were rushing from all sides, the younger brother of Vasava, the illustrious protector of all the Dasarhas become unable to bear it all. He thus spoke to the famous grandson of Sini and praised him much :—"O hero of the Sini race, those that are retreating are indeed retreating. O Satwata chief, those that are still staying,—let them also go away.

85. Behold, I shall soon fell Bhisma down from his car and also Drona in this battle with all their followers. O Satwata chief, there is none in the Kuru army who can escape me when I am angry.

86—89. Therefore taking up my fearful discus I shall (to-day) kill Bhisma of rigid vows. O grandson of Sini, killing in battle, these two foremost of car-warriors, namely Bhisma and Drona with all their followers, I shall gladden the heart of Dhananjaya and the king (Yudhisthira) and also of Bhima and the twin Aswinas. Killing all the sons of Dhritarashtra and all those foremost of kings who have taken their side, I will with great joy secure a kingdom to-day for Ajatasatru." Having said this, the son of Vasudeva threw off the reins of the horses and jumped down from the car. Whirling with his right arm his discus with a beautiful shape and with sharpness as that of a razors, which was as effulgent as the sun and possessed the force of one thousand thunderbolts, the high-souled Krishna rushed with great force towards Bhisma making the earth tremble under his feet.

90. That chastiser of foes, the younger brother of the chief of the celestials, angrily rushed towards Bhisma who stood in the midst of his troops, as a lion, from the desire of killing a large elephant, rushes towards it.

91—94. The end of his yellow garments waving in the air looked like a cloud charged with lighting. That lotus of a discus, the Sudarsana, having for its stalk the beautiful arms of Sourin (Krishna) looked as beautiful as the primival lotus, which was as bright as the morning sun which caused that lotus to bloom. The beautiful leaves of that lotus were as sharp as the edge of a razor. Krisnas body was the beautiful lake, his arms where the stalk upon which shone that lotus. Seeing the younger brother of Mohendra excited with anger and that he was loudly roaring, that he was armed with discus, all creatures uttered loud wails. They thought the distruction of the Kurus was near at hand. Armed with his discus, Vasudeva looked like the Samvanta fire that appears at the end of a Yuga for consuming the world.

95—96. The preceptor of the universe blazed up like a fearful comet risen for consuming all creatures. Having seen that foremost of men, that divine personage advancing armed with discus, Santanu's son (Bhisma) who stood on his car with his bow and arrow in hand thus fearlessly spoke, "Come, come, O lord of the gods, O deity that had the universe for your abode, O god armed with mace, sword and Saranga, I bow to you.

97. O lord of the universe, forcibly fell me down from this excellent car. O refuge of all creatures, O Krishna in this battle, if I be killed by you, great will be my good fortune both in this world and in the next.

98. O Vrisni and Andhaka chief, you give me the greatest respect. My dignity will be celebrated all over the three worlds." Having heard these words of the son of Santanu (Bhisma), Krishna still impetuously rushed towards him and said.

99. "You are the root of this great slaughter on earth. You will see Duryodhana killed to-day. A wise minister who treads the path of virtue should restrain a king who is addicted to the evil of gambling.

100 That wretched king who transgresses his duty should be abandoned as one whose intellegence has been misdirected by fate." Haviug heard these words, the royal Bhisma thus spoke to the chief of the Yadu race :—"Destiny is all power.

101. The Yadus for their benefit abandoned Kansa. I said this to the king (Dhritarastra) but he did not heed my words."

102. Meanwhile, jumping from his car, Partha of mighty and long arms himself soon ran after that Yadu chief possessing massive and long arms. He soon came to him and seized him by his two arms.

103. That first of all gods, Krishna was excited with rage. Therefore, though thus seized, Vishnu (Krishna) forcibly dragged Jishnu (Arjuna) after him, like a tempest carrying away a tree.

104. The high-souled Partha, however, seized with great force his legs as he was rushing towards Bhisma ; O king, he succeeded in stopping him with great difficulty on the tenth step.

105. When Krishna stopped, Arjuna, adorned with a beautiful golden garland cheerfuly bowed to him and he then thus spoke to him :—"Quell our wrath O Keshava, you are the refuge of the Pandavas.

106. O Keshava, I swear by my sons and brothers that I will not withdraw from the acts to which I have pledged myself.

107. O younger brother of Indra, at your command, I will certainly annihilate the Kurus." Having heard that promise and pledge by Arjuna, Janardana became gratified. He was ever engaged in doing what is agreeable to that foremost of the Kurus, Arjuna. He therefore, discus on arms, once more mounted on the car.

108. That chastiser of foes once more took up the reins. Then taking up his couch called Panchajanna, Sourin (Krishua) filled the sky and all the directions with its sounds.

109. Thereupon when the Kuru heroes saw Krishna adorned with necklace and Angada and ear-ring, with carved eyelashes smeared with dust and with milk-white teeth take up his couch, they sent up a loud cry.

110. The sounds of cymbals, drums and kettle-drums and the rattle of car-wheels and also those of smaller drums, mingling with those lion-like shouts sent up by all the Kuru troops became a fearful uproar.

111. The twang of Partha's Gandiva which resembled the roarings of thunder filled the skyand all the directions. Shot from the bow of the Pandava, bright and blazing arrows flew in all directions.

112. Then the Kuru king with a large force and with Bhishma and Bhurisrava's son with arrows in their hands' resembling a comet risen for consuming a constelletion rushed against him.

113. Bhurisrava hurled at Arjuna seven javelins with wings of gold, Duryodhana hurled a fearful lance, Salya a mace and Santanu's son (Bhisma) a dart.

114. Thereupon baffling the seven javellins with seven arrows, which were as fleet as arrows, shot by Bhurisrava, Arjuna cut off with his sharp arrow the lance hurled by Duryodhana.

115. That hero cut down with two arrows the blazing dart, as effulgent as lightning that came towards him hurled by Santanu's son and the mace hurled by the Madra king.

116. Then drawing with his two hands and with great force his beautiful and irrisisting powerful bow Gandiva he invoked with proper mantras the exceedingly wonderful and fearful weapon named Mohendra. He made it appear in the sky.

117. With that great weapon which was as effulgent as the blazing fire, that illustrious great bowmen, adorned with diadem and garland of gold checked the entire Kuru army.

118. Those arrows from Partha's bow cut off the arms, bows, standard-tops and cars ; penetrated igto the ranks of the kings and of the huge elephants and horses of the enemy.

119. Having filled all directions with those sharp and terrible arrows Partha adorned with diadem and garland of gold agitated the hearts of his foes by the fearful twang of his Gandiva.

120. In that fierce battle, the sounds of conchs and beat of drums and the deep rattle of cars were all silenced by the twang of the Gandiva.

121. Having known that twang to have been produced by the Gandiva, king Virata, and other foremost of men, and the brave Panchala king Drupada all went to the place with undepressed hearts.

122. All the troops stood struck with fear each at the spot where he heard that twang of the Gandiva. None dared to go to the place whence rose that sound.

123—126. In that fearful slaughter of the kings, heroic warriors as well as car-warriors with their charioteers were killed. Elephants with bright golden housings and gorgions standards wounded with broad headed arrows that fell upon them suddenly fell down dead with their bodies mangled by Kiritin. Forcibly struck by Partha with his winged arrows and sharp broad headed arrows, the yantras and indragalas of the standards of innumerable kings were cut down. Innumerable foot soldiers, car-worriors, steeds and elephants fell fast on the field, their limbs paralysed or themselves speedily deprived of life afflicted by Doananjaya with those arrows. O king, many were the warriors who in that terrible fight had their armours and bodies cut through, by that weapon named after Indra.

127. With those fearful and sharp arrows, Kritin (Arjuna) made a river of blood to flow on the field of battle, its blood was supplied from the mangled bodies of the soldiers. Its froth was made by their feet.

128. Its current was broad and it ran fearfully. The bodies of dead elephants and horses formed its banks. Its mire consisted of the entrails, the marrow and the flesh of human beings and of the huge Rakshashas.

129. Innumerable crowns of human heads covered with hair formed its floating moss, and heaps of human bodies formed its sand-banks. They caused that river to flow in one thousand directions ; armours strewn all over it formed its waves, and the bones of human beings and elephants and horses formed its stones and pebbles.

130—132. Its banks were infested by large numbers of jackals and wolves and cranes, and vultures and crowds of Rakshasas and herds of hydas. Those that were alive saw that fearful river of fat, marrow and blood caused by the showers of arrows shot by Arjuna ; it resembled the great Vaitarani (river). Having seen the foremost of warriors thus killed by Falguna (Arjuna), the Chedies, the Panchalas, the Kamshas, the Matsyas, and all the Pandava warriors, those foremost of men, all highly elated with victory sent up loud shouts that frightened the Kuru warriors.

133. They sent forth that shout indicative of victory on seeing the foremost warriors of the Kuru army, the very combatants who were protected by the (Kuru) leaders thus killed by Kritritin (Arjuna) that terror of foes, who frightened them all as a lion frightens a herd of small animals.

134—137. Then the wielder of Gandiva and Janardana, with great delight attacked loud shouts. The Kurus with Bhisma and Drona and Duryodha and Valika all mortally wounded by the weapons (of Arjuna) then saw the sun withdraw his rays. Seeing also the Mohendra weapon spread out and causing as it were the end of the Yuga, they withdrew their forces for the night's rests. Thus having achieved a great feat and won great renown and having seen the sun assume a red colour and the evening twilight set in and having completed his work (for that day), Arjuna retired with his brothers to the camp for the night's rest. Then when darkness set in, a fearful and great uproar was made by the Kuru troops.

138. All said :—"In to-day's battle, Arjuna has killed ten thousand car-warriors and seven hundred elephants. All the people of the western country, the various tribes of the Souviras, the Kshudrakas and the Malavas have all been killed.

139—141. The feat achieved to-day by Dhananjaya is indeed a very great one ! None else is capable of doing it. The king of the Amvartas, Srutayush, Durmavshava, Chitrasena, Drona, Kripa, the Sindhu king, Valhika, Bhurisravas, Salya, Sala, a hundreds of other warriors with Bhisma at their head have to-day been defeated by the wrathful son of Pritha, Kiritin, the great car-warrior of the world." O descendant of Bharata, talking thus, all the troops of of your army went to their tents from the field of battle.

142. All the troops of the Kuru army frightened by Kiritin then went into their tents illuminated by thousands of torches and by innumerable lamps,

Thus ends the fifty-nineth chapter, third day's battle in the Bhismabadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LX.

(BHISMABADHA PARVA).—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O descendant of Bharata, when the night passed away, the illustrious Bhisma with his wrath excited followed by a very large number of troops, going at the head of the Kuru army charged the enemy's troops.

2. Drona, and Duryodhana, Valhika, Durmarshana, Chitrasena, the mighty Jayadratha and other royal heroes backed by a large number of troops accompanied him.

3. Surrouned by these great and mighty car-warriors all possessing great prowess and energy, O king, he shone in the midst of those foremost of royal heroes like the lord of the celestials in the midst of the celestials.

4. The magnificent standards on the backs of the elephants stationed in front of the various divisions of the army waved in the air and looked highly beautiful with yellow, black and brown colours.

5. That great army with the royal son of Santanu (Bhisma) at its head and with other great car-warriors and with elephants and horses, looked as resplendent as a mass of clouds charged with lightning or as the sky with gathering clouds in the season of rains.

6. Then like the fearful current of the ocean-going Ganga, that great Kuru army, protected by Santanu's son rushed with great force towards Arjuna.

7. With various kinds of forces possessing great strength and also with innumerable elephants, horses and foot soldiers and car-warriors, the Vyuha made by the ape-bannered hero (Arjuna) looked from the distance like a great mass of clouds.

8. That illustrious hero, that foremost of men, standing on his car furnished with high standard and yoked with white steeds went against the enemy's army supported by a large force.

9. Seeing that ape-bannered hero accompanied by that foremost of the Yadu race, all the Kurus with your sons were filled with dismay.

10. Your troops saw that best of Vyuhas which was protected by that great car-warrior of the world Kiritin (Arjuna). It had thousands of weapons up-raised and on each of its corners stood four thousand elephants.

11. This Vyuha of to-day was like the one which was formed on the day previous by that foremost of Kurus, king Dharmaraja Yudhisthira and the like of which had never been seen or heard fo before by any man.

12. Then thousands of drums were loudly beat on the field of battle. There rose from every quarter sounds of conchs and trumpets and lion-like shouts.

13. Then bows of loud twang, drawn by heroic warriors, with arrows fixed on the bowstrings and the sounds of conchs rose above the uproar made by drums and cymbals.

14. The entire sky was filled with the sounds of conchs ; dust filled every place with that dust the atmosphere appeared as if a canopy had been overspread Having seen that canopy, all the brave warriors rushed to the battle.

15. Car-warriors struck with car-warriors were cut down with their charioteers, horses, cars and standards. Elephants struck by elephants and foot soldiers struck by foot soldiers all fell (on the filled of battle).

16. Impetuous horsemen struck down by impetnous horsemen fell with fearful countenances. All appeard to be exceedingly wonderful.

17. Excellent shields adronded with golden stars and possessed of the effulgence of the sun, broken by battle axes, lances and swords dropped on the field of battle.

18. Many car-warriors, mangled and bruised by the tasks and the powerful trunks of elephants fell down with their charioteers, many foremost of car-warriors, struck by the foremost of car-warriors fell on the earth.

19. Having heard the wails of horsemen and foot soldiers, struck with the tusks and other limbs of elephants or crushed by their huge animals fell down on the field of dattle.

20. Then when horsemen and foot soldiers were falling fast, and elephants, horses and cars were flying away in fear, Bhisma surrounded by many great car-warriors got a sight of the ape-bannered warrior (Arjuna).

21. The palmyra-bannered hero, the son of Santanu, who had five palmyras on his standard, then rushed upon the diadem, decked warrior (Arjuna) whose car was yoked with excellent steeds which possessed wonderful energy and which blazed like the lighting.

22. O king, thus against that son of Indra who was like Indra himself rushed many warriors headed by Drona, Kripa, Salya, Vivingsati, Duryodhana and also Somadatta's son.

23. Then the heroic son of Arjuna Abhimanyu learned in all the weapons and clad in a handsome golden armour, rushed out of the ranks and attacked all your warriors.

24. That son of Arjuna baffled the weapons of all the mighty warriors. He looked effulgent as the exalted Agni on the sacrificial alter when invoked with high Mantras.

25. Then the greatly powerful Bhisma created a river in that field of battle. Its water was made by the blood of foes. But he quickly avoided the son of Subhadra and charged the great car-warrior Partha.

26. Then Arjuna, adorned with diadem and garlands, with his wonderful Gandiva in his hand, the twang of which resembled the roars of clouds, shot showers of arrows and baffled the showers of arrows (shot by Bhisma).

27. That illustrious ape-bannered hero then poured upon Bhisma that foremost of all wielders of arms a shower of sharp arrows and broad-headed polished shafts.

28. Your troops then saw that shower of arrows, shot by that great ape-bannered hero, opposed and dispersed by Bhisma, as the sun dispels darkness.

29. Then the Kurus, the Srinjayas, and all other people saw the single combat between those two foremost of men, Bhisma and Arjuna both distinguished by the fearful twang of their bows.

Thus ends the sixtieth chapter, Bhisma and Arjuna's single combat, in the Bhisma badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXI.

(BHISMABADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O sire, Drona's son, Bhurisrava, Salya, Chitrasena, the son of Samyamani, all these fought with Subhadra's son.

2. When he was fighting with these five foremost of men, all saw him endued with great prowess, like a young lion fighting with five elephants.

3. None among them equalled the son of Arjuna in sureness of aims, in bravery, in prowess, in lightness of hand or in the knowledge of weapons.

4. When Partha saw that chastiser of foes, his son thus fighting and displaying his prowess in battle, he sent up a lion-like shout.

5. O king, having seen your grandson thus afflict your army, your warriors surrounded him from all sides.

6. Then that chastiser of foes, the son of Subhadra, depending on his own prowess and might, advanced with undepressed heart against the army of the Kurus.

7. When he was thus fighting with the enemy in that battle, his great bow, as effulgent as the sun, was seen by everybody to be incessantly drawn for the purpose of striking at the enemy.

8. Wounding the son of Drona with one arrow and Salya with five, he cut down the standard of Samyamani's son with eight arrows.

9. With another sharp arrow, he cut down the great dart with a golden staff which resembled a snake and which was hurled against him by Somadatta's son.

10. Arjuna's son baffled in the very sight of Salya his hundreds of fearful arrows and killed his four steeds.

11. Bhurisrava, Salya, Drona's son, Samyamani and Sala were all seized with panic by seeing the prowess of Arjuna's son. They could not stay before him.

12—13. O great king, then urged by your son the Trigartas, the Kekeyas numbering twenty-five thousand, all of whom were foremost of men accomplished in arms and who who were incapable of being defeated by any enemy in battle, surrounded Kiritin with his son in order to kill them both.

14. O king, that chastiser of foes, the generallissimo of the Pandava army, the Panchala prince saw (from a distance) the cars of the father and the son surrouded.

15—16. Followed by many thousands of horsemen and footsoldiers and many hundreds of elephants and cars and the Madras and the Kekayas, with his bow drawn in wrath and with all his troops behind him he advanced.

17. That division of the Pandava army, protected by that illustrious and firm bowman and furnished with cars, elephants and horsemen looked exceedingly resplendent as it advanced on battle bent.

18. When he was thus going to Arjuna's aid, he struck Somadatta's son on his shoulder joint with three arrows.

19. Wounding the Madrakas with ten sharp arrows, he soon killed the warrior who was protecting the rear of Kritavarman.

20. That chastiser of foes then, with a broad-headed arrow killed Damana, the son of Paurava.

21. Then the son of Samyamani wounded the invincible Panchala prince with ten arrows, and his charioteer with ten more.

22. Then that great bowman having been thus wounded, licked with his tongue the corners of his mouth and cut down his enemy's bow with a broad-headed and sharp arrow.

23. The Panchala prince soon wounded his foe with twenty-five arrows and then, O king, he killed his horses and then his two wheel-protectors.

24. O best of the Bharata race, Samyamani's son then stood on the car the horses of which were killed, and stared at the illustrious son of the Panchala king.

25. Then taking up a fearful sword made of steel, he walked on foot and came to Drupada's son who was on the car.

26—27. The Pandava soldiers as well as the Prishata prince Dhristradyuma saw him coming like a surging wave which resembled a snake fallen from the sky. He whirled his sword and looked like the sun. He advanced with the gait of an enraged elephant.

28--29. Thereupon inflamed with rage, the son of the Panchala king, beholding Samyamani's son rush towards him, with a sharp sword and buckler in grasp, and seeing the other approach his car and beyond the range of arrows, crushed his, head with the stroke of his heavy mace.

30. Then, O monarch, when he was falling down dead, his resplendent sword and shield, loosened from his hands, fell down on the ground, together with his body.

31. Thus that high-souled Panchala prince endued with dreadful might won great fame, by thus having crushed his adversary with his club.

32. Then, O Sire, when that mighty car-warrior and fierce bowman, that prince, was slain, loud cries of "Oh" and "Alas" were heard in your army.

33. Thereafter, beholding his own son slain, Samyamani inflamed with wrath, impetuously fell upon the Panchala prince, ever invincible in battle.

34. Then all the monarchs belonging to the Kuru and the Pandava armies saw those two heroes, those foremost of car-warriors, engaged in battle.

35. Then Samyamani, that slayer of hostile heroes, excited with rage, struck the son of Prishata with three arrows, like an elephant rider striking the beast with the hook.

36. Similarly, Salya also, that beautifier of an assembly, angrily wounded Prishata's heroic son on the breast. Thereupon there commenced another battle.

Thus ends the sixty-first chapter, the slaughter of the son of Samyamani, in the Bhishma-badha of the Bhishma Parva.

CHAPTER LXII.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. I consider, O Sanjaya, destiny to be superior to human endeavour, in as much as, the troops of my son are always being slaugtered by those of the sons of Pandu.

2. You always, O Suta, tell me, that my troops are slaughtered, whilst on the other hand you say that the Pandava forces are not slaughtered and are all filled with delight.

3. You always, O Sanjaya, speak of my troops as being destitute of manliness, as felled and falling and massacred.

4. Though they are fighting to the best of their powers, and striving hard to secure victory, yet you always tell me that the Pandavas are gaining victory over them, whilst they are becoming reduced in number.

5. So, O son, I am always hearing of numerous causes of insufferable and poignant grief, engendered by the misdeeds of Duryodhana.

6. I could discover no measure by which the Pandavas could be reduced, also by which, O Sanjaya, my sons would be able to secure victory in this battle.

Sanjaya said :—

7. Listen, O monarch, with patience, to the description of the destruction of human hosts and of the hosts of steeds elephants and cars; this mighty evil owes its origin to you.

8. Dhristadyumna, being afflicted by Salya with nine arrows, was inflamed with wrath; and he afflicted the ruler of the Madras, in return, with darts made of steel.

9. Then we saw the highly wonderful prowess of the son of Prishata, as he speedily checked (the carreer of) Salya, the ornament of assemblies.

10. No weakness was detected in any one of them, when enraged, they were engaged in the battle. The combat between them seemed to last only for a moment.

11. Then, O mighty monarch, in that fight, Salya cut down the bow of Dhristyadyumna with a keen-pointed yellow dart.

12. Also, O Bharata, he covered Dhristadyumna with showers of arrows, like clouds, swelling with rain, covering a mountain at the rainy season.

13. When Dhristadyumna was being thus tormented, Abhimanyu, inflamed with wrath, rushed with voilence against the car of the king of the Madras.

14. Then the highly excited nephew of Krishna, that hero of immeasurable soul, having reached near the car of the Madra king, pierced Atrayani with three whetted shafts.

15. Thereat, O monarch, your troops desirous of resisting the son of Arjuna in battle, speedily formed themselves in a circle around the chariot of the ruler of the Madras.

16. Duryodhana, Vikarna, Dushasana, Vivingsati, Dumarsana Dusaha, Chitrasena, Durmukha,

17. Satyavrata, Purumitra and the mighty car-warrior Vikarna,—these stationed themselves in the field for protecting the chariot of the ruler of the Madras.

18. Thereat Bhimasena, excited with rage, and Dhristadyumna of Prishata's race, the sons of Draupadi and Abhimanyu, the twin sons of Pandu by Madri,

19. These ten warriors opposed the ten warriors of Dhritarastra's hosts, discharging O monarch, weapons of diverse shape.

20. It is, O monarch, through the wicked policy of yours that those warriors inflamed with rage then approached and encountered one another in battle, out of a desire for slaying one another.

21. When those ten warriors, wrought up with wrath, met the other ten in that awful battle, the rest of the car-warriors of your army and of the army of your foes became sight-seers.

22. Those mighty car-warriors shooting weapons of diverse shape and roaring at one another began to smite one another.

23. Then in that battle, inflamed with wrath and desirous of slaying one another, those heroes roared at one another, and boasted of their prowess.

24. Then, O monarch, those kinsfolk that had met together, burning with jealousy and challenging one another, fell upon one another, discharging mighty weapons at the same time.

25. Inflamed with wrath, Duryodhara in that fierce battle pierced Dhristadyumna with four whetted arrows; and, in battle, the feat was wonderful.

26. Durmarsana pierced him (Dhristadyumna) with twenty shafts, Chitrasena with five, Durmukha with nine, Dussaha with seven,

27. Vivingsati with five, and Dushasana with three. Them, O monarch, that son of Prishata, the slayer of his foes, pierced,

28-31. In return, each with twenty shafts, displaying great lightness of hands. O Bharata Abhimanyu, in that battle, pierced Satyavrata and Purumitra, each with ten shafts. The sons of Madri, the delighters of their mother, in that battle covered their maternal uncle with a shower of sharp shafts; and that seemed indeed marvellous Thereupon, O mighty monarch, Salya covered with innumerable arrows those nephews of his, those two foremost of car-worriors, who were desirous of counteracting the stratagems of their uncle (Salya himself.) Though thus covered over with arrows, the twin sons of Madri flinched not.

32. Thereafter the Pandava Bhimasena endued with great might beholding Duryodna and desirous of putting an end to the strife, grasped his mace.

33. Seeing that mighty-armed Bhimsena with uplifted mace look like the Kailasa mount towering with its peaks, your sons fled out of terror.

34. Duryodhana however wrought up with anger urged against Bhima the Magadha division consisting of ten thousand swift-coursing elephants.

35. King Suyodhana, then accompanied by that division of elephants, and placing the ruler of the Maghads in front of him, advanced towards Bhimasena.

36. Thereat Vrikodara, beholding that division of elephants make towards himself, descended from his car, holding a mace in his hands and roaring out like a lion.

37. Grasping a mighty and heavy mace made of the essence of adamant, Bhimasena charged that division of elephants, like Death himself with his mouth wide open.

38. Then like the slayer of Vritra moving amidst the Danava host, the mighty armed Bhimsena, endued with great strength, careerd on the field of battle, slaughtering elephants with his mace.

39. Then at the deafening shouts of the roaring Bhima—shouts that were capable of producing a tremour in the heart and in the mind,—the elephents huddling together were deprived of the power of moving.

40. Then the sons of Droupadi, the mighty car-warrior the son of Subhadra, and Nakula, Sahadeva, and Dhristadyumna the son of Prishata,

41. Supporting Bhima's car, proceeded behind him, checking the foe with their shower of arrows, like the clouds drenching the mountains with rain.

42. With Khuras and Khurapras and Vallas and Anjalikas, all well-sharpened and tempered, the Pandava warriors cut down the heads of those who were fighting on the backs of elephants.

43. In consequence of the thick falling of the heads (of elephant-riders), their arms decked with ornaments and their hands grasping the iron hook, a shower of stones appeared to fall.

44. And elephant-riders deprived of heads, seated as they were on the necks of those beasts, appeared like trees on a mountain with their heads broken.

45. We also saw many other mighty elephants, felled and falling, slain by Dhristadyumna, the high-souled son of Prishata.

46. Thereafter, the ruler of the Magadma territory, goaded in that battle, against the car of Subhadra's son, an elephant that resembled Airavata itself.

47. Then the heroic son of Subhadha, that slayer of hostile heroes, beholding that mighty elephant of the ruler of the Magadhas make towards himself, killed it with a single shaft.

48. Then the nephew of Krishna that conqueror of hostile cities cut down with a Valla of silvery wings, the head of the king who could not extricate himself himself from the (falling) elephant.

49. Then Bhimasena the son of Pandu, also penetrating that division of elephants, careered in the field, crushing the elephants, like Indra crushing the mountains.

50. In that battle, we also beheld elephants smashed by Bhimasena, each with a single stroke, like cliffs rent open by the thunder-bolt.

51. Elephants prodigious like mountains were slain, having their tusks broken, their temples, their bones, their backs, and their frontal globes smashed.

52. We saw, O monarch, some of those beasts slain, and some with mouths foaming; (we saw) other mighty elephants with their frontal globes smashed, vomitting blood in profusion.

53. Some fell down on the ground overwhelmed with terror, and they resembled huge hills and were soiled in every part of their body with fat and blood, and were almost bathed in marrow and brain matter.

54. Bhima careered in the field like the Destroyer himself with his mace in his hand. Vrikodara whirling his mace that was drenched with the blood of the elephants,

55. Appeared dreadful like Pinaki (Siva) himself wielding the bow Pinaka. Crushed by the wrathful Bhimasena, the elephants,

56—57. Sorely afflicted, suddenly fled away, smashing the ranks of your own army. The mighty bowmen and car-warriors headed by the son of Subhadra, protected that hero as he battled, like the immortals protecting the wielder of the thunderbolt. Grasping his blood-stained mace almost bathed in the blood of elephants,

58—60. Bhimasena of fierce soul then appeared like the destroyer himself. Then O Bharata, we saw Bhimasena whirling his mace in all directions appear like the god Siva in the course of his wild dance. We beheld, O mighty monarch, his heavy and sounding mace that resembled the club of the destroyer himself, the whizz of which equalled the roar of Indras thunder, which was fierce to look at , and which was stained copiously with blood and smeared with marrow and hair,

61. And (lastly) which resembled the Pinaka of the enraged Rudra engaged in slaughtering animals. Just as a herdsman belabours his herd with a cudgel,

62. So Bhima belaboured the elephant division with his mace. Smitten by that mace, as also by means of arrows on all sides,

63. The elephants hastily fled away from the field, smashing the chariots of their own host. Like a tempest driving away clouds, Bhimasena driving away from the field those elephants, stood there like the wielder of the trident (Siva) standing on the cremation ground.

Thus ends the sixty-second chapter, the display of Bhima's prowess, in the Bhismabadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXIII.

(BHISMABADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When that division of elephants had been crushed, your son Duryodhana, commanded his whole forces saying, 'Kill Bhimasena.'

2. Thereat, the entire army, at the command of your son, rushed agaimst Bhimasena, setting up at the same time a dreadful uproar.

3—5. That infinite army, whose impetus it would have been impossible even for the gods to bear, that army which was incapable of being crossed like the sea on a Parva day, that army that swarmed with car-warriors, steeds and elephants and that resounded with the blare of conchs, the rattle of chariots, and the soudd of drums, that numbered innumerable foot soldiers and car-warriors, that was shrouded in a cloud of dust—that veritable ocean of advancing hostile forces that was incapable of being agitated, Bhimasena withstood in battle, like the banks resisting the surging sea.

6. Then, O monarch, we beheld in that battle, the marvellous aud super-human feat achieved by the high-souled son of Pandu, namely Bhimasena.

7. Undauntedly did Bhimasena check, with his mace, the rulers of men who, excited with wrath, had been advancing towards him, on their steeds, chariots and elephants.

8. Bhima, that foremost of those endued with might, having thus checked with his mace the career of the vast army, stood in that dreadful confusion, immovable as the mount Meru itself.

9. In that most terrific, fierce and ruthless encounter, his brothers, and sons, and Dhristadyumna the son of Prishata,

10. And the sons of Draupadi, and Abhimanyu and the ever-victorious Sikhandin, these mighty warriors did not forsake Bhimasena, as they all apprehended danger.

11. Thereafter taking up his huge and heavy mace made of Saikya iron, he (Bhimasena) rushed against your warriors, like the Destroyer himself wielding his club.

12. Smashing down hosts of charioteers and also hosts of steeds, that mighty and heroic Bhima careered on the field like fire spreading at the end of a Yuga.

13. Slaughtering in that battle numerous warriors, like Death himself destroying animals at the end of a Yuga, smashing with the impetus of his thighs hosts of cars, that son of Pandu,

14. Began to crush your army with the greatest ease, like an elephant crushing a a cluster of reeds. Dragging down warriors from the terraces of their respective cars, and felling elephant-riders from the back of the elephants on which they were fighting,

15. And horse-soldiers from the back of the steeds, and crushing foot-soldiers as they stood on the ground, Bhima killed all with his mace, like a tempest breaking down trees with its violence.

16. Bhimasena produced a fierce carnage in the forces of your son. Smeared with fat, marrow, serum and flesh, and bespattered with blood,

17. His mace, that dealt death to steeds and elepahants, appeared exceedingly terrible. With corpses and carcasses of steeds, men and elephants and horse-soldiers,

18. The field of battle wore the appearance of the (gloomy) abode of Death. Like the Pinaka of the enraged Rudra engaged in slaughtering animals,

19. Like the dreadful club of the destroyer himself, and like the effulgent thunderbolt of Indra himself, was seen the terrible-looking and death-dealing club of Bhimasena.

20. The appearance of that high-souled son of Kunti, as he whirled his mace, became as terrible as that of the Destroyer himself at the time of the universal destruction.

21. Beholding him repeatedly smash that mighty host and advance like Death himself, all the warriors became cheerless.

22. Uplifting his mace, in whichsoever direction the son of Pandu turned his eyes O Bharata, from that diretion, all the soldiers fled (deserting their ranks.)

23—24. Beholding Vrikodara of fierce deeds armed with his mace and unconquered by the sea of soldiers and seeing him break the ranks and devour the hostile troops, like Death himself with his gaping mouth, Bhisma rushed at him with great impetuousity,

25. Riding on his car of great effulgence and of rattle as loud as the rumble of clouds, and covering the sky with the shower of his arrows, like Parjannya pouring down rain.

26. Seeing him make towards himself like the Destroyer with wide upon mouth the mighty-armed Bhimasena inflamed with rage, rushed towards him.

27. That very moment, the heroic grand son of Sini namely Satyaki fell upon the grand-sire (Bhisma), and he began to slay his enemies with his strong bow, agitating the army of your son the while.

28. That at time, O Bharata, all the warriors of your army were unable to check him, as he advanced, borne by steeds of argentine effulgence, discharging (right and left) his shafts well-whetted and furnished with beautiful wings.

29. Then the Rakshasa Alambhusa pierced him with ten shafts only. Piercing him in return with fine arrows, the grand-son of Sini, advanced on his car.

30. Seeing that heroic warrior of the race of the Vrishnis thus advancing, and whirling in the midst of his enemies, and checking the foremost of the Kurus and uttering repeated war-cries in the battle,

31. Your warriors showered their arrowy down-pour on him, like rain clouds drenching the mountains with torrents of rain. They were unable to check the career of that hero who appeared like the mid-day sun in his full glory.

32. At that time, O king there was none (in your army) who was not cheerless, except the son of Somadatta, by name Vurisravas. This one seeing the car-warriors of his side routed, O Bharata, grasping his bow of fierece impetus, rushed at Satyaki desirous of fighting with the latter.

Thus ends the sixty-third chapter, the encounter between Satyaki and Vurisravas, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXIV.

(BHISMABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Then, O monarch, inflamed with wrath he pierced Satyaki with nine arrows, like an elephant-driver piercing the animal with the iron hook.

2. Thereat, before the very eyes of the spectators, Satyaki of immeasurable soul shrouded, with his arrows of straight-joints, him of the Kourava host.

3. Thereupon king Duryodhana, encircled by his uterine brothers, surrounded (for supporting him) the son of Somadatta, who had been striving hard in the encounter.

4. In the same manner, the Pandavas endued with great might, speedily forming themselves in a circle round Satyaki, stood (ready) in that battle.

5. Then, O Bharata, Bhimasena wrought up with wrath, with his upraised mace, opposed your sons headed by Duryodhana himself.

6—9, Supported by many thousand of cars, and excited with rage and fury, your son Nandaka pierced Bhimasena of great might with keen-pointed shafts whetted on stone and winged with the feathers of the Kanka bird. Then also, O monarch, Duryodhana excited with rage, in that fierce fight, struck Bhimasena on the breast with nine whetted shafts. Theaeafter the mighty-armed Bhimasena endued with superior strength mounted on his own most excellent chariot and thus addressed his charioteer Visoka. "These heroic and mighty car-worriors, these sons of Dhritarashtra endued with prowess,

10. Excited with anger, are all striving to slay me in battle. Them will I undoubtedly slay today before your very eyes.

11—12. Therefore, a charioteer, do you drive my steeds carefully in this encounter." Having thus spoken, O ruler of men, the son of Pritha pierced your son with ten keen-pointed shafts ornamented with gold. He also pierced Nandaka in return, in the centre of his breast, with three arrows.

13. Thereat Duryodhana, having pierced in return Bhima of superior strength with sin arrows, pierced Visoka with another three well-sharpened shafts.

14. In that battle, O king, as if smiling, Duryodhana with these arrows cut off the eflulgent bow of Bhima near the grasp.

15. Then in that battle, Bhima, beholding his charioteer Visoka afflicted with sharp shafts discharged by the mighty bowman, namely your son,

16. And unable to brook it and inflamed with wrath, took up another bow of celestial make, in order, O mighty sovereign, O foremost of men, to encompass the death of your son.

17. Inflamed with wrath, he also took up an arrow with a horse-shoe head, furnished with feathery wings; and with it, Bhima severed the excellent bow of the king (Duryodhana).

18. Thereat your son overwhelmed with fury, throwing off that severed bow, swiftly took up another bow of tougher make.

19. O monarch placing on his bow-string a fierce Visikha shaft that resembled in effulgence the bludgeon of Death himself, your son, excited to the highest pitch of fury struck Bhimasena with it, on the centre of his breast.

20. There-with struck home and afflicted sore, he (Bhima) squatted on the terrace of his car; and when he was thus seated, he was overwhelmed with a swoon.

21. Beholding Bhima thus afflicted, the mighty car-warriors of the Pandava host headed by Abhimanyu, all of excellent parts could not brook it.

22. Then these warriors, without the least flurry, poured on the head of your son a mighty shower of arrows of fierce velocity.

23. Meanwhile Bhimasena of mighty prowess having regained conciousness, pierced Duryodhana with three shafts and again with another five.

24. That fierce bowman, that son of Pandava then pierced Salya with twenty-five shafts furnished with golden wings. Thus pierced, the latter fled from the field of battle.

25—26. Thereat your fourteen sons namely, Senapati, Susena, Jalasandha, Sulochana, Ugra, Bhimaratha, Bhima, Viravahu, Aloluka, Durmukha, Dushpradharsa, Vivatsu, Vikata and Soma, then encountered Bhima (in that battle).

27. With their eyes coppery in rage, and shooting myriads of shafts, they rushed against Bhimasena, piercing him simultaniously.

28. Then the heroic Bhimasena of superior might, beholding your sons, began to lick the corners of his mouth like a wolf in the midst of inferior beasts.

29. Then that mighty-armed son of Pandu, swooping down with great violence like Garuda himself, cut off with a horse-shoe-headed shaft the head of Senapati.

30. Then with a cheerful soul, laughing all the while, that one of strong arms, piercing Jalasandha with three shafts, transported him to the abode of Death.

31—36. Then slaying Susena also, he despatched him to Death. With a broad-headed arrow he felled on the ground the head of Ugra furnished with a helmet and graced with a couple of Kuldalas, and looking like the (charming) moon itseelf. Thereafter Bhima the son of Pandu, piercing in that battle Viravahu, along with his steeds, standards and charioteer with seventy arrows, despatched him to the other world. Then as if smiling, Bhimasena, O monarch, conveyed to the abodes of Death the two brothers Bhima and Bhimaratha. Then in that fierce contest, with an arrow furnished with a horse-shoe head, Bhima, despatched Sulochana to the regions of Death, before the eyes of all the soldiers. Then the rest of your sons who were there, beholding in the field the prowess of Bhimsena, and while being thus struck by that high-souled warrior, all ran away from the field of battle, afraid of Bhima.

37—38. Thereupon the son of Santanu thus addressed the mighty car-warriors of his army:—'This fierce bowman, Bhima, inflamed with wrath, is slanghtering in battle the mighty sons of Dhritarashtra, accomplished in weapons, heroic, courageous and united though they are. Do you all receive that son of Pandu in battle."

39. Thus spoken to, all the warriors belonging to the army of Dhritarashtra's son, furious in rage, rushed at Bhimasena endued with superhuman strength.

40. Suddenly, O ruler of men, Bhagadatta, mounted on an elephant with rent temples, rushed towards the spot where Bhima was stationed.

41. Rushing to the encounter, he, in that battle, intercepted Bhimasena from the view, (covering him) with shafts whetted on stone like clouds intercepting the sun from the view.

42. Then the mighty car-warriors headed by Abhimanyu, who all relied on the strength of their arms, could not brook this interception of Bhima.

43. So, all those heroes opposed Bhagadatta on all sides with a shower of arrows, and they also began to pierce the elephant from all sides with an arrowy down pour.

44. That elephant of the ruler of the Pragytisas, O king, being struck by all those mighty warriors, with showers of weapons of diverse discription,

45. And with blood spattered on its body, became, in that battle, worthy of being looked at, like masses of rain-clouds tinged with the rays of the sun.

46. That elephant, shedding temporal juice, being goaded by Bhagadatta, rushed against all those (heroes), like Death incarnate urged on by the Destroyer himself.

47. It doubled its speed and shook the earth under neath its tread. Then all those mighty car-warriors, seeing that dreadful aspect of the animal,

48—49. And considering it irristible, lost their heart. Then that king the foremost of men, excited with wrath, struck Bhimasena on the centre of his chest, with a straight shaft. That mighty car-warrior and bowman, being pierced by that monarch,

50. With his limbs stiffened in consequence of a swoon, caught hold of his flag-staff. Beholding them terrified, and seeing Bhima overwhelmed with a swoon,

51—52. The powerful Bhagadatta endued with great prowess uttered a loud roar. Then O monarch, the Rakshasa Ggatotkacha of dreadful appearance seeing Bhima in that plight became inflamed with fury, and even there disappeared from the sight. And spreading a terrible illusion capable of enhancing the apprehension of the cowards,

53. He re-appeared within a moment assuming a dreadful form, and riding on an Airavatata the creation of his own illusive powers.

54. Other elephants guarding the points of the compass, namely, Anjana, Vamana Mahahadma, followed it, all of pure effulgence.

55. All these three mighty elephants ridden by Rakshshas were possessed of prodigious bodies with the temporal juice profusely exuding from their temples.

56. And they were endued with prowess strength and might and great fleetness and courage. Then Ghatotkacha goaded his own elephant in battle,

57, Being desirous, O afflicter of your foes, of slaying Bhagadatta along with his elephant. Goaded by the Rakshasas, of great strength, the other elephants,

58. Each possessed of four tusks, fell, from all sides, with fury, upon the elephant of Bhagadatta, striking the latter at the same time with their tusks.

59. Wounded with arrows, and afflicted by those elephants, and smarting with pain, the elephant of Bhagadatta set up a mighty roar that resembled the rumble of the thunderbolt of Indra.

60. Hearing those deep and dreadful cries of the roaring elephant, Bhisma thus spoke to Drona and king Suyodhana.

61. "This mighty bowman Bhagadatta fighting in this battle with the wicked-souled son of Hidimva, is involved in a great peril.

62. This Rakshasa is of prodigious stature, and king Bhagadatta also is very wrathful. Surely encountering each other in the fight they both will prove like the Death and the Destroyer.

63. Even now do we hear the mighty up-oar of the enraptured Pandavas, as also the distressful and loud cries of the frightened elephant (of Bhagadatta).

64. Good betide you, we shall now proceed to protect the king: uprotected, in battle, he will soon be deprived of his life.

65. Therefore, O warriors of extraordinary prowess, make haste; O sinless ones, do not delay. This hair-stirring and ruthless combat is deepening more and more.

66. This leader of a division is devoted to us, is the son of an illustrious dynasty and is endued with bravery. O you of unfading renown, it is proper that his rescue should be effected by us."

67. Listening to those words of Bhisma, all the monarchs forming in serried files and headed by the son Bharadwaja, with a desire for rescuing Bhagadatta,

68—69. Proceeded in all haste to the spot where the latter was. Beholding them advance, the Panchalas, together with the Pandavas headed by Yudhisthira himself, pursued the enemy from behind. Beholding that mighty host, the foremost of the Rakshasa endued with prowess,

70. Uttered a deafeaning roar, that resembled the roar of thunder. Hearing his roar and seeing those fighting elephants,

71. The son of Santanu, namely, Bhishma again addressed the son of Bharadwaja saying:—' I do not like to fight with the wicked-souled son of Hidimva.

72, At present he is surcharged with strength and prowess and is well-supported. He is now incapable of being defeated even by the wielder of the thunderbolt himself.

73. He is sure in his aims and can strike home; our vehicles are all fatigued and we have been wounded and lacertated in our fight with the Pandavas and the Panchalas.

74. Therefore we do not like to fight any longer with the Pandavas. Proclaim therefore, the withdrawal of our divisions for this day. Tomorrow shall we again battle with the enemy."

75. Hearing these words of the grandsire, and afflicated as they were with the fear of Ghatotkacha, they (the Kouravas) deightedly did what the former said availing themselves of the pretext of the advent of night.

76. Upon the withdrawal of the Kurus, the victorious Pandavas sent up their war crees accompanied with the blare of conchs and cornets.

77. Thus, O foremost of the Bharata race, did the battle rage that day, between the Kurus and the Pandavas headed by Ghatotkacha.

78. Thereafter, the Kouravas, at night fall, hastily repaired to their own encampments, being ashamed and being vanquished by the Pandavas.

79. Those mighty car-warriors, the sons of Pandu, with their bodies mangled with shafts in battle, O king-retired to their camps, with hearts over-flowing with joy.

80. And, O mighty monarch, they proceeded placing Bhimasena and Ghatotkacha at their van, and O mighty sovereign, worshipping them out of great delight.

81. They uttered diverse cries that became mingled with sounds of the tabors, and they uttered also their war-cries which again were mingled with the blare of their conchs.

82. Those high-souled warriors, uttering leonine roars and shaking the earth with their tread, O sire, agitated the hearts of your sons.

83. Then those repressors of their foes retired to their camps at the advent of night. King Duryodhana, on the other hand, distressed in consequence of the slaughter of his brothers,

84. Reflected for some moments, overwhelmed with tears and grief. Then making all the necessary arrangements for his camp according to the rules of military sciences he began to meditate, afflicted (as he was with) the death of his brother and overcome with piognant grief on their account.

Thus ends the sixty-fourth chapter, the withdrawal of the troops at the end of the fourth day's combat, in the Bhismabadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXV.

(BHISMABADHA PARVA).—Contd.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. Hearing of those feats achieved by the sons of Pandu—feats which are difficult of being achieved even by the celestials themselves, O Sanjaya, I have been filled with apprehension and amazement.

2. Hearing also of the humiliation of my sons in every way, O Sanjaya, I have been seized by a burning anxiety as to what the finale (of this war) will be.

3. The prophecy of Vidura does consume my heart; and, O Sanjaya, I see that through the influence of (adverse) destiny every-thing is happening even as he had said.

4. The smiters of the Pandava hosts are battling with those foremost of warriors headed by Bhisma, who are endued with heroism and accomplished in (the use of) all weapons.

5. What asceticism those high-souled and greatly powerful sons of Pandu have observed, what boon, O child, have they secured, what knowledge have they cultivated,

6. In consequence of which they suffer no reduction, like the stars in the firmament? I can not bear the repeated slaughter of my warriors by the sons of Pandu.

7—8. Through the disposal of Destiny, a highly severe chastisement has overtaken me alone. Tell me truly, O Sanjaya, every thing, about why my sons have become liable to slaughter and why the sons of Pandus have been exempted from it. I can not discern, O afflicter of your enemies, the termination of this ocean of distress,

9. Like a man desirous of swimming over the vast sea with his two arms. I now certainly see that a terrible calamity has overtaken my sons'.

10. No doubt, Bhima will slay all my sons. I do not find that hero who can protect my sons in battle.

11—12. The destruction of my sons in battle is certain, O Sanjaya. Therefore, O Suta, it behoves you to tell me who am questioning you, in detail and truly, the real cause of these events, as also, what Duryodhana did, seeing his own troops turn their faces away from the field of battle.

13. Bhisma, Drona, Kripa, and the son of Souvala, and Jayadratha, and the mighty bowman the son of Drona, and the mighty Vikarna,—what did all these warriors do?

14. What, O highly wise one, was the resolution of these high-souled warriors, when, O Sanjaya, my sons turned away their faces from the field?

Sanjaya said:—

15. Hear, O king, with perfect attention, and hearing do you understand what you hear. There was nothing the result of incantation and nothing the production of illusion.

16. Neither, O monarch, did the sons of Pandu create any new source of apprehension. Those warriors endued with strength are fighting their battles according to the rules of fair combat.

17. The sons of Pritha, O Bharata, desirous of securing illustrious fame, ever perform all acts—even the maintenanee of their lives—in perfect accordance with the rules of morality.

18. Attended by excellent prosperity and endued with great strength and conforming to all morality, they never turn back from the fight. Victory ever attends righteousness.

19. For this reason, O ruler of earth, the sons of Pritha are unslayable in battle and are ever courted by victory. Your sons are of wicked intentions and are intent on perpetrating sin ;

20—21. And are cruel and of low deeds ; therefore are they always worsted in the battle. O ruler of men, various heartless injuries were done to the Pandavas by your sons, like men of low extraction. Disregarding all those offences of your sons,

22. O elder brother of Pandu, the sons of Pandu tried always to keep them hidden and uuknown. O ruler of men your sons do not pay them proper respect.

23. Let your sons now reap the fruit,—that resembles the poisonous fruit of the Kimpaka tree,—of that their persistent course of sinful actions. [illegible] ivine [illegible] own [illegible]

[illegible] mighty monarch, do you with your sons and relatives, taste that mortal fruit, in as much as, O king, you did not seem to be awakened though always warned by your well-wishers.

25. Always forbidden by Vidura, Bhisma, Drona of high soul, his son, as also by me, you did not pay any regard,

26. To our words, salutary and intended for your good though they were, even as a sick man rejects wholesome medicines. Accepting the views of your sons, you expected to see the Pandavas vanquished.

27. Hear again the true reason,—about which you had asked me—for the victory of the sons of Pandu, O foremost of the Bharatas.

28. I shall exactly tell you, O subjugator of your foes, as I myself have heard it. The grandsire himself was questioned, on this point by king Duryodhana.

29—30. Beholding his brothers, all accomplished car-worriors, worsted in battle, your son Duryodhana, O Kourava, with his heart overwhelmed with sorrow, asked this question to the grandsire, approaching him with humility, on the advent of night. O ruler of men, hear from me what your son did say at the time.

Duryodhana said —

31. Drona, yourself, Salya, Kripa, the son of Drona, Kritavaman, the son of Hridika, and Sudakshina the ruler of the Kamvojas,

32. Bhurisravas, Vikarna and Bhagadatta endued with prowess—these heroes are all regarded as mighty car-warriors ; all these men are the sons of illustrious dynasties and are ever ready to shuffle off their mortal coil.

33. I consider these to be a match for the three worlds united together. The whole Pandava army can not withstand your prowess.

34. Regarding these things, a doubt has arisen in my mind. Tell me, who am asking you, of him, relying on whom the sons of Kunti are gaining victory over us at each step.

Bhisma said :—

35-36. Hear, O king, the words that I am going to say to you, O you of the Kuru race. I did frequently address you to the same effect, urging you to conclude peace with the sons of Pandu. I consider this to be prf[illegible] both to you and to the earth, O lo[illegible] who [illegible] supreme, he

37. [illegible] you, O king, enjoy [illegible] be so of this earth with your broth[illegible] highest centented heart, and enhancing [illegible] eings, of your relatives and gratifying eve[illegible] else.

38. O Sire, you paid no heed to words before, though I cried myself hoa[illegible] Now this evil has overtaken you, in as m[illegible] as you have ever despised the sons Pandu.

39. Hear from me as I speak, O king O lord, the reason why those sons of Pandu, who are never tired in the performance of pious acts, are unslayable.

40. There was not, is not, or will not be a person, who would have been, is or will be able to conquer the Pandavas, protected as they are by the wielder of the Sarnga bow.

41. Hear from me, you who are versed in morality, the ancient history that was related to me, O sire, by the sages of tranquil souls.

42. In the days of yore, all the celestials and sages, assembled together, danced attendance upon the grandsire (Brahma) on the mountain Gandhamadana.

43. Seated at his ease in their midst, the lord of people, saw an excellent chariot, burning with effulgence, stationed in the firmament.

44. Having ascertained everything about that chariot by means of his contemplation, and folding his palms together, Brahma, with his soul filled with delight bowed down his head to the Purusha, the highest of all Divinities.

45. Also the sages and the celestials, beholding the figure thus revealed in the heavens, stood with hands folded and with their gaze fixed on the marvel of marvels.

46. Then Brahma best conversant with with morality, the foremost of those versed in the Vedas and the creator of the worlds, having worshipped that form duly, chaunted this hymn of praise.

47. "Thou art the glory of the universe, and hast the universe as thy form. Thou art the lord of the universe; thou art the protector of it; thou hast thy senses under thy thorough control. Thou art the Lord paramount of this universe, thou art the Vasudeva; I seek refuge in thy divine self that art the soul of Yoga.

48. Victory unto thee that art the divine and paramount Lord of this universe; victory unto thee, who art ever anxious for the world's welfare. Victory unto thee, the lord and the master of the Yogins; victory ...hee that art identified with the ocean tresseu ...rgy. his brother...

84. R...y unto thee the Lord of the lords whelmed...rse, that hast the lotus springmaking ...hy navel and that hast expanded fo... Victroy unto thee that art the incarn... of gentleness, thee that art the son of (O thou, the Lord of the past, the ...ent, and the future.

51. Victrory be unto thee, O thou that hast the universe for thy form, that art free from the influence of all maladies. O Lord of the universe, O thou of long arms, victory be unto thee who art devoted to further the welfare of the worlds.

52. O great Serpent, O huge Boar, O Lord, O thou possessed of the lion's manes, victory be unto thee. O thou whose raiments are yellow, O Lord of the several points of the compass, O thou that art like the abode of the universe, O infinite one, O thou that dost suffer no deterioration,

53. O thou that art the Manifest, O thou that art the Unmanifest, O thou of senses thoroughly controlled, O thou that art like the infinite space, O thou that ever achievest the acts beneficial to the worlds, O thou that are beyond all measurement, O thou that alone art conversant with thy nature, O thou that art ever deep and the fulfiller of desires, victory be unto thee.

54. O thou that hast no end, O thou that art known as Brahma, O thou that art eternal, and art the protector of all creatures, O thou that art ever successful, O thou whose understanding is accomplished in all things, O thou that art conversant with all righteousness, O thou that art ever attended with victory,

55. O thou of mysterious self, O thou that art the soul of all Yoga, O thou that art the origin of every thing that has sprung into existence, O thou that art the knowledge of the souls of every being, O master of the univbrse, victory be unto thee that art the creator of all beings.

56. O thou that art self-create, O thou of eminent parts, O thou that art ever active for bringing about the destruction of all beings, O thou that art the inspirer of all thoughts in the mind, victory be unto thee, the beloved of those that are conversant with Brahma.

57. O thou that art ever engaged in the acts of creation and destruction, O represser of all desires, O most exalted Divinity, O thou the origin of Amrita, O thou whose existence only is a reality, O thou that art the ... doth appear at the end of a Yuga, O thou ... art the bestower of ... victory,

58. O thou that art the Lord of lords of men, O Divine one, O thou that hast the lotus growing from thy navel, O thou endued with great might, O thou that art self-create, O thou that art the elements in their nascent condition, O thou that art the soul of all performances, victory be unto thee, the giver of all things.

59. The goddess of earth constitutes thy feet, the cardinal and subsidiary points of the compass repressent thy arms; the celestial regions constitute thy head; thy form is composed of myself; the celestials compose thy limbs, and the sun and the moon thy two eyes.

60. Asceticism and truth born of acts of piety constitute thy strength. Thy energy is fire, thy breath the wind. And wate s have been created from thy perspiration.

61. The twin Acwins ever constitue thy ears, the goddess of learning is thy tongue, the Vedas are thy knowlege and in thee is this world stationed.

62. O thou that art the Lord of Yoga and the Yogins, we know neither thy extent nor thy measure, neither thy energy nor thy prowess, nor thy strength, nor thy origin.

63. O god, cherishing reverence for thee, and betaking to thy ways by the performance of vows &c, we do ever worship Vishnu, the Supreme Lord, the God of gods.

64. The sages, the celestials, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the Rakshas, the Pannagas, the Pishachas, and men, and the animals, and birds and men and reptiles,

65. All these have been created by me in the first instance, on earth, through thy grace. O thou that hast the lotus springing from thy navel, O thou of expanded eyes, O Krishna, O soother of all afflictions,

66. Thou art the refuge of all created beings and thou art their bodies! Thou hast the universe for thy mouth; O thou that art the Lord of the celestials, the gods are ever happy through thy grace only.

67. O god, through thy grace the earth hath ever been freed from all her apprehensions. So, O thou of expanded eyes, be thou the propagator of the Yadu race.

68. Gratify my solicitation O Lord, for the sake of establishing righteousness, for for slaying the sons of Diti and for upholding the universe

69. O Vasudeva all that is supremely mysterious regarding thee, O Lord, all that have been exactly sung by me, through thy grace.

70. Having created the divine Sankarsana thyself out of thy own self, thou didst then, O Krishna create thyself as Pradumnya, born out of thy own self.

71. From Pradumnya thou didst then creat Anirudha known as the undeteriorating Vishnu. And it was Anirudha who did create me Brahman as the supporter of the universe.

72. Thus created by the essence of Vamdeva, I have been created by thyself. Dividing thyself into portions, O Lord create thysslf among humanity.

73. There, for the well-being of the world, slaughtering the Asuras, and establishing righteousness and winning glory, thou shalt again attian to the best Yoga.

74. O thou of immeasurable prowess, the regenerate sages and the celestials sing of thy wonderful self out of devotion for thee, under those various appellations that are ascribed to thee.

75. O thou of excellent arms, all the host of beings find their support in thee, having sought shelter in thee, the giver of boons. The Vipras eulogise thee as the bridge of the universe, having no beginning, middle or end, and as posessed of infinite Yoga prowess."

Thus ends the sixty-fifth chapter, the eulogy to Vishnu, in the Bhismabadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXVI.

Bhisma said :—

1. Thereupon that almighty Divinity, the Lord of the lords of people, thus replied to Brahma in a soft and sonorous voice.

2. "I have come to know, O sire, all that you desire, through my Yoga power. It will be even as you desire." Saying this he disappeared then and there.

3. Then the celestials, the sages, and the Gandharvas were all filled with great wonder; and urged by curiosity they then thus spoke to the Grandsire Brahma.

4. "Who indeed is he, O master, that was even now adored by your illustrious self with bows and with humility, and who was eulogised in so high terms? We desire to hear about him."

5. Thus spoken to, the almighty Grandsire thus replied to the celestials, the regenerate sages, the Gandharvas and every one else in soft and sweet words.

6. "O foremost of the celestials he who is disignated That, he who is supreme, he who is existent at present, and will be so for all future periods, he who is the highest self, he who is called the soul of beings, and he who is the paramount Lord,

7. I was holding conversation even with his ever-contented self; that Lord of the universe has been entreated by me to show his grace on the earth,

8. To take his birth in the world of men and to be known as the son of Vasudeva (I entreated him saying) :—'For slaughtering the Asuras, do thou take thy birth on the face of the earth.

9. Those Daityas, and Danavas, and Rakshasas of dreadful appearance and of great might who were slain in battle, have been born among men.

10. For slaying them, the almighty Lord of great strength, being accompanied by Nara, shall wonder over the earth assuming a human form.

11. Those ancient and illustrious sages namely Nara and Narayana, are incapable of being vanquished in battle by even the gods united together.

12. Together, those two sages Nara and Narayana, of immeasurable effulgence, will be born in the world of men, and they that are fools will not recognise them as such.

13. That Lord of the universe, whose son Brahma am, that Vasudeva, the Paramount Lord of all the worlds should always be worshipped by you.

14. O you foremost of celestials, endued with great prowess and bearing the conch, the discus and the mace, he should never be disregarded by you as a man.

15. He is the supreme mystery; he is the suprme shelter; he is the supreme Brahma, and he is the supreme glory.

16. He is undeteriorating, unmanifest and eternal. He is designated the Purusha, he is ever sung but never known by any body.

17, He is the supreme energy, his is the supreme felicity, he is the supreme truth. Thus has Viswakarman sung.

18. Therefore the Lord Vasudeva of infinite prowess should never be disregarded as a man by the celestials and the Asuras headed by Indra himself.

19. That one of perverted undersaanding who, out of contempt, calls Hrishikesa a man is said to be the vilest of all creatures.

20. He is spoken of as a great sinner who disregards Vasudeva for his having incarnated himself as a man.

21. Men speak of him as a great sinner, who does not know that Divine one, that soul of the mobile and the immobile, that one of pure effulgeuce, that one bearing the mark of Srivatsa on his breast, that one from whose navel a lotus has sprung.

22. Disregarding that wearer of the diadem and the gem Koustuva, that giver of assurances of safety to his friends, that one of illustrious soul, a man becomes sunk in the dreadful mire of sin.

23. Every one, having known all these truths, should do obeisance, O best of the celestials, to Vasndeva that Lord of the lords of people."

Bhisma said :—

24. That almighty one (the Grandsire), having thus spoken to the gods and the sages in the days of yore, repaired to his own residence' leaving all creatures behind.

25. Thereafter the celestials, together with the Gandharvas, the sages, and the Apsaras, having listened to that discourse delivered by Brahma, went to Heaven with joyful hearts.

26, It was this, O sire, that was heard by me from the sages of accomplished understanding when they were speaking of Vasudeva the ancient one, amongst their assembly.

27. O you conversant with the Shastras, I also heard this from Rama the son of Jamadagni, from the highly intelligent Markendeya and also from Vyasa and Narada.

28. Having heard the truth about the subject, and having heard of Vasudeva as the undeteriorating Lord of illustrious soul, the supreme Master of the Lords of people,

29. From whose self has sprung Brahma the father of all the universe, why should not men adore and worship that Vasudeva?

30. You have been, O sire, forbidden in days past, by the sages of accomplished understandings (who said to you), 'Do not risk a battle with Vasudeva the weilder of the bow,

31. As also with the Pandavas'. But out of folly, you could not comprehend my word; I do regard you therefore as a cruel Rakshasa; and you are encompassed in ignorance.

32. For this reason it is that you despise Govinda and Dhananjaya the son of Pandu; for, what other man could despise the divine Nara and Narayana?

33. I therefore, O monarch, say to you that this one is eternal and undeteriorating pervading the whole universe, immutable, the ruler, the creator, the supporter and the truly existent.

34. That preceptor of the mobile and the immobile creations, that supreme Lord, supports the triune world; he is the Warrior, the Victory, the Victorious, and the Lord of all nature.

35. He is permeated, O king, with the quality of goodness and is free from the slightest tinge of the qualities of passion and dullness. Righteousness is where Krishna is; and victory is where rightiousness is.

36. The sons of Pandu are, O king, supported by the supreme excellence of his yoga of self; and, with certitude, victory will court them.

37. He it is who inspires the sons of Pandu with an intelligence that brings about their prosperity; he it is who charges them with strength in battle; he it is who ever protects them from danger.

38. This one is that eternal Deity that pervades all creatures, and is ever blessed. He, of whom you have asked me, is celebrated under the name of Vasudeva.

39. He is adored and served with restrained hearts alike by the Brahmanas, the Kshatriyas, the Vaisyas, and the Sudras, each having distinguising features of their own, and performing their own duties,

40. He it is, whom, at the end of the Dwapara Yuga and in the beginning of the Kali Yuga Samkarsana had eulogised, in the manner of devotees.

41. It is that Vasudeva the creator of the universe who does repeatedly create, Yuga after Yuga, all the regions of the celestials and the mortals, all the sea-girt cities, and also all the regions of human habitation.

Thus ends the sixty-sixth chapter, the story of the world's creation, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXVII.

Duryodhana said :—

1. In all the worlds, Vasudeva is spoken of as the Highest Being; O grandsire, I desire to know all about his nativity and his glory.

Bhisma said :—

2. Vasudeva is the Supreme Being, the God of all gods. There is to be seen none, O foremost of the Bharatas, superior to Him of eyes resembling lotus petals.

3. Markaudeya speaks of Govinda as the great mystery, as all beings, as the Soul of all, as the Highest Soul and as the Foremost of all male beings.

4. He created these three things viz., Water, Air, and Fire. Having created this Earth, that Divine Master, the Lord of all the worlds,

5. That Highest Soul, that Foremost of all Beings, laid himself down on the waters. Therein, that Divine One composed of all energies, was lulled in sleep through his Yoga.

6. He created Fire from His mouth, and Wind from His vital breath. That undeteriorating One created Words and the Vedas from His mind.

7. At first, He created these worlds as also the celestials along with all the sages. He also created decrepitude and death of all creatures and also their growth and birth.

8. He is righteousness itself and is versed in all duties. He is the giver of boons and the gratifier of all our desires. He is the Actor himself as well as the Act itself, and he is the Divine and the Sole Master.

9. That undeteriorating Lord of illustrious soul, at first created the Past, the Present and the Future and also the creator of the worlds viz (Brahma).

10. He created Samkarshana the First-born of all created being. He created the divine Sesha who is otherwise known as Ananta,

11. And who supports all creatures and upholds the Earth with all her mountains. Through devout meditation, the Vipras come to know Him of supreme energy.

12—13. That Foremost of all male beings slew the mighty Asura named Madhu who was born out of the secretion of His ears, who was furious and of fierce actions and fierce intentions, when he was on the point of destroying Brahma. In consequence of His slaying that Asura, the celestials, the Danavas, and the mortals,

14. And the sages call Janardana by the name of the Slayer of Madhu. The great Boar, the Lion, and the three-treaded Lord,

15. Hari is the Father, and the Mother, of all living creatures. Neither there was, nor there will be, any one superior to Him of eyes like lotus petals.

16. From His mouth, O monarch, He created, the Regenerates, from His arms the Kshastriyas, from His thighs the Vaisyas and from His legs the Sudras.

17—18. With ascetic austerities devoutly serving in the days of the full moon and the new moon Keshava the Divine, the creator of all corporal creatures, the Essence of Brahma and of Yoga, one surely attains to Him. Keshava has been called the Supreme energy and the Grandsire of the worlds.

19. The sages, O ruler of men, call Him Hrishikesha or the Lord of the senses. Know Him also to be the supreme Teacher, the Father, and the Preceptor.

20. Regions of undeteriorating blessedness is secured by him on whom Krishna becomes gracious. He that seeks protection from Keshava in seasons of danger, and

21. He that always reads of His themes, becomes happy and attended will all blessings. Those who attain to Krishna are never again befooled.

22. That Janarddana ever saves those who are overwhelmed with great terror. O descendant of the Bharata race, perfectly aware of this fact, Yudhisthira,

23. With his whole soul, has sought shelter in Keshava, the Supreme God, the Lord of the worlds, the Master of all Yoga and the Lord of this Earth.

Thus ends the sixty-seventh Chapter, the nativity and glory of Keshava, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHPTER LXVIII.

Bhisma said :—

1. Hear, O monarch, from me this hymn, chaunted by Brahma himself, and recounted in the days of yore to men on Earth by the Brahmanical sages and the celestials.

2. "Thou art the Master of the Sadhyas and the celestials, and art the Lord of the god of gods, the Protector of people and the Knower of all hearts. Thus has the sage Narada sung of thee.

3. Markandeya has spoken of thee as the Past, the Present, and the Furture, the the Sacrifice of all sacrifices and the Austerity of all austerities.

4. The almighty Bhrigu has sang of thee that thou art the God of all gods, and thine is the ancient and excellent semblance that is ascribed to Vishnu.

5. Dwipayana spoke of thee that thou art the Vasudeva among the Vasus, the consolidator of the sway of Sakra (Indra) and the God of gods and of all created beings.

6. In the days of yore, on the occasion of the creation of creatures, thou hast been called Daksha, the Lord of creation. Angiras has spoken of thee as the creator of all corporeal beings.

7. Devala has sung of thee that the Unmanifest All is in thy form and the Manifest is in thy mind, and that the celestials have all sprung from thy speech (breath).

8. The heavens are pervaded with thy head ; thou dost sustain the Earth with thy two arms ; the triune world is inside thy abdomen ; thou art the Eternal Male Being.

9. Persons purified by the performance of austerities, know thy divine self even to be such. To the sages gratified with a knowledge of the self, thou art the foremost of all true existent entities.

10. O Slayer of Madhu, thou art the sole refuge of the royal sages, who are of illustrious nature, who never turn back from the fight, and who are devoted to all their duties.

11. Even thus is that almighty and excellent Being Hari always adored and eulogised by sages conversant with the Yoga who are headed by Sanatkumara."

12. Thus, O Sire, has been described to you, in detail and in brief, the real nature of Keshava. Now turn your heart in love to Keshava.

Sanjaya said :—

13. Your son, O mighty monarch, listening to this sacred story, began to regard highly Keshava and those mighty car-warriors, the sons Pandu.

14.—15. Thereafter, O monarch, Bhisma, the son of Santanu, again addressed him saying—"You have now heard, O monarch, the true description of the glory of the high-souled Keshava and of Nara, about which you asked me. You have also heard of the purpose for which both Nara and Narayana have taken their births among men.

16. You have also learnt why those two heroes are invincible and why they have not been ever vanquished in battle ; as also why the sons of Pandu, O king, are unslayable in battle by anybody.

17. Towards the Pandavas endued with fame, Krishna bears an unshaken affection. Therefore it is, O foremost of sovereigns, that I advice that peace be concluded with the Pandavas.

18. Controlling your passions do you rule this earth with your powerful brothers around you. You shall surely reap destruction if you disregard the divine Nara and Narayana."

19. Having spken thus, O ruler of men, your father became silent ; and dismissing the king, he entered his own tent.

20. The king also retired to his own tent having bowed down to that one of illustrious soul. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, he slept away that night on a (milk) white bed.

Thus ends the sixty-eighth chapter, the glory of Krishna, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXIX.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When that night had passed away and when the sun had risen, the two armies O mighty monarch, encountered each other for battle.

2. Looking at each other in that battle, they rushed against each other in serried files, inflamed with rage and desirous of slaying and conquering each other.

3. In consequence of your wicked counsel, O king, the Pandavas and the Dhritarashtras, filled with joy, clad in mail and formed in battle array, rushed against one another for striking one another.

4. O monarch, Bhisma protected on all sides the array of his troops that figured the Makara. O king, so also, the sons of Pandu protected the array that they had formed with their troops.

5. Then, O mighty monarch, your sire Devavrata, that foremost of car-warriors, marched forth surrounded by a mighty host of cars.

6. And other car-warriors, foot-soldiers tuskers and horse-soldiers, followed him each stationed in his proper rank.

7. The sons of Pandu endued with fame, seeing the Kauravas ready for the encounter, formed their troops in that invincible and excellent array that figures a hawk.

8. And in the backs of that hawk-like array shone Bhimasena possessed of great strength. In its eyes were Sikhandin and the irrepressible Dhrishtadyumna the son of Prishata.

9. In its head was stationed the heroic Satyaki of invincible prowess ; and in its neck was Partha wielding the Gandiva bow.

10. The high-souled Drupada ever-attended with prosperity, along with his son, and supported by a Aukshahini of troops, formed its left wing.

11. Its right wing was formed by Kaikaya the commander of a division consisting of a Aukshahini ; in its back were the sons of Drupadi and the highly powerful son of Subhadra.

12. In its tail was the heroic and ever prosperous king Yudhisthira himself endued with great prowess, and supported by his twin brothers Nakula and Sahadeva.

13. Then in the battle that commenced Bhima, penetrating through the mouth of the Makaralike array of the Kauravas, approached Bhisma and covered him over with arrows.

14. Thereupon Bhisma endued with great prowess, discharged powerful weapons that confounded in that fierce encounter the array of troops belonging to the sons of Pandu.

15. Upon the confusion of the forces, Dhananjaya proceeding hastily, pierced Bhishma with a thousand shafts, at the van of battle.

16. Having baffled in that battle the weapons discharged by Bhisma, Dhananjaya stood ready for the encounter, supported by his own division filled with joy.

17—19. Thereupon king Duryodhana that foremost of those endued with strength, that great car-warrior seeing that terrible slaughter of his army and remembering the death of his brothers, in that battle, speedily apporached the son of Bharadwaja, and addressing him said :—O preceptor, O sinless one, you are my constant well-wisher. Relying on you as also on the grandsire, we expect without doubt to conquer in battle even the very celestials themselves.

20. Not to speak of the sons of Pandu, who are of puny might and prowess ? Good betide you. Act in such a way that the sons of Pandu may be slain."

21. Thus spoken to on the field by your son, Drona penetrated the Pandava array even before the very eyes of Satyaki.

22. Thereat, O Bharata, Satyaki impeded the progress of Drona. Thereupon ensued an encounter that was fierce and terrible to look at.

23. Then in that battle, the highly powerful son of Bharadwaja, burning with rage as if smiling, struck the grandson of Sini with ten shafts on his shoulder-joint.

24. At this, Bhimasena waxing wroth, pierced Bharadwaja with arrows, desirous O monarch, of rescuing Satyaki from Drona that foremost of all wielders of weapons.

25. Thereat Drona and Bhisma and also Salya, O sire, inflamed with rage, covered Bhimasena in that battle with (a thick shower of) arrows.

26. Then, O sire, Abhimanyu waxing wroth, and the sons of Draupadi also, pierced with their whetted shafts all those warriors with uplifted weapons.

27. Then in that fierce battle, the mighty bowman Shikhandin rushed against Bhisma and Drona, both of great prowess, who inflamed with wrath, had fallen upon his own troops.

28. Grasping a very tough bow of which the twang resembled the rumble of the clouds, that hero speedily poured down a shower of arrows, shrouding the sun itself.

29. But the grandsire of the Bharatas, meeting with Shikhandin in the battle avoided him, remembering the femininity of his sex.

30. Thereat, O mighty monarch, urged by your son, Drona rushed into the encounter, in order to protect Bhisma.

31. Shikhandin also encountering Drona the foremost of all wielders of weapons, shunned him out of fear, like one flying from the blazing fire that burns at the end of a Yuga.

32. Then O ruler of earth, your son, supported by a mighty division, advanced to rescue Bhisma, out of a desire for securing great fame.

33. So also, O monarch, the Pandavas firmly setting their heart upon victory rushed at Bhisma, placing Dhananjaya at their head.

34. Then a fierce and wonderful encounter, like that between the celestials and the Asuras, ensued between those two hosts each desirous of winning victory and great fame in battle.

Thus ends the sixty-ninth chapter, the commencement of the fifth day's fight, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXX.

(BHISMABADHA PARVA.)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then Bhisma, the son of Santanu, fought a fierce battle, desirous of saving your sons from their fear of Bhimsena.

2. In that morning, a most dreadful battle was fought between the kings of the Kurava and the Pandava hosts, in which many best warriors were slain.

3. When that furious and dreadful engagement raged, a terrible din arose, that touched the very heavens.

4. The clangour that was made was deafening in consequence of the roars of stricking elephants and the neighs of steeds and the blare of conchs and the sound of drums.

5. Those mighty warriors endued with great prowess, fighting with one another out of a desires for victory, roared at one another, like bulls amongst a herd of kine.

6. O foremost of the Bharatas, heads cut off with keen-edged arrows, falling in that b ıttle, appeared like a shower of stones from the skies.

7. Many heads, O foremost of the Bharatas, were seen lying on the field of battle, graced with ear-rings and head-gears, and effulgent like gold itself.

8. The ground was strewn over with limbs severed by Visikha, with head graced with ear-rings, and with arms decorated with ornaments &c.

9—10. In a moment the earth literally became covered over with bodies cased in armours, with decorated arms, with faces charming like the moon and beauti fied with eyes with coppery corners, and O monarch, with the of dead bodies of elephants, steeds and men.

11. Under the thick cloud of dust (raised by the warriors) in which the whistling weapons flashed like lightning, the sound emitted by the various implements of war resembled the roars of thunder.

12. That dreadful and fierce fight, O Bharata, between the Kurus and the Pandus created a river of blood in the field of battle.

13. In that fierce, dreadful, terrifying and hair-stirring battle, the Kshastriyas incapable of being represscd in battle began to shower a veritable down-pour of arrows.

14. Afflicted with that shower of arrows, the elephants of your army as well as of the enemy's army, began to shriek aloud and run hither and thither with uplifted trunks.

15. Nothing could be heard in consequence of the flappings produced by bows of great toughness, belonging to cool-headed warriors excited with fury.

16. As head-less trunks stood up in th a sea of blood, other kings rushed into batt l endeavouring to slay their enemies.

17. Heroes of immeasurable prowesse possessed of arms resembling bludgeoms, slew one another in that battle, with shafts and Saktis and maces and swords.

18. Pierced with shafts and deprived of their riders who used to guide them with hooks, elephants began to course (madly) through the field ; steeds ran about in all direction having their riders slain.

19. Many warriors of your army and many belonging to the host of enemy, afflicted with shafts-wounds, running hither and thither (with pain), (at last) jumped up and fell down.

20—21. In that fight between Bhima and Bhisma, heaps of arms, heads, bows maces, legs and ornaments and bracelets were seen rising over the field.

22. There was also seen here and thera O ruler of men, large number of running steeds and retreating elephants.

23. The Kshastriyas, urged on by Destiny, began to slay one another in that battle, with maces, swords, lances and straight-jointed shafts.

24. Other heroes accomplished in battle struck one another in that battle with their bare arms, that resembled bludgeons made wholly of iron.

25. O king, other heroic warriors of your army fought on with those of the Pandava host, and slew one another by striking one another with clenched fists, knees, palms and blows.

26. With the fallen, the falling, and with those rolling on the ground in agony, the battle, O lord of men, became indeed very dreadful.

27. Car-warriors deprived of their cars, grasping well-tempereds swords, rushed at one another desirous of slaying one another.

28. Thereupon king Duryodhana surrounded by a large number of the Kalingas and placing Bhisma at the head, charged the Pandava host.

29. So also, the Pandavas, surrounding Vrikodara and riding on fleet animals in that battle, rushed, inflamed with wrath, against the divison led by Bhisma.

Thus ends the seventieth chapter, the fierce fight, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXI.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Seeing his brother (Bhima) and other kings (of the Pandava host) engaged with Bhisma, with weapons uplifted, Dhananjaya rushed against the son of Ganga.

2. Hearing the blare of the conch Panchajanya, and the twang of the bow Gandiva, and seeing the standard of the son of Pritha (Arjuna), every one of us was seized with terror.

3—4. O mighty monarch, we then beheld the standard of that wielder of the Gandiva bow,—standard that resembled a lion's tail in shape and looked like a blazing mountain in the air ; that could not be obstructed by the trees ; that appeared like the risen comet ; and that was of diverse hue and variegated and of celestial make and bore the device of the monkey.

5. In that terrible encounter, the warriors saw Arjuna's gold-mounted Gandiva appear beautiful like flashes of lightning illumining a mass of clouds in the welkin.

6. While he was slaying the warriors of your army, we heard shouts, that resembled those of Indra himself, uttered by Arjuna, as also the dreadful sounds he produced by striking his palms against his arms.

7. Arjuna poured in torrents his arrowy showers in all the drections of the compass, like a rain-cloud surcharged with lightning and thunder and assisted by violent tempest pouring rain.

8. Then Dhanjaya, possessed of dreadful weapons, rushed against the son of Ganga. Confounded with his weapons we then were unable to distinguish between the east and the west.

9. Then O foremost of the Bharata, your warriors, not knowing which point of the compass they were in, with their animals exhausted, steeds slain and hearts confounded, and huddling close to one another,

10. Threw themselves upon the protection of Bhisma, along of with your sons. In that battle Bhisma the son of Santanu became their refuge.

11. Seized with panic, car-warriors jumped down from their cars and cavalry-soldiers from the back of their steeds ; and foot-soldiers fell down even on the ground where they stood.

12. Hearing the twang of the bow Gandiva, that resembled the rumble of thunder, O Bharata, all your warriors were struck with terror and began to fall off their ranks.

13. Then, with fleet and mettled chargers of the Kamvoja breed, and surrounded by many thousand Gopas and an army of the Gopayanas,

14. And O ruler of men, supported, by the Madras, the Souviras, the Gandharas the Trigarttas, and the foremost of all Kalinga warriors, the king of the Kalingas,

15. And king Jayadratha accompanied by many kings and followed by a numerous force consisting of various races headed by Dussasana himself,

16. And supported by fourteen thousand picked cavalry-sol diers urged by your son, encompassed on all sides the king of the Suvalas.

17. Then in that battle, united together and riding on their respective vehicles, those foremost of Bharata's race, namely the sons of Pandu, began to slaughter the warriors of your army.

18. A thick cloud of dust, raised by car-warriors, elephants, steeds and foot soldiers, made the battle that raged all the more terrible.

19. Bhisma then, supported by a mighty force consisting of elephant-warriors, car-warriors and cavalry-soldiers, all armed with Tomaras, Narachas and Prasas fell to fight with the diadem-decked Arjuna.

20—21. The ruler of Avanti encountered the king of the Kasis. Bhimasena engaged the ruler of the Sindhus; and Ajatasatru (Yudhisthira) with his sons and his counsellors, engaged with the renowned Salya the foremost of the Madras. Vikarna became engaged with Sahadeva, and Chitrasena with Sikhandin.

22. The Matsyas, O ruler of men encountered Duryodhana along with Sakuni. Drupada, Chekitana and the mighty car-warrior Satyaki

23. Engaged with the illustrious Drona, supported by his son. Kripa and Kritavarman both charged Dhristadyumna.

24. Thus, running steeds and wheeling and whirling cars and elephants, in that battle, engaged with one another, all over the field.

25. Flashes of lightning illumined the welkin although there was no cloud, and the points of the compass were shrouded in thick clouds of dust; and O ruler of men, large meteors were seen falling with terrible sounds.

26. A mighty tempest, raged and a shower of dust began to fall. The sun disappeared in the firmament being shrouded by the dust-clouds raised by the troops.

27. All the warriors, overwhelmed with that dust and fighting with their various weapons, were greatly confounded.

28. The whizzing noise produced by the arrows capable of piercing through every armour and discharged by the arms of heroes, was indeed deafening.

29. O foremost of the Bharatas, weapons endued with the pure effulgence of the stars, illumined the firmament when they were shot by excellent arms.

30. In all directions were scattered, O foremost of the Bharatas, bucklers made of bull's hide, of variegated appearance, and covered with a net-work of gold.

31. In all directions were seen heads and limbs falling, being cut off with swords of the effulgence of the sun.

32. Mighty car-warriors, having the wheel, the axle and the terraces of their cars broken, fell down on the ground, with their steeds slain and their long arms severed.

33. Steeds fell down on the battle-field mangled with the cut of weapons, and cars wheeled around deprived of their warriors.

34. O Bharata, wounded with arrows, with their bodies mangled, and their harnesses on, excellent steeds ran there dragging the car-yokes after them.

35. Many warriors, O king, with their cars, horses and drivers were seen slain in that battle by a single elephant possessed of great strength.

36. In that battle scenting the odour of the temporal juice shed by other compeers, many elephants began to snuff the air in the very midst of that slaughter of troops.

37. The field of battle was covered with elephants bearing wooden edifices and guides, as they fell down deprived of live being struck with piked lances.

38. In the midst of large forces, many elephants with the standards and warriors on their back, fell down on the ground being crushed by other huge compeers urged on by their guides.

39. In that battle, O king, were seen many chariot-shafts to be broken by elephants using their trunks that resembled the body of the serpent chief.

40. In that battle car-warriors, the yokes of whose cars had been shattered, were seized by the hair by the tuskers; and dragged down like branches of trees they were thoroughly crushed.

41. Other prodigious elephants, dragging cars entangled with other cars, ran in all directions uttering loud roars.

42. The appearance of those elephants dragging those chariots looked beautiful like that of others of their species tearing lotus-stems growing in the lakes.

43. Thus then the extensive field of battle was strewn over with cavalry-soldiers, and mighty car-warriors and their tall standards.

Thus ends the seventy-first chapter, the fierce fight, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXII.

(BHISMABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O ruler of men, Sikhandin, with the king of the Matsyas viz Virata, speedily rushed against Bhisma, that mighty bowman difficult of being defeated in battle.

2. Dhananjaya in that battle rushed against Drona, Kripa, Vikarna, and many kings, all mighty-bowmen, brave, and endued with great prowess,

3. As also, against that great warrior, the ruler of the Sindhus supported by his friends and ministers, and, O foremost of the Bharatas, against many other kings from the West and the South.

4. Bhimasena, in that fight, rushed against your vindictive son Duryodhana that mighty bow-men, as also against his, brother Dussaha.

5. Sahadeva rushed against the two mighty car-warriors, both skilful bow-men and invincible in battle, namely, Sakuni and Uluka who were father and son.

6. That mighty car-warrior, O great monarch, namely Yudhisthira, who had been shamefully deceived by yours son, proceeded in that battle against the elephant division of the Kurus.

7. That brave son of Pandu by Madri namely Nakula, who was capable of wringing tears from the foe, encountered in battle that excellent division of car-warriors consisting of the Trigartas.

8. Satyaki, Chekitana, and the son of Subhadra endued with great prowesss, all invincible in battle, rushed against the Salyas and the Kaikayas.

9. The Rakshasa Ghatotkacha, and Dhristaketu, both incapable of being conquered, charged in that battle the car-division of your sons.

10. Then, O king, the mighty car-warrior, that generalissim Dhristadyumno of immeasurable soul, engaged with Drona of fierce achievements.

11. Thus the warriors of your army, all heroic and mighty bow-men, encouutering the Pandavas in the battle, began to smite one another down.

12. When the sun reached the meridian and when the sky burned with his fiery rays, the Kurus and the Pandus began to kill one another.

13. Then chariots, mounted with flag-staffs from the topsof of which pennons were fluttering, and variegated with gold and covered with tiger-skins, appeared beautiful, as they drove through the scene of battle.

14. A dreadful din was created by those warriors as they engaged in the fight out of a desire for conquering one another, and as they roared like roaring lions themselves.

15. The strokes that the heroic Srinjayas and the Kurus dealt to one another in that conflict and that were terrible and wonderful, were also seen by us.

16. Neither, O monarch, O afflicter of your enemies, were we able to see the firmament, the sun or the cardinal and subsidiary quarters, in consequence of their being shrouded on all sides by a thick discharge of arrows.

17. The effulgence, like that of blue lotuses, of Saktis with shinning heads, of hurled lances, of well-tempered swords,

18. As also the effulgence of the coats of mail and of diverse and woncerful ornaments, filled the firmament and the cardinal and subsidiary quarters with its flashes.

19. Then, O monarch, here and there, the field of battle appeared beautiful being strewn over with the bodies of monarchs, which were effulgent like the sun or the moon.

20. Excellent car-warriors, all foremost of men, encountering one another in battle, appeared beautiful, O king, like planets in the heavens.

21. Then that foremost of car-warriors namely Bhisma, waxing wroth opposed Bhimasena of great prowess even before the very eyes of the assembled troops.

22. Then shafts furnished with golden wings whetted on stone,smeared with oil and charged with impetus, wounded Bhima in that battle, being shot by Bhisma himself.

23. Thereat the mighty Bhimasena hurled at Bhisma, O Bharata, his lance charged with fierce momentum and resembling an enraged snake.

24. But in that combat Bhisma cut off with his straight arrows, that lance furnished with a golden staff as it coursed swiftly towards himself.

25. Thereafter, O Bharata, with a whetted and well-tempered Valla Bhisma cut in twain the bow of Bhimasena.

26—27. Thereupon, speedily rushing at Bhisma, Satyaki in that encounter, with numerous keen-pointed and sharp-edged shafts discharged with a bow-string drawn back to the ear, pierced, O ruler of men, your own father. Thereat aiming a sharp and very dreadful arrow,

28. Bhisma felled the charioteer of that Vrishni hero from his seat on the box of the chariot. Upon the death of the driver, the steeds, O king, of that warrior, bolted away.

29. Those steeds wildly careered over the field of battle, endued as they were with the fleetness of the mind or the wind. Thereupon a loud uproar was sent up by all the the troops.

30. Exclamations of Oh! and Alas! were uttered by the warriors of the Pandava army. Run, Seize, Hold the steeds, Go in haste,

31. Such cries followed the chariot of Yuyudhana. During this interval, Bhisma the son of Santanu,

32. Began to slay the troops of the Pandavas, like the slayer of Vritra himself slaying the hosts of the Danavas. Thus slaughtered by Bhisma, the Panchalas supported by the Somakas,

33. Setting their hearts fixed on battle, rushed against Bhisma. Other warriors of the host of the sons of Pritha, headed by Dhristadyumna himself rushed in battle against the son of Santanu, inflamed with a desire for slaughtering the army of your son.

34. So also, O king, the warriors of your army headed by Bhisma and Drona, rushed with impetuousity against the enemy. Thereupon these raged a seceond battle.

Thus ends the seventy-second chapter, the prowess of Bhisma, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Then the mighty car-warrior Virata pierced with three arrows the mighty car-warrior Bhisma, and the latter's steeds with another three arrows.

2. Thereat Bhisma the son of Santanu, that mighty bow-man endued with great strength and lightness of hands, pierced him in return with ten shafts furnished with wings of gold.

3. Then that fierce bow-man and mighty car-warrior of firm hands, namely, the son of Drona, pierced with six shafts the wielder of the Gandiva bow between his breasts.

4. Thereat that slayer of his foes, that humiliator of his antagonists, namely, Phalguna (Arjuna), cut down the bow of Drona's son and pierced him sore in return with five sharp arrows.

5. Then the latter, endued with great impetuousity, overwhelmed with fury, not brooking the severing of his bow by Partha (Arjuna) in the battle, grasped another bow,

6. And, O king, pierced Phalguna (Arjuna) with ninety keen-pointed shafts; then with seventy excellent arrows he pierced the son of Vasudeva.

7. Thereupon with eyes coppery in rage, Phalguna with Krishna breathing long and hot and reflecting again and again,

8—9. And also that grinder of foes that foremost of mighty heroes pressing his bow with his left arm, and excited with rage, and wielding the Gandiva bow, placed on the bow-string sharp and straight and fierce shafts capable of depriving a foe of his life; and therewith, in that battle, speedily pierced the son of Drona.

10. Those shafts, in that battle, penetrating through the armour of the son of Drona drank his life-blood. But thus pierced by the wielder of the Gandiva-bow Drona's son did not flinch.

11. Discharging similar arrows at the son of Pritha, O king, he stood unwavering in battle, desirous of protecting Bhisma of illustrious vows.

12. That great feat of his which consisted in his encountering the two Krishnas together in battle, was greatly applauded by the foremost among the Kurus.

13. Having obtained from Drona various rare weapons together with the method of their withdrawal, he every day undauntedly fought amidst that host.

14. "This is the son of my preceptor; this is the very dear son of Drona; especially he is a Brahmana, and so worthy of my veneration."

15. Thinking thus, that grinder of enemies the brave Vivatsu (Arjuna), that foremost of car-warriors, showed mercy towards Bharadwaja's son.

16. Thereafter in that encounter leaving alone the son of Drona, Kunti's son (Arjuna) borne by white chargers, endued with great prowess, fought on displaying great lightness of hands and spreading slaughter in the ranks of the enemy.

17. Duryodhana pierced the mighty bow-man Bhimasena with ten shafts furnished with vulture-feathers and whetted on stone and decked with gold.

18. Excited with wrath, Bhimasena grasped a variegated bow of tough make, capable of depriving the foe of his life, as also ten sharp arrows.

19. Thereafter taking a steady aim with those keen-pointed shafts charged with great energy and fierce impetus, and drawing the bow-string back to his ears, Bhimasena struck home the ruler of the Kurus on his broad chest.

20. Thereupon the gem that was hanging in the breast of Duryodhana by golden threads, being surrounded by those arrows, appeared charming like the sun in the heavens surrounded by the planets.

21. But your son endued with great energy, thus pierced by Bhimasena, did not brook it cooly, like a snake not bearing the sound of the tread of man.

22. Thereafter inflamed with rage, O king, he pierced Bhima with numerous shafts furnished with golden wings and whetted on stone, with a view to protect his own soldiers.

23. Thus fighting with each other and mangling each other (with shafts) in that battle, those two sons of yours, both endued with great prowess appeared beautiful like two gods.

24. Then that foremost of men, that slayer of hostile heroes, namely, the son of Subhadra, pierced Chitrasena with innumerable short arrows and also Purumitra with seven shafts.

25. And that heroic one equal to Sakra himself in battle, piercing Satyavrata with seventy shafts, seemed to dance about on the field causing us much pain.

26. Chitrasena pierced him in return with ten shafts, Satyavrata with nine, and Purumitra with seven.

27. Thus pierced the son of Arjuna while still shedding blood, severed the beautiful and mighty bow of Chitrasena that was capable to holding the foe at bay.

28. Penetrating his coat of mail, Arjuna's son, pierced him with a shaft on the breast. Thereat the heroic princes of your army all mighty car-warriors,

29. Uniting together, and inflamed with rage, pierced Arjuna's son with numerous keen-pointed arrows. But the latter, conversant with excellent weapons, wounded all of them with sharp arrows.

30. Beholding that feat of his, your sons in that battle surrounded him on all sides, who was consuming the warriors of your army

31. Like a blazing fire consuming a heap of fuel in the summer season. Thus smiting down your soldiers the son of Subdhra appeared highly beautiful.

32. Beholding those feats of Abhimanyu the son of Subhadra, O king, your grandson Lakshmana speedily faced him desirous of battle.

33. Thereupon waxing wroth Abhimanyu that mighty car-warrior pierced Lakshmana of auspicious marks and his charioteer, with six well sharpened arrows.

34. So also, O king, Lakshmana pierced the son of Subhadra with sharp arrows; and O mighty sovereign, the feat seemed to be marvellous.

35. Thereat that mighty car-warrior the son of the Subhadra, slaying the four steeds of Lakshmana, as also his charioteer, rushed at him covering him with sharp shafts.

36, Then standing on his chariot of which the steeds were slain, Lakshmana the slayer of inimical heroes, excited with the wrath, hurled a lance aiming at the car of Subhadra's son.

37. Then Abhimanyu, cut down with his keen-pointed arrows, that dreadful and irressitible lance that resembled a snake and that was coursing swiftly towards himself.

38. Thereupon Goutama (Kripa) taking Lakshmana upon his chariot carried him away from the field before the very eyes of the troops.

39. Then in that general and dreadful engagement, the fighters rushed, one against another, smiting one another and desirous of depriving one another of his life.

40, The mighty bowmen of your army and the mighty car-warriors of the Pandava host, all ready to lay down their lives in battle, began to slay one another.

41. Having dishevelled hair, deprived of their armours, shorn of their cars, and with their bows severed, the Srinjaya fought on with their bare arms.

42. Then the mighty-armed Bhisma endued with great strength, waxing wroth, began to slay with weapons of celestials make, the Pandavas of high-soul,

43. In that battle, the earth was then strewn our with the corpses and falling bodies of car-warriors, cavalry-soldiers, men, and horses, and of elephants deprived of their guides.

Thus ends the seventy-third chapter, the single combats, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then O king, the mighty-armed Satyaki, invincible in battle, drawing in that battle, an excellent bow capable of bearing a great strain,

2. Discharged numerous arrows furnished with wings and resembling snakes of virulent venom, displaying at the same time his great and wonderful lightness of hands.

3—4. While slaying the enemy in that battle, so swiftly did he draw his bow, take out his arrows (from his quiver), place them on his bow-string, discharge them at the foe, and again take out other arrows and let them off, that he appeared to be highly beautiful like a mass of clouds pouring showers of rain.

5. The king Duryadhana beholding him swell like a raging fire, O Bharata, despatched against him a division consisting of ten thousand cars.

6. Then Satyaki of infal'iable prowess endued with great strength, that mighty bow man, slew all those excellent bowmen with weapons of celestial make.

7. Having accomplished that fierce feat and grasping his bow, that hero encountered Bhurisravas in that battle.

8. *Bhurisravas that enhancer of the glory of the Kurus, seeing that division of his troops felled by Yuyudhana (Satyaki) wating wroth rushed against Satyaki.

9—11. Stretching his mighty bow that resembled that of Indra himself (rain-bow) in hue, he, O monarch, discharged thousands of arrows, that looked like snakes of virulent poison, that were endued with the energy of the thunderbolt itself displaying in the act his wonderfull lightness of hands. Thereupon the followers of Satyaki unable to bear those shafts of fatal touch, O monarch, fled in all directions, abandoning, O king, in battle Satyaki ever invincible in fight.

12. Seeing this, the ten highly powerful sons of Yuyudhana, all mighty car-warriors of great fame, clad in armours of best make possessing various weapons and diverse standards,

13. Approaching in that fierce conflict that mighty bowman named Bhurisravas, who bore the device of a sacrificial stake on his standard, thus addressed the latter in wrath in that dreadful fight.

14. "O kinsman of the Kuravas, O mighty one, come give us battle; fight with us either jointly or separately.

15. Vanquishing ourselves in battle you may earn great glory, or crushing you in combat we shall attain to great gratification."

16. Thus spoken to, that foremost of men possessed of great strength and heroism and proud of his prowess, seeing them ready for the fight, thus replied to them.

17. "You have spoken well O heroes; if indeed this be your desire, fight with me in a body[putting forth all your endeavours. I will slay all of you in battle."

18. Thus spoken to, those heroes all mighty bowmen and endued with great lightness of hand, poured a thick shower of arrows on that subduer of his enemies.

19. That afternoon, O mighty sovereign a dreadful battle was fought on the field between Bhurisravas alone on side and many united together on the other.

20. O monarch, they then covered that single-handed foremost of car-warriors with an arrowy downpour, like rain clouds drenching a mighty cliff in the rainy season.

21. But that mighty car-warrior cut down those numerous shafts discharged by them,—shafts, which resembled the mace of Death or the thunder-bolt itself in their noise,—even before they could reach him.

22—23. Those ten warriors then completely surrounding that mighty-armed hero, strove to slay him. But, O Bharata, Somadatta's son, inflamed with wrath, cutting off their bows, severed their heads in that conflict with arrows of diverse descriptions. Thus slain, they fell down on the ground like trees crushed by the thunderbolt.

24. Beholding those mighty sons of his slain in battle, that hero of the Vrishni race namely Satyaki, rushed against Bhurisravas, O king, thundering out of his war-cry.

25. Those two heroes both endued with great prowess, then made their cars collide against one another; and in that conflict slaying the steeds of one another's chariot,

26. And thus deprived of the use of their respective chariots, those two mighty, powerful heroes, jumping down on the ground, rushed against one another, whirling mighty swords and bucklers.

27. Then those two foremost of men thus standing prepared for the encounter, appeared exceedingly beautiful. Thereafter approaching Satyaki who was armed with a sword of best make,

28—30. Bhimsena, O monarch, hastily took him up on his chariot. Your son also, O king, in that conflict, speedily took up Bhurisravas on his car before the very eyes of all the assembled bowmen. When thus the battle raged, the son of Pandu (Arjuna), inflamed with wrath began to fight with that mighty car-warrior viz, Bhisma, O foremost of the Bharatas. When then the orb of the day assumed a crimson hue, Dhananjaya displaying great activity,

31. Slew twenty-five thousand mighty car-warriors of the hostile host. These warriors, being commanded by Duryodhana to slay the son of Pritha,

32. Approaching him met with their destruction, like insects burning on fire. Thereupon the Matsyas and the Kekyas all accomplished in the science of bowmanship,

33. Surrounded the mighty car-warrior Arjuna along with his son. At that moment the sun having gone down below the horizon,

34—35. All the warriors were overwhelmed with confusion. Then your Sire Devavrata whose steeds were completly exhausted, O mighty sovereign, caused the withdrawal of the forces. After that (fierce) encounter beteen the Kurus and the Pandavas,

36. The troops, overwhelmed as they were with great apprehension, retired to their respective encampments. Thereafter repairing to their respective camps, O Bharata, the Pandavas along with the Srinjayas, as also the Kurus, duly rested (for the night).

Thus ends the seventy-fourth chapter, the end of the fifth day's fight, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXV.

(BHISMABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then O monach, when the night had worn away, the Kurus and the Pandavas, having duly rested, again marched forth for battle.

2. Then O Bharata, a loud clangour arose there, as mighty car-warriors prepared themselves for battle, as tuskers were equipt for the coming conflict,

3. As the foot-soldiers donned their coats of mail, and as steeds were furnished with trappings &c. Then O Bharata, on all sides was heard tremendous sound of drums and blare of conchs.

4. Thereafter king Yudhisthira addressing Dhristadyumna said :—"Arrange, O mighty-armed hero, the troops in the the Makara array that is calculated to extirpate the enemy."

5. Thus spoken to by the son of Pritha (Yudhisthira), that mighty car-warrior Dhristadyumna, O sovereign, proclaimed that order among the car-warriors (for forming the Makara array).

6. King Drupada and the Pandava Dhananjaya formed its head. Sahadeva along with the mighty car-warriors Nakula constituted its two eyes.

7. Bhimasena endued with great strength, O king, formed its beak. The son of Subhadra, the sons of Drupadi, the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha,

8. Satyaki and the very virtuous king Yudhistfiira were stationed on the neck of that array. Virata, the leader of a division, O monarch, formed its back.

9. The five Kekaya brothers, united with Dhristadyumna and supported by a mighty division, stationed themselves on its left wing.

10. Dhristaketu the foremost of men and Chekitana endued with prowess, stationing themselves on the right wing, prepared themselves for the defence of array.

11. O might monarch, at the feet of of that array were stationed the ever-properous and mighty car-warriors namely the Kuntivoja, and Satanika supported by a large division.

12. The fierce bowman Sikhandin, of great prowess being surrounded by the Somakas, together with Iravan, was stationed in the tail of that arrray.

13. Thus O Bharata, disposing their troops in this array, the Pandavas, O mighty monarch, donning their mails and desirous of battle, at sunrise,

14. Rushed against the Kouravas with impetuosity, supported by their elephant-warriors, car-warriors, cavalry and infantry as also with their standard, and umbrellas, and effulgent and shining weapons upraised.

15. Beholding the troops of the Pandavas thus disposed of, your sire Devavrata O king, arranged his trooqs in a counter-array figuring a huge crane.

16. In its beak was placed that mighty bowman the son of Bharadwaja; and O ruler of men, Aswatthaman and Kripa formed its two eyes.

17. Kritavarman the foremost of all bowman together with the king of the Kamvojas and with the Valhikas, was, O foremost of men, placed in the head of that array.

18. Surasena and your son Duryadhana, O Bharata, surrounded by numerous kings, was stationed in its neck, O mighty sovereign.

19. The ruler of the Pragjyotisas, united with the Madras, the Souviras and the Kekayas, and supported by a large division, was, O foremost of men, placed in its breast.

20. Susarman, the ruler of Prasthala, clad in mail, and supported by his own division, stationing himself in its left wing, stood ready for battle.

21. The Tasaras, the Yavanas, the Sakas, together with the Chulikas, placing themselves in the right wing of that array prepared for battle, O Bharata.

22. Srutayush and Satayush and the som of Somadatta, O Sire, supporting one another, stood in the rear of that array.

23. Then the Pandavas rushed to batte with the Kurus. At sun rise, O mighty monarch, the engagement commenced.

24. Elephants rushed against car-warriors and car-warriors proceeded against elephants. Horse-soldiers rushed against horse-soldiers, and car-warriors also advanced towards horse-soldiers.

25. Horse-soldiers, O king, also rushed against horses and elephants in that dreadful fight; as also, O king, elephant-riders proceeded against elephant-riders and cavalry.

26. Car-warriors encountered foot-soldiers, and cavalry-soldiers also engaged with the infantry. Thus, O king, excited with wrath, they rushed against one another in that battle.

27. The army of the Pandavas, defended by Bhimasena, Arjuna, and the twins Nakula and Sahadeva, as also by other mighty car-warriors, appeared beautiful like the sky bespangled with stars in a dark night.

28. So also, your troops, O king, with Bhisma, Drona, Kripa, Salya, Duryodhana and others, appeared beautiful like the firmament covered with the planets.

29. Bhimasena the son of Kunti, endued with great prowess, beholding Drona, rushed against the division of Bharadwja's son, being borne by fleetest steeds.

30. The highly powerful Drona, waxing wroth, in that battle, O monarch, pierced Bhisma with nine shafts made of iron, directiug them towards his vital parts.

31. Thus wounded sore in that battle by the son of Bharadwaja, Bhima dispatched the latter's charioteer to the regions of the of Death.

32. Then that son of Bharadwaja endued with prowess, himself holding the reins of his steeds, began to consume the Pandava host like fire consuming a heap of cotton.

33. Thus slaughtered by Bhisma and Drona, O foremost men, the Srinjayas with the Kekayas took to their heels.

34. So also your soldiers, mangled by Bhima and Arjuna, were deprived of their senses even where they stood, like an excellent damsel fainting away in consequence of wounded pride.

35. In that battle, in which many excellent heroes lost their lives, the array of your soldiers as well as that of the Pandavas was shattered and broken; and O Bharata, great distress overwhelmed the two armies.

36. Then, O Bharata, we beheld a delightful sight, when your warriors fought with the enemy, both inspired with a singleness of purpose.

37. In that battle, O lord of men, the Pandavas and the Kouravas, fought with one another hurling weapons at one another.

Thus ends the seventy-fifth chapter, the commencement of the sixth day's fight, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXVI.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. Our army is endued with many excellent attributes and composed of various kinds of troops, and its efficiency is great. O Sanjaya it is disposed of in perfect accordance to the rules of the military science; so it should to be ever crowned with success.

2. The warriors therein are very much devoted to our interests, and are ever attached to us. They are disciplined and free from the vices of lust and anger. Their prowess has been tested before.

3. They are neither very old nor very young; they are neither lean nor very corpulent. They are of active habits, well-built, strong-bodied, and free from any disease.

4. They are clad in coats of mail and well-furnished with offensive weapons; they are accomhlished in the use of all kinds of weapons, and are masters in fighting with swords, with maces and even with bare arms.

5. They are well-practised in the use of lances, sabres, darts, iron bludgeons, short shafts, javelins and mallets.

6. They are well-discipline d in the excer cise of all kinds of weapons, and are experts in mounting on and descending from vehicles, in moving forward and in falling back,

7. In striking down effectually, in marching forward, and in retreating back; they have been examined in the management of steeds, elephants, and chariots.

8. Being duly tested? they have been employed on pay and not for the sake of family-relationship,

9. Nor for the sake of friendship, nor for connections through marriage and birth. They are all honourable and prosperous; and all their relatives have been honoured and well-treated by ourselves.

10—12. We have done many good services to them; they are also all illustrious men, possesssd of great intelligence. They are again defended, O son, by many best of men endued with great lightness, of great achievements, of world-wide renown and resembling the Protectors of the worlds themselves; they are protected by numerous Kshatriyas esteemed throughout the earth, who have, out of their own accord, taken our side with their followers and forces. Truly our army is like the vast ocean swelling with the waters of various streams flowing into it from all sides.

13. Our army teems with chariots, which though destitute of wings are capable of moving like the winged rangers of the sky; it abounds also in elephants. Myriads of fierce warriors constitute the waters of that ocean and the various vehicles constitute its numerous waves.

14. Innumerable maces, darts, arrows and lances form the oars plied on it. It abounds in standards and ornaments, and is full of cloths of gold embossed with gems.

15. The running vehicles constitute the wind that lashes that ocean into fury. It really resembles the extensive and shoreless sea roaring (in fury).

16. That army of ours is again protected by Drona and Bhisma; so also it is defended by Kritavarman, Kripa and Dussasana, and by others headed by Jayadratha,

17. By Bhagadatta and Vikarna, by the son of Drona, by Souvala and by the ruler of the Valhikas. Thus protected by many foremost of men, all endued with strength and possessed of generous souls,

18–19. If that army be still slaughtered in battle, it is indeed due to predestined Fate. Neither man, nor illustrious and ancient sages, O Sanjaya, ever saw on earth such extensive preparations for battle. That such a large army well-supplied with the implements and sinews of war,

20. Should be slain in battle, alas, what can it be due to but Destiny? All this appears to be unnatural, O Sanjaya.

21. Vidura had often advised what would have been beneficial and profitable; but my wicked son Duryodhana would not accept his counsel.

22. I think the prophetic and high-souled Vidura had foreseen all that is happening at present; and hence his thought was so.

23. Or it may be, O Sanjaya, that all this had been predestined by the Creator; and what is pre-ordained by Him must happen as ordained and can not be otherwise.

Thus ends the seventy-sixth chapter, the thoughts of Dhritarastra, in the Bhismabadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1—2. Through your own wickedness, O monarch, have you been overwhelmed with this calamity. Those faults, O foremost of the Bharatas, in that sinful conduct towards the Pandavas, of which you were cognisant, O king, were not descried by Duryodhana. It was through your fault, O ruler of men, that the game at dice was played in days past;

3. And it is through your fault also that this battle with the Pandavas has been brought about. Do you now reap the fruit of that sin which you have already committed.

4. One reaps the fruits of actions done by himself; so, O monarch, do you reap here and hereinafter the fruits of your own actions.

5. O monarch, though overwhelmed with this calamity, be still patient, and listen to the account of the battle as it happened, as I, O sire, go on recounting it.

6. Having shattered the ranks of your mighty army with his well-sharpened shafts Bhimasena, endued with heroism, encountered all the younger brothers of Duryodhana.

7. Duryodhana, Durvisaha, Dussaha, Durmada, Jaya, Jayasena, Vikarna, Chitrasena, Sudarsana,

8—9. Charuchitra, Suvarman, Duskarma, and Karna—beholding these and many other mighty car-warriors of the Dhartarastras near enough to himself, all excited with wrath, Bhimasena, endued with great strength, in that battle penetrated into the ranks of your mighty army protected by Bhisma himself.

10. Then seeing him standing amongst them, all those kings said :—'Let us torture this one till he is deprived of his life.'

11. Then that son of Pritha (Bhima), encompassed by those brothers of his, all resolved (to slay him), appeared like the sun surrounded by the unpropitious planets at the time of the world's annihilation.

12. Though then the son of Pandu (Bhima) was in the very heart of the Kaurava array, fear did not overwhelm him as it did not overwhelm Indra in the midst of the Danava host during the fight, in days of old, between the Asuras and the celestials.

13. Then hundreds and thousands of car-warriors furnished with all kinds of weapons, all ready for the battle, assailed his single self with dreadful arrows.

14. Thereat the heroic Bhima, unmindful of the sons of Dhritarastra, slew in that battle many foremost (hostile) warriors, including elephant-riders, cavalry-soldiers, car-warriors and others.

15. And knowing the intention of those cousins of his who were all resolved to slay him, Bhimasena, possessed of great strength determined, O king, to slay them all.

16. Thereafter, leaving aside his car and grasping his mace, that son of Pandu (Bhima) began to smite down that ocean-like host belonging to the sons of Dhritarastra.

17. When Bhimasena had thus broken the Kaurava host, Dhristadyumna the son of Prisata, abandoning Drona hied there where Suvala's son was.

18. That foremost of men, checking the mighty army of your sons, approached, in that battle, the car of Bhima left empty by himself.

19. Seeing, in that conflict, Visoka the charioteer of Bhimasena, Dhristadyumna, O mighty monarch, became depressed in mind and was deprived of his senses.

20. Overwhelmed with grief, his voice choked up with tears and breathing heavily, he questioned Visoka saying :—"Where is Bhimasena, dearer to me than my own life?"

21. Thereupon, folding his palm, Visoka thus replied to Dhristadyumna saying :—"Leaving me here, the mighty son of Pandu (Bhima), possessed of great strength,

22. Has, alone and unsupported, entered into the ocean-like host of the sons of Dhritarastra. He said to me, O foremost of men, these cheerful words.

23. 'Wait for me, O charioteer, restraining the steeds for a moment only, until I slay these that are resolved to destroy me.'

24. Beholding then the highly powerful Bhima running mace in hand, all the car-warriors were transported with joy.

25. And when that awful and general engagement raged, O monarch, your friend, breaking through the hostile ranks, penetrated into it."

26. Listening to these words of Visoka, Dhristadyumna the son of Prisata, possessed of great strength, replied to the charioteer on the field of battle saying:—

27. 'If to-day, discarding my affection for the Pandavas, I am to abandon Bhimasena in the fight, what need have I then of my very life?'

28. What will the Kshastriyas say of me if I return without Bhima, (from the field of battle)? What will they say of me when they will hear that Bhima alone entered into the hostile ranks though I was there to help him in the conflict?

29. The gods headed by Sakra himself visit him with evil, who abandoning his supporters in battle, returns home unscathed.

30. Moreover that highly powerful Bhima is my friend and relative. He is devoted to to me, and I cherish a great devotion for that slayer of foes.

31. I shall therefore penetrate there where Vrikodara has already gone. See me slay the foes like Vasava slaying the Danavas."

32. Having thus spoken, that hero, O Bharata, advanced through the centre of the hostile ranks following the track (opened and) marked by Bhima with the elephants crushed by his mace.

33. Then he (Dhristadyumna) beheld Bhima consuming the troops of the enemy and crushing, in the conflict, many kings, like so many trees.

34. The car-warriors, the cavalry-soldiers, the foot-soldiers and the tuskers, being thus slaughtered in the fight, began to utter loud distressful cries.

35. Cries of 'Oh' and 'Alas', O sire, arose from the ranks of your soldiers, as they were slaughtered by the accomplished Bhima versed in diverse modes of warfare.

36. Thereafter they (the Kaurava combatants) exercised in all sorts of weapons, surrounding Vrikodara, began fearlessly to pour a shower of weapons on him from all sides.

37. Then that highly powerful son of Prisata, beheld that foremost of all wielders of weapons, that hero of world-wide fame, that son of Pandu, viz., Bhimasena, charged on all sides by the serried and mighty ranks of the enemy ;

38. And approaching Bhimasena, the son of Prisata comforted him whose body was mangled with shaft-cuts, who was treading on foot and vomitting the poison of his anger and who was wielding his mace like the Destroyer himself at the time of the universal annihilation.

39. That high-souled hero (Dhristadyumna) quickly plucked off the arrows from Bhima's body, and took him up on his car ; and embracing the latter warmly, the former comforted him even in the very midst of the enemy.

40. Thereat, in that conflict, your son, approaching his brothers, quickly said to them. "This wicked-souled son of Drupada has now joined Bhimasena.

41. We shall proceed against him in close array in order to slay him, even before he, our enemy, challenges us to fight." Hearing these words, the sons of Dhritarastra, urged on by the command of their elder brother and unable to put up with the foe,

42. With uplifted weapons fell to slaughter him (Dhristadyumna), like so many dreadful comets falling down at the hour of destruction at the end of a Yuga. Grasping beautiful bows and shaking the earth with the twang of their bows and the rattle of their car-wheels, those heroes,

43. Showered arrows on the son of Drupada, like the clouds showering rain on mountain breasts. But the latter, accomplished in various modes of warfare, though thus wounded with keen-pointed shafts did not flinch.

44—45. On the other hand, O king, highly inflamed with rage against your sons, like Indra against the Asuras, that mighty car-warrior, the youthful son of Drupada, beholding your heroic sons stay before him in battle and exert their best for slaying him, placed on his bow-string the fierce dart called Pramohana, with a view to slay them all. Then those heroic warriors, having their senses and mind confounded by being struck with the Paramohana weapon lost all consciousness.

46. Seeing those sons of yours overwhelmed with a swoon and deprived of their senses, like those whose hour has come, the Kaurava troops fled in all directions, with their steeds, elephants and chariots.

47. Meanwhile, Drona, that foremost of all wielders of weapons, encountering Drupada, pierced him with three fierce arrows.

48. Thus, O king, wounded sore by Drona, that ruler of men, Drupada, fled from the field of battle, remembering his former enmity (with Bharadwaja's son).

49. Thereupon, the highly powerful Drona, having vanquished Drupada, sounded his conch. Hearing the blare of his conch, all the Somakas were struck with terror.

50. Then Drona, endued with great energy,that foremost of wielders of weapons, heard that your sons had been deprived of their senses in battle through the influence of the Pramohana weapon.

51. Thereupon, desirous of rescuing the princes, Drona hastily left that part of the field where he was (and went where your sons were) ; there, that mighty bowman possessed of great prowess,namely the son of Bharadwajá, beheld

52. Dhristadyumna and Bhima career through that dreadful field ; and that mighty car-warrior likewise beheld your sons overwhelmed with a swoon.

53. Thereupon, he fixed on his bowstring the weapon known as Prajnana (capable of imparting consciousness) and therewith cut off the Pramohana weapon. Then your sons, those mighty car-warriors, regained their senses.

54. Thereupon, desirous of battle, they again encountered Bhima and the son of Prisata in battle. Then king Yudhisthira summoning his troops addressed them saying:—

55. "Let twelve heroic car-warriors headed by Subhadra's son, protected with coats of mail,proceed following, to the best of their abilities, the track of Bhima and the son of Pri·a·a.

56—58. Let intelligence be brought (of those two heroes). My mind is not unmisgiving." Thus commanded, the five Kekaya princes, the sons of Draupadi, and the highly powerful Dhristaketu, all powerful warriors, endued with heroism and proud of their manliness, saying 'yea' (to the words of Yudhisthira) marched forward when the sun had reached the meridian, placing Abhimanyu at their head and being supported by a mighty division of troops.

59. Those grinders of foes forming their troops in the array known as Suchimukha, penetrated, in that battle, into that car-division of the sons of Dhritarastra.

60—61. Your troops, O ruler of men, struck with the fear of Bhimasena and deprived of their senses by Dhristadyumna, were not able to bear the charge of those fierce bowmen headed by Abhimanyu as the rushed, like a lady in the streets deprived of her consciousness by a swoon.

62. Desirous of rescuing Dhristadyumna and Vrikodara,those fierce bowmen ownings standards decked with glod, approached the former breaking through the hostile ranks.

63. Those two heroes viz Vrikodara and Dhristadyumna himself, became filled with delight, and fell (with increased ardour) to slaughter your troops.

64. Then the prince of the Panchalas, the heroic of son of Prisata, beholding his own preceptor suddenly make towards himself, disisted from compassing the death of your sons.

65. Then placing Vrikodara on the car of the Kekaya king he, inflamed with rage, rushed against Drona who was accomplished in the use of arrows and all other kinds of weapons.

66. Then the highly-powerful son of Bharadwaja, that grinder of foes, excited with wrath severed, with a broad-head shaft, the bow of Dhristadyumna as the latter rushed against him with impetuousity.

67. Bearing in mind the broad he had eaten of his master king Duryodhana and desirous of encompassing his good, he (Drona) directed hundreds of other various shafts towards the son of Prisata.

68. Thereafter, grasping another bow, that slayer of hostile heroes, namely the son of Prisata, pierced Drona with seventy shafts all furnished with golden wings and whetted on stone.

69—70. Then again Drona, that grinder of foes, cut down Dhristadyumna's bow; and his four steeds he despatched to the dreadful abode of Death with four excellent arrows; and, O Bharata, Drona also despatched to Death Dhristadyumna's charioteer with a broad-headed shaft.

71. Thereupon that mighty car-warrior, Dhristadyumna, possessed of long arms, speedily jumping down from his chariot of which the steeds were slain, mounted on the excellent car of Abhimanyu.

72. Then the Pandava host, consisting of chariots, elephants and steeds, began to quake with the fear (of Drona), even before the very eyes of Bhimasena and the intelligent son of Prisata.

73. Beholding their array thus shattered by Drona of immeasurable prowess, all those mighty car-warriors were not able to check the former.

74. That army, then thus slaughtered by Drona with his keen-pointed arrows, began to whirl about, like the agitated sea, on the field of battle.

75. Beholding the hostile troops in that plight, your warriors were filled with delight; and also beholding the aged preceptor consume the hostile array on all sides, O Bharata, the warriors sent up loud exclamations of "well-done" "well-done."

Thus ends the seventy-seventh chapter the prowess of Drona, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

(BHISMABADHA PARVA).—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thereafter king Duryodhana, having regained his senses, once more opposed the invincible Bhima with a shower of arrows.

2. Once more uniting together, your sons, all mighty car-warriors, encountering Bhima in battle, began to fight with him in all earnestness.

3. The mighty-armed Bhimasena also approaching his chariot mounted on it, and proceeded to that part of the field where your sons were.

4. Taking up a woundefully tough bow, endued with great energy, capable of nepriving the enemy of his life, and diversely varigated, he (Bhima) began to pierce your sons with innumerable shafts in that battle.

5. Then king Duryodhana sortly wounded the mighty Bhima in his very vital parts with a Naracha of exceeding sharpness.

6. Thus deeply pierced by your son, that fierce bow-man, with eyes red in rage and out of fury drawing his bow-string fiercely,

7. Pierced Duryodhana on this two arms and breast, with three arrows; but O king, thus struck the latter wavered not,like a monarch of mountains.

8. Beholding those two enraged heroes strike one another in battle, the younger brothers of Duryodhana, all of whom were ready to lay down lives their in battle,

9. Bearing in mind their pre-concerted plan of afflicting Bhima of fierce deeds, began with an earnest determination, to strike him(from all sides).

10. Then the highly powerful Bhima beholding them make towards himself in battle, O monarch, rushed against them like an elephant encountering his compeers.

11. Then excited to fury, that hero endued with great fame and energy, afflicted your son Chitrasena, O monarch, with a long shaft.

12. Then in that conflict, O king, the discendant of the Bharata race smote your other sons with diverse kinds of arrows furnished with golden wings and charged with great impetus.

13. Then those twelve mighty car-warriors including Abhimanyu and others, arranging their troops in proper order,

14. And being despatched by the very virtuous king Yudhisthira to follow behind Bhima, encountered, O mighty monarch, your princely sons, all excellent car-warriors.

15. Beholding those warriors on their chariots resemble the sun or the fire itself in effulgence, beholding all those fierce bow-men of burning effulgence and exceeding beauty,

16. Shine resplendent in that conflict being decorated with diadems of gold—your sons all endued with great strength abandoned fighting with Bhima. But the son of Kunti was unable to brook the sight of their leaving the combat alive.

Thus ends the seventy-eighth chapter, the prowess of Bhima, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXIX.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then Abhimanyu accompanied by Bhimasena, once more running after them, afflicted your sons in battle.

2—3. Thereupon their mighty car-warriors of your army including Duryodhana and others, seeing Abhimanyu and Bhimasena joined with the son of Prisata in the midst of their own troops, grasped their bows and carried along by fleet steeds, rushed to the place where those heroes were stationed. Then, in that afternoon O monarch, there ensued a terrible fight,

4. Between the mighty warriors of your army and those of the enemy, O Bharata. Then Abhimanyu, slaying the steeds of Vikarna in that terrible conflict,

5. Pierced the latter with twenty-five short shafts ; then that mighty car-warrior Vikarna, leaving his chariot of which the steeds were slain,

6. Ascended, O king, the resplendent car of Chitrasena ; them thus seated on the same chariot, namely those two brothers, the perpatuator of Kuru's race,

7—9. The son of Arjuna, O Bharata, covered with a shower of arrows. Then Durjaya and Vikarna pierced the nephew of Krishna with five shafts made entirely of iron. But the nephew of Krishna moved not in the least, and remained firm like the immovable Meru. In that conflict, O sire, Dussasana fought with the five Kekaya brothers ; O mighty monarch, the battle that raged between them was indeed very wonderful. The sons of Droupadi, excited with rage, in that battle, checked Duryodhana,

10—11. Your son ; and O monarch, every one them pierced him with three shafts each. Your invincible son, O monarch, in that conflict, pierced the sons of Droupadi separately with arrows of exceeding sharpness. Pierced with their arrows in return and bespattered with blood, he (Duryodhana) appeared highly beautiful,

12—14. Like a mountain washed with spring-watter mixed with red chalk. The highly powerful Bhisma also, O king, in that battle began to afflict the Pandava host like a herdsman belabouring his herd (with his cudgel). Thereupon, O ruler of men, the twang of Partha's Gandiva was heard, when he was engaged in slaughtering the right wing of your army. In that battle, headless trunks stood up by thousands,

15-16. In the host of the Kurus as well as in that of the Pandavas. O Bharata that ocean of troops of which blood formed the waters, the arrows the eddies, the elephants the islands, and the steeds the fishes, that ocean was crossed by those foremost of men on their chariots that served the purpose of boats. Many foremost warriors, with arms severed, armours shattered, and bodies mangled,

17. Were seen lying prostrate there, by hundreds and by thonsands. With the carcasses of infuriate elephants slain and bespattered with blood,

18. The field of battle, O foremost of the Bharatas, appeared beautiful as if strewn with hillocks. The wonderful sight that we beheld, O Bharata, was, that among your as well as their army,

19. There was no man who was not inflamed with a desire for battle. Thus did those heroic warriors of your army fight on with those of the Pandavas, desiring great renown and ardently longing for securing victory in battle.

Thus ends the seventy-ninth chapter, the fierce fight, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXX.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then when the sun assumed a crimson hue, king Duryodhana, ardently longing for battle, rushed towards Bhima, out of a desire for slaying him.

2. Beholding that best of human heroes, that most implacable enemy of his, make towards himself Bhimasena, excited to the highest pitch of wrath, said these words :—

3. 'The hour has come that I have been looking forward to so anxiously for all these years. To-day I will slay you, if indeed you you do not abandon fighting.

4. Slaying you, I will this day soothe the sorrows of Kunti, and also those of Droupadi; to-day will I avenge the woes that we did suffer during our exile in the woods.

5. O son of Gandhari, inflated with pride in days past, you disregarded the sons of Pandu. Reap now the dire fruit of that act of yours.

6. Acting upon the counsel of Karna and of the son of Suvala, and thoroughly desregarding the Pandavas, you formerly treated the latter as it had pleased you.

7. You also despised the descendant of the Dasarhas (Krishna) when he begged you (for peace). Filled with joy, you sent Uluka to us with your messages.

8. For all these act of yours, I will, this day, slay you with all your relations, and will avenge all those wrongs you did formerly inflict on us."

9. Having spoken these words, and bending and repeatedly stretching his bow and taking up terrible arrows that resembled the thunder-bolt itself in effulgence, Bhima,

10. Excited with rage, quickly shot at Suyodhana thirty-six arrows resembling the flames of a blazing fire, looking like the thunderbolt and coursing straight through the air.

11. Thereafter he struck Duryodhana's bow with two arrows, his charioteer with another two; and with four others, he despatched the latter's fleet steeds to the abode of Death.

12. Then that grinder of foes, with two other arrows drawn a long way back at the time of being discharged, cut down, in that conflict, the umbrella of the king from his excellent car.

13. With three more arrows he cut down the excellent standard that was indeed blazing. Having severed it, he uttered a loud roar even before the very eyes of your son.

14. And that beautiful standard, decked with diverse kinds of gems, suddenly fell down on the ground from the chariot, like lighting from the clouds shooting down on the earth.

15. And all the rulers of men then beheld that blazing and propitious standard of the Kuru king, effulgent like the sun, bearing the device of an elephant and embossed with gems, fall down, (served by Bhima).

16. Then the mighty car-warrior Bhima, as if smiling, struck Duryodhana with ten shafts, in that battle, like an elephant-rider piercing the huge animal with the hook.

17. Thereupon the king of the Sindhus, that foremost of car-warriors, that highly powerful one, stationed himself on the flank of Duryodhana, being supported by many excellent warriors.

18. Then that foremost of car-warrior, namely Kripa took upon his own car, O king, the vindictive Duryodhana, that descendant of the Kuru race, endued with immeasurable energy.

19. Then in that conflict, king Duryodhana, pierced deep and afflicted sore by Bhimasena, squatted down on the terrace of his car.

20. Thereafter king Jayadratha, desirous of slaying Bhima, surrounded him on all sides with thousands of chariots, and warriors, and thus intercepted him.

21. Thereupon, O king, Dhristaketu, and Abhimanyu endued with prowess, the Kekayas, and the sons of Draupadi, engaged with your sons.

22. The high-souled Abhimanyu quickly struck them all piercing each with five shafts,

23.—24. Resembling the thnnder-bolt itself or the mace of Death, shot from his beautiful bow. Thereupon all of them, unable fo bear it, showered an arrowy down pour on that excellent car-warrior namely Subhadra's son, like clouds showering rain on the Meru mountain. Thus afflicted in the battle, that hero, accomplished in the use of weapons, and invincible in fight,

25. Namely, Abhimanayu, O king, made your warriors tremble, like the wielder of the thuder-bolt making the Asuras tremble in the war between them and the celestials.

26. Thereafter, O Bharata, that foremost of car-warrior, hurled at Vikarna fourteen mortal broad-headed shafts that looked like snakes of most virulent venom.

27. Possessed of great prowess, and as if dancing in battle, with those shafts he cut down the standard of Vikarna from this car and also slew his charioteer and steeds.

28. Again that mighty car-warrior viz the son of Subhadra shot at Vikarna other arrows, well-tempered, keen-pointed and straight-coursing.

29. Those arrows decked with the feathers of the Kanka bird, coming upon Vikarna and passing through his body stuck on the ground like so many hissing snakes.

30. Those arrows, with wings and points decorated with gold, and bathed in the blood of Vikarna, and stuck on the earth, appeared to the vomit-blood.

31. Beholding Vikarna thus penetrated through and through, his other uterine brothers, rushed in that conffict against those warriors who were headed by the son of Subhadra.

32. When those warriors formidable in battle riding on their own chariots quickly came upon the combatants of the Pandavas army seated on their cars tike so many effulgent suns, they began to pierce one another in that battle.

33. Then Durmukha piercing Srutakarman with five swift-coursing arrows cut down the latter's standard with a single arrow, and pierced his charioteer also with seven others.

34. Advancing closer, with six arrows he piereed Srutakarman's steeds caparisoned with a net-work of gold and fleet as the wind itself; he also felled the latters charioteer.

35. Thereupou standing on that chariot of his of which the steeds were slain, that mighty car-warrior Srutakarman, excited to the highest pitch of fury, hurled a great dart blazing like a fierce meteor.

36. That very resplendent dart charged with great energy, penetrating through the massive armour of the renowned Durmukha, and shattering it, stuck itself on the ground.

37. Thereupon Sutosoma, possessed of great prowess, beholding Srutakarman dedeprived of his chariot, took him up on his car even before the very eyes of the assembled host.

38. Thereafter, O monarch, Srutakirti possessed of heroism, rushed, in that battle, against yonr illustrious son Jayatsena, out of a desire for slaying him.

39—40. Then in that conflict. O monarch, yonr son Jayatsena, with a sharp-edged Kshurapra (horse-shoe-headed shaft), as if smiling, cut off the bow of that high-souled warrior, namely Srutakirti, O Bharata, as the latter came repeatedly stretching it. Thereupon Satanika seeing his uterine brother deprived of his bow,

41. Endued as he was with great energy, quickly rushed to the spot, every moment uttering rors resembling those of a lion. Then in that conflict stretching his bow with a strong hand, Satanika,

42. With great lightness of hands, pierced Jayatsena with ten sharp arrows and then uttered a loud roar like that of an elephant in rut.

43. Then again with another sharp arrow capable of penetrating through all kinds of mail, Satanika deeply pierced Jayatsena on the breast.

44. At this crisis, Duskarna, who was near his brother, overwhelmed with wrath cut off the bow and arrows of the son of Nakula (Satanika)

45. Thereat, grasping another bow of excellent make and capable of bearing great strain, the highly powerful Satakina fixed on the bow-string shafts of exceeding sharpness.

46. Then he (Satanika) challenged Duskarna, before his brothers,saying 'Wait' "Wait," and then he discharged at him those keen-pointed arrows that resembled so many blazing snakes.

47. Then the former cut off the latter's bow with a single shaft; and pierced his charioteer with two shafts; and, O sire, in that conflict the former also quickly pierced the latter with feathered shafts.

48. Thereafter that sinless warrior, with twelve shafts of great sharpness, pierced all the steeds of Duskarna,—steeds that we e flect as the mind and decked with gold trappings.

49. Then highly excited with rage, he in that conflict, deeply pierced Duskarna on the chest, with another broad-headed arrow well-directed and swift-coursing.

50. There at the latter fell down on the ground like a tree smitten by the thunderbolt. Beholding Duskarna slain, the five mighty car-warriors, O king,

51. Encompassed Satanika on all sides, out of a desire for slaying him; and they began to strike the illustrious Satanika with a showers of arrows.

52. Thereupon the five Kekaya princes excited with rage, rushed (to the rescue of Satanika). Beholding them advance, your sons all mighty car-warriors,

53. O mighty monarch, encountered them like so many elephants encountering their huge compeers. Durmukha, Durjaya, the youthful Durmarsana,

54. Satrunjaya and Satrusata,—all these illustrious warriors, proceeded, O king, in a body against the Kekaya brothers.

55. Riding on their chariots resembling (fortified) cities, to which were harnessed steed decked with precious caparisions and which were decorated wonderful streamers of variegated hue.

56. Those heroes, wielding excellent bows, owning finest armours and best standards, entered the hostile array like lions going from one forest to another.

57. Then between them and the foe, raged a fierce and dreadful combat in which cars and elephants got entangled together and in which the combatants (mercilessly) slew one another,

58. Out of a feeling of animosity, they fought the dreadful fight that lasted for a few moments only before sun-set, adding to the population of Death's kingdom,

59—60. Then car-warriors and cavalry-soldiers were strewn by thousand on the field of battle. Thereupon excited with wrath, the son of Santanu namely Bhisma, with straingt-knotted shafts, began to slay the troops of the high-souled Pandavas. With his arrows he also despatched to the regions of Death the troops belonging to the Panchala princes.

61. Thus, O king, having broken the ranks of the Pandava host, the grandsire withdrawing his forces, retired to his own encampment.

62. The very virtuous king Yudhisthira also, seeing Dhristadyumna and Vrikodara, smelt their heads, and with a delighted heart repaired to his camps.

Thus ends the eightieth chapter, the withdrawal of the forces after the sixth day's fight, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXI.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then, O mighty monarch, those heroes literally bespattered with blood, keeping alive their enmity for one another, retired to their respective tents.

2. Threafter having rested awhile, and having duly praised one another (for the feats achieved), they again were seen clad in coats of mail, standing desirous of battle.

3. Then, O monarch, your son Duryodhna, covered with stains of blood all over the body, and overwhelmed with anxious thought, from confidence, asked the grand-sire Bhishma saying :—

4. "Our troops are fierce and formidable and duly arranged; and they carry mighty standards; and yet those heroic and fleet host of car-warriors belonging to the Pandava army, penetrating and slaughtering and crushing,

5. And confouuding us all, has earned great fame in battle. I have also been wounded deeply by those dreadful shafts resembling the club of Death himself, that have been shot by Bhima, who broke through our Makara-array that was strong as the thunder-bolt itself.

6. Beholding Bhima, I have been, O sire, unmanned with fear; even now I can not regain the equilibrium of my mind. O you of never-failing aim, I desire, through your grace, to obtain victory and to slay the sons of Pandava."

7. Thus addressed by Duryodhana and knowing him to be possessed by great grief, that high-souled son of Ganga, that foremost of all wielders of weapons, endued with intelligence, smiling, replied to the former with a cheerless heart :—

8. "Breaking through the hostile ranks with the greatest exertions and with all my power, O prince, I wish to give you victory and joy. For your sake, I do never disemble.

9. These mighty car-warriors, who have sided with the Pandavas in this battle, are innumerable, formidable, all foremost heroes, endued with renown and accomplished in the use of weapons; they are indefatigable and seem to vomit forth the venom of their wrath in battle.

10 These heroes are not to be so easily vanquished; they entertain feelings of the bitterest hostility for you, and are morever swelling with their powers. Yet O monarch, I will, with all my soul, fight these heroes to the bitter end.

11. For your sake, O generous hero this day will I have no regard for my life in battle. For your sake, will I consume all the regions with their myriad celestials and Daityas, what to speak of your enemies?

12. I will encounter, O king, the Pandavas, and there by encompass all that is agreeable to you." Hearing these words, Duryodhana became inspired with confidence, and his heart swelled in joy.

13. Then with a delighted heart, he gave the word of command to the troops and all the assembled kings, saying' Proceed'. At his command the army consisting of chariots, steeds, foot-soldiers, and elephant-riders, began to advance (in battle array).

14. That extensive army of yours, O king, equipped with various sorts of implements of war, was filled with delight. O king, your army, teeming with elephant-riders, cavalry-soldiers and foot-soldiers, arranged in battle order, appeared exceedingly beautiful.

15. The division of tuskers composed of large numbers and goaded on by skilful riders, appeared charging from all sides of the field; and your troops were also formed into order by many princely warriors, accomplished in the use of offensive and defensive weapons.

16. A cloud of dust,—resembling in hue the rays of the rising sun and intercepting from the view the sun itself—that was raised by the divisions of cars, elephants, infantry and cavalry as they movedover the field in due order, appeared exceedingly beautiful.

17. Just as lightning, flashing amidst a mass of clouds in the firmament, appears beautiful, so the streamers of variegated hue mounted on cars and the backs of elephants, fluttering in the air and whirling along the welkin, appeared highly effulgent.

18. A dreadful and deafening din was created by monarchs stretching and twanging their bows,—din that resembled the roar of the ocean, when in the Satya era, it was churned by the hosts of celestials and Asuras.

19. At that moment, that army of your sons, uttering fierce war-cries, comprising in it combatants of diverse hues, looking so resplendent, and capable of slaughtering the enemy's host, appeared like the clan of clouds that are seen at the expiration of a Yuga.

Thus ends the eighty-first chapter, the colloquy between Bhisma and Duryodhana, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, the son of Ganga, seeing your son plunged in thought, once more addressed these delightful words to him.

2. "Myself, Drona, Salya, Kritavarman, of the Satwata race, Ashwathaman, Vikarna, Somadatta with the Shindhus,

3. And Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, and Valhika with the Valhikas, and the mighty king of the Trigarttas and the formidable sovereign of of the Magadhas,

4. Vrihadvala the ruler of the Kosalas Chitrasena, Vivingsati, with many thousand of car-warriors, decorated with tall standards,

5. And a large number of country-born steeds, O king, mounted with excellent horse soldiers, and innumerable huge elephants infuriate with shedding temporal juice from their temples and mouth,

6. And many heroic foot-soldiers accomplished in the use of various kinds of weapons, and born in various countries, are all prepared to fight for your sake.

7. These and many others, prepared to lay down their very lives for your sake, are I consider, capable of obtaining victory even over the gods in battle.

8. It is my bounden duty, O king, to tele always what will be for your good. The Pandavas are incapable of being vanquished even by the very gods led by Vasava himself.

9. They are supported by the son of Vasudeva himself in battle, and are endued with prowess equal to that of the great Indra himself. But, O foremost of kings, I will ever carry out your commands.

10. Either I will conquer the Pandavas in battle, or they will conquer me." Having thus spoken, Bhisma gave to Duryodhana the excellent herb called Visalya-Karanee, (that which kills all pain),

11—12. That most efficacious remedy for healing all wounds. Therewith your son cured himself of all his wounds. Then at the fair dawn, the most powerful Bhisma that foremost of men accomplished in the art of arraying troops, formed with his own troops, the array called Mandala, bristling with the glitter of various kinds of weapons.

13. The array teemed with excellent warriors, as also with tuskers and infantry and it was surrounded on all sides with many thousand cars,

14. And with large divisions of cavalry armed with scimitars and lances. Near every elephant were stationed seven car-warriors, and near every car were placed seven horsemen.

15. Behind every horsemen were stationed ten bowmen, and behind each bowman were placed seven foot-soldiers. Thus, O monarch, your troops urged by mighty and great car-warriors,

16. Stood ready for the fierce encounter being protected by Bhisma. Then a thousand horsemen, and as many tuskers,

17. And ten thousand chariots, along with your heroic sons, all accoutred in mail, headed by Chitrasena, supported the grandsire.

18. It was seen that as Bhisma was supported by those heroic warriors themselves endued with great strength and clad in mail, they were in their turn protected by the grandsire.

19. Duryodhana also, on that battle-field, occupying his car and clad in mail, and endued with all grace, looked beautiful like Indra himself in paradise.

20. Then, O Bharata, loud were the war cries uttered by your sons, and deafening was clatter of chariots and the sound of the musical instruments.

21. Then that mighty and impenetrable Mandala, array of those slayers of enemies viz the sons of Dhritarastra, formed by Bhishma himself, began to march forward facing the west.

22. Invulnerable in battle by the enemies, O monarch, that array appeared beautiful in every part. Then beholding that formidable Mandala, array,

23. King Yudhisthira himself formed his troops in the array known as Vajra. Thus when the troops were thus formed into battle array, and were stationed in proper ranks,

24. The car-warriors and cavalry soldiers uttered their war-cries (resembling leonine raors). Then, desirous of battle, fierce warriors began to leave their ranks,

25. And those heroes supported by their respective divisions, began to smite down one another. The son of Bharadwaja encountered the ruler of the Matsyas, and the son of Drona engaged Sikhandin.

26. King Duryodhana himself rushed against the son of Prisata; the twins Nakula and Sahadeva proceeded against the king of the Madras.

27. Vinda and Anuvinda from Avanti went against king Iravat. All the other monarchs engaged Dhananjaya in battle.

28—29. Putting forth all his exertions, Bhimasena checked the son of Hridika in battle. Endued with great prowess Arjuna's son, O king engaged in battle, your sons viz Chetrasena Vikarna, and Durmarsana. Against that fierce bow-man, viz the ruler of the Pragjyotisas, Hidimva, the ruler of the Rakshas, 30—31. Rushed with impetuosity, like an infuriate elephant meeting a compeer in the same state. Then O monarch, the Rakshasa Alamvusha excited with wrath rushed in that battle, against Satyaki invincible in battle surrounded though he was with his own division. Exerting himself well, Bhurisravas engaged in that conflict Dhristaketu.

32. Yudhisthira, the son of Dharma, engaged king Srutayusa; and in that battle Chekitana fought with Kripa.

33. The rest putting forth all their endeavours advanced against the mighty car-warrior Bhima. Thereafter thousands of monarchs surrounded Dhananjaya on all sides,

34. Wielding in their hands darts, lances arrows, maces, and bludgeons; thereat, highly enraged, Arjuna addressed the descendant of the Vrishini race (Krishna) saying :—

35. "Behold, O Madhava, the troops of the sons of Dhritarastra formed in battle array by the high-souled son of Ganga, who is versed in all the modes of forming soldiers in battle array.

36. Behold also, O Madhava, innumerable heroes all ardently longing for battle. Behold also, O Kesava, the king of the Trigarttas supported by his brothers.

37. Today, before your very eyes, I will O Janardana, slay all these, O foremost of the Yadus, who are desirous of fighting with me in the battle."

38. Having thus spoken, the son of Kunti, rubbing his bow-string poured an arrowy down-pour on those hosts of kings.

39. Those fierce bowmen also covered him in return with showers of shafts, just as clouds, in the season of rain, fill the tanks with showers of rain.

40. Then, O ruler of men, when in that great battle the two Krishnas were seen to be covered with fast-falling arrows, loud shouts of 'Oh!' 'Oh!' were heard in your troops.

41. The celestials, the divine sages, the Gandharvas, and the mighty reptiles, were all overwhelmed (with amazement beholding Krishna and Arjuna thus situated.

42. Thereafter waxing wroth, Arjuna invoked, O king, the weapon called Aindra ; then wonderful was the prowess that we beheld of Vijaya,

43. In as much as he baffled the thick shower of arrows discharged by his enemies with myriads of shafts shot by himself. There was none, O ruler of men, that was not wounded,

44. Among those thousands of kings, steeds and tuskers. The rest, O sire, the son Pritha pierced, each with two or three shafts.

45. While being thus slaughtered by the son of Pritha, they sought protection from the son of Santanu ; and then Bhisma became the rescuer of those warriors who resembled men sinking in the fathomless deep.

46. Then those flying and broken ranks of your army, moving and falling back upon the divisions of Bhima, created a great confusion in the latter ranks, like the raging tempest agitating the mighty main.

Thus ends the eighty-second chapter, the commencement of the seventh day's battle, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When the battle thus raged, when Susarman had turned away from the battle, when the high-souled son of Pandu (Arjuna) had broken your ranks,

2. When your army resembling the mighty main had been greatly agitated, and when the son of Ganga had swiftly advanced towards Vijaya,

3. King Duryodhana, beholding the prowess of the son of Pritha in that battle, hastily approaching all those kings thus addressed them all ;

4. Also, addressing the heroic Susarman endued with great strength, and stationed at their head, Duryodhana said these words, amidst all the soldiers, imparting delight to them all.

5. 'This Bhisma, this son of Santanu, this foremost of the Kurus, has resolved to fight with Dhananjaya, heedless of his very life and to the best of his abilities.

6. Do you all, putting forth all your energies in battle, and supported by your respective divisions, protect the grandsire of the Bharatas, as he rushes against the army of the enemy."

7. Saying 'yea,' all those divisions, led by foremost of kings, O mighty monarch, moved near the grandsire.

8. Thereupon the son of Santanu viz Bhisma, while thus advancing, suddenly encountered the mighty Arjuna of the Bharata race, coming towards himself,

9. Riding on his highly resplendent chariot that bore the standard marked with the emblem of the mighty ape, to which were yoked mighty white steeds, and that produced a clatter resembling the rumble of clouds.

10. Beholding the diadem-decked Dhananjaya rush to battle, all yonr troops, seized with panic, set up a dreadful uproar.

11. Beholding Krishna resembling another Aditya and holding the reins in his hands, look like the sun in the meridian, your soldiers were unable to fix their eyes on him.

12. So also the troops of the Pandavas were unable to gaze at Bhisma the son of Santanu, borne by white steeds, holding a white bow, and looking like the white planet (Sukra) rising in the skies.

18. He was also surrounded on all sides by the Trigarttas of high-soul, along with their brothers, sons, and many other car-warriors.

14. Meanwhile the son of Bharadwaja in that conflict, pierced the king of the Matsyas with one winged arrow ; and he cut down the bow and the standard of the latter with one shaft each.

15. Thereupon Virata the leader of a division leaving aside his severed bow, hastily grasped another of tougher make and capable of bearing great stsain,

16. As also, arrows of the shape of snakes of virulent poison, and resembling blazing serpents. In return, he pierced Drona with three shafts, his steeds with four,

17, His standard with one, and his charioteer with five. Virata also pierced the bow of Drona with one shaft. Thereupon that foremost of the regenerates, Drona, waxed irascible.

18. Thereafter with eight straight-knotted shafts, Drona slew Virata's steeds, and,

O foremost of the Bharatas, his charioteer also with one shaft furnished with wings.

19. Thereat that foremost of car-warriors viz, Virata, jumping down from his chariot, of which the driver and the steeds had been slain, swiftly ascended the car of Sankhya.

20. Then, the father and the son (Virata and Sankhya) riding on the same car, putting forth all their energies, endeavoured to check the son of Bharadwaja with a mighty shower of arrows.

21. Thereupon that highly-powerful son of Bharadwaja, waxing wroth, with great lightness (of hand) hurled, in that battle, a shaft resembling a snake of virulent venom, at Sankhya.

22. That arrow, penetrating through Sankhya's heart and drinking his life blood, struck on the ground with its body soaked in the crimson fluid.

23. Pierced by the shaft of Bharadwaja's son, Sankhya quickly dropped down from his car, loosing hold of his bow and arrows and before the very presence of his father.

24. Beholding his own son slain, Virata, fled out of fear, leaving Drona in battle who then looked like Death himself with yawning jaws.

25. Thereafter in that battle, the son of Bharadwaja, resisted, by hundreds and by thousands, the mighty army belonging to the sons of Pandu.

26. Sikhandin also, O mighty sovereign, encountering the son of Drona in the conflict, wounded him between the brows with three swift-coursing long shafts.

27. With those three arrows stuck on his fore-head, that foremost of men (Drona's son) appeared beautiful like the Meru mountain decked with three golden peaks towering high.

28--29. Thereupon waxing wroth, within half the time taken up by the wink, Ashwathaman cut off in that combat Shikhandin's charioteer, standard, horses and weapons covering them, O king, with innumerable arrows. Then that foremost of car warriors jumped down from the car of which, the steeds had been slain,

30. Grasping a whetted and effulgent sword and buckler. Then that afflicter of foes, namely Shikhan l'n, waxing wroth began to move about on the field of battle like a hawk.

31. As he (Sikhandin) whirled about on the field, O mighty monarch, Drona's son could not find any vulnerable point; and this seemed indeed very wanderful.

32. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, Drona's son inflamed with rage, sped, in that battle many thousands of shafts (against Sikhandin).

33. Then that foremost of those possessed of prowess (Sikhandin), cut off with his sharp-edged sword the dreadful shower of arrows that was falling fast upon him.

34. Thereafter the son of Drona cut off Sikhandin's glittering shield charming with a hundred moon; then in that battle he also shattered into pieces the latter's sword.

35—36. Then O monarch he (Drona's son) pierced Sikhandin with myriads of shafts furnished with wings. Thereat Sikhandin, whirling the fragment of his sword splintered by the arrows (of Drouni), hurled it at the latter, like a blazing serpent. Beholding that fragment of the sword that then resembled the all-destructive fire (at the end of a Yuga) come swiftly towards himself,

37. The son of Drona cut it off in the battle, displaying great lightness of hand; then also he pierced Sikhandin with many shafts made wholly of iron.

38. Thus wounded sore with sharp arrows, Sikhandin quickly ascended, O monarch, the car of the high-souled Satyaki, that scion of the dynasty of Madhu.

39. Then Satyaki, inflamed with wrath, in that conflict, covered, on all sides, the ruthless Rakshasas Alamvusha, with his dreadful arrows.

40. Thereat, O Bharata, that foremost of the Rakshasas cut off Satyai's bow with a crescent-shaped arrow in that combat, and pierced the latter with numerous arrows.

41. Spreading an illusion through his Rakshasa prowess, he covered Satyaki with an arrowy downpour. Then we did behold the wonderful prowess of the grandson of Sini,

42. In as much as though pierced in that battle, with those sharp arrows, he did not flinch in the least. Then that descendant of the Vrishni race placed on his bow-string the Aindra weapon,

43. Which that renowned scion of Madhus race had obtained from Vijaya himself. That weapon then reducing into ashes the Rakshasi illusion,

44. Poured a shower of dreadful shafts on Alamvusha from all sides, like clouds in the rainy season covering the mountain top with (thick showers of rain.)

45. Thus afflicted sore by that high-souled scion of Madhu's race, the Rakshasa fled out of fear, leaving Satyaki (victorious) on the field.

46. Then having vanquished that foremost of the Rakshasas who could not be vanquished even by Indra himself, the grandson of Sini uttered a loud roar, even before the very eyes of your warriors.

47. Then Satyaki of prowess incapable of being baffled, began to slaughter your warriors with many well-sharpened shafts; and afflicted with fear these latter began to break away.

48—49. Meanwhile, that mighty son of Drupada, namely, Dhristadyumna, O king, in that battle covered your son, the ruler of men, with innumerable straight-knotted shafts. Thus covered with the arrows shot by Dhristadyumna, O Bharata,

50. Your son, that lord of men, neither wavered nor was agitated with fear; on the other hand, he quickly pierced Dhristadyumna with arrows, in that conflict,

51. Numbering sixty (first) and thirty (next). All this seemed highly wonderful. Thereupon the generalissimo of the Pandavas, waxing wroth, O Bharata, cut off Duryodhana's bow.

52. Also that mighty car-warrior slew the four steeds of the latter in battle, and quickly pierced his person with seven shafts of exceeding sharpness.

53. Thereupon that mighty-armed Duryodhana endued with great strength jumping down from his car the steeds of which were slain, rushed on foot towards Prisata's son with sword uplifted.

54. At that moment the highly powerful Sakuni desirous of rescuing the king, approached the spot and placed the monarch on his car before the presence of all warriors.

55. Then vanquishing the Kuru king, Prisata's son that slayer of hostile heroes, began to slaughter your troops like the wielder of the thunderbolt slaying the Asuras.

56. Then in that battle, Kritavarman afflicted the mighty car-warrior Bhima, virtually covering the latter (with arrows), like masses of clouds covering the sun.

57. Thereupon that scorcher of foes' Bhimasena, waxing irascible and smiling the while, shot, in that combat, myriads of shafts towards Kritavarman.

58. Wounded with those arrows that Atiratha of the Satwata race swelling with all prowess, quaked not, O mighty monarch; but, on the other hand, pierced Bhima with many keen-pointed arrows.

59. Thereat the highly-powerful Bhimsena slaying Kritavarman's four steeds, felled his charioteer and his well-cleansed standard.

60. Then that slayer of hostile heroes (Bhima) pierced Kritavarman with arrows of diverse sorts; thus mangled and mutilated with arrows, the latter looked like a porcupine.

61. Thereafter leaving his chariot of which the steeds were slain, Kritavarman ascended the car of your brother-in-law Vrisaka, O monarch, before the eyes of your son.

62. Bhimasena also, inflamed with wrath rushed at your troops; and excited to the highest pitch of fury, he began to slaughter them like the god of Death himself wielding his mace in his hands.

Thus ends the eighty-third chapter, the single combats, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. I have heard, O Sanjaya as you have discoursed on, of the numerous and wonderful single combats fought between my warriors and those of the sons of Pandu.

2. But, O Sanjaya, you never speak of my soldiers being delightful (on such occasions). You always speak of the warriors of the Pandavas as cheerful, and never and routed.

3. You always speak of my warriors as depressed in mind, vanquished and shorn of energy in battle. O Suta, indubitably all this is brought about by Destiny.

Sanjaya said:—

4. Your warriors strive in battle to the best of their strength and ardour, displaying, O foremost of the Bharatas, their manliness as much as possible.

5, Even as the very tasteful water of the celestial river Ganga flowing into that of the mighty main, attains saline properties,

6. So also, O monarch, the manlines of the illustrious warriors of your army opposed by that of the heroic sons of Pandu becomes baffled in battle.

7. It behoves you not, O foremost of the Kurus, to attribute blame to your own warriors, who exert themselves to the best of their might, and achieve feats that are difficult of being dnne so.

8. From your own fault, and from that of your son, O ruler of men, this great and dreadful destruction (of the creatures of) the earth has come to pass, adding considerably to the population of Death's kingdom.

9. It behoves you not, O king. to grieve for what has come to pass in consequence of your own faults. The kings do not pay any the least regard to their lives in this battle.

10. The rulers of men (assembled on the field), desire to attain to the regions of those that perform pious acts. Always cherishing a desire for attaining Paradise, they are fighting agitating the hostile army.

11. That afternoon, O mighty monarch' a great destruction of creatures took place' Hear of me, with singleness of attention' of that battle that resembled that between the gods and the Asuras.

12. The two (royal) brothers from Avanti, both mighty bow-men, possessed of great might, and exceeding effulgence, and both formibable in battle, beholding Iravat, rushed at him.

13—14. Then the combat that was fought between them was dreadful and horripilating. Thereupon Iravat waxing wrath, quickly pierced those two brothers of godly presence, with straight-knotted shafts of exceeding sharpness. Those two warriors versed in diverse modes of warfare pierced Iravat in return, in that battle.

15. As they fought on, O king, strking their best to slay their mutual foes and desirous of avenging what is done to one another, there could be found no distinction between them.

16. Then in that conflict, Iravat, O king, with four arrows, despatched the four steeds of Anuvinda to the regions of Death.

17. Also, O sire, with a couple of keen-eged broad-headed arrows, the former cut off the standard and bow of the latter in that battle. All this, O king, seemed to be wonderful.

18. Thereupon Anuvinda leaving his own car, ascended that of Vinda; thereafter he grasped an excellent bow of great toughness and capable of bearing a great strain.

19. Then those two foremost of car-warriors endued with heroism and riding on one and the same car, both belonging to the country of Avanti, began to shower incessantly arrows on the high-souled Iravat.

20. Shot by them both, swift-flying arrows decked with gold, intercepting the rays of the orb of the day, (literally) covered the sky.

21. Thereupon, inflamed with wrath, Iravat poured an arrowy downpour on the two brothers both mighty car-warriors; and he felled their charioteer.

22. When deprived of life, the charioteer fell down on the earth, the chariot was dragged in all directions in consequence of its horses being unrestrained.

23. Obtaining victory, O monarch, over the two brothers, the son of the daughter of the king of the Nagas displaying his manliness, began speedily to spread havoc among your soldiers.

24. Thus slaughtered in battle, the mighty army of the sons of Dhritarastra performed various movements like a man reeling through the effects of poisoning.

25. Then the son of Hidimba, the foremost of the Rakshasas endued with great strength, riding on his chariot of solar hue and furnished with a standard, rushed against Bhagadatta.

26. Thereupon the ruler of the Pragjyotisas mounted on his prince of elephant like the wielder of the thunder-bolt mounting on his Airavat in the days of yore at the time of the battle caused by the insult offered by Taraka.

27. Then there came the celestials along with the Gandharvas and the sages. They were unable to find out any distinction between the son of Hidimva and Bhagadatta.

28. As the lord of the celestials (Indra) waxing wroth had struck terror into the hearts of the Danavas, so did also the ruler of the Pragjyotisas, O king, in that battle frighten and crush the Pandava troops.

29. Thus routed by him on all directions, the Pandava troops, O Bharata, did not find, in their whole host, an one competent to save them.

30. We then only beheld the son of Bhimasena (Gatotkacha), O Bharata, riding on his car; the rest of the car-warriors, with minds distracted (with fear) had fled (in all directions),

31. Then, O Bharrata, when the Pandava forces rallied, a dreadful and fierce roar was sent up by your troops in that battle.

32. Thereupon, O mighty monarch, in the fierce engagement that commenced, Gatotkacha covered Bhagadatta with a shower of arrows, like a rain-cloud covering the Meru mountain with a downpour of rain.

33. Then king Bhagadatta, severing those arrows shot from the bow of the Rakshasa, in that combat quickly pierced the the son of Bhimasena in all his vital parts.

34. Wounded with innumerable straight-jointed shafts, that foremost of the Rakshasas did not flinch, (but stood firm) like a mountain though cleft open.

35. Then the ruler of the Pragjyotisas inflamed with rage, in that battle sped fourteen Tomaras against the Rakasha, who (easily) cut them off.

36. Then that Rakshasa of mighty arms, cutting off those Tomaras, pierced Bhagadatta with seventy shafts of exceeding sharpness, all resembling the thunderbolt of Heaven.

37. Thereupon the king of the Prajyotisas, in that combat, as if smiling, despatched, O Bharata, to death the four horses of the Rakshasa.

38. Standing on his car of which the steeds were slain, that foremost of the Rakshasas endued with prowess, hurled at the elephant of Bhagadatta, a Sakti, with great force.

39. Then the ruler of the Pragjyotisas cut off that Sakti falling with great vehemence and furnished with a golden staff, into three splinters; and the Sakti fell shattered on the ground.

40. Seeing his Sakti splintered into pieces, the son of Hidimva fled out of fear like Namuchi the foremost of the Daityas flying, in the days of yore, from the fight with Indra.

41. Obtaining victory, O king, in battle over that heroic and highly powerful Rakshasa of illustrious renown who is incapable of being vanquished even by the god of Death and Varuna themselves,

42. Bhagadatta riding on his elephant crushed in that battle, the troops of the Pandavas, even like a wild elephant, that roves, O king, trampling lotus-stems (underneath its huge feet.)

43. The ruler of the Madras encountered in battle the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva. He covered his two nephews, both sons of Pandu, with an arrowy down-pour.

44. Sahadeva finding himself encountered by his uncle in battle, shrouded him with a net-work of arrows, like clouds shrouding the solar orb.

45. Shrouded by that net-work of shafts, the Madra king wore an appearance indicative of joy; the twins also were greatly delighted for the sake of their mother.

46—47. Thereafter in that combat, that mighty car-warrior (the Madra king), O king, with four excellent arrows despatched smilingly Nakula's four steeds to the mansion of Death. Then that mighty car-warrior Nakula jumping down from his car of which the horses were slain,

48. Ascended the vehicle of his illustrious brother. Then in that battle the heroes, mounted on the same car, stretching their tough bows,

49. Waxing irascible and becoming formidable in battle, covered the king of the Madras (with shafts). Covered with innumerable staight-jointed arrows

50. Shot by his nephews, that foremost of men (the Madra king) moved not, but stood still even like a mountain; then as if smiling, he baffled that shower of arrows.

51. Thereupon the highly powerful Sahadeva, inflamed with wrath, grasping a dart, rushed at the ruler of Madras and then hurled it at him, O Bharata.

52. That dart shot by him and coursing swiftly like the Garuda himself, penetrating through the body of the Madra king, fell down on earth.

53. Thus deeply pierced, and smarting with pain, that mighty car-warrior squatted down on the terrace of his car, and O mighty monarch he was overhelmed with a swoon.

54. In that battle, seeing him (the Madra king) senseless and fallen on the car and afflicted by the twins, his charioteer drove him on his vehicle away from the field of battle.

55. The sons of Dhritarastra beholding the car of the ruler of the Madras turn away from the field, were all depressed in mind and thought that he was no longer alive.

56. Obtaining victory in battle, over their uncle, the sons of Madri, greatly delighted blew their conchs and roared out their war cries.

57. Thereafter filled with delight, they rushed against your host, O ruler of men, like the immortals Indra and Upendra, O king, rushing against the host of the Daityas.

Thus ends the eighty-fourth chapter, the single combats, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXV.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then when the sun shone on the meridian, king Yudhisthira, behoding Sruta yusa, urged his own steeds towards him.

2. Then the king rushed at Srutayusa, that subduer of foes, wounding the latter at same time with nine straight knotted-shafts of exceeding sharpness.

3. That king, that mighty bowman, (Srutayusa) resisting in battle, the shafts, shot at him by the son of Pandu, sped at Kunti's son a group of seven arrows.

4. Those arrows penetrating through Yudhisthira's armour drank, in that battle, his life-blood, as if plucking out all vitality envigorating the frame of that high-souled warrior.

5. Pierced deep by that illustrious sovereign, the son of Pandu, in that combat struck the former on his breast with an arrow resembling in shape the ear of a boar.

6. Then that foremost of car-warriors namely the son of Pritha, with another broad-headed shafts, quickly felled on the ground from his car, the standard of the illustrious Srutayusa.

7. Then that ruler of earth Srutayusa, beholding his standard felled, pierced, O king, the son of Pandu with seven arrows of great sharpness.

8. Then Yudhisthira the son of Dharma burnt with rage, like the fire that burns at the end of a Yuga consuming all creatures.

9. Beholding the son of Pandu blaze forth in rage, the celestials, the Gandharvas and the Rakshasas became afflicted O monarch, and the whole world was seized upon by anxiety.

10. Then this thought prevailed in the minds of all beings present, namely 'This king, waxing wroth, will today consume the triune world.'

11. Then, O king, when the son of Pandu was thus enraged, the Rishis and the celesu tials performed many benedictory ceremonies for the peace of the worlds.

12. Then that king (Yudhisthira) possessed with anger and constantly licking the corners of his mouth, assumed a dreadful appearce like that of the sun that rises at the end of a Yuga.

13. Thereupon, O ruler of men, all the warriors of your army, became despondent of their lives, O Bharata.

14. But that highly-renowned one (Yudhisthira) restraining that wrath of his, with patience, severed the mighty bow of Srutayusa near the grasp.

15. Thereafter in that combat the king (Yudhisthira, pierced the latter whose bow had been severed, with a long arrow between his breasts, even before the very eyes of all the troops.

16. Then, O monarch, with great quickness, Yudhisthira endued with great prowess, slew the steeds of the illustrious Srutayusa as also his charioteer, with swift-flying arrows.

17. Then deserting his car of which the steeds were slain, and beholding the manliness of the monarch (Yudhishthira), Srutayusa fled with all haste from the field of battle.

18. When that mighty-bowman Srutayusa was vanquished in battle by the son of Dharma, the troops of Duryodhana, O king, turned their faces away from the field of battle.

19. Acheiving this feat, O mighty monarch, Yudhisthira the son of Dharma fell to slaughter your army, like the Destroyer himself with gaping mouth.

20. Then Chekitana that descendant of of the Vrishni race, covered that foremost of car-warriors namely the son of Gotami, with numerous arrows, before the very eyes of all the troops.

21. Resisting also those arrows, in that combat, Kripa the son of Saradwata pierced O monarch, with winged shafts, Chekitana who had been fighting very heedfully.

22. Then, O Bharata, with a broad-headed shaft the former severed the latter's bow ; as also with great lightness of hand he overthrew with another broad-headed arrow the latter's charioteer.

23. Kripa also slew Chekitana's steeds and the charioteers of those who were protecting him in the flank. Then he of the Satwata race quickly jumping down from his car grasped a mace.

24. Then that foremost of all wielders of maces slaying the steeds of the son of Gotami with that mace capable of crushing heroes, felled the latter's charioteer.

25. Then standing on the ground, the son of Gotami shot at him sixteen shafts ; and those shafts penetrating through him of the Satwata race, struck on the surface of the earth.

26. Then Chekitana, inflamed with rage and desirous of slaying the son of Gotami, once more hurled that mace at the latter, like Purandara hurling his thunder-bolt at Vritra.

27. Thereat the son of Gotami, with many thousands of arrows resisted that mighty and huge mace made entirely of adamant, that was falling swiftly on him.

28. Thereupon Chekitana, O Bharata, drawing his sword out of its sheath, with admirable activity rushed at the son of Gotami.

29. Thereupon Kripa also having laid aside his bow and grasping his sword highly polished, with great impetuosity rushed at Chekitana.

30. Then those two (heroes) endued with strength and armed with swords of excellent make, began to smite one another with their well-sharpened weapons.

31. Then those two foremost of men, struck with the vehemence of one another's swords (blows) fell down on the earth inhabitted by all sorts of creatures.

32. Their limbs were stiffened in a swoon and they lost their consciousness through the fatigue (of their exertions). Thereupon the king of the Karushas, out of friendship, rushed (to the rescue of chekitana,

33. And that hero invincible in battle seeing Chekitana in that plight, placed him on his car before the very eyes of all the troops.

34. So also, O ruler of men, your heroic brother-in-law Sukani, quickly took up on his chariot that foremost of car-warriors namely the son of Gotami.

35. Thereafter Dhristaketu endued with great strength, waxing wroth, pierced, O king. the son of Somadatta, on the breast, with ninety shafts.

36. The son of Somadatta, O mighty monarch, with those arrows stuck on his breast, appeared highly beautiful like the mid-day sun covered with its own rays.

37. Then in that conflict, Bhurisravas deprived the mighty car-warrior Dhristaketu (of the use) of his chariot, having slain its steeds and driver with excellent arrows.

38. Beholding him deprived of his car in consequence of its driver and steeds being slain, Somadatta's son covered him in the battle with a thick shower of arrows.

39. Then, O sire, deserting that car of his, the high-minded Dhristaketu ascended the vehicle belonging to Satanika.

40. Then, O monarch, Chitrasena, Vikarna, and Durmersana, all good car-warriors, clad in armours of gold, rushed against the son of Subhadra.

41. Then a dreadful combat ensued between Abhimanyu and these warriors, that resembled, O king, the fight between the body and its three humours viz. wind, bile, and phlegm.

42. Depriving, O monarch, your sons of their chariot, in that great battle, that foremost of men, Abhimanyu did not slay them recollecting the words of Bhima.

43—45. There after as the battle raged, the son of Kunti (Arjuna) owning white steeds, beholding Bhisma who was unconquerable even by the celeltials themselves in battle and who was supported by many thousands king proceed to rescue your sons from Abhimanyu—a mere boy, though a mighty car-waraior still alone—adressed these words to the son of Vasudeva. "O Hrishikesha, urge the steeds to the spot where those numerous warriors are.

46. O Madhava, so guide the steeds that these numerous heroes irrepressible in battle and all accomplished in the use of weapons, may not slay our troops."

47. Thus spoken to by Kunti's son of immeasurable prowess, he of the Vrishni race drove in the thick of the battle that car to which were yoked white steeds.

48. When wrought up with wrath Arjuna rushed against your army, O Sire, a tremendous uproar was set up by your troops.

49. The son of Kunti then having approached those monarchs protected by Bhisma himself, addressing, O king, Susarman, spoke these words to him :—

50. "I know you to be one of the foremost in battle ; your enmity for us in days gone by, was also implacable. To-day, reap the mortal fruit of that wicked behaviour of yours.

51—52. To-day I shall transport you to your grand-sires who had long being dwelling in the regions of the dead." Hearing these insulting words spoken by that slayer of foes namely Vibhatsu, Susarman, the commander of a car-division spoke nothing well or ill in reply.

53. Surrounded by innumerable monarchs, he attacked the heroic Arjuna from all sides, namely in the front, in the rear and in the two flanks.

54. O sinless one, encircling Arjuna in that battle, Susarman along with your sons covered the former with arrows, like clouds covering the orb of the day.

55. Then commenced a sanguinary engagement between your warriors and those of the Pandavas, in which blood flowed like streams of water.

Thus ends the eighty-fifth chapter, the encounter between Arjuna and Susarman, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then the highly powerful Dhananjaya wounded with those arrows, breathing like a trodden snake, forcibly cut off, in that battle, the bows of those mighty car-warriors, discharging shaft after shaft.

2. Within a moment having severed the bows of those highly powerful monarchs in the battle, O king, that illustrious hero setting his mind upon their destruction began to pierce them simultaneously with his arrows.

3. Wounded by the son of Sakra (Ajuna), O king, they rolled on the field weltering in their blood, with their bodies mutilated, their heads severed their armours shattered and their lives taken out of them.

4. Many, of them afflicted with the arrows shot by the son of Pritha (Arjuna), fell down on the earth ; and undergoing diverse contortions simultaneously gave up their lives. Beholding those princes slain in battle, the ruler of the Trigarttas proceeded (to battle) riding on his own car.

5. Then thirty-two of those car-warriors, protecting his (Trigarta king's) rear, rushed at the son of Pritha. Thereafter those warriors encircled Pritha's son and drawing their bows emittings fierce twangs,

6. Covered the latter with a thick shower of arrows, just as clouds charged with rain drench with showers of their contents the mountain breast. Afflicted with that shower of arrows, Dhananjaya inflamed with rage in that battle,

7. With sixty shafts, cleansed with oil, slew all those warriors protecting the rear of the Trigartta king. Vanquishing those sixty car-warriors inbattle, filled with delight, the illustrious Dhananjaya,

8. Ever-attended with victory, hied to slay Bhisma, having slain that division of kings. The king of the Trigarttas beholding those mighty car-warriors, his friends slain,

9. Speedily advanced towards the son of Pritha in order to slay him, placing in his front a large number of kings. Beholding that foremost of those versed in the use of weapons, namely Dhananjaya, thus assailed, the Pandava warriors headed by Sikhandin,

10. Grasping in their hand well-sharpened weapons, rushed in battle desirous of protecting the car of Arjuna. Beholding those royal heroes accompanied by the Trigartta king make towards himself, the son of Pritha,

11. That fierce bowman, destroyed them in battle, with arrows of exceeding sharpness shot from the Gandiva bow. Desirous of encountering Bhisma in battle, Dhananjaya then observed many kings including Duryodhana and the ruler of the Sindhus.

12—13. Then that highly powerful and wonderfully-intelligent hero of infinite prowess and great energy, fighting with them for a moment only and checking them, and then avoinding the king (Duryodhana) and Jayadratha and others, proceeded towards the son of Ganga, holding in his hands his bow and his arrows. Then the illustrious Yudhisthira of fierce prowess, excited with wrath speedily rushed to the battle.

14. Avoiding in battle the ruler of the Madras of infinite renown who was allotted to his share and who was his kinsmen, Yudhisthira accompanied by the sons Madri and also by Bhimasena, proceeded, desirous of battle, toward Bhisma the son of Santanu.

15. Though assailed in battle by all the sons of Pandu, all mighty car-warriors united in a body, the son of Santanu begotten upon Ganga, that high-souled warrior versed in all modes of warfare, flinched not in the least.

16. Then king Jayadratha, highly intelligent and endued with great strength, and never failing in his aims in battle, advancing upon those mighty car-warriors forcibly severed their bows by means of his own excellent bow.

17. Then the illustrious Duryodhana, having anger for his poison, waxing wrath in battle, wounded Yudhisthira, Bhima, Arjuna, and the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva) with arrows resplendent like fire itself.

18. Pierced with arrows shot by Kripa, Salya, Sala and Chitrasena, O master, the Pandava brothers excited to the highest pitch of fury, resembled the celestials wounded with arrows shot by the united hosts of the Daityas.

19. Beholding Sikhandin with his bow severed by the royal son of Santanu, the illustrious Ajatasatru (Yudhisthira) waxing wroth, angrily said these words to the former.

20. " Having said to me even before your father these words viz,—' I will slay with my showers of arrows of the effulgence of the resplendent sun, Bhisma of great vows. This I say you forsooth,'—you made a promise.

21. You have not redeemed that promise of yours, in as much as you have not yet slain Devavrata in battle. O hero, be not of a man of empty promises. Preserve your virtue, your race and your fame.

22. Behold Bhishma of tremendous impetuosity falling upon my host of troops destroying it with a shower of arrows of excessive effulgence, like the Destroyer himself destroying everything in a moment,

23. Having your bow severed, shunning the fight, vanquished by the royal son of Santanu, whither are you going forsaking your friends and your uterine brothers ? this does not befit you.

24. Beholding Bhisma of infinite prowess and seeing this army broken and routed, O son of Drupada, you are indeed seized with panic, in as much as your countenance has assumed a pallid hue.

25. But, behold, O hero Dhananjaya has engaged in dreadful fight with Bhisma even without your knowledge. Celebrated through out the world, why to-day, O hero are you afraid of Bhisma ? "

26. Hearing this hard-worded speech full of instructions delievered by the very virtuous king Yudhisthira, that high-souled hero Sikhandin considering it to be good counsel, hastened, O king, to bring about the slaughter of Bhisma.

27. When Sikhandin had been thus advancing with great momentum to fall upon Bhisma, Salya checked him with a weapon dreadful and difficult of being baffled.

28. Beholding that weapon effulgent like the fire that appears at the Yuga's end (for destroying the world) shot at him, the son of Drupada, of prowess resembling that of the great Indra, was not at all confounded.

29. On the other hand, that fierce bowman stood there resisting that weapon with numerous arrows. Thereafter Sikhandin fixed on his bow-string the Varuna weapon that was capable of counteracting (the fiery weapon of Salya).

30—31. The celestials in the heavens and the rulers of the earth, all beheld that weapon (fiery dart of Salya) baffled by Sikhandin's (Varuna) arrow. In that battle, O king, the high-souled and heroic Bhisma also uttered his war-cry having cut off the bow and wonderfully variegated standard of the royal son of Pandu viz Yudhishthira of the Ajamida race. Thereupon seeing Yudhisthira overwhelmed with fear, leaving aside his bow and his arrows,

32—33. And grasping a mace, Bhimasena rushed on foot against Jayadratha in that battle. Then Jayadratha simultaneously pierced Bhimasena who was thus furiously rushing at him with a mace in hand with five hundred sharp-pointed terrible shafts, each resembling the mace of the Destroyer himself. Without paying the least heed to those arrows, the highly active Vrikodara with heart burning in wrath, 34—35. Slew in that battle all the steeds of the king of the Shindhus, steeds that resembled (in speed) pegions themselves. Then your son Chitrasena of unequalled prowess and resembling the sovereign of the celestials himself, beholding Bhishmasena, rushed to battle with a view to slay the latter, riding swift on his car and with weapons raised over head. Bhimasena also, roaring and uttering his war-cry, rushed against him mace in hand.

36. Beholding that mace, resembling the mace of Death himself, thus raised overhead (by Bhima), every one of the Kuru warriors, eager to avoid its fall, deserting the van of your son,

37. Fled in all directions, in that confounding dreadful and ruthless crush of combatants. O Bharata, your son Chitrasena beholding that mighty mace course towards him, was not confounded at heart.

38. Grasping a resplendent sword and a buckler, Chitrasena leaving his car and jumping down from it on level ground like a lion jumping down from the crest of a cliff, stood on his legs on the field of the battle.

39. Meanwhile that mace falling upon that beautiful car with its steeds and elephants, crushed it in battle, and fell on the ground like a blazing and fierce meteor dropping down from the skies.

40. Seeing that very wonderful feat achieved by your son), your warriors, O Bharata, were filled with delight ; and they unitedly uttered their war-cries and began to praise your son.

Thus ends the eighty-sixth chapter, the breaking of Chitrasena's car, in the Bhismabadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

(BHISMABADHA PARVA)- Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Approaching the highly intelligent Chitrasena who had been deprived of his car, your son Vikarna picked him up on his own chariot.

2. When that dreadful and confounding battle was thus raging, Santanu's son Bhisma quickly rushed against Yudhisthira.

3. Then the Srinjayas with their cars, elephants and steeds, began to quake (with fear); and they regarded Yudhisthira to be inside the jaws of Death.

4. On the other hand, that descendant of Kuru's race, that lord Yudhisthira, united with his two twin brothers (Nakula and Sahadeva), encountered that foremost of men, that fierce bowman namely Bhisma, the son of Santanu.

5. Thereafter that son of Pandu shooting in that battle thousands of arrows, covered Bhishma, like clouds covering the orb of the day.

6. Those arrows duly discharged by Yudhisthira, the son of Ganga received in distinct sets of hundreds and thousands.

7. Also, O Sire, a net-work of arrows woven by Bhima was seen in the heavens resembling flights of insects ranging through the skies.

8. In half a wink's time, Bhisma the son of Santanu, in that battle made the son of Kunti disappear in battle, covering him with distinct sets of arrows.

9. Thereat king Yudhisthira inflamed with rage, sped at that high-souled grand-sire of the Kurus, a Naracha that resembled a snake of virulent venom.

10. Then in that battle, O king, the mighty car-warrior Bhisma, with a razor-sharp arrow, cut off that Narach discharched from the bow of Yudhisthira, even before it could reach him.

11. In that battle, Bhisma, having cut off that Naracha that resembled the Destroyer himself, slew the steeds caparisoned with golden ornaments, of that foremost of the Kurus (Yudhisthira).

12. Leaving his car the steeds of which were slain, Yudhisthira the son of Dharma, quickly ascended the car of the high-souled Nakula.

13. Thereafter Bhisma that conqueror of hostile fortresses, excited with wrath, approaching the twins in battle, covered them with numerous shafts.

14. Then O mighty monarch, beholding the twins thus afflicted with the arrows shot by Bhisma, Yudhisthira began to reflect anxiously, desirous of finding out a means for the death of Bhisma.

15. Thereafter, O king, Yudhisthira urged the kings on his side and his relatives, saying "Uniting together do you all slay Bhisma the son of Santanu."

16. Then hearing the command of Pritha's son, all the rulers of earth surrounded the grand-sire with a mighty host of cars.

17. Thus encircled, your father Devavrata played with his bow and arrows felling, O king, numerous mighty car-warriors.

18. The sons of Pritha then beheld that foremost of the Kurus, career on the field of battle, like a lion-cub in the woods amidst a herd of deer.

19. Beholding him utter loud war-cries in battle and frighten heroes with his shafts, O monarch, the Pandava warriors were seized with terror, like a herd of deer at the sight of a lion.

20. Then the Kshatriyas, in that battle, beheld the movements of that foremost of the Bharatas, resemble the movements of fire aided by a strong wind, when it consumes a heap of straw.

21. Then in that battle Bhisma felled the heads of car-warriors like expert men felling ripe palm-fruits from their trees.

22. As those heads, O mighty monarch, fell down on the surface of the earth, a great noise was produced like that of a shower of stones.

23. As that dreadful and fierce battle raged, a great a confusion set in, O king, among all the ranks of the soldiers.

24. When the arrays were thus shattered by Bhisma, the Kshatriyas challenging one another encountered one another for battle..

25. Sikhandin approaching the grand-sire of the Bharatas, assailed him with vehemence saying 'stay'.

26. Then Bhisma remembering the femininity of Sikandin, and for that reason neglecting him in battle, rushed against the Srinjayas.

27. Thereupon the Srinjayas, beholding Bhisma in that battle, were filled with delight and they uttered numerous war-cries that became mingled with the blare of the conchs.

28. Then, O lord, when the sun was on the western side of the meridian, there commenced a battle in which car-warriors and elephant-riders encountered one another.

29. Then Dhristadyumna the prince of the Panchalas, and also the mighty car-warrior Satyaki, began to torment your troops with showers of Saktis and Tomaras.

30. They also, O monarch, slew in battle your warriors with innumerable shafts. O foremost of men, your troops, though thus smitten down in battle,

31. Did not desert the fight having formed a laudable determination (to fight to the last); and those foremost of car-warriors began to slay (the hostile troop) to the best of their energies.

32. Then, O monarch, a loud cry of agony was set up by your high-souled warriors as they were slain by the illustrious son of Prisata.

33. Hearing that distressful cry uttered by your troop, Vinda and Anuvinda of the Avanti country, both mighty car-wrriors, rushed to encounter the son of Prisata.

34. Then those mighty car-warriors both endued with great activity, slaying the steeds of Prisata's son, shrouded him with a shower of arrows.

35. Thereupon that mighty car-warrior the Panchala prince quickly jumping down his car, ascended with agility the chariot of the highly illustrious Satyaki.

36. Thereupon king Yudisthira surrounded by a mighty division of troops rushed to those two afflicters of foes viz the princes of Avanti both inflamed with wrath.

37. So also, O sire, your sons putting forth all their energies, remained in battle surrounding Vinda and Anuvinda.

38. In that battle Arjuna also inflamed with many wrath fought with many best of Kshatriyas like the wielder of the thunderbolt fighting against the Asuras.

39. Drona also, that well-wisher of your son, excited with wrath began to consume all the Panchalas like fire consuming a heap of cotton.

40. Your sons, O ruler of men, headed by Duryodhana himself surrounding Bhisma, fought on with the Pandavas.

41. Then, O Bharata, when the lustrous orb assumed a crimson hue, king Duryodhana addressing all your warriors said, "make hasten :"

42. When they thus fought on achieving feats difficult of being accomplished, the sun being lost to the sight ascended the western hills.

43. Then in a moment, towards nightfall, a dreadful river surging with billows of blood infested by packs of jackals, began to flow accross the field of battle.

44. Then the field of battle assumed a dreadful sight abounding as at did with the spirits of the dead and the ominous jackals howling (hediously).

45. Rakshasas, and Pisachas and other feeders on flesh were seen on all sides by hundreds and by thousands.

46. Arjuna having conquered the kings headed by Susarman along with their followers, proceeded through the divisions towards his own tent.

47. That descendant of the Kuru race, viz the lord Yudhisthira also proceeded, O king, surrounded by his troops and accompanied by his brothers, towards his own tent at the advent of night.

48. Bhimsena also, O foremost of kings having vanquished in battle the kings, all good car-warriors, headed by Duryodhana himself, retired to his own camp.

49. In that great battle also, king Duryodhana surroundiug Bhisma the son of Santanu, speedily proceed towarded his own tents.

50. Drona and his son, Kripa and Salya and Kritavarman of the Satwata race, bringing up the rear of the whole host of the Kurus, wended towards their respective tents.

51. So also, O monarch, Satyaki and Prisata's son Dhrishtadyumna having slain many warriors in the battle proceeded towards their tents.

52. Thus, O mighty monarch, your warriors as also those of the Pandavas, all chastisers of their enemies, returned to their encampments when the shades of night had fallen on this earth.

53. Then, O mighty monarch, the Pandavas and the Kurus repairing near their respective encampments entered them exchanging greetings with one another.

54. Then duly arranging for sccuts and out-posts and for protecting their persons, and drawing out the arrows from their bodies and having bathed in various waters,

55. And being praised by the ministrels and bards and arranging for the performance of benedictory rites, those illustrious heroes then began to sport accompanied by songs and sounds of musical instruments.

56. For a short while only did that scene resemble paradise itself, and those foremost of mortals for a while desisted from talking of the battle.

57. When those two armies, abounding in elephants and steeds and men exhausted with fatigue, were lulled in the arms of sleep O king, they indeed presented a charming signt.

Thus ends the eighty-seventh chapter, the withdrawal of the troops after the seventh day's fight, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Having passed that night and having enjoyed a peaceful slumber, those rulers of men belonging to the hosts of the Kurus and the Pandavas, again marched out for battle.

2. Then a tremendous din was created by those two hosts when they marched out for baftle,—din that resembled the uproar of the ocean itself.

3. Thereupon king Duryodhana, Chitrasena, Vivinsati, Bhisma the foremost of all car-warriors, the son of Bharadwaja endued with prowess,

4. These mighty car-warriors of the Kaurava host clad in mail and united together and with great care, formed, O king, the battle-array of their troops against those of the Pandavas.

5. Your sire Bhisma, O ruler of men, formed a mighty array resembling the dreadful ocean itself, having for its waves and currents the vehicles (of the warriors).

6. Then Bhisma the son of Santanu marched out in the van of all the troops, supported by the Malavas, the Southerners and Avantyas.

7. Behind him came the son of Bharadwaja endued with prowess, being supported by the Pulindas, the Kshudrakas and the Malavas.

8. After Drona marched Bhagadatta endued with great prowess and determined (to fight to the last), being supported by the Magadhas, the Kalingas, and the Pisachas, O ruler of men.

9. After Bhagadatta, came Vrihadvala the ruler of the Kosalas, being supported by the Melakas, the Tripuras and the Chichias.

10. After Vrihadvala came the heroic Trigartta, the ruler of Prasthala, accompanied by numerous Kamvojas and thousands of Yavanas.

11. After Trigartta, O Bharata, the valiant son of Drona rushed to battle, resounding the earth with his war-cries.

12. After the son of Drona proceeded king Duryodhana accompanied by the whole army and surrounded by his uterine brothers.

13. After Duryodhana marched Kripa, the son of Saradwata. Thus marched out the mighty array that resembled the ocean itself.

14. In that array, O lord, streamers, white umbrellas, precious armours of wonderful workmanship, and many bows, shone resplendent.

15. Seeing that mighty array of your warriors, the mighty car-warrior Yudhistuira speedily addressing Prisata's son, the generalissimo of his army said these words.

16. 'Behold, O mighty bowman, this array of troops already formed, resembling the very ocean ; O son of Prisata, without loss of time, do you also arrange your troops in counter-array."

17. Thereupon, O mighty monarch, the valiant son of Prisata formed the dreadful array known as Sringátaka that is capable of penetrating through the hostile array.

18. In its two horns was placed Bhimasena and the mighty car-warrior Satyaki, supported by many thousands of car-warriors and cavalry and infantry.

19. In its navel was the ape-bannered Arjuna owning white steeds ; and O foremost of men, in its middle was king Yudhisthira and the sons of Pandu begotten upon Madri.

20. Other mighty bowmen, all rulers of earth, and versed in the art of forming arrays with their troop filled up that array.

21. Abhimanyu and the mighty car-warrior Virata, the sons of Draupadi, and the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha were commanded to bring up the rear.

22. Thus, O Bharata, forming this mighty array, the heroic sons of Pandu occupied the field anxiously longing for battle and for victory.

23. Loud noise of the drums, mingled with the blare of conchs and the slapping of the armpits and the war-cries and shouts of the warriors, became dreadful, and filled all the quarters of heaven.

24. Thus those heroes, O king, encountering one another in battle, gazed at one another with winkless eyes.

25. Then, O foremost of men, challenging one another by their appellations, the warriors became engaged with one another.

26. There raged a fierce and frightening battle betweeen your warriors and those of the enemy, as they smote down one another.

27. Whetted long shafts, O Bharata, began to rain on all sides of the field of battle, like dreadful reptiles with mouths wide open.

28. Resplendent darts cleansed with oil and shot with great force, began to fall, O king, like flashing forks of lightening from the clouds.

29. Maces, covered with shining pieces of cloth and decked with gold were seen to fall on the field like so many beautiful crests of mountains.

30. Swords resplendent like the clear blue sky, glittered there. Bucklers made of bull's hide and decorated with hundred moons, O Bharata,

31. Falling on all sides, appeared beautiful, O king. O ruler of men, when the two armies fought with cach other in that battle,

32. They appeared beautiful like the hosts of the celestials and the Daityas engaged with one another (in days gone by). From all sides they rushed against one another in that battle.

33. Excellent royal car-warriors rushing against their antagonist car-warriors fought on in that dreadful battle having the yokes of their chariots entangled with one another.

34. On all sides, O foremost of the Bharatas, were seen scintieations of fire mixed with smoke emitted from the tusks of elephants in consequence of friction, as they fought on with one another.

35. Some elephant-warriors struck down with Prasas, falling on the ground appeared like mountaint-rees overthrown from the peaks.

36. Heroic foot-soldiers of diverse appearance were seen to slay one another and to battle with lances that looked like their nails.

37. The combatants of the Kuru and the Pandava troops nearing one another, began to despatch one another to the regions of Death, with arrows of diverse shapes.

38. Thereafter Bhisma the son of Santanu, rushed against the Pandava host, filling the heavens with the clatter of his car and confounding the enemies with the twang of his bow.

39. The car-warriors of the Pandava host also setting up a dreadful noise, rushed towards Bhisma, firmly resolved to fight and headed by Dhristadyumna himself.

40. Then, O Bharata, raged the battle between your as well as the enemy's troops, consisting of men, steeds, cars and elephants —battle in which the combatants became entangled with one another.

Thus ends the eighty-eighth chapter, the commencement of the eighth. day's combat, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXIX.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA) :—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. The Pandavas were unable to look at Bhisma burning like the solar disc, when inflamed with wrath he rushed to (the thick of the) fight.

2. Thereafter the whole army, by the order of the son of Dharma, rushed against the son of Ganga when the latter was wounding them with whetted shafts.

3. But Bhisma ever proud in battle, began to fell with his shafts, the Somakas, the Srinjayas and the Panchalas, all mighty wielders of the bow.

4. Though thus slaughtered by Bhisma, the Panchalas with the Somakas impetuously rushed against Bhisma, abandoning all fear of death.

5. Then that foremost of car-warriors namely Bhisma the son of Santanu, in that battle, O king, cut off the arms and heads of all those combatants.

6. Your sire Devavrata deprived car-warriors of their car ; and the heads of horse-soldiers fell fast as they rode on theif chargers.

7. We also beheld, O mighty monarch elephants deprived of their riders and fallen on the filled like so many hills and also paralysed by the weapons of Bhishma.

8. Not a single person of the Pandava host remained there on the field of battle, except, O ruler of men that foremost of car-warriors namely Bhimasena endued with great prowesss.

9—10. Encountering Bhisma in battle, Bhima began to resist the former ; a dreadful, fierce and deafening uproar arose among all the troops when Bhima and Bhisma thus encountered each another. Thereupon the Pandavas greatly delighted roared out their war-cries.

11. Thereupon king Duryodhana surrounded by his uterine brothers, protected Bhisma when that battle destructive of creatures was raging furiously.

12. Then that foremost of car-warriors Bhima, slew the charioteer of Bhisma; thereupon the steeds having none to check them ran away dragging the chariot.

13. Then that slayer of enemies, Bhima, with an arrow of the shape of horse-shoe and of exceeding sharpness, cut off quickly the head of Sunabha; and the latter fell down on the ground.

14. When that mighty car-warrior that fierce bowman namely your son Sunabha was slain in battle, O Sire, his other seven uterine brothers, all brave heroes, could not brook it in battle.

15. Adityaketu, Vahvasin, Kundadhara, Mohadura Aparajita, Panditaka, and Vishalaksha, all difficult of being conquered in battle,

16. These seven grinders of foes, clad in coats of mail and owning wonderful armours and weapons, rushed to battle against the son of Pandu, desirous of fighting with him.

17. Then in that battle, Mahendra pierced Bhima with nine winged shafts resembling the thunder-bolt itself, like the slayer of Vritra piercing Namuchi (in the days of yore).

18. Adityaketu pierced Bhima with seventy shafts, Vahvasin with five, Kundadhara with ninety and Vishalaksha with seven.

19. That conqueror of foes, namely Aparajita himself, O mighty monarch, that mighty-carwarrior, pierced the highly-powerful Bhimasena, with innumerable shafts.

20. Panditaka pierced Bhima with three shafts in that battle. But Bhima did not tolerate these wounds inflicted by his enemies in that battle.

21. Then that grinder of foes (Bhima) pressing his bow with his left hand, with a staight-knotted shaft cut off in that battle, the head of

22. Your son Aparajita, graced with a well-formed nose. When he was thus conquered by Bhima, his head fell down on the ground.

23. Then the former, with another broad-headed-shaft, despatched the mighty car-warrior Kundadhara to the region of Death, even before the very eyes of the troops.

24. Then that one of immeasurable soul (Bhima), placing on his bow-string another shaft, sped it, O Bharata, against Panditaka in that battle.

25. That shaft slaying Panditaka penetrated into the earth, even as a serpent urged by fate, enters the earth having bitten a person whose hour has come.

26. Thereafter that generous-hearted hero, O ruler of earth, remembering the woe he (with his brothers) had to undergo, cutting off with three shafts the head of Vishalaksha felled it on the ground.

27. He also pierced the mighty car-warrior Mahendra with a long shaft between his breasts, and O king, (thus stricken), the latter fell down dead on the ground.

28. Severing the umbrella of Adityaketu with a shaft, Bhima cut down the former's head, O Bharata, with a broad-headed arrow of exceeding sharpeness.

29. Thereafter inflamed with rage, with a straight-knotted shaft Bhima despatched Vahvasin to the abode of Death.

30. Then O ruler of men, the rest of your sons fled away in all directions, considering that the words he had uttered in the assembly-hall to be true.

31. Thereupon king Duryodhana, afflicts ed with the calamity that had befallen hil brothers, commanded his troops saying, "Slay this Bhima."

32. Thus, O ruler of men, your sons, alexcellent bow-men, beholding their brothers slain, remembered the words,

33. Salutary and wholesome, that the wonderfully-wise Kshatiya had said. Those words of that true speaking one has now been realised,

34. Words, beneficial and true, to which you paid no heed in past days, being possessed by covetousness and folly, as also, O lord of wealth, by the affection for your sons.

35. From the way in which that hero (Bhima) of long-arms is slaying the Kauravas, it may be asserted that, that mighty son of Pandu has surely taken his birth for the destruction of your sons.

36. Thereafter king Duryodhana possessed with overwhelming grief, approached Bhisma, and O Sire, began to lament before him in great sorrow.

37. 'My heroic brothers have all been slain in battle by Bhimasena; and other soldiers, though striving their best to resist him, are all being slain and slaughtered.

38. Though you are always in our midst, yet you always neglect us. Alas! what a wrong course have I taken! Behold my evil Destiny!'

Sanjaya said :—

39. Hearing this, your father Devavrata, inflamed with rage, said these words to Suyodhana, with his eyes overflowing with tears.

Bhisma said :—

40. 'Even this had been said before by myself, by Drona, by Vidura and by the illustrious lady Gandhari. But then, O sire, you did not pay any heed to it.

41. O Grinder of foes, I have made arrangements with you that, neither myself nor the preceptor Drona shall survive this war.

42. I tell you truly that, every one of the host of Dhritarastra whom Bhima will meet in battle, he will slay in fight.

43. Therefore, O king, with all your patience, and forming a firm resolution for battle, do you fight with the sons of Pritha, looking upon paradise as your final goal.

44. The sons of Pandu cannot be vanguished even by the celestials headed by Indra himself. Therefore, O Bharata, forming a firm determination for fight, do you fight on (with the Pandavas).

Thus ends the eighty-ninth chapter, the slaughter of Adityaketu and others, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XC.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. Seeing my sons, so many in number, slain by one, what, O Sanjaya, did, Bhisma Drona, and Kripa do?

2. Day by day, O Sanjaya, my sons are being destroyed. Indeed O Suta, I consider them to be completely struck down by (Evil) Destiny.

3—5. In as much as, my sons are never victorious and are ever vanquished in battle, in as much as my sons remaining amidst, Drona, Bhisma, the illustrious Kripa, and the heroic son of Somadatta, and Bhagadatta, and O son, Aswathama, and many orther heroic and valiant worriors of high-soul, are still slaughtered in battle, what can it be but (adverse) Fate?

6. The wicked Duryodhana did not listen to our advise before. Forbidden, O son by myself, by Bhisma, by Vidura,

7. By his mother Gandhari ever anxious to compass his good, that perverse Duryodhana did not comprehend our words before, through his folly. Now he reaps the fruits of his own actions,

8. In as much as, day by day, waxing wroth in battle, Bhimasena is despatching my sons to the abode of death.

Sanjaya said :—

9. Those excellent words of Khattwa have now been verified, which, O lord, uttered as they were for your good, you did not pay any heed to before.

10. 'Withhold your sons from the dice, do not persecute the sons of Pandu',—these words, spoken by your well-wishing friends,

11. You did not listen to, like one on death-bed neglecting wholesome medicine. It is now that you realise those words spoken by the righteous.

12. Disregarding the salutary advices offered by well-wishing friends like Bhisma Drona, Vidura and others, the descendants of the Kuru race are reaping destruction.

13. Now, O monarch, the inevitable consequence of all that has arrived. Listen now from me as to how the battle was fought.

14. At mid-day, O king, the battle raged fiercely and the carnage that took place was exceedingly terrible. Hear me narrate it.

15. Then at the command of the son of Dharma (Yudhisthira), all the troops of the Pandava host inflamed with rage, rushed against Bhisma, out of a desire for slaying him.

16. Dhristadyumna, Sikhandin and the mighty car-warriors Satyaki, uniting together their divisions, rushed, O mighty monarch, against Bhisma.

17. Then the mighty car-warriors Virata and Drupada accompanied by all the Somakas rushed even against Bhisma himself.

18. The Kekayas, and Dhristaketu, and Kuntivoja, clad in mail and supported by their armies, rushed, O monarch, against Bhisma himself.

19. Arjuna, the sons of Drupadi, and the highly powerful Chekitana, rushed against the kings commanded by Duryodhana himself.

20. Thereafter, the valiant Abhimanyu, that mighty car-warrior, the son of Hidimva, and Bhimasena himself, all wrought up with wrath, assaulted the Kouravas.

21. Thus were the Kouravas slain in battle by the Pandavas divided in two divisions; so also, O monarch, the Pandavas were slaughtered by the Kouravas in that fight.

22. Then that foremost of car-warriors namely Drona, excited with rage, rushed against the Somakas and the Srinjayas, despatching them to the mansion of Death.

23. Then the high-souled Srinjaya, set up a loud and distressful cry when, O king they were thus being slaughtered in battle by that great bowman the son of Bharadwaja.

24. Innumerable Kshastriya warriors, smitten by Drona were seen to convulse like persons suffering from agonising ailments.

25. They groaned and moaned and cried and uttered cries of agony in consequence of which a confused noise was heard, resembling that produced by men struck with famine.

26. On the other hand, the highly puissant Bhimasena, waxing wroth, caused a dreadful carnage among the Kourava ranks like another god of Death himself.

27. In that fierce fight, as the troops slew one another, a terrible river started up into existence on the field of battle, of which the waves and currents were formed of blood.

28. That great battle, O mighty monarch, between the Kurus and the Pandavas, was indeed very dreadful in its aspect; and it considerably swelled the population of of Death's domain.

29. Thereafter Bhima inflamed with rage, fell with impetuousity upon the elephant-division of the Kurus, and many were the beasts that he sent to the regions of Death.

30. There, in that battle, O Bharata, many were the elephants that pierced with Nacharas by Bhima, fell and were confounded and shrieked and careered in all directions.

31. Huge elephants, with their trunks cut off, and their bodies mangled, fell down on the earth, O sire, screaming like cranes.

32. Nakula and Sahadeva, both together, charged the cavalry-division. Those horses decked with golden chains and caparisons of the same metal,

33. Were seen to be slain by hundreds and by thousands; and, O monarch, the earth was strewn over with falling horses.

34. The earth looked awful, O foremost of men, being covered over with horses of diverse appearance, some of which were tongueless, some of which, again were breathing hard, some moaning and some deprived of their lives.

35. The earth also, O Bharata, appeared kwfully beautiful being overstrewn with aings slain by Arjuna in the encounter.

36. With shattered chariots, and torn flags and umbrellas of great effugence, with rent chamaras and fans, and with mighty weapons splintered into pieces,

37. With garlands and necklaces of gold, with heads graced with ear-rings, with bracelets, with head-gears fallen off from the heads, and with streamers,

38. With well-made car-bottoms, and O king, with reins and riggings—covered with all these things, the earth appeared as beautiful as she appears during the spring being strewn over with blossoms.

39. Such also was the carnage caused in the Pandava host, O Bharata, when the son of Santanu, and Drona that foremost of car-warriors were enraged;

40. As also when Aswathaman, and Kripa and Kritavarman (were wrought up with rage). So also your troops underwent destruction when the other side was inflamed with wrath.

Thus ends the ninetieth chapter, the eighth day's fight, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XCI.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. When, O king, that dreadful battle destructive of excellent heroes was thus raging, Suvala's prosperous son Sakuni rushed against the Pandava hosts.

2. Also, O king, that slayer of foes, that son of Hridika, of the Satwata race, proceeded in battle against the Pandava divisions.

3—5. Several warriors of your army, with a mighty division of horses consisting of best animals of the Kamvoja breed, of those born in lands watered by many rivers, of those belonging to Aratta, Mahi, Sindhu, and Vanayu, of those that were white-hued, of those born in mountainous tracts, and of those exceedingly swift and endued with the fleetness of wind, and of those of the Tittiri breed, surrounded on all sides the Pandava army. With many steeds duly clad in mail and decked with caparisons of gold,

6. All best of their class, and fleet as the wind itself, the highly puissant son of the Pandava (Arjuna), of cheerful appearance and the slayer of his foes, rushed against that division of horses belonging to the enemy.

7. This prosperous son of Arjuna by name Iravat, endued with great prowess was begotten by the highly intelligent Partha (Arjuna) on the daughter of the sovereign of the Nagas.

8. Her husband having been slain by Suparna (Garuda), she was helpless and completely depressed in mind ; she was then bestowed upon Arjuna by the illustrious Airavata.

9. As she came to him under the influence of desire, the son of Pritha accepted her as his wife. Thus it was that Arjuna's son was begotten upon another's wife.

10. This son of Arjuna was brought up in the regions of the Nagas, and was protected by his mother. He was abandoned by his wicked-souled uncle from his animosity for the son of Pritha.

11. Hearing that Arjuna had come to the regions of Indra, that handsome, highly puissant and accomplished Iravat of prowess that could not be baffled, hied to those regions.

12. That mighty-armed hero of infallible prowess, approaching his father did obeisance to him, duly folding his palms.

13. He introduced himself to the illustrious Arjuna saying—'I am your son Iravat, O lord, may good betide you.'

14. He also reminded Arjuna of the circumstances under which the latter met his mother. Then the son of Pandu also remembered them aright.

15. Then in the mansion of the chief of the celestials, the son of Pritha embracing his son equal to him in his acquirements, was highly delighted.

16. Then that mighty-armed hero (Iravat), O king, was thus cheerfully commanded by Arjuna, in the celestial regions with regard to his own business (namely the impending war with the Kurus).

17. 'O son, when the battle would take place, you should render us assistance.' He then said 'yea' to the words of his father ; and now that the hour has arrived, he also presented himself,

18. O king, surrounded by parti-coloured horses, countless in number. Those horses caparisoned with trappings of gold and of diverse hues and great fleetness,

19. O king, suddenly appeared on the field like swans on the bosom of the mighty-main. Those horses encountering your division of fleetest steeds,

20. Struck one another with their chests and noses. Overthrown by their own impetuosity, O king, they began to fall down suddenly on the earth.

21. When those two horse divisions thus clashed against one another (and some fell down), a terrible sound, resembling that of Suparna's swoop was heard there.

22. So also, O mighty monarch, those who rode on these steeds nearing one another in that dreadful battle, fell upon slaughtering one another mercilessly.

23. When that general and dreadful encounter raged fiercely, the chargers of the two hosts, seized with panic, coursed wildly all over the field.

24. Warriors, mutilated with shafts, with their chargers slain, and themselves exhausted with fatigue, began to perish, cutting one another with their swords.

25. Then when that horse-division was considerably thinned and very few survived, O Bharata, the younger brothers of Suvala's son (Skuni), all endued with heroism, rode out in the van (of the hostile ranks),

26. On horses, the contact of whose dash was overthrowing like the vehemenee of the wind, which were equal to the wind in fleetness, and which were all excellent chargers, well-broken and youthful.

27. Gaya,Gavaksha, Vrisava, Charmavan, Arjava and Suka, these six highly puissant heroes rode out of the mighty ranks the Kauravas, 28, Supported by Sakuni and their respective mighty divisions consisting of highly powerful warriors, themselves covered with armours, accomplished in battle, fierce in aspect and possessed of great strength.

29. Breaking through that invincible cavalry division of Iravat, desirous of victory and longing for paradise and endued with great strength,

30. Those Gandhara heroes formidable in battle cheerfully penetrated into it. Thereupon the highly puissant Iravat, beholding them very delightful,

31—32. Thus commanded his own warriors adorned with wonderful ornaments and weapons, saying:—'Adopt such measures by which these warriors of Dhritarashtra's son may all be destroyed with their weapons and vehicles.' Saying 'Yes,' all those warriors belonging to Iravat,

33. Slew in battle that division of your army difficult of being conquered by the enemy.* Beholding their division crushed by the division of Iravat,

34. The sons of Suvala not tolerating it in battle, rushing at Iravat, surrounded him on sides.

35. Piercing Iravat with sharp lances and urging their warriors against him, those heroes careered over the field creating a great confusion.

36. Then Iravat pierced with sharp lances by those high-souled warriors and covered with blood that was trickling down from his wounds, appeared like an elephant pierced with the hook.

37. Single-handed as he was, he was smitten sore by many, on his chest, his back, and his flanks; but O king he flinched not in consequence of his great patience.

38. Thereupon Iravat, conqueror of hostile cities, waxing wroth, piercing all of them with whetted shafts, deprived them of their senses.

39. Then drawing out all those lances from his own body, that subduer of enemies wounded the sons of Suvala in battle even with those very lances.

40. Then drawing his sharp sabre and holding his buckler, he (Iravat) quickly ran on foot desirous of slaying the sons of Suvala, in that battle.

41. Then all those sons of Suvala regaining consciousness, possessed by rage, once more rushed towards Iravat.

42. Iravat also proud of his strength, and displaying the lightness of his hands by whirling his sword, rushed against all those sons of Suvala.

43. Those sons of Suvala, riding on fleet chargers could find no opportunity for striking Iravat moving as he was with great agility.

44. Then beholding Iravat standing on foot on the ground, those warriors once more surrounding him close, endeavoured to capture him.

45. Then Iravat, that slayer of foes, beholding them very near to himself, with his sword, cut off their right and left arms (lit: with which they wielded their swords and their bows respectively), and also mutilated their bodies.

46. Their weapons and their hands furnished with these, fell down on earth, and they thenselves deprived of life and with their bodies mangled, fell down dead.

47. Only Vrisava, O mighty monarch, with his body mangled with wounds, escaped, with difficulty, alive from that most terrible combat destructive of heroes.

48. Then your son Duryodhana beholding all those heroes crushed, waxing wroth, said these words unto the Rakshasa of fearful appearence,

49. That fierce bowman, that subduer of foes, that one of great illusive energies, viz Alumvusha the son of Rishyasringa, who was the sworn enemy of Bhimasena, in consequence of the latter's slaughter of Vaka.

50. 'Behold O hero, how this puissant son of Arjuna, versed in illusions, has done me this terrible wrong in the shape of destroying my forces?

51. You are also, O sire, capable of going every where at your unrestrained will and are also versed in all weapons of illusion; you are moreover the sworn enemy of Pritha's son; so slay me this one in battle.'

52. Saying 'yea' (to Duryodhana's words), that Rakshas of terrible appearance rushed, uttering his war-cries, to the spot where the youthful son of Arjuna was.

53. Alamvusha was supported by the heroic lancers of his own division, all accomplished in smiting and well-mounted, skilful in fight, bearing resplendent lances.

54. He was desirous, O king, of slaying in battle the highly puissant Iravat, along with the two thousands excellent cavalry that survived the recent conflict.

55. The most agile and puissant Iravat also, that slayer of enemies, waxing wroth began to resist the Rakshasa who was desirous of slaying him.

56. That Rakshasa (Alamvusha) endued with great strength, beholding Iravat make towards himself, speedily began to put forth his illusions.

57. He then created, as many illusive chargers, all mounted by fierce Rakshasas, bearing in their hands lances and battle axes.

58. These two thousand well-disciplined smiters, advancing with wrath, and encountering Iravat's division, were both speedily despatched to the regions of the departed.

59. When both the divisions of Iravat and Alamvusha were slain in battle, those two heroes, both formidable in battle, encountered each other like Indra and Vritra.

60. Seeing that Rakshasa invincible in battle make towards himself, the highly puissant Iravat, excited with wrath, began to resist him;

61. And when the former had come very near to him, with his sword he cut off that wicked one's bow and shafts into five fragments each.

62. Seeing his bow severed, he speedily mounted on the sky, confounding as it were with his illusive powers Iravat who was greatly excited with rage.

63—64. Thereupon mounting on the sky, that unapproachable hero Iravat, versed in all duty and capable of assuming any from at will, confounding with his illusive powers that Rakshasa, cut off the latter's limbs in that battle. Thus was that foremost of Rakshasas cut into pieces again and again.

65. But, O mighty monarch, Alumvusha was again born anew, in the fulness of his youth. Illusion is natural with them (the Rakshasas) and their age and appearance are the result of their will.

66—67. Thus the limbs of the Rakshasa again and again cut to pieces, appeared very beautiful. Thereupon the enraged Iravat repeatedly cut that Rakshasa endued with great strength with his battle axe of exceeding sharpness. Cut like a tree by that powerful Iravat, that heroic

68. Rakshasa uttered a dreadful roar; that created a terrible sound. Cut with the strokes of the battle-axes, the Rakshasa shed blood profusely.

69. Thereafter that son of Rishyasringa possessed of great strength, beholding his puissant antagonist blaze forth in that battle, became inflamed with fury and put forth his own powers in that battle.

70. Assuming a dreadful and prodigious form he tried to capture the son of Arjuna, namely the illustrious Iravat.

71. In the very thick of the fight, before the very eyes of all the combatants, seeing that illusion put forth by that wicked-souled Rakshasa,

72. Iravat, highly excited with rage, himself began to create great illusions. Then when that unreceding hero was overwhelmed with rage in that battle,

73. A Naga related to him through his mother came to his support; surrounded on all sides by numerous Nagas, O king, in that battle,

74. That Naga, assumed a prodigious form mighty like that of Ananta himself. Thereafter with those innumerable and diverse kinds of Nagas, he covered the Rakshasa.

75. Thus surrounded by the Nagas, that foremost of the Rakshsas, reflecting for a while, assumed the form of Garuda and devoured all those serpents.

76. When that Naga, related to him through his mother's side had been thus devoured through the illusive powers of Alamvusha, Iravat became confounded and the Rakshasa slew him with his sword.

77. Then that Rakshasa felled on the earth the head of Iravat graced with ear-rings and a diadem, and effulgent like the moon or the lotus.

78. When that heroic son of Arjuna had been slain by the Rakshasa, the sons of Dhritarastra with all their partisan kings, were relieved of their anxiety.

79. In that great and dreadful battle between those two armies, awful was the carnage that then took place.

80. Horses and elephants, and foot-soldiers, mixing with one another, was slain by the tuskers; and car-warriors, and horse-soldiers, and tuskers were also slain in that battle by foot-soldiers.

81. Then, O king, in that dreadful engagement, divisions of foot-soldiers and car-warriors and numerous horses, belonging to your as well as their (Pandavas) host, were slain by car-warriors.

82. Meanwhile Arjuna also unaware o the fate of the son of his loins, slew in that battle those heroic kings who were engaged in supporting Bhisma.

83. Thereafter, O monarch, your warriors and the Srinjayas, by thousands, gave up their lives in battle slaying one another.

84. Car-warriors, with dishevelled hair, with their arrows, swords, and bows severed, fought on with their naked arms meeting one another.

85. The highly powerful Bhisma also shew in that battle mighty car-warriors with shafts capable of penetrating into the very vitals, agitating the whole host of the Pandavas.

86. By him (Bhisma) many warriors and tuskers, and horse-soldiers and car-warriors and steeds of Yudhisthira's army, were slain.

87. In that battle, O Bharata we beheld the prowess of Bhisma, of Bhimasena and also, O Bharata, of the son of Prisata.

88. The battle that that mighty bowmen of the Satwata race namely Satyaki, fought, was indeed very fierce. Beholding the prowess of Drona, the Pandavas were seized with terror.

89. 'Single-handed can this Drona slay us in battle with all our soldiers; what to speak of him when he is supported by a large body of warriors of world-spread renown.'

90. Even these were the words that the sons of Pritha said, O monarch, when, O foremost of the Bharatas, they were greatly afflicted by him in that fierce fight.

91. All the heroes endued with great strength, of those two armies, did not give or take quarter; they fought on as if possessed by Rakshasas or evil spirits.

92. And, O sire, the bowmen of your army and those belonging to the army of the Pandavas, were all excited to the highest pitch of fury. We indeed did not then find any one pay the least heed to his life in that battle destructive of heroes, and that resembled the fight of the Daityas themselves.

Thus ends the ninety-first chapter, the slaughter of Iravat, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XCII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA):—Contd.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. Describe to me, O Sanjaya, what the highly puissant sons of Pritha did when they heard that Iravat had been slain in battle.

Sanjaya said :—

2. Beholding Iravat slain in battle, the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha the son of Bhimsena, sent forth a terrible roar.

3. As he roared, the earth having the oceans for her raiments, with her mountains and forests, O king, quaked violently with the echo of his roars ;

4. As also the firmament and all the cardinal and subsidiary quarters. As your soldiers heard, O Bharata, that terrible uproar,

5. Their thighs were petrified and they trembled and perspired ; and O foremost of kings, all of them became depressed at heart.

6. And they fled on all sides like herds of elephants frightened by a lion. Then the Rakshasa, uttering those loud roars that resembled the rumble of the thunderbolt,

7. Balancing his resplendent trident, and assuming a dreadful appearance, and surrounded by foremost of Rakshasas of fearful mein and armed with diverse weapons,

8. Advanced, greatly excited with rage, like the Destroyer at the time of universal annihilation. Beholding that irate hero of dreadful apperance make towards himself,

9. And seeing also his own troops, one and all, turning their faces away from the field of battle from fear of that Rakshasa, king Dhuryodhana rushed against Ghatotkacha,

10—12 Grasping a bow with arrows fixed on the string and uttering his war-cries incessantly and loud. Behind him followed the ruler of the Bangas himself, supported by ten thousand elephants prodigious like the hills and with the temporal juice flowing down. Beholding your son surrounded by the elephant-division rush to battle, O mighty monarch, that night-ranger became inflamed with wrath ; then raged a combat, dreadful and hair-stirring,

13. Between the Rakshasa, O mighty monarch, and the division of Duryodhana. Beholding that elephant-division like a mass of clouds in the horizon,

14. The Rakshasas, highly enraged, rushed at it, with weapons in their hands, and uttering various war-cries, like clouds charged with lightning.

15. With arrows, darts, sabres, shafts, lances, mallets, and battle-axes, they began to slay the warriors fighting from the backs of elephants.

16—17. They slew those huge elephants with blocks of stones and large trees. We beheld, O mighty monarch, elephants with temples rent, and bodies bathed in blood and mangled with wounds, slain by those rangers of night. When that division of elephant-riders, was shattered and thinned in number, 18, Duryodhana himself, O mighty monarch, rushed against the Rakshasas, influenced by great animosity and heedless of his own life.

19. That highly powerful hero sped arrows of exceeding sharpness at those Rakshasas, and that fierce bowman slew many of the Rakshasas that were fighting there.

20—22. Your irate son Duryodhana, O foremest of the Bharatas, that mighty car-warrior slew with four shafts, the four Rakshasas viz Vigavanta, Maharoudra, Vidyutjwihva, and Pramathin. Once more, that one of immeasurable soul shot, O foremost of Bharatas, a shower of arrows incapable being buffled, at the host of the Rakshasas. Beholding, O sire, that marvellous feat achieved by sour son,

23. The highly powerful son of Bhimasena blazed forth with rage ; then stretching his mighty bow effulgent like the thunderbolt of Indra,

24. He rushed against the irate Duryodhana with violence. Beholding him rush forward like death incarnate urged on by the Destroyer himself,

25. Your son Duryodhana, O monarch, did not waver at all. Then Ghatotkacha with his eyes coppery in wrath thus addressed Duryodhana angrily saying :—

26. "This day will I liquidate the debt I owe to my fathers and mothers who had so bong been exiled by your heartless self.

27. The sons of Pandu, O monarch, were deceitfully defeated by you at a game of dice. The daughter of Drupada by name Krishna, while in her courses and so clad in one garment only,

28. O perverse-minded wretch, was was brought in the midst of the court-hall and was persecuted by you in various ways. While she was dwelling in her hermitage in the woods, out of a desire for compassing your good, the wicked-souled

29. Ruler of the Sindhus oppressed her disregarding my sires. O you the disgrace to your family, these and many other such insults

30. Will I this avenge, if indeed you do not fly forsaking the field of battle.' Having thus spoken, and stretching his mighty bow Hidimva's son,

31. Biting his lips with his teeth and licking the corners of his mouth, covered Duryodhana with a mighty shower of arrows, like clouds washing the mountain breast with torrents of rain in the rainy season.

Thus ends the ninety-second chapter, the fight of the son of Hidimva, in the Bhismabadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XCIII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then that shower of arrows, which it was difficult even for the Danavas to withstand, was borne by that foremost of kings Duryodhana, like a mighty elephant bearing a shower of rains.

2. Thereafter your son possessed with rage, and breathing like a snake was involved in a very hazardous situation in that battle, O foremost of the Bharatas.

3. Then he (Duryodhana) shot (at the Rakshasa), twenty five keen-pointed darts of exceeding sharpness ; those darts, O king, fell upon that foremost of Rakshasas with great force,

4. Like enfuriate snakes falling upon the mountain Gandhamadana. Pierced with those arrows, and shedding blood copiously like an elephant in rut (shedding the temporal juice),

5. That cannibal formed a fixed resolution for destroying the king. Thereafter the Rakshasa grasped a mighty lance, capable of penetrating even through rocks,

6. Blazing with effulgence, burning like a fierce meteor and resembling the flashes of lightning in radiance. That mighty-armed hero then desirous of slaying your son, raised that lance.

7. Beholding that lance raised, the ruler of the Bangas, speedily urged his elephant of proportions huge like a hill, against the Rakshasa.

8. This king, in that battle, riding on his excellent elephant of great strength and fleetness, reached the spot where Duryodhana's car was stationed ;

9. And he covered the car of your son Duryodhana with the body of his elephant. Seeing the way (to Duryodhana's car thus covered by the highly intelligence ruler of the Bangas,

10. Ghatotkacha, O mighty monarch, with eyes coppery in anger, sped that raised dart of great fierceness at the elephant.

11. Struck with that dart, O king, hurled by the hand of Ghatotkacha, the elephant bleeding profusely, fell down dead.

12. The mighty ruler of the Bangas quickly leaping up from his elephant, jumped down on the surface of the earth.

13. King Duryodhana seeing that excellent elephant felled and his army shattered, was overwhelmed with grief.

14. Holding before his mind's eye the paramount duty of a Kshastriya, and also from his own pride, king Duryodhana, though worsted, stood immovable like the everlasting hills.

15. Then placing on his bow-string whetted shafts blazing like the Fire of dissolution, and highly excited with rage, he discharged them at that dreadful ranger of the night.

16. Seeing those arrows falling like the thunderbolt of Indra, the high-souled Ghatotkacha foiled their aim by the alacrity of his movements.

17. Like clouds at the end of a Yuga, once more did he fiercely roar out, with eyes coppery in rage, striking terror into the hearts of all soldier.

18. Hearing that deafening roar uttered by the fearful Rakshasa, Bhisma the son of Santanu, coming to the preceptor Drona, addressed him saying :—

19. 'As I hear these dreadful roars uttered by the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha, I think it sure that the son of Hidimva is engaged with king Duryodhana himself.

20. In battle, this Rakshasa could not be conquered by any creature. So hie yourself to the king and rescue him. May good betide you.

21. That hero of eminent parts viz., Duryodhana has been assaulted by the high-souled Rakshasa. Now, O afflicter of foes, even this (to protect the king) is our incumbent duty."

22. Having heard the words of the grandsire, the mighty car-warriors, without delaying and at the top of their speed, rushed where the ruler of the Kurus was.

23. Drona and Somadatta, and Valhika and Jayadratha and Kripa and Bhurisravas, Salya and the two princes of Avanti and also Vrihadvala,

24. And Aswathaman, and Vikarna, and Chitrasena and Vivinsati,—these and thousands of other car-worriors, along with those that followed them,

25—26 Proceeded, desirous of rescuing your son Duryodhana who had been hotly pressed. Beholding that invincible division protected by many mighty car-warriors make towards himself with hostile intentions, that foremost of Rakshasas possessed of mighty arms, remained immovable like the Mountain Mainaka,

27. Holding a massive bow and surrounded by his relations armed with bludgeous and mallets, and diverse other kinds of weapons.

28. Then commenced a fierce engagement capable of making the hair stand erect, between those foremost amongst Duryodhana's host and those amongst the Rakshasa's kinsmen.

29. On all sides of the field of battle, the twanging of bows was heard, O mighty monarch, like the crackling of burning bamboos.

30. The din produced by the stroke of weapons against the armours of the combatants, resembled, O king, the sound produced by the rending of mountains.

31. The appearance of lances hurled by the arms of heroes was, O ruler of men, like that of serpents coursing swiftly through the welkin.

32. Thereafter excited to the highest pitch of fury, that foremost of Rakshasas possessed of mighty arms stretching his mighty bow, uttered a terrible yell.

33. He then burst asunder the bow of the preceptor Drona with a cresent-shaped arrow. Then with a broad-headed arrow, having crushed the standard of Somadatta, he broke out into another yell.

34. He pierced Valhika with three shafts, between his breasts; then he pierced Kripa with one shaft and Mitrasena with three.

35. With another well-directed and well-aimed shaft shot by his bow drawn to its fullest stretch, he struck Vikarna on the soldier-joint as the lattar neared him;

36—37. Then Vikarna, bathed in blood, squatted down on the terrace of his car. Thereafter that Rakshasa of infinite soul, excited with wrath, sped, O foremost of the Bharatas, five and ten darts at Bhurisravas; and these darts penetrating through the latter's armour stuck on the surface of the earth.

38. He also wounded the drivers of Vinvinsati and the son of Drona; both of them fell down on their seats in the car, loosening their grasp of the reins of steeds.

39. He cut down, O monarch, the standard of the king of the Sindhus bearing the device of the boar and decked with gold, with a crescent-shaped shaft; and with another, he burst the latter's bow asunder.

40. Then again with eyes red in rage, the Rakshasa slew with four lances the four steeds of the high-souled princes of Avanti.

41. Then, O mighty monarch, he pierced prince Vrihadvala with another sharp and well-tempered arrow, shot from his bow drawn to its fullest stretch.

42. That one (Vrihadvala) thus deeply pierced and smarting with pain, sat down on the terrace of his chariot. Then that lord of the Rakshasas possessed with furious wrath, and stationed on his car,

43. Shot many keen-pointed shafts of great sharpness that resembled snakes of virulent poison; these shafts, O mighty monarch, penetrated through Salya accomplished in battle.

Thus ends the ninety-third chapter, the fight of Hidimva's son, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XCIV.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Having made all your warriors turn their faces away from field of battle, the Rakshasa, O foremost of the Bharatas, assaulted Duryodhana out of a desire for slaying him.

2. Beholding him make towards the king with impetuousity, your warriors, all invincible in battle, rushed at him, desirous of doing away with him.

3. Those mighty car-warriors, stretching their bows that looked like large palmyar trees, and uttering their war-cries loud as the roars of the lions, rushed at him shooting weapons at him.

4. Then they covered him with an arrowy downpour, like clouds covering the moudtains with a downpour of rain in the rainy season.

5. Thus pierced sore, and greatly afflicted like an elephant smitten with the hook, the Rakshasa then at once rose to the sky like the son of Vinatal Garuda,

6. Then he uttered a loud roar that resembled the rumble of autumnal clouds; and that dreadful roar reverberated through the susidiary and cardinal points of the compass.

7. King Yudhisthira hearing those war-cries of the Rakshasa, thus spoke, O foremost of the Bharatas, to Bhimasena the subduer of foes.

8. "Surely the Rakshasa is fighting with mighty car-warriors of the host of Dhritarastra's son, in as much as we can hear, (even at this distance), the noise created by his fierce cries.

9. I also perceive that that foremost of Rakshasas has now to bear a burden unequal to his strength ; on the other hand, the grand-sire inflamed with rage is exerting for slaughtering the Panchalas.

10. For the protection of these latter, Phalguna is engaged with the foe. Having heard, O mighty armed hero, of these two tasks both of which demand prompt attention,

11. Hie yourself for rescuing the son of Hidimva involved in a great predicament." Accepting the words of his brother, without the least delay, Vrikodara

12. Proceeded to the battle, terrifying all the kings with his fierce war-cries, and, O king, with an impetuousity like that of the ocean in the days of the full moon or the new moon.

13. Him followed Satyadhri and Sanchitti ever invincible in battle, and Srenimat and Vasudhara and the puissant son of the king of the Kasis,

14. The sons of Droupadi, all mighty car-warriors headed by Abhimanyu, and Kshatradeva, the powerful Kshatradharman,

15. And Nila the sovereign of the low countries accompanied by his own divisions. They surrounded the son of Hidimva with a mighty division of cars.

16. With six thousand highly infuriated elephants, all potent smiters, those heroes began to protect Ghatotkacha that foremost of the Rakshasas.

17. These warriors made the very earth quake with their fierce war-cries, the clatter of their car-wheels, the sound produced by the hoofs of their galloping horses.

18. Hearing that noise of the assualting army, the warriors of the army of your sons, wore a pallid countenance being agitated with the fear of Bhimasena ;

19—20. And leaving Ghatotkacha alone, they turned back from the field of battle. But the combatants of your army and those of the enemy's host were both untreating ; so there once more ensued, O mighty monarch, a terrible battle, between these high-souled warriors. Mighty car-warriors hurling weapons of various shapes,

21. Rushed at one another and then smote down one another. Thus raged the most dreadful combat capable of inspiring terror into the hearts of the cowards.

22. Horse-soldiers encountered elephant-riders and foot-soldiers fought with the car-warriors ; challenging one another in battle they rushed against one another, O king.

23. In consequence of this onslaught of cars, horses, elephants, and infantry, a thick and impenetrable cloud of dust appeared, being raised by the car-wheels and tread of the foot-soldier.

24. Then the field of battle, O king, was shrouded by a thick cloud of dust of the reddish hue of smoke; and none was able to distingush between his friend and his foe.

25. Father could not distinguish his son nor the son his father, in that horripilating-carnage where no consideration was of any avail.

26. The clashing of weapons and the yells of men, O foremost of the Bharatas, created a fierce din, that resembled the roar of demons themselves.

27. On the field of battle a river started up into existence, of which the currents, were constituted by the gore of elephants, horses, and men, and the weeds and moss by the hair (of the warriors).

28. A deafening noise, like that produced by a shower of stones, was heard there, as the heads of the combatants fell on the field severed from their trunks.

29. The earth was covered with headless trunks with mutilated elephants and with horses with limbs mangled and hacked to pieces.

30. Mighty car-warriors, putting forth all their energies, rushed to smite down one another, hurling at the same time weapons of various kinds.

31. Urged on by their riders, encountering one another, horses dashed against one another, and fell down on the field deprived of life.

32. Combatants, with eyes crimsoned in rage, meeting one another, struck one another with their breasts, and thus killed one another.

33. Goaded on by their riders, elephants slew their hostile compeers with the ends of their tusks, in that battle.

34. These elephants decked with fluttering pennons and shedding blood in copious quantities, and bespattered with it, appeared like clouds adorned by forks of lightening.

35. Some of these with bodies mangled with tusk wounds, others with their temples rent by broad-headed shafts, careered all over the field roaring like roaring clouds.

36. Some with their trunks cut in twain, others with their bodies mutilated, fell down in that sanguinary battle, like mountains having their wings cut off.

37. Other huge elephants having their sides opened by their hostile compeers, copiously shed blood like mountains discharging liquified red chalk.

38. Others, slain with lances and pierced with Tomaras, with their riders killed, looked like mountains deprived of their crests.

39. Others, possessed with fury, and inflamed with shedding the temporal juice, and having none to restrain them, began to crush in that battle, horses and cars and soldiers by hundreds.

40. So also horses pierced with lances and darts by cavalry-soldiers, dashed against their assailants, as if agitating all the points of the compass.

41. Car-warriors born in noble families, and reckless of their lives, meeting their hostile compeers, fought on dauntlessly depending on their own excellent strength.

42. Those heroes accomplished in battle, O king, desirous of securing either fame or paradise, smote down one another in that fierce carnage, as if in a Sayambara.

43. When that hair-stirring comba was thus raging, the troops belonging to Dhritarastra's army were generally made to turn back their faces from the field of battle.

Thus ends the ninety-fourth chapter, the fight of Hidimva's son, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XCV.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. There upon king Duryodhana, seeing his own troops slain, inflamed with wrath, rushed against that subduer of foes namely Bhimasena.

2. Grasping a huge bow effulgent like the thunder-bolt of Indra himself, he covered the son of Pandu with a thick shower of arrows.

3. Fixing on his bow-string a crescent-shaped and exceedingly sharp arrow furnished with wings of down, and inflamed with rage, he burst assunder the bow of Bhimasena.

4. At this opportunity, that mighty car-warrior Duryodhana without the least delay placed on his bow-string another sharp arrow capable of penetrating even through the very mountains.

5. Then that mighty-armed hero, with that arrow struck Bhimasena on the breast. The latter thus pierced deeply, smarting with pain, and licking the corners of his mouth,

6. Cought hold of the staff of his standard decked with gold (for support). Thereupon Ghatotkacha seeing Bhimasena thus depressed,

7. Blazed up with rage, like a conflagration capable of consuming everything. The mighty car-warriors of the Pandava host headed by Abhimanyu,

8. Now rushed impetuously at the king uttering their fierce war-cries. Beholding those enraged warriors rush with impetuousity,

9. The son of Bharadwaja spoke these words to the mighty car-warriors of your army :—"Good betide youall ; hie yourselves and strive to rescue the king,

10. Who is now involved in a great predicament and is being sunk into the sea of danger. These irate car-warriors of the Pandava army, these fierce bow-men,

11. Placing Bhimasena at their head, are rushing at Duryodhana, hurling diverse kinds of weapons, determined to secure success,

12. Roaring out their fierce war-cries and frightening thereby the rulers of earth belonging to our party." Hearing these words of the preceptor, your warriors headed by Somadatta,

13. Rushed against the ranks of the Pandavas. Kripa, Bhurisravas, Salya, the son of Drona, Vivingsati,

14. Chitrasena, Vikarna, the ruler of the Sindhus, Vrihadvala aud the two Avanti princes, both great bow-men, all in a body surruounded the Kuru ruler (for the aiding him).

15. Proceeding only twenty steps, the Pandavas and the Dhartarastras began to stirke one another, out of a desire for slaying one another.

16. The mighty-armed son of Bharadwaja also, having spoken the above words, stretched his mighty bow and afflicted Bhima with twenty-six shafts.

17. Then again that hero of mighty-arms speedily covered him with a shower of arrows, like clouds covering the mountains with rains in the rainy season.

18. But the highly puissant Bhimasena, that fierce bow-man, without the least delay, pierced Drona in return in his left side with ten shafts of great sharpness.

19. Thus deeply pierced and overwhelmed with pain, the preceptor worn out as he was with age, squatted down on the terrace of his chariot being deprived of his consciousness.

20. Beholding him (Drona) highly pained, king Duryodhana himself and the irate son of Drona, both together rushed against Bhimasena.

21. Seeing them both rush against himself like the Destroyer him at the end of a Yuga, the mighty-armed Bhimasena speedily took up a mace;

22. And jumping down from his car he stood fixed like the immovable hills, uplifting his heavy mace that resembled the bludgeon of Death himself.

23. Beholding him stand with his uplifted mace like the crested Kailasa mountain, the Kuru king and the son of Drona, united together, rushed against him.

24. Thereupon the highly puissant Bhimasena also rushed with impetuousity against those two foremost of powerful heroes who were rushing unitedly against himself.

25. Beholding the enraged Bhima of terrible expression thus fall upon them, the mighty car-warriors of the Kourava host proceeded to meet him without delay.

26. Headed by the son of Baradwaja, those heroes, out of a desire for slaying Bhimasena, hurled at the latter's breast weapons of diverse descriptions.

27. Thus united together, they sorely pressed that son of Pandu (Bhima) on all sides. Beholding that mighty car-warrior thus involved in a predicament and thus afflicted,

28. The mighty car-warriors of the Pandava host, such as Abhimanyu and others, rushed forward desirous of rescuing him, setting their own dear lives at naught.

29. The heroic ruler of the low countries, that dear-loved friend of Bhima, by name Nila, of complexion blue like the clouds, excited with wrath, rushed at the son of Drona.

30. That fierce bowmen (Nila) ever longed for an encounter with the son of Drona. Now stretching his mighty bow he pierced with many a winged shaft the son of Drona,

31. Just as, O mighty monarch, in the days of yore, Sakra pierced the Danava Viprachchiti, invincible in battle and the terror of the celestials,

32. Who, possessed by rage, struck terror into the three worlds by the display of his energy. Thus pierced by Nila with well-directed shafts,

33. Drona's son, shedding blood profusely, became possessed with wrath; then drawing his wonderful bow whose twang resembled Indra's thunder,

34. That foremost of intelligent heroes resolved to slay Nila in battle. Thereafter fixing on the bowstring broaded-headed shafts, resplendent and variegated by the forger himself,

35. He (Drona's son) slew with these the four horses of Nila and cut down his standard too. With the seventh arrow, he pierced Nila himself on the chest.

36. Thus deeply pierced and sorely pained, Nila squatted down on the terrace of his car. Beholding king Nila, of appearance like a mass of blue clouds, thus confounded,

37. Ghatotkacha excited with wrath and surrounded by his kinsmen, impetuously rushed against Drona's son that ornament of battle.

38. Other inferior Rakshasas invincible in battle also rushed to the fight. Seeing that Rakshasa of dreadful aspect make towards himself,

39. The highly puissant son of Bharadwaja, without the least delay rushed against the former and excited with wrath he slew many Rakshasas of dreadful visage,

40. Who were stationed in the front of in Ghatotkacha ; beholding his own troops turn faces away from the field of battle, in consequence of the shafts shot from the bow of Drona,

41. The huge-bodied Gatotkacha, the son of Bhimasena became wrought up with rage, and brought into existence an awful and terrible illusion.

42. Then therewith that ruler of the Rakshasas of potent illusive powers, confounded in battle Drona's son. Then all your warriors were repulsed through the illusion of the Rakshasa.

43. They (your warriors) saw one another mangled and lying on the surface of the battle field, writhing in convulsions, distressed and weltering in their own blood.

44. Drona, Duryodhana, Salya Aswathaman, and other foremost bowmen of the Kourava host were seen to fly away from the field of battle.

45. All the car-warriors appeared to be smashed, the kings felled, the horses and cavalry hacked to pieces by thousands.

46. Beholding this (illusive) scene your warriors, O king, ran towards the encampments, although myself and Devavrata cried at the top of our voice saying, O king,

47. "Go on fighting, fly not, this illusion has been set forth by Ghatotkacha ?" But confounded as they were, they did not stop ;

48. They also did not believe the words we uttered, as they were inspired with terror. Beholding them fly, the Pandavas winning victory,

49. Began to shout their war-cries, being joined by Ghatotkacha himself. They uttered continued yells of triumph, which became mixed with the blare of conchs and sound of drums.

50. Thus it was that your whole army was broken and routed in all directions by the wicked-souled son of Hidimva at the time when the sun set.

Thus ends the ninety-fifth chapter, the display of illussion by Hidimva's son, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhishma Parva,

CHAPTER XCVI.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When that dreadful battle was over, king Duryodhana, approaching the son of Ganga, and saluting him with humility,

2. Began to describe everything that had taken place, namely, the victory won by Ghatotkacha, and the defeat he himself has suffered.

3. That invincible warrior, O king, then spoke these words, sighing repeatedly and addressing the grandsire of the Kurus namely Bhisma.

4. "Just as the son of Vasudeva has been relied upon by the foe, so relying upon yourself, I have commenced this dreadful war with the Pandavas, O lord.

5. My troops counting eleven Aukshahini in number, as also my own self, O grinder of foes, are all under your command.

9. Though thus supported, yet, O foremost of the Bharatas, I have been worsted in battle by the Pandava combatants headed by Bhimasena and dependent on Ghatotkacha.

7. This it is that is corroding my limbs like fire burning a withered tree. Therefore, O you of eminent parts, O slayer of foes, through your grace, I wish,

8. O gransire, to slay that worst of Rakshasas myself, mainly depending upon your invincible self. It behoves you to see that my wish is fulfilled."

9. Hearing, O foremost of the Bharatas, these words of the king, Bhisma the son of Santanu addressed these words to Duryodhana.

10, "Hear, O king the words that I shall speak to you, O scion of the Kuru race, about how you should conduct yourself, O grinder of foes.

11. O sire, O slayer of foes, you should ever carefully protect yourself in battle, under all circumstances. O sinless one, you should always engage with the very virtuous king Yudhisthira,

12. Or with Arjuna or with Bhimasena or with the twins Nakula and Sahadeva. Keeping in view the duty of a king, a king strikes another royal compeer.

13. Myself, Drona, Kripa, the son of Drona, Kritavarman of the Satwata race, Salya, Somadatta's son, the might car-warrior Vikarna,

14. Your heroic brothers headed by Dussasana,—we shall all fight with that highly puissant Rakshasa for your sake.

15—17. Or if you bear implacable hatred for that fierce prince of Rakshasas, let this ruler of earth namely Bhagadtta, who is equal to Indra in battle, encounter in battle that evil-minded one." Having thus addressed the king, Bhimsa eloquent in speech thus spoke to Bhagadatta even before that foremost of kings:—"Proceed, O mighty monarch, without delay, against the son of Hidimva, invincible in battle.

18. Putting forth all your energies do you resist that Rakshasa of cruel deeds before the eyes of these bowmen, even as Indra risisted Taraka in days gone by.

19. Your weapons are of celestial make and O represser of your foes, your prowess is divine. And before this, you have had encounters with many a host of Asuras.

20. O foremost of kings, you are a match for the Rakshasa in this fierce battle; and supported by your own divisions, O king, do you slay that foremost of Rakshasas."

21. Hearing these words of Bhisma the generalissimo of the Kouravas, Bhagadatta rushed towards the enemy uttering his war cries.

22. Beholding him rush like a mass of roaring clouds, the mighty car-warriors of the Pandava host inflamed with wrath advanced with impetuousity.

23. Bhimasena, Abhimanyu, the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha, the sons of Drupadi, Satyadhriti, Kshatradeva, and O sire,

24. Vasudeva, the ruler of the Chedis, the ruler of the Dasarnas,—all these warriors assaulted Bhagadatta. Bhagadatta also mounted on his elephant Supratika, charged these heroes.

25. Then ensued a dreadful combat of awful aspect, between the Pandava hosts and Bhagadatta's divisions, increasing the population of Death's domain.

26. Fleet arrows charged with energy and shot by car-warriors, O mighty monarch, began to fall on elephants and chariots.

27. Huge-elephants with rent temples and goaded on by their riders, approached and fell upon one another dauntlessly.

28. Excited to the highest pitch of fury and blind with shedding the temporal juice, those elephants approaching one another ripped one another open with the point of their tusks resembling hard bludgeons.

29. Horses, graced with long-flowing tails and mounted by lancers, urged on by their riders, vehemently dashed against one another totally undaunted.

30. Foot-soldiers struck by orther foot-soldiers with lances and darts, fell down on the ground by hundreds and thousands.

31. Car-warriors riding on their cars, O king, having slain many heroes with Karnis (barbed arrows) Nalikas (fire-arms) and shafts to began to vociferate their war-cries.

32. When that hair-stirring combat was thus raging, the fierce bowmen Bhagadatta assailed Bhimasena,

33. On his elephant with rent temples and with the temporal juice trickling down in seven distinct lines like so manay rillets flowing down the mountain breast.

34. That sinless one advanced on the neck of Supratika, scattering thousands of arrows, like the almighty Purandara riding on the Airavata.

35. That ruler of men afflicted Bhima with an arrowy down-pour, like clouds afflicting the mountains with a down-pour of rain at the end of the summer.

36. Then that fierce bowman Bhimasena excited with rage, slew with his showers of arrows those warriors numbering more than hundred who were engaged in protecting Bhagadattas feet.

37. Seeing them slain, the highly powerful Bhagadatta, inflamed with wrath, goaded his foremost elephant towards the chariot of Bhimasena.

38. Like an arrow shot from the bowstring, that elephant, O subduer of foes, directed by Bhagadatta, impetuously rushed against Bhimasena.

39. Beholding that elephant thus advance furiously, the mighty car-warriors of the Pandava host headed by Bhima assaulted it.

40. The five Kekaya brothers, Abhimanyu the sons of Draupadi, the heroic ruler of the Dasarhas, Kshatradeva, and O sire,

41. The ruler of the Chedis, and Chitraketu, all these powerful warriors wrought up with wrath, displaying their excellent weapons of celestial make,

42—44. Surrounded that single elephant on all sides. That huge elephant pierced with many shafts and shedding blood profusely, appeared beautiful like the king of mountains decked with red chalk solution. The ruler of the Dasarhas, mounted on an elephant prodigious like a mountain, dashed against the elephant of Bhagadatta. Beholding that elephant rush towards himself that foremost of elephants,

45. Namely Supratika withstood it like the banks of the ocean resisting its surging waves. Beholding the excellent elephant of the high-souled ruler of Dasarhà thus checked,

46. The troops of the Pandavas, all applauded Bhagadatta saying 'excellent' 'excellent' Thereupon the ruler of the Pragjyotisas waxing wrath, with fourteen lances,

47—48. Struck, O foremost of men, the elephant of the Dasarha king ; these lances penetrating the fine armour and caparisons of gold covering the elephant's body, entered into it like snakes entering into their holes on ant-hills. That elephant, O foremost of the Bharatas, thus deeply pierced and extremely pained,

49. With its fury quenched, turned back with great vehemence ; then that elephant uttering dreadful roars of agony ran,

50. Crushing the army to which it belonged, like the strong wind crushing the trees with its velocity. When that elephant of the Dasarha king was defeated, the mighty car-warriors of the Pandava host,

51. Uttering their war cries aloud, proceeded for battle. Then placing Bhima at their head they assailed Bhagadatta,

52—53. Shooting arrows and weapons of various descriptions and shapes. Thereupon hearing the war-cries of those advancing and irate warriors longing for vengance, that fierce bowman Bhagadatta dauntless through rage, goaded his own elephant.

54. That foremost of elephants, thus urged on by the press and stroke of the toe and the hook, in that battle became destructive like the fire of dissolution.

55. Then, O king, the elephant careered, hither and thither, and crushed divisions of cars and elephants and horses mounted by cavalry-soldiers.

56. It also crushed foot-soldiers by hundreds and by thousands. Thus agitated by it, that mighty army of the Pandavas,

57. Contracted, O monarch, like a piece of hide held over a blazing fire. Beholding his own army thus routed by the highly intelligent Bhagadatta,

58. Ghatotkacha excited to the highest pitch of fury, rushed against the former. That being of fierce aspect, with countenance and eyes flashing fire,

59. Burning with rage, assuming a dreadful form, took up a resplendent trident capable of rending even the mountains.

60. Then that highly powerful hero desirous of slaying the elephant, hurled the lance, emitting scintillations of fire from all sides.

61. Beholding that lance swiftly course towards the elephant, the ruler of the Pragjyotisas, sped a dreadful crescent-shaped arrow of exceeding sharpness and effulgence.

62. Then with that arrow, that hero endued with energy, cut off the fierce trident ; and that trident of golden effulgence then fell down on the ground divided in twain,

63. Like the mighty thunderbolt of Indra discharged by him, dropping through the skies. Then beholding that trident fallen and severed in twain, that ruler of the earth Bhagadatta,

64. Took up a lance furnished with a golden staff and blazing like the flames of fire, and then hurled it at the Rakshasa saying 'Stay' 'Stay.'

65. Beholding it course through the air like the thunderbolt itself, the Rakshasa lightly jumped up and caught hold of it uttering fierce war-cries.

66. Then before the very eyes of the Pragjyotisas, O Bharata, he broke it into pieces placing it on his thighs. This feat was indeed wonderful.

67. Beholding that mighty feat achieved by the puisssant Rakshasa, the celestials in the heavens, along with the Gandharvas and the sages were amazed.

68. The Pandavas also, O mighty monarch, headed by Bhimasena, filled the earth with their shouts of 'well-done' 'well-done.'

69. Hearing the roars of the delighted Pandavas of high soul, the highly powerful Bhagadatta that fierce bowman was unable to brook them.

70. Then stretching his mighty bow equal to the thunderbolt of Indra in effulgence, he assailed with vehemence the mighty car-warriors of the Pandavas,

71. Discharging, as he advanced, resplendent darts of exceeding sharpness and of the effulgence of fire. He pierced Bhima with one shaft and the Rakshasas with nine,

72. Abhimanyu with three, and the Kekayas with five. Then with a shaft of straight joints, shot from his bow drawn to its fullest length,

73. He pierced in that battle the right arm of Kshatradeva, and suddenly the latter's excellent bow with shafts fixed on the string fell down, loosend from the grasp.

74. Then again he pierced the five sons of Droupadi with five shafts, and inflamed with rage he slew the chargers of Bhimasena.

75. Then with three shafts he cut down Bhima's standard bearing the device of the lion, and with another three winged shafts he penetrated the latter's charioteer.

76, The charioteer Visoka thus deeply pierced and extremely pained by Bhagadatta in the conflict, squatted down on the terrace of the car, O foremost of the Bharatas.

77. Then O mighty monarch, that foremost of car-warriors Bhima, thus deprived of the use of his car, quickly leapt off from his excellent chariot wirh a mace in hand.

78. Beholding him with the uplifted mace resemble a crested mountain, your troops, O Bharata, were seized with panic.

76. At this juncture, O king, that son of Pandu, whose charioteer is Krishna, came destroying his foes right and left,

80. To that part of the field where those two foremost of the men, those two mighty car-warriors, viz Bhimasena and Ghatotkacha, father and son, were engaged with the ruler of the Pragyotisas.

81. Beholding his brothers, all mighty car-warriors, thus engaged in battle, that son of Pandu (Arjuna), O foremost of the Bharatas, joined the fight scattering his shafts on all sides.

82. Then that mighty car-warrior namely Duryodhana himself in all haste urged on his army teeming with chariots and elephants.

83. Thereupon that son of Pandu owning white steeds, rushed with velocity against the mighty army of the Kouravas that was speedily advancing.

84, Then in that combat, O Bharata, Bhagadatta also, crushing the ranks of the Pandavas with that elephant of his, assailed Yudhisthira himself.

85. Thereat, O sire, a fierce battle commenced between Bhagadatta on one side, and the Panchalas, the Srinjayas, and the Kekayas on the other, all with weapons upraised.

86. In the course of that combat, Bhimsena apprised Kesava and Arjuna of the slaughter of Iravat as it had happened.

Thus ends the ninety-sixth chapter, the prowess of Bhagadatta, in the Bhismabadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XCVII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Hearing his son Iravat slain, Dhananjaya, overwhelmed with grief and sighing like a snake,

2—3. Spoke, O king, these words addressing the son of Vasudeva, even on the field of battle. "Surely the high-minded Vidura of great wisdom divined beforehand this dreadful destruction of the Kurus and the Pandavas. It was therefore that he forbade king Dhritarastra.

4. Innumerable other heroes, O slayer of Madhu, have been slain by ourselves and the Kouravas in this sanguinary war.

5. For the sake of wealth, O foremost of men, vile deeds are being perpetrated. Fie on that wealth for the sake of which this destruction of kinsmen is being perpetrated.

6, Death is preferable, for him who has no wealth, to the acquistion of wealth by the slaughter of his kins-men. What good O Krishna, shall we reap, slaughtering these our kinsmen assembled together.

7. In consequence of the faults of Duryodhana and those of Sakuni the son of Suvala, and in consequence of the wicked counsels of Karna, the Kshatriyas are suffering destruction.

8. Now, O slayer of Madhu, do I realise what a great act of piety, O mighty-armed, one, did the king (Yudhisthira) do by begging of Suyodhana,

9. Either half of the kingdom or else five villages only. But the pervert Duryodhana turned deaf ears to our solicitations. Beholding these Kshatriyas, all brave warriors, prostrate on the surface of the earth.

10. I can not but reproach myself. Fie fie on the life of a Kshatriya. These Kshatriyas may consider me incapable of battling any longer,

11. But, O slayer of Madhu, this battle with my kinsmen does not at all please me. However, swiftly drive the horses towards the army of the sons of Dhritarastra.

12. I shall cross this ocean of battle incapable of being crossed by the strength of my arms. Surely, O Madhava, this is not the time for the display of feminine sentiments."

13. Thus spoken to by the son of Pritha, that slayer of hostile heroes Kesava, urged on those cream-coloured steeds endued with the fleetness of the wind.

14. Thereupon a deafening uproar was set up by your troops, O Bharata, like that of the ocean lashed into fury by the wind in the day of the new moon or the full moon.

15. Then in the afternoon, O mighty monarch, the battle that was fought between Bhisma and the Pandavas, resembled in its din the rumble of the rain cloud Parjanya.

16. Then your sons, O king, surrounding Drona like the Vasus encircling Vasava, assailed Bhimasena.

17. Thereafter Bhisma the son of Santanu, Kripa the foremost of car-warriors, Bhagadatta and Susarman rushed against Dhananjaya.

18. The son of Hridika and Valhika both assailed Satyaki. King Amvastaka encountered Abhimanyu.

19. The rest of the warriors, O mighty monarch, engaged with other great car-warriors of the hostile party. Then commenced an awful engagement whose aspect was indeed terrible.

20. Bhimasena beholding your sons, O ruler of men, in battle, blazed forth in anger like the sacrificial fire blazing forth with clarified butter.

21. Your sons, O king, covered that son of Kunti with a shower of arrows like clouds covering a mountain with torrents of rain during the rainy season.

22. Then, O ruler of men, when thus covered with arrows by your sons, that hero Bhima, agile as a tiger, began to lick the corners of his mouth.

23. Thereafter, O Bharata, he felled Vyudoraska with a sharp arrow furnished with a head like that of a horse-shoe; and the latter was deprived of his life.

24. Then again with an well-tempered and well-sharpened broad-headed shaft, he felled Kundalin, like a lion felling a small deer.

25. Then Bhima fixed on his bow-string arrows well-tempered and of exceeding sharpness. Getting near your sons, O sire, he let these arrows go with great lightness and with good aim.

26. These arrows sped by that firm bowman Bhimasena began to overthrow your sons, all mighty car-warriors, from their seats.

27. Bhima felled Anaghristti, Kunaveda, Vairata, Deerghalochana, Deerghavahu and Kanadhwaja.

28. When falling, these heroes, O scion of the Bharata race, appeared beautiful like blossoming mango trees falling down in the spring.

29. Then considering the highly puissant Bhima to be the Destroyer incarnate, the rest of your sons, O ruler of men fled with haste.

30. Then Drona covered that hero (Bhima) who had been consuming your sons, with a shower of shafts, like showers of rain covering the mountain breast.

31. Then indeed we beheld the wonderful proewss of the son of Kunti, in as much as, though opposed by Drona himself, he succeeded in slaughtering your sons.

32. Just as a heifer bears the shower of rain falling from the skies, so did Bhima bear the arrowy downpour discharged by Drona, like one undaunted.

33. Really, O mighty monarch, Vrikodara achieved marvellous feats, in as much as he succeeded in slaying your sons and opposing Drona simultaneously.

34. Then the elder brother of Arjuna played amidst your heroic sons like, O monarch, a powerful tiger roving amidst a herd of deer.

35. Just a wolf, remaining inside a herd of cattle, chases and terrifies them, so, in that battle, did Vrikodara crush and frighten your sons.

36. The son of Ganga, Bhagadatta, the mighty car-warrior Gotami's son, all opposed in battle Arjuna himself the son of Pandu.

37. Then that Atiratha checking the enemies' weapons with his own weapons, despatched many mighty heroes of the hostile rank to the regions of Death.

38. Then Abhimanyu with his shafts, deprived that foremost of car-warriors, viz king Amvasta of world-wide fame, of his car.

39. Deprived of his car and wounded by the illustrious son of Subhadra, he quickly jumped down from his car in shame and O lord of men.

40. Hurled his sword at the high-souled son of Subhadra. Thereafter that highly-powerful hero ascended the car of the son of Hridika.

41. Then that slayer of hostile hero, namely Abhimanyu, versed in all the modes of warfare, beholding the swiftly advancing sword, evaded its strake by the agility of his movements.

42. Beholding the sword thus baffled by the son of Subhadra, in that battle, the troops, O ruler of men, set up an uproar crying 'well-done' 'well-done.'

43. Other warriors of the Pandava host headed by Dhrishtadyumna himself, engaged with your warriors ; so also your warriors fought against the troops of the Pandavas.

44. Then when they were thus slaughtering one another mercilessly and achieving feats difficult of being accomplished, fierce was the battle that raged between your and their warriors.

45. In that battle the warriors, O sire, dragging one another by the hair, fought on striking one another with their finger-nails, their teeth, their blows and thighs,

46. Their sabres and palms and sinewy arms. Availing themselves of one another's weaknesses, they despatched one another to the regions of Death.

47. Father slew son and son slew father. In that battle men fought on making the best use of all their limbs.

48. Beautiful bows with their staves decked with gold, O Bharata, loosened from the hold of slain warriors, and precious ornaments,

49. And whetted shafts furnished with golden or argentine wings and cleansed with oil and resembling snakes that have recently cast of their slough, shone on the field (as they lay scattered thereon).

50. Swords with hilts made of ivory and decked with gold, and bucklers, belonging to bowmen, embossed with gold, lay scattered on the field, loosened from the grasp of their wielders.

51. Lances and darts and battle-axes, and javelins, all decked with gold and of golden hue,

52. And, O sire, beautiful coats of mail, heavy and light bludgeons, maces, battle-axes and small arrows,

53. And diverse-sharped, caparisons for elephants, and chamaras and fans and numerous bows variegated and decorated with gold, lay scattered on the field.

54. Men lying on the field with diverse weapons in grasp looked as if alive, though those mighty car-warriors were all deprived of the vital breaths.

55. With their bodies crushed with strokes of maces, their heads smashed with the blows of bludgeons, and thoroughly mangled by the cars and elephants and steed, men lay on the field.

56. Then the surface of the earth covered over with carcasses and corpses of of men and elephants and steeds, appeared, O king, as if covered with hillocks.

57.—58 The field of battle was strewn over with fallen darts, swords, arrows, lances, sabres, axes, piked stakes, iron crows, battle-axes, clubs and bludgeons, and Sataghnees and bodies mutilated with weapons.

59. O slayer of enemies, the earth covered with some warriors silent in death, with others weltering in their blood and with some again moaning feebly, became highly beautiful.

60—61. O Bharata, the field of battle assumed a beautiful aspect, being strewn over with arms of mighty warriors smeared with sandal-paste and adorned with leathern fences and bracelets, as also with well-shaped thighs resembling the trunks of elephants, and with severed heads of large-eyed combatants, graced with gems and ear-rings.

62. Covered over with blood-soiled armours and golden ornaments, the field of battle appeared most beautiful as if scattered over with fires of mild flames.

63. With ornaments of various kinds loosened from their places, with bows fallen about, with shafts of golden wings lying about,

64. With many broken cars decked with rows of bells, with numerous slain steeds bespattered with gore and their tongues protruding,

65. With car-bottoms, and standards, quivers, pennons, huge milk-white conchs, belonging to mighty warriors,

66. With trunkless elephants, scattered on the field, the earth appeared charming like a damsel adorned with various sorts of ornaments.

67—68. Then also with other elephants pierced with lances and pained to the extreme, and repeatedly uttering shrieks of agony with their trunks, the field of battle appeared beautiful as if covered with moving mountains. With blankets of various colours, and caparisons of elephants,

69. With well-shaped hooks having their handles decked with lapises, with bells of huge elephants scattered here and there,

70. With clean housings of wonderful workmanship, with the skins of Ranku deer, with beautiful neck-laces and golden girths,

71. With many broken implements of war, with golden darts, with many gold-fringed breast-plates of steeds soiled with dust,

72. With severed arms of horse-soldiers, adorned with bracelets and scattered about, with well-polished lances of keen-points and with resplendent swords,

73. With variegated turbans fallen off and lying about, with wonderful crescent-shaped arrows of golden effulgence,

74. With housings of steeds, with skins of Ranku deer, torn and soiled, with beautiful and precious gems that had graced the turbans of the kings,

75. With umbrellas, and chamaras and fans scattered about, with moon-like or lotus-like faces of warriors conspicuous with charming ear-rings,

76. And graced with well-clipped beards, and beautified, O king, with Kundalas of golden effulgence,

77. The earth looked like the sky bespangled with the stars and the planets. Thus, O Bharata, the two mighty armies crushed one another,

78. Encountering one another in battle. When, O Bharata, the two armies were crushed and exhausted and completely broken,

79. The hideous pall of night fell over the earth and the fight could no longer be discerned. Then the Kurus and the Pandavas withdrew their forces from the field.

80. When that hideous night, fierce and dreadful, set in, both the Kurus and the Pandavas, having withdrawn their forces, entered their encampments and retired to their respective tents.

Thus ends the ninety-seventh chapter, the withdrawal of the forces in the eighth day's fight, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XCVIII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then king Duryodhana, Sakuni the son of Suvala, your son Dussasana and the invincible son of Suta,

2. These assembled together, O monarch, began to consult as to 'how could the sons of Pandu with their partisans be conquered in battle.'

3. Thereafter king Duryodhana, addressing the son of Suta and the highly powerful son of Suvala, spoke to all his counsellors thus :—

4. "Even Drona, Bhisma, Kripa, Salya, and the son of Somadatta cannot withstand the sons of Pritha in battle. I know not what the cause may be.

5. Thus unslain, they (the Pandavas) are every day reducing my troops in great number. Therefore, O Karna, I am becoming weaker in strength, and my store of weapons is also being exhausted.

6. I am deceived by the warlike Pandavas, who cannot even be slain by the celestials themselves. I am doubtful of the means as to how to smite them down in battle." To these words of the ruler of men, O king, Suta's son replied :—

Karna said :—

7. "Grieve not, O foremost of the Bharatas, I will compass your pleasure. Let Bhisma the son of Santanu be speedily withdrawn from the battle.

8. When, O scion of the Bharata race, the son of Ganga shall cease to fight, and when he shall lay aside his weapons, I will slay the sons of Pritha together with all the Somakas,

9. In the battle even before the eyes of Bhisma himself. O king, I pledge my troth for this. Bhisma always uses the Pandavas liniently.

10. Bhisma also is incapable of conquering these mighty-car-warriors (the Pandavas) in battle. Moreover Bhisma is proud in battle and is very fond of battle.

11. How could he, O sire, then conquer the Pandavas who have mustered a mighty force. Therefore, without the least delay, hying yourself towards the tent of Bhisma,

12. Persuade that venerable and old hero to lay aside his weapons. Thus when Bhisma will lay aside his weapons, you shall see the Pandavas slain,

13. With all their kinsmen and allies, by my single self in battle"

Sanjaya said :—

Thus spoken to by Karna, your son Duryodhana,

14—15. Then said these words addressing his brother Dussasana :—'Look to it, O Dussasana, that all my retinue may without delay be dressed and ready'. Having thus spoken, O king, to Dussasana, that ruler of men addressed Karna saying :

16. "Having persuaded that foremost of men, Bhisma, to withdraw himself from the battle, I shall soon come back to you, O repressor of foes.

17. When Bhisma will be withdrawn from the fight, you shall slay the Pandavas in battle." Then, O ruler of men, your son, without any more loss of time, set out,

18—19. Accompained by his brothers, and looking like Indra surrounded by the celestials. Thereafter, his brother Dussasana, helped that foremost of kings equal to a tiger in strength, to mount on his steed. Decked with bracelets, with a diadem on his head, and, O king, his arms graced with other ornaments,

20—22. That son of yours, O monarch, shone brightly as he went towards Bhisma's tent. Smeared with fragrant sandal paste of the colour of vandi flowers and of the effulgence of gold, and vested in dirtless raiments, and proceeding with the playful gait of the lion, O king, Duryodhana appeared beautiful like the bright-rayed orb of day in the skies. As that foremost of men (Duryodhana) proceeded towards the tent of Bhisma,

23. Numerous fierce bowmen of world-wide fame with bows in hand, as also his brothers all mighty bowmen, followed him like the celestials following Vasava.

24. Mounted on other horses, elephants and chariots, other foremost of men, O Bharata, surrounded him on all sides.

25. Many of his friends bearing weapons came there for protecting the king, and they accompained him like the celestials accompanying Indra in heaven.

26. Thus honoured by the Kurus, that highly puissant king of the Kurus repaired to the son of Ganga of illustrious fame,

27—28. Followed and surrounded by his uterine brothers, he proceeded, raising his right arm sinewy like the trunk of the elephant and capable of crushing all his foes, and therewith accepting the homages offered by men on all sides with their raised and folded palms.

29. He heard sweet words uttered by the assembled inhabitants of various countries. That illustrious one was applauded and eulogised by the bards and minstrels.

30—31. That lord paramount of all men honoured all these men in return. Many high-souled persons then sorrounded him on all sides with golden lamps, lighted and fed with fragrant oil. Thus surrounded by those lighted lamps made of gold, king Duryodhana,

32. Shone resplendent like the moon surrounded by blazing mighty planets. Then attendants, graced with golden turbans, and bearing canes and Jharjharas in their hands,

33. Gradually cleared the crowd that surrounded the king on all sides. Thereafter, the king, reaching the beautiful tent of Bhisma,

34. And then descending from his horse, that ruler of men approached Bhisma. Thereafter doing obeisance to Bhisma, he seated himself on a beautiful seat,

35. Made of gold, of exquisite workmanship and overspread with an excellent coverlet. Then he thus spoke to Bhisma, with his palms folded, his voice choked in grief and his eyes bathed in tears.

36. "Relying upon you, O slayer of foes, we are even capable of vanquishing in battle the celestials and the Asuras united together, with Indra at their head,

37. What to speak of the sons of Pandu though they may be warlike and supported by their friends, allies, and kinsmen. Therefore, O son of Ganga, O lord, it behoves you to be merciful on me.

38. Do you slay the heroic sons of Pandu like the great Indra slaying the Danavas. 'O monarch, I shall slaughter all the Somakas,

39. The Panchalas, the Kekayas, along with the Karushas, O Bharata.' These were your words to me, verify them by slaying the assembled sons of Pritha,

40. As also the Somakas, all fierce bowmen. Prove, O Bharata, the truth of your words. But if out of mercy, or out of your hatred, O lord,

41. For my unfortunate self, you are inclined to spare the sons of Pandu, then permit Karna, that ornament of battle, to join the fight.

42. He will conquer the sons of Pirtha together with all their friends, allies and kinsmen." Having thus spoken, your royal son Duryodhana stopped, without saying no other word to Bhisma of dreadful prowess.

Thus ends the ninety-eighth chapter, the colloquy between Bhisma and Durycdhana, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER XCIX.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA) :—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thereupon the high-souled Bhisma, thus deeply pierced by the dagger-like words of your son and overwhelmed with grief, spoke not even a single disagreeable word to your son.

2. Thus mutilated with those 'wordy daggers' and sighing like a snake, and meditating for a while, and possessed with rage and sorrow,

3. And raising, out of wrath, his two eyes, as if, O Bharata, desirous of consuming the universe with the celestials, the Gandharvas, and the Asuras, that foremost of those learned in the ways of the world (viz Bhisma),

4. Coolly addressed these words to your son:—"Why, O Duryodhana, are you piercing me with these harrowing words of yours,

5. Me who am ever endeavouring, to the best of my abilities, to accomplish what will be for your benefit, me who am ready to lay down my very life in battle, for doing good to you?

6. Is not this the sufficient indication (of his invincibility) that heroic son of Pandu (Arjuna), gratified Agni by allowing it to consume the Khandava forest, after having vanquished his opponents in battle?

7. When, O mighty-armed hero, that son of Pandu released, with force, you captured by the Gandharvas, that indeed is indication enough (of his prowess.)

8. On that occasion, when all your uterine brothers of great heroism, as also, O lord, Radha's son of Suta race had fled forsaking you, the rescue effected by Arjuna is indeed indication enough of his prowess.

9. That in the kingdom of Virata, single-handed, he encontered our assembled host is indication enough.

10. That vanquishing the wrathful Drona and myself in battle, he succeeded in taking off our raiments, is indication enough.

11. That he conquered the great bowman, the son of Drona, as also the son of Saradwata on the occasion of the capture of Virata's kine, is indeed indication enough.

12. That conquering Karna ever bragging of his manliness, he gave his robes to Uttara is a sufficient indication.

13. That the son of Pritha vanquished in battle the Nivatakavacha brothers difficult of vanquishment by Indra himself is indication enough of his valour.

14. What man is capable of conquering the mighty son of Pandu, who is protected by the Protector of the worlds, the wielder of the conch, discus and the mace divine.

15. The son of Vasudeva is of infinite prowess, and is the Destroyer of this creation. He is the Lord of all, the God of Gods, the Supreme Soul and Eternal.

16. Diversely, O king, has He been described by Narada and other illustrious sages. But through your folly, O Suyodhana, you do not seem to recognise what you should do and what you should not.

17. A man on the brink of death sees everything to be made of gold; so also, O son of Gandhari, you see everything to be invested with a yellow hue.

18. You have yourself sowed implacable enmity between yourself on the one side and the Pandavas and Srinjayas on the other. Let us now see you fight with them in battle. Display your manliness.

19. I, however, O foremost of men, shall slay the assembled Panchalas and Somakas excepting only Sikhandin.

20. Either slain by them in battle, I shall go to the mansion of Death or slaying them I shall afford delight to you.

21. In the palace of Drupada, Sikhandin was first born as a woman; then through the virtue of a boon he became a male being. This one is the Sikhandini of old.

22. Even if I were to loose my life, O Bharata, I shall not slay him. This one is the same Sikhandini whom the creator made a female.

23. Pass the night in tranquil sleep, O son of Gandhari; tomorrow I shall fight a terrible fight, of which men shall speak so long as the earth will endure."

24. Thus spoken to, your son, O ruler of men, came out and saluting the reverend signor, with his head, he (your son) repaired to his own tent.

25. Thereafter the king, reaching his own tent, and ordering his illustrious officers to retire, that destroyer of foes entered his own camp.

26. There in his tent that ruler of men passed the night. When the night had passed away, the king, rising at the break of day,

27. Ordered, his royal warriors saying:—'Arrange the forces in battle-order. To-day, waxing irascible in battle, Bhisma shall slay the Somakas.'

28. Having heard those copious lamentation of Duryodhana in the night, and regarding them, O king, as commands to himself,

29. The son of Santanu was greatly depressed; and he censured the life of dependency and reflected for a long time, desirous of encountering Arjuna in battle.

30. Coming to know from outward expressions what the son of Ganga had been thinking of, Duryodhana, O mighty monarch ordered Dussasana saying:—

31. "O Dussasana, without delay draw up our chariots for protecting Bhisma. Urge to battle all our two and twenty divisions.

32. Even that for which we have been longing all these years, have now come to pass, viz, the slaughter of the Pandavas with all their troops and the acquisition of the kingdom by ourselves.

33. Therefore, I now consider our highest duty to be the protection of Bhisma. Protected and assisted by us, he will slay the Parthas in battle.

34. That pure-souled one had said :— 'I will not slay Sikhandin ; for this one was a female before, O king, so I should avoid him in battle.

35. All the world know, that to compass the pleasure of my father, O mighty armed one, I formerly relinquished a swelling kingdom and the company of woman.

36. Therefore, O foremost of men, I will not slay in battle females or those who were females before. I tell this truly.

37. Before the commencement of the battle I have told you,—and you have heard —that this Sikhandin was born formerly as a female and was called Sikhandini.

38. Born as a female child she has come to be a man. If now I am to fight with him I will sped my shafts towards him on no account.

39. I will, O sire, slay all other Kshatriyas in battle, who, desirous of victory to the Pandavas, shall happen to encounter me in the van of the battle.'

40. Thus did that foremost of the Bharatas, accomplished in the vedas, namely the son of Ganga address me. So I consider our foremost duty to be the protection of Ganga's son to the best of our abilities.

41. If left unprotected, in a great forest, even a wolf can slay a lion. We should not allow Ganga's son to be slain by Sikhandin like a lion slain by a wolf.

42. Our maternal uncle Sakuni, Salya, Kripa, Drona, and Vivinsati, should protect, putting forth their best energies, the son of Ganga. If he is duly protected, victory indubitably will be ours."

43. Hearing these words of Duryodhana, all those warriors surrounded on all sides with a host of cars, the son of Ganga.

44. Then your sons, surrounding Ganga's son, proceeded to battle shaking the earth and the heavens and agitating the Pandavas.

45. The mighty car-warriors of the Kurus, clad in armour, and supported by those cars and many elephants, formed themselves in battle-array encircling Bhisma.

46. Protecting that mighty car-warrior Bhisma, they stood like the celestials protecting the wielder of the thunder-bolt in the battle between themselves and the Asuras.

47—49. Thereafter king Duryodhana addressing his brothers once more said :— "Yudhamanyu protects the left wheel of Arjuna's chariot and Uttamaujas protects the right. Thus protected, Arjuna protects Sikhandin. O Dussasana, so arrange, that Sikhandin, thus protected by Arjuna, may not slay Bhisma left unprotected by ourselves." Hearing the words of his brothers, your son Dussasana,

50. Placing Bhisma at the van proceeded to battle, surrounded by the troops. Beholding Bhisma thoroughly encompassed by a host of cars,

51. Arjuna, the foremost of car-warrior said to Dhristadyumna ;—"Let, O Prince of the Panchalas, Sikhandin, that foremost of men be placed face to face with Bhisma. I myself will be his protector, O prince.

Thus ends the ninety-ninth chapter, the colloquy between Duryodhana and Dussasana in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER C.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thereafter, Bhisma the son of Santanu advanced with his troops ; and he formed his own troops in the array known as Sarvatobhadra.

2. Kripa, Kritavarman, the mighty car-warrior Saivya, Sakuni, the ruler of the Sindhus, and Sudakshina, the ruler of the Kamvojas,

3. All these, O Bharata, accompanied by Bhisma, and along with your sons stationed themselves in the van of all the troops, and in the very head of the Kaurava array.

4. Drona, Bhurisravas, Salya and Bhagadatta, O sire, clad in mail, stood defending the right wing of that array.

5. Aswathaman, Somadatta, and the two princes of Avanti, both mighty car-warriors, supported by a large division, defended the left wing.

6. King Duryodhana, surrounded by the Trigarttas on all sides, stood, O monarch, O Bharata, in the centre of the array facing the Pandavas.

7. That foremost of car-warriors Alamvusha, and the mighty car-warrior Srutayulha, cased in armour, stood in the rear of the array behind all the troops.

8. Thus, O Bharata, your warriors, having formed this mighty array and cased in armour, appeared as if leaping forward.

9. Then king Yudhisthira and that son of Pandu, Bhimasena, and Nakula and Sahadeva the two sons of Madri,

10. All cased in mail, stood in the van of their array at the front of all the troops. Dhristadyumna, Virata, the mighty car-warrior Satyaki.

11. All these warriors stood prepared for battle, with their mighty divisions desirous of destroyiug the ranks of the enemy. Sikhandin, Arjuna, the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha,

12. The mighty-armed Chekitana, the highly puissant Kuntivoja, all these, O mighty monarch, stood ready for fight, surrounded by their large divisions.

13. That fierce bow-man Abhimanyu, the highly powerful Drupada, and the Kekaya brothers, cased in armour, stood ready for combat.

14. Thus the heroic Pandavas forming this mighty and invincible counterarray, stood, cased in mail, prepared for the ensuing struggle.

15. Your warriors, O king, supported by large divisions and placing Bhisma at their head, charged, putting forth all their energies, the sons of Pritha on the field.

16. So also, O king, the Pandavas headed by Bhimasena himself, and desirous of wining victory, rushed to battle with a view to encounter Bhisma.

17. With their war-cries and confused uproars and the blare of Krakachas and sound of drums, cymbals, cow-horns, and panavas, and the roars of their elephants.

18. And with fierce yells, the Pandavas rushed to battle. With the sound of our drums, cymbals, conchs, Dunduvis,

19. With fierce war-cries, and other kinds of shouts, hastily did we advance to meet the foe,

20. All inflamed with rage. Thereupon ensued an awful and fierce engagement, in which the soldiers, rushing at one another, smote one another down.

21. Then the earth began to tremble with the loud din. Birds uttering fierce shrieks hovered over our heads.

22. The sun that had risen in all splendour, now became bedimmed in effulgence; and dreadful winds began to blow portending ominous results.

23. Fearful jackals yelling terribly roved there, harbingering, O mighty monarch, a great carnage.

24. The points of the compass, O king, appeared to be blazing, and showers of stone began to fall, as also showers of bones mixed copiously with blood.

25. Tears dropped from the eyes of the animals that were all weeping; and O ruler of men, preyed upon by anxiety, they frequently discharged urine.

26. O foremost of the Bharatas, fierce war-cries of heroes were drowned by the terrible uproar uttered by Rakshasas and cannibals.

27. Jackals, vultures, crows and dogs yelling various shrieks, began, O sire, to pounce and swoop down upon the ranks of soldiers.

28. Blazing meteors, striking against the solar disc, began to drop down suddenly on earth portending mighty terrors.

29. Thereafter the two mighty arrays of the Pandavas and the Kouravas, during that dreadful fight, began to shake owing to the tremendous din produced by the blare of conchs and the sound of drums, like forests shaken by the tempest.

30. The din that was produced by the two armies teeming with royal warriors, and horses, which have encountered each other in an inauspicious moment, became deafening, like that made by the ocean when it is lashed into fury by the tempest.

Thus ends the hundredth chapter, the sighting of omens, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CI.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thereafter the generous hero Abhimanyu borne by excellent steeds of tawny colour, rushed against the mighty divisions of Duryodhana,

2—3. Showering an arrowy downpour like the clouds showering rain. All your warriors, O scion of the Kuru race, were not able to resist that slayer of foes, that enraged son of Subhadra, who had then, armed with weapons, plunged into the illimitable ocean of the Kaurava army.

4. Arrows capable of crushing the foes, O king, being discharged by him in that battle, conveyed many heroic Kshatriyas to the mansion of the king of the departed.

5. Inflamed with rage, Subhadra's son discharged in that battle fierce arrows that resembled the mace of Death, and blazing snakes of virulent venom.

6. That son of Phalguna, soon shattered into pieces may cars with their rider and many elephant-warriors with the elephants they rode upon.

7. When he was achieving these wonderful feats in battle, the rulers of earth greatly delighted worshipped and applauded the son of Phalguna.

8. That son of Subhadra, O Bharata, scattered your divisions, like the tempest scattering a heap of cotton on all sides in the firmament.

9. Thus scattered by him, your troops, O Bharata, could not find a protector, like elephants sunk deep in mire.

10. Thus routing all your troop, O foremost of men, Abhimanyu stood, O king, like a blazing fire with not a streak of smoke.

11. Your troops, O king, could not bear that slayer of foes, like insects failing to bear a blazing fire, when urged on by Fate.

12. That mighty car-warrior of the Pandava host smiting all his opponents, appeared like Vasava the wielder of the thunder-bolt.

13. His bow of golden stave, moving on all sides, appeared beautiful, O king, like flashes of lightning illumining the rain-clouds.

14. Arrows, well-sharpened and well-tempered, shot from that bow, in that battle, appeared, O king, like flights of bees coming out from a blossoming tree in a forest.

15. When that high-souled son of Subhadra thus careered through the field on his car of golden sides, his foes could not detect any weakness in him.

16. Confounding Kripa, Drona, Drona's son of great prowess, and the ruler of the Sindhus, that fierce bow-man began to move with celerity and grace on the field of battle.

17. When, O Bharata, he thus consumed your ranks, I saw his bow drawn as to resemble a circle and the solar disc of effulgence.

18. Beholding him fall upon them with celerity, the heroic Kshatriyas considered, in consequence of the feats accomplished by him, that the world contained two Phalguna.

19. Thus crushed by him, O monarch, the mighty army of the Bharatas, reeled here and there like a woman intoxicated with drink.

20. Thus shattering the mighty hostile army and causing the mighty car-warriors to tremble, the delighted his forces like Vasava (delighting the gods) having conquered Maya.

21. Crushed by him, your troops in that battle, uttered terrible cries of distress resembling the rumbling of the rain clouds.

22. Then O Bharata, hearing that fierce distressful shriek uttered by your troops, that resembled the roar of the tempest-tossed ocean in a Parva,

23. Your son Duryodhana, O king, addressing Rishyasringa's son said :—'Single-handed the nephew of Krishna, O mighty-armed hero, like a second Phalguna,

24. Is tossing in rage my army like Vritra tossing the celestial host. I do not see any other efficacious medicine for him in battle,

25. Save and except, O foremost of the Rakshasas, your ownself who have seen the end of all learning. So encountering without delay the heroic son of Subhadra, do you slay him in battle.

26. We on the other hand headed by Bhisma and Drona shall slay Arjuna in battle." Thus spoken to that prince of the Rakshasas, possessed of might and prowess,

27. Complying with the commands of your son, speedily rushed to battle uttering deafening roars like those of clouds in the rainy season.

28. In consequence of those fierce roars of his, the mighty army of the Pandavas became agitated in all parts, like the ocean becoming agitated by the tempest.

29. Many were they, O king, who terrified at his roars, fell down on the surface of he earth giving up their dear lives.

30, The nephew of Krishna, filled with delight grasping a bow with arrows fixed on the string, rushed against the Rakshasa, as if dancing in the terrace of his car.

31. Then that Rakshasa, encountering the son of Arjuna, began to crush, in rage, the latter's divisions even, those that were not far from him.

32. Thus slaughtering the vast army of the Pandavas, the Rukshasa rushed at it like Vala rushing at the celestial host.

33. Great was the carnage that was produced, O sire, in the ranks of the enemy, when they were assailed and slaughtered by the Rakshasa of fearful aspect.

34. Then with a thousnnd arrows, the Rakshasa routed the vast army of the Pandavas, displaying the superiority of his prowess.

35. Thus slaughtered by that Rakshasa of dreadful expression, the division of the Pandavas fled in all directions out of great apprehension.

36. Thus crushing the troops in battle like an elephant crushing a lotus, that highly puissant Rakshasa rushed against the sons of Draupadi.

37. Thereat inflamed with rage, the sons of Draupadi, all mighty bowmen accomplished in smitting down the foe, rushed against the Rakshasa, like the five planets rushing at the sun.

38. Then that foremost of the Rakshasas sorely afflicted by those warriors endued with prowess, appeared like the moon afflicted by the five planets at the time of the dreadful dissolution at the end of a Yuga.

39. Then the highly powerful Prativindhya penetrated the Rakshasa with whetted arrows, sharp as battle axes and with keen points.

40. With his armour penetrated by those arrows, that foremost of the Rakshasas appeared beautiful like a mass of rain cloud fringed by the rays of the solar orb.

41. Struck with those arrows furnished with golden wings, the son of Rishyasringa, O king appeared beautiful like an immovable hill with its crest on fire.

42. Thereafter the five brothers, in that fierce conflict, afflicted that foremost of the Rakshasas, with whetted shafts furnished with golden wings.

43. Thus pierced by those dreadful arrows resembling furious snakes, Alamvusha, O king, became infuriated like a prince of elephants.

44. Thus, O monarch, deeply pierced and sorely afflicted by those mighty car-warriors within a few moments, the Rakshasa remained unconscious in a swoon for, a long time.

45. Thereafter regaining consciousness, and swelling through fury to double his dimensions, the Rakshasa cut off the bows, arrows and standards of his adversaries.

46. Then that mighty car-warrior Alamvusha as if dancing on the terrace of his car, wounded every one of the brothers with five shafts each, smiling all the while.

47. Then that highly powerful Rakshasa excited to the highest pitch of fury slew the steeds and charioteers of his high-souled foes, with great activity.

48. Then again, waxing wroth, he pierced them with arrows duly-whetted, of diverse shapes, and discharged by hundreds and thousands.

49. Then that Rakshasa that ranger of the nights, depriving those mighty champions of their cars, rushed against them desirous of slaying them.

50 Seeing his brother thus afflicted by the wicked-souled Rakshasa in battle, the son of Arjuna rushed against the former.

51. Then between them commenced a combat that resembled that between Vritra and Vasava. Your troops as also those of the Pandavas, all mighty car-warriors, then began to look at that fight.

52. Those two highly powerful heroes, O monarch, meeting one another in dreadful fight, both burning with rage and with eyes red in rage,

53. And both resembling the All-destructive fire, began to eye one another. That encounter between them became dreadful and destructive of forces, like that in the days of old, between Sakra and Samvara, during the battle between the gods and the demons.

Thus ends the hundred and first chapter, the commencement of the ninth day's fight, the encounter between Alamvusha and Abhimanyu, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA.)—Contd.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. How, O descendant of the Bharata race, did Alamvusha fight with the heroic son of Arjuna who had been slaying mighty car-warriors in battle?

2. How did also the son of Subhadra that slayer of hostile heroes, fight with the son of Rishyasringa? Describe all this in detail to me as it actually happened in the battle.

3—4. What did also Bhima, that foremost of car-warriors and the Rakshasa Ghotatkacha and Nakula and Sahadeva and the car-warriors Satyaki and Dhananjaya do to my troops in that battle? Tell me all this truly, O Sanjaya, for you are well-acquainted with the incidents of the battle.

Sanjaya said :—

5. I shall describe to you, O sire, in detail, the hair-stirring battle that was fought between the prince of the Rakshasas and the son of Subhadra ;

6. As also the prowess that Arjuna and Bhimasena the son of Pandu, and Nakula and Sahadeva did display in battle ;

7. As also how your warriors, headed by Bhisma and Drona, fearlessly achieved many wonderful feats in battle.

8. In that battle uttering fierce roars at Abhimanyu the mighty car-warrior, Alamvusha, repeatedly challenging the former,

9. Rushed at him saying "Stop, Stop." Abhimanyu also, incessantly roaring like a lion,

10—11. Rushed at that mighty bowman, the son of Rishyasringa, that implacable enemy of his father. Thereupon these two foremost of car-warriors, man and Rakshasa, impetuously met one another on their respective cars, like a deity and a Danava. The foremost of the Rakshasas was possessed of illusive powers while Phalguna's son was accomplished in the use of celestial weapons.

12. Thereafter, O mighty monarch, Krishna's nephew, piercing the son of Rishyasringa with three shafts of exceeding sharpness, again pierced him with five.

13. Thereupon Alamvusha, inflamed with rage, pierced Krishna's nephew on the breast with nine swift-coursing shafts, like a guide piercing a huge elephant with the hook.

14. Then that ranger of the night, endued with great lightness, afflicted Arjuna's son in battle, O Bharata, with thousands of arrows.

15. Thereat Abhimanyu, waxing wroth, with nine straight-knotted and whetted shafts, pierced that foremost of the Rakshasas on his broad chest.

16. Those shafts, then piercing through his body, penetrated into his very vitals. His body mangled with those shafts, the foremost of the Rakshasas appeared beautiful,

17. Like a mountain overgrown with blossoming Kinsuka trees. Struck with those arrows furnished with golden wings, that highly powerful,

18. And foremost Rakshasa, appeared beautiful like a mountain on fire. Thereupon, O monarch, the vindictive son of Rishyasringa, waxing wroth,

19. Pierced, with winged shafts, that nephew of Krishna, who resembled the great Indra himself. Those sharp arrows, resembling the rod of Death, discharged by the Rakshasa,

20. Piercing through Abhimanayu, penetrated the surface of the earth. So also, gold-decked arrows shot by the son of Arjuna,

21. Piercing Alamvusha entered the earth. Then the son of Subhadra with his straight shafts,

22. Compelled the Rakshasa to turn his face away from the field, like Sakra repulsing Maya in the great battle between the celestials and the Asuras. Thus repulsed and afflicted by the foe in battle, the Rakshasa,

23. That afflicter of enemies, created a veil of impenetrable darkness through his illusive prowess. Then, O ruler of men, every body was covered by the gloom ;

24. And none was able to discern Abhimanyu, or his friends or enemies. Then, beholding that palpable darkness of great fearfulness, Abhimanyu,

25. That delighter of the Kuru race, invoked into existence the solar weapon of great effulgence. Then, O monarch, the world was again disclosed to the sight.

26—27. And with that weapon Abhimanyu destroyed the illusion of that wicked-souled Rakshasa. Then waxing wroth, that foremost of men, endued with great prowess, covered the prince of the Rakshasas in that battle with a net-work of straight-knotted shafts. Various other kinds of illusion was created by that Rakshasa ;

28. But Phalguna's son, of immeasurable soul, and versed in the use of all weapons, destroyed them all. Then the Rakshasa, his illusions all neutralised, and himself afflicted with shafts,

29. Fled out of fear, forsaking his chariot even where he was. When that Rakshasa, ever fighting unfairly, had been thus speedily vanquished,

30. The son of Arjuna began to crush your troops in battle like an infuriated excellent elephant agitating a lake having lotuses blooming in its waters.

31. Thereupon Bhisma the son of Santanu beholding the troops thus routed by the son of Subhadra, checked the latter with a mighty shower of arrows.

32. Then the mighty car-warriors of the Dhritarastra's host encircling that single hero, began to pierce him forcibly with many arrows.

33. Thereat that hero (Abhimanyu) equal in prowess to his father and to the son of Vasudeva in strength and powers,

34. That foremost of all wielders of weapon, performed in battle many a wonderful feat worthy of his father and his maternal uncle.

35. Thereupon that heroic Dhananjaya, highly enraged, desirous of rescuing his son, rushed to the spot where the latter was, slaying your troops as he came.

36. So also, O monarch, your sire Devavrata encountered the son of Pritha in battle, like Rahu meeting the lustrous orb.

37. Thereupon, O ruler of men, your sons with cars, steeds, and elephants, surrounded Bhisma in battle and began to protect him.

38. So also, O king, the Pandavas, clad in mail, surrounding Dhananjaya, O foremost of the Bharatas, began to put forth all their energies in battle.

39. Then, O king, the son of Saradwata, who was stationed in front of Bhisma, pierced Arjuna with a number of twenty-five arrows.

40. Rushing against him like a tiger rushing against an elephant, Satyaki pierced him with whetted shafts, desirous of doing good to the Pandavas.

41. The son of Gotami also with great celerity and waxing wroth, pierced the descendant of Madhu's race, on the breast with nine shafts decked with golden wings.

42. Thereat the grandson of Sini also highly inflamed with rage, bending his bow quickly fixed on the bow-string a shaft capable of doing away with the son of Gotami.

43. Then the irate son of Drona seeing the effulgent dart course swiftly like the thunder-bolt of Indra, speedily cut it in twain.

44. Thereupon that foremest of car-warriors the grandson of Sini, forsaking Gotama's son in battle, rushed towards Drona's son, like Rahu in the firmament rushing towards the moon.

45. Then the son of Drona cut off the bow of Satyaki in twain, O Bharata; then he pierced him whose bow had been cut with numerous shafts.

46. Then taking up another bow capable of slaying the foe and of bearing great strain, Satyaki pierced the son of Drona on the breast and on the arms with a group of sixty shafts, O king.

47. Thus pierced and pained, the latter became unconscious and he sat down on the terrace of his car and supported himself by holding the flagstaff.

48. Then Drona's son possessed of great prowess regaining consciousness and waxing wroth, pierced the descendant of the Vrishni race with a Naracha.

49. That Naracha penetrating Sini's grandson, entered the surface of the earth like a powerful young snake entering its hole in the spring.

50. Then with another broad-headed arrow Drona's son cut down the excellent standard of him of Madhu's race; and then uttered a fierce war-cry.

51. Once more he covered Satyaki with a dreadful group of arrows, O monarch, like clouds covering the sun at the expiration of the summer season.

52. Satyaki also, O mighty monarch, destroying that net-work of arrows, speedily scattered on Drona's son a large number of arrows.

53. Then that grandson of Sini, freed from that net-work of arrows, like the sun emerging out of the clouds, began to scorch the son of Drona (with his arrows).

54. Inflamed with ire, the highly puissant Satyaki once again covered Drona's son with a thousand shafts; and then uttered his war-cry.

55. Then beholding his son in that plight, like the moon devoured by Rahu, the highly powerful son of Bharadwaja rushed against the grandson of Sini.

56. Then in that great battle, he pierced him of the Vrishni race with arrows of exceeding sharpness, desirous of rescuing his own son so afflicted by the latter (Satyaki).

57. Then abandoning that mighty car-warrior that son of the preceptor Drona, Satyaki, pierced Drona with twenty shafts of sharpness like that of the battle axe.

58. At this crisis, that afflicter of foes that mighty car-warrior the son of Kunti, (Arjuna) waxing wroth, rushed against Drona.

59. Then Drona and Arjuna met in that fierce battle, like, O mighty monarch, Venus and Jupiter meeting one another on the heavens.

Thus ends the hundred and second chapter, the encounter between Drona and Arjuna, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CIII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA).—Contd.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. How did those two foremost of men, those two fierce bowmen, namely Drona and Dhananjaya the son of Pandu encountering each other, fight with each other to the best of their abilities ?

2. The son of Pandu is ever dear to the highly intelligent son of Bharadwaja; so also, O Sanjaya, the preceptor is always dear to Partha in battle.

3. Those two foremost of car-warriors ever delighting in battle, namely Dhananjaya and the son of Bharadwaja, how did those two heroes, like two fierce lions encountering one another, fight one another putting forth all their energies ?

Sanjaya said :—

4. In battle neither Drona regard the son of Pritha as dear to him, nor does the son of Pritha, keeping in view the duty of Kshatriyas, regard the preceptor as dear to him.

5. Kshatriyas, O king, never shun any one in battle; they fight with their fathers or brothers without the slightest regard for them.

6. Then, O Bharata, Drona was pierced in battle with three shafts by the son of Pritha; but the former regarded not those arrows shot from Arjuna's bow.

7. Once more did the son of Pritha cover him in that battle with a shower of shafts; and Drona, then blazed up with anger like a raging forest conflagration,

8. Within a short while, with straight-jointed shafts, covered Arjuna in that battle, O foremost of kings, O Bharata.

9. Thereafter king Duryodhana commanded king Susarman to protect in battle the flanks of Drona.

10. Thereupon the ruler of the Trigarttas waxing wroth, and stretching his bow full, covered the son of Pritha, O foremost of king, with many shafts tipped with iron.

11. Those arrows, O king, discharged by Drona and Susarman, shone, O mighty monarch, in the heavens like a row of crane in the firmament in Autumn.

12. Those arrows, reaching, the son of Kunti, entered into him, like, O lord, a flight of birds entering a tree bending with the burden of its tasteful fruits.

13. Thereupon Arjuna, that foremost of car-warriors, uttering his war-cry in battle, pierced the ruler of the Trigarttas and his son with myriads of shafts.

14. Thus pierced by Partha who then looked like the Destroyer himself at the end of a Yuga, they rushed even towards Partha himself resolved to die in battle.

15—16. They also poured a shower of arrows towards the chariot of Pandu's son. Then the latter received that shower of arrows, O foremost of kings, with another shower discharged by himself, like a mountain receiving a shower of rain. Then in that battle we beheld the wonderful lightness of Vibhatsu's hands.

17. In as much as, single-handed, he baffled the indefeasible shower of arrows poured by many, like the wind scattering masses of clouds.

18. The celestials and the Danavas all become pleased with that feat of Pritha's son. Thereafter Arjuna waxing wroth on the Trigarttas, O Bharata,

19. Discharged, O monarch, the Vayavya weapon at the head of the hostile ranks. Thereupon raged a tempest agitating the whole welkin,

20. And felling rows of trees, and killing hosts of troops. Thereat Drona beholding that fierce Vayavya weapon,

21. Discharged, O mighty monarch, a terrible weapon named Saila. When, O ruler of men, that weapon was shot by Drona in battle,

22—23. The wind subsided, and points of the compass shone brightly. Thereafter that heroic son of Pandu, made the car-division of the Trigarttas despondent and destitute of prowess, and compelled them to turn their faces away from the field of battle. Thereat Duryodhana, and Kripa that foremost of car-warriors,

24. Aswathaman, Salya, Sudakshina the ruler of the Kamvojas, the two Avanti princes Vinda and Anuvinda, and Valhika with the Valhikas,

25. These warriors, along with a mighty division of cars, surrounded Pritha's son on all directions. Also Bhagadatta and Srutayusha, endued with great strength,

26. With a mighty elephant division, surrounded Bhima on all directions. Also, O ruler of men, Bhurisravas, Sala and Suvala's son,

27. With a shower of resplendent shafts of exceeding sharpness, resisted the two sons of Pandu. In that battle Bhisma, supported by Dhritarastra's sons along with their divisions,

28. Reaching near Yudhisthira, surrounded him on all sides. Then Vrikodara the son of Pritha, beholding the elephant division advance towards himself,

29. Licked the corners of his mouth, like the king of beasts in the forest. Thereafter that foremost of car-warriors, grasping his mace, in that fierce battle,

30. Speedily jumped down from his car and struck terror into the hearts of your troops. Then those elephant-warriors, beholding him stand with mace in hand,

31. Surrounded him on all sides with great carefulness. Then that son of Pandu, standing in the midst of that elephant division, appeared beautiful,

32. Like the sun shining in the midst of a mass of clouds. Then that foremost of the Pandavas, began to agitate that division of elephants,

33. Like the tempest scattering away a mighty net-work of clouds. Then those tuskers, slaughtered by the highly powerful Bhimasena in battle,

34. Began to utter distressful shrieks like masses of roaring clouds. Mangled with the tusks of those elephants in many parts of his body,

35. The son of Pritha appeared beautiful like a blossoming Asoka tree. Catching the tuskers by their tusks, he rooted the tusks out,

36. And with those tusks wounding the elephants on their frontal globes felled them in battle, like the Destroyer himself wielding his mace.

37. Wielding his mace bathed in blood, with his person be-spattered with fat and marrow, and smeared with gore Bhima appeared beautiful like the Rudra himself.

38. Thus slaughtered, the surviving remnant of that huge elephant division ran away in all directions, O king, crushing their own ranks.

39. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, owing to those huge elephants running away in all directions, the army of Duryodhana was once more compelled to turn their faces away from the field of battle.

Thus ends the hundred and third chapter, the prowess of Bhima, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CIV.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. At mid-day, O mighty monarch, commenced a combat between the Somakas and Bhisma, that become dreadful and destructive of many creatures.

2. That foremost of car-warriors viz the son of Ganga began to consume the ranks of the Pandava host, with his sharp shafts discharged by hundreds and thousands.

3. Then your father Devavrata crushed that army like a herd of heifer grinding (under their tread) a heap of paddy sheaves.

4. Then Dhristadyumna, Sikhandin, Virata and Drupada, encountering Bhisma in battle began to pierce that mighty car-warriors with numerous shafts.

5. Thereat, O Bharata, piercing Dhristadyumna and Virata with three shafts, Bhisma discharged a Naracha at Drupada.

6. Then those fierce bowmen, pierced by Bhisma that grinder of foes, waxed wroth, O king, in battle like a snake trampled under the feet.

7. Then Sikhandin pierced the grandfather of the Bharatas, but the latter of undeteriorating renown struck him not, remembering his femiminity.

8. Then Dhristadyumna blazing up with rage like fire, pierced the grandsire, with three shafts on the breast and the arms.

9. Drupada with twenty-five, Virata with ten, Sikahndin with twenty-five arrows pierced Bhisma.

10. That hero (Bhisma) thus deeply pierced, O mighty monarch, and bathed in copiously flowing blood, appeared beautiful like flowering red Asoka tree in the spring.

11. Then the son of Ganga pierced them in return each with three straight-going shafts; and O sire, he burst open the bow of Drupada with a broad-headed arrow.

12. The latter then taking up another bow pierced Bhisma with five arrows and his charioteer with three whetted shafts on the field of battle.

13. Thereupon, O monarch, Bhima, the five sons of Draupadi, the five Kekaya brothers, and Satyaki of the Satwata race,

14. Headed by king Yudhisthira himself rushed at the son of Ganga, desirous of rescuing the Panchalas headed by Dhristadymna.

15. So also, O ruler of men, your warriors anxious for protecting Bhisma, rushed against the Pandava host, supported by their respective divisions.

16. Thereupon ensued a fierce and sanguinary engagement between your army and theirs both teeming with men, steeds, chariots and elephants—engagement that considerably swelled the population of Death's domain.

17. Car-warriors meeting car-warriors despatched them to the abode of Death; so also others, men, horse-soldiers, elephant-riders encountering one another,

18--19. Conveyed one another to the abode of Death, with their straight-knotted shafts; and in that field of battle, O ruler of men, many cars deprived of their riders with numerous dreadful arrows, and with their drivers slain, careered on the field being dragged on all sides.

20. Crushing, O king, innumerable men and steeds in that battle, those cars of the velocity of wind appeared beautiful like ærial castles.

21. Many car-warriors deprived of their cars, clad in armour and possessed of strength all decked with ear-rings and turbans and with bracelets and garlands,

22. All resembling sons of the gods and equal to Sakra in prowess in battle, prosperous as Vaisravana himself and wise in polity as Vrihaspati himself,

23. Ruling over vast dominions, and all heroic warriors, O ruler of men, flying hither and thither, were slain like ordinary men.

24. Huge tusked elephants also, O foremost of men, deprived of their excellent riders, fell down crushing their own ranks and uttering distressful cries.

25. With their armours, variegated standards, chamaras, white umbrellas with golden staves, and lances shattered, O sire,

26. The huge elephants ran in all the ten points of the compass, resembling newly-risen clouds, and roaring also like them.

27. So also, O ruler of men, elephant-riders, deprived of their elephants, were seen to run in all directions in that general engagement between your army and theirs.

28. We also beheld steeds born in various regions, decked with golden caparisons, and fleet as the wind itself, by hundreds and by thousands.

29. We also beheld horse-soldiers, deprived of their chargers chase and chased by, one another in that battle, with swords in their grasp.

30. An elephant meeting a flying compeer in that great battle, rushed with velocity crushing foot-soldiers and steeds.

31. Also, O king, in that battle one elephant crushed many cars, and cars also, passing over fallen steeds, crushed them in battle;

32. And also, O king, horses again crushed the foot-soldiers in that battle. Thus, O king, they crushed one another in various modes.

33. When that awful and fierce battle was thus raging, there started up into existence on the field of battle a hideous river, having blood for its stream,

34. Choked with piles of bones, and having the hair (of slain warriors) for its moss and weeds. It had cars for its lakes arrows for its eddies and horses for its fishes; and it was inaccessible.

35. It abounded in pebbles consisting of the heads of warriors; as also in sharks &c formed by the elephants. It had armours and head-gears for its froth and bows for its current and swords for its tortoises;

36. The trees on its banks were formed of the numerous standards; it had men for its banks which it ate away constantly. It was infested by swans consisting of cannibals, and it considerably increased the population of Death's domain.

37. Many heroic Kshatriyas all mighty car-warriors crossed that river on their rafts consisting of cars, steeds and elephants, totally driving away fear from their hearts.

38. Just as the river Vaitarani conveys all departed spirits to the dominions of the ruler of spirits, so, in that afternoon, that river carried away (with its bloody currents) all cowards that became overwhelmed with a swoon.

39. Then in that battle the Kshatriyas beholding that awful carnage, exclaimed saying:—Through the folly of Duryodhana, Kshatriyas are being thus destroyed.

40. Why did Dhritarastra of wicked soul, that ruler of men, infatuated by covetousness, harbour feelings of envy against the sons of Pandu, all endued with many virtues."

41. Various exclamations of this kind, purporting to be applauses to the Pandavas and censures to your sons, were heard there addressed to one another.

42. Hearing these exclamations vociferated by all the warriors, your son Duryodhana, that offender of all men,

43. Addressing Bhisma, Drona, Kripa and Salya said, O Bharata:—"Do you go on fighting with self-confidence? Why do you tarry at all?".

44. Then ensued a battle between the Kurus and the Pandavas, O king, that owed its origin to that game at dice and that brought about awful carnage.

45. Now do you see, O son of Vichitraviryya, the dreadful fruit of your refusal to accept the salutary advices (of your friends,) though warned against it by many high-souled heroes.

46. Neither the sons of Pandu, O king, with their soldiers and followers, nor the Kauravas pay any the least heed to their lives in that battle.

47. For this reason, O foremost of men, a dreadful destruction of men is taking place, brought about by Destiny or by your wicked policy, O king.

Thus ends the hundred and fourth chapter, the general engagement, in the Bhismabadha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CV.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Then that foremost of men Arjuna, conveyed, with his whetted shafts, the kings that followed Susarman to the abode of the lord of departed spirits.

2. Thereupon in that battle Susarman pierced Pritha's son with many shafts; he then pierced the son of Vasudeva with seventy shafts and Arjuna again with nine.

3. Baffling those arrows with his showers of arrows, that mighty car-warrior, the son of Sakra, despatched the warriors that supported Susarman to the mansion of Death.

4. Thus slaughtered by Pritha's son, as if by the Destroyer himself at the expiration of a Yuga, those mighty car-warriors, seized with panic, ran away from the field of battle.

5. Some leaving their horses, some their cars, and some their elephants, O sire, fled in all the directions of the compass.

6. Others, on the other hand, seizing steeds, elephants and chariots in that battle, fled away, O ruler of men, at the top of their speed.

7. In that fierce fight, foot-soldiers, abandoning their weapons, and without paying any heed to any one, fled, O Bharata, hither and thither.

8. Though they were repeatedly forbidden by the Trigartta ruler Susarman as also by many other foremost sovereigns they did not tarry on the field any longer.

9. Seeing that army thus routed, your son Duryodhana, placing Bhisma at the head of all the troops, and himself marching in the van,

10. Assaulted Dhananjaya putting forth all his energies, desirous of saving, O ruler of men, the life of the king of the Trigarttas.

11. Susarman alone, accompanied by his brother, was standing against Arjuna in battle, scatterring various kinds of shafts, the rest of his men having ran away.

12. So also, O king, the Pandavas, clad in armour, rushed, with all their energies, to the spot where Bhisma was, desirous of rescuing Partha.

13. Though perfectly cognisant of the dreadful prowess of the wielder of the Gandiva bow, the Pandava heroes with loud cries of 'Oh!' and 'Alas!' advanced towards Bhisma from all sides.

14. Then that hero, owning the standard bearing the device of the palmyra tree, covered the Pandava host in that battle with straight-knotted shafts.

15. When the sun reached the meridian, O mighty sovereign, the Kurus mingling pell-mell with the Pandavas fought on fiercely.

16. Then the heroic Satyaki piercing Kritavarman with five swift-coursing arrows stood in the field shooting shafts by hundreds and by thousands.

17. So also king Drupada piercing Drona with sharp shafts again pierced the latter with seventy shafts and his charioteer with five shafts.

18. Bhimasena, piercing the Valhika king, his great grandsire, uttered his war-cry that resembled the tiger's roar in the woods.

19. The son of Arjuna being pierced by Chitrasena with many swift-coursing arrows, pierced him in return on the breast with three shafts.

20. Encountering one another in battle, those two foremost of men, appeared beautiful, O king, like Venus and Saturn shining in the heavens.

21. Then that slayer of hostile heroes, that son of Subhadra, endued with prowess, slaying Chitrasena's four steeds and charioteer with nine shafts, uttered his fierce war-cry.

22. Then that mighty car-warrior Chitrasena, jumping down with agility from the car of which the steeds were slain, ascended with quickness, O ruler of men, the chariot of Durmukha.

23. The highly puissant Drona also penetrating Drupada with straight shafts, pierced with quickness the latter's charioteer.

24. Thereupon king Drupada thus afflicted before the army, fled, borne away by fleet steeds, remembering his former enmity.

25. Bhimasena in a moment deprived king Valhika of his horses, car and driver, before the very eyes of the troops.

26. Thus involved in a perilous situation and seized with panic, O mighty monarch, that foremost of men Valhika, jumping down from his own vehicle,

27. Ascended, in that fierce battle, that of Lakshana. Satyaki, having repulsed Kritavarman in battle,

28. Approached the grandsire Bhisma, shooting various kinds of arrows. Then he, having pierced the grandsire with sixty whetted shafts furnished with feathery wings,

29. Seemed to dance on the terrace of his car, wielding his massive bow. Thereupon the grandsire hurled at him a mighty lance made entirely of iron,

30. Decked with gold, charged with great velocity and looking beautiful like a daughter of a Naga. (Beholding) that irresistible lance swiftly course towards himself like death itself,

31. That high-formed hero of the Vrishni race baffled it with the swiftness (of his movements); and that dreadful lance, even without reaching him of the Vrishni race,

32—33. Fell down on the surface of the earth, like a mighty meteor of blazing effulgence. Thereupon, O king, that descendant of the Vrishni race, swiftly taking up his own lance of golden effulgence, sped it at the car of the grandsire. That lance sped with the strength of Satyaki's arm in that battle,

34. Flew swiftly, like the last night (of worldly existence) of a doomed man. Then O Bharata, Bhisma cut in twain that swift-coursing lance,

35—36. With two sharp arrows having horse shoe-heads; and the lance fell down on the ground. Having severed that lance, the son of Ganga, that grinder of foes, waxing wroth and smiling the while, pierced Satyaki on the breast with nine arrows. Thereupon with all their chariots, elephants and horses, the Pandavas, O elder brother of Pandu,

36. Surrounded Bhisma on all sides, in order to rescue him of Madhu's race. Then between the Kurus and the Pandavas, both desirous of securing victory, commenced a fierce fight making the hair stand erect.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifth chapter, the combat between Bhisma and Satyaki, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CVI.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)— Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Beholding, O king, Bhisma inflamed with rage in battle, surrounded by the Pandavas, like the sun in the heavens surrounded by the clouds at the end of the summer,

2. Duryodhana, O monarch, said to Dussasana :—"This heroic Bhisma, this mighty bowman and slayer of heroes,

3. Is surrounded on all sides, O foremost of the Bharatas, with the heroic Pandava warriors. It behoves you, O hero, to look to the protection of that (high-souled one).

4. Our grandsire Bhisma, being well-protected in battle, will slay all the Panchalas with the Pandavas.

5. Therefore I think the protection of Bhisma to be our foremost duty. This fierce bowman Bhisma of illustrious vows is our protector.

6. Therefore surrounding the grandsire with all our troops, do you protect him as he accomplishes difficult feats in battle."

7. Thus spoken to, your son Dussasana stood with his mighty army, surrounding Bhisma in that battle.

8. Then Sakuni the son of Suvala with hundred thousands cavalry soldiers, holding resplendent spears, swords and lances,

9. And forming a proud and strong detachment of troops, bearing standards, and supported by well-disciplined and well-accomplished foot-soldiers all excellent fighters,

10. Began to oppose Nakula, Sahadeva, and Yudhisthira the son of Pandu, surrounding those foremost of men on all sides.

11. Then king Duryodhana despatched a detachment of ten thousand horses all brave warriors, for checking the Pandavas.

12. As these highly fleet chargers resembling so many Sarudas rushed to battle, the earth, O king, struck with their hoof quaked and produced a loud din.

13. The dreadful clatter of the hoofs of steeds that was then heard resembled the crackling sound produced by a bamboo forest on the top of a hill, when set on fire.

14. As these rushed to the charge, there arose a thick cloud of dust, that mounting to the solar orbit shrouded the sun itself.

15. Then the army of the Pandavas was agitated by the charge of that fleetest horse division, like a mighty lake agitated in consequence of a flight of swans suddenly alighting on its waters.

16. Nothing could be heard in consequence of their neighs. Then king Yudhisthira, and the two sons of Pandu begotten upon Madri,

17—18. Quickly checked the furious charge of those horsemen in battle, like, O mighty monarch, the banks withstanding the waves of the mighty main swollen with the waters of the rainy season on the day of the full moon. Thereupon, O king, these car-warriors, with their straight-knotted shafts,

19. Began to sever the heads of these horse-soldiers from their trunk; then, O mighty monarch, they fell down slain by these firm bowmen,

20. Like huge elephants falling down in mountain caves, slain by their compeers. Those warriors of the Pandava, army also with sharp lances and straight shafts,

21. Cut down the head of those horsemen, coursing all over the field. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, the horse-riders thus struck with swords,

22. Began to drop their heads like mighty trees dropping the fruits. Slain on all sides, horses with their riders

23. Were seen fallen and falling. When being thus slaughtered, the horses began to fly away struck with terror,

24. Like so many deer flying for the sake of preserving their lives at the sight of a lion. The Pandavas then, O monarch, confounding their foes in battle,

25. Blew their conchs and struck up their drums in battle. Then dejected in consequence of the defeat of his troops, Duryodhana

26. Said, O foremost of the Bharatas, these words to the king of the Madras: "This eldest son of Pandu, supported by his twin brothers in battle.

27. Is routing my army, O mighty-armed king, before your very eyes. Do you check him, O mighty-armed one, like the banks of the sea checking its fury.

28. You are well-known for the irresistibleness of your strength and prowess." Then hearing these words of your son, the highly puissant Salya,

29—31. Supported by a division of cars, hied to the spot where king Yudhisthira was. Then the son of Pandu checked in battle that detachment of Salya falling upon him with great fury. Then that mighty car-warrior the very virtuous king Yudhisthira quickly pierced the king of the Madras with ten shafts between his breasts; and Nakula and Sahadeva pierced him with seven straight shafts.

32. The king of the Madras in return pierced them all with three shafts each; then again he pierced Yudhisthira with sixty shafts of exceeding sharpness;

33. He also wounded the two terrified sons of Madri with two shafts each. Thereupon the mighty armed Bhima, beholding the king,

34. Staying within the reach of the Madra-king's car, as if within the very jaws of death, rushed in that battle to the side of Yudhisthira.

35. Then when the sun, rising on the western quarter, was scorching the earth, a fierce and sanguinary engagement commenced.

Thus ends the hundred and sixth chapter, the encounter between Salya and Yudhisthira, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CVII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Thereupon your father, waxing wroth, began to pierce the sons of Pritha and their troops, with excellent shafts of exceeding sharpness.

2. Piercing Bhima with twelve, Satyaki with nine shafts, Nakula with three, Sahadeva with seven, he pierced

3. Yudhisthira with twelve shafts on the arms and on the breast. Then that highly powerful hero, having pierced Dhristadyumna also, uttered a loud roar.

4. Nakula pierced him in return with twelve shafts, the descendant of Madhu's race, with three, Sahadeva with seventy, Partha with nine, Dhristadyumna with seventy and Bhimasena with seven shafts.

5. Then Yudhisthira pierced the grandsire in return with twelve shafts. Drona having pierced Satyaki began to pierce Bhima,

6. Each time with five whetted shafts resembling the rods of Death himself. Those two heroes, each then with three straight shafts, pierced in retun,

7. That foremost of Brahmanas namely Drona, like a guide piercing a mighty elephant with the hook. The Souviras, the Kitavas, the Easterners, the Westerners, the Northerners, the Malavas,

8. The Avisapas, the Surasenas, the Sivis and the Vasatis, these did not avoid Bhisma though fearfully slaughtered by him in battle with whetted shafts.

9. So also many other kings, come from various other realms, rushed at the Pandavas, bearing in their hands weapons of diverse kinds.

10. The Pandavas also surrounded the grandsire on all sides. That invincible one (Bhisma) surrounded by that mighty division of cars,

11. Blazed forth destroying the foe, like a terrible conflagration in a wood. His car was his fire chamber, his bow was his flames, his sword, darts, and maces were his fuels.

12. His arrows were the scintillations, and Bhisma himself was the fire that consumed the forest of the Kshatriyas. With arrows furnished with golden wings and the feathers of vultures and charged with great energy,

13. With barbed arrows, with Nalikas and Narachas, Bhisma covered that army of the Pandavas. He felled with whetted shafts elephants and car-warriors.

14—16. He made the large detachment of car-warriors look like a palmyra-forest with its trees deprived of their tops. In that battle, O king, that mighty-armed hero, the foremost of all wielders of weapons, made cars, elephants and steeds deprived of their riders. Hearing the twang, that resembled the rumbling of the thunder, of your father's bow, O Bharata, all creatures began to tremble, and O foremost of the Bharatas, then the arrows of your father seemed to be incapable of being baffled.

17—20. Then the arrows, shot from the bow of Bhisma, did not only strike against the armours of combatants but penetrated through them. We saw, O monarch, many cars dragged over the field, by the fleet steeds that were harnessed to them, in consequence of the death of the heroes that rode them. Four and ten thousand car-warriors belonging to the Chedis, the Kashis and the Karushas, all well-known, and born of illustrious family, never retreating from field and owners of golden standards, prepared to lay down their lives in battle, encountering Bhisma who looked like Death himself with mouth wide open, were all despatched to the regions of the departed along with their steeds, cars and elephants.

21. We beheld, O monarch, chariots by hundreds and thousands then, some with their Akihas shattered and bottoms broken, some with their wheels broken.

22. Then, O monarch, with cars broken along with their wooden fences, with fallen car-warriors, with arrows, with beautiful but broken armours, with battle axes,

23. With maces, with short arrows, and whetted shafts, with car bottoms, with quivers, shattered wheels, O sire,

24. With arms, bows, words, and heads graced with ear-rings, with finger-protecters and gloves, and broken standards,

25. With bows splintered into pieces, the earth become strewn over. Then, O king, elephants with their riders slain, and slaughtered horsemen,

26—27. Began to fall down dead on the field by hundreds and by thousands. Striving their least, the heroic warriors of the Pandava army could not rally the car-warriors who, afflicted by the arrows of Bhisma, were flying then in all directions. That mighty host (of the Pandavas), slaughtered by Bhisma who equalled even Indra in prowess,

28. Were so completely broken that no two persons were seen to fly together. With its chariots, elephants and horses laid low and with its standards and flags overthrown in profusion,

29. The army of the sons of Pandu, deprived of its consciousness began to utter cries of "Oh" and "Alas." In that battle father slew his own son and son slew his own father,

30. And friend slew his dear friend urged on to the deed by Destiny. Many combatants of the Pandava army, doffing their armours,

31—32. Were seen to run away in all directions with their hair dishevelled. Then the troops belonging to the son of Pandu were seen to run hurriedly in fear like a herd of bulls throwing aside the yokes of cars; and the cries of distress that these troops then uttered were indeed fearful. Then the descendant of the Yadava race beholding the army thus routed,

33. Spoke to Vibhatsu the son of Prit , reining in the excellent chariot he drove: "O Partha, the hour which you so ardently looked forward to, has now arrived.

24. Now strike, O foremost of men, or you shall be unconscious being overwhelmed by a swoon. O hero, the words you uttered before in the assemblage of kings, 35—36. In the city of Virata, before Sanjaya himself, O Pritha's son, those words are 'I will slay all the combatants of Dhritarastra's son along with their followers, headed by Bhisma and Drona, all who will fight with me.' O son of Kunti, O grinder of foes, do you now verify those words of yours.

37. Remembering the duties of a Kshatriya go on fighting without harbouring any anxious feeling." Thus spoken to, by the son of Vasudeva, with his head hung down and looking askance,

38. Arjuna as if unwilling said these words to the former. "Either to acquire monarchy with hell at the end by the slaughter of those who ought not to be slain,

39. Or to suffer the woes of an exiled life,—which of these should now be considered as my duty? However, O Hrishikesha, urge the steeds on, I shall do your biddings.

40. I will lay low Bhisma the grand-sire of the Kurus." Thereupon that descendant of Madhu's race, drove those steeds of argentine hue,

41. To the spot, O king, where Bhisma, incapable of being gazed at like the sun himself, was staying. Thereupon the mighty army of king Yudhisthira returned to the charge,

42. Beholding the mighty-armed son of Pritha rush for an encounter with Bhisma in that terrible fight. Thereupon, O foremost of the Kurus, Bhisma uttered his war-cry even like a roaring lion,

43. And then quickly covered the car of Dhananjaya with a shower of arrows. Within a moment Arjuna's car with the steeds and charioteer,

44. Were lost to view in consequence of that thick arrowy shower. But the son of Vasudeva, with the least delay and with patience, fearlessly

45. Drove forward those steeds mangled with the shafts of Bhisma. Then the son of Pritha taking up his bow of celestial make, and of twang as loud as the rumble of clouds,

46—47. Felled the bow of Bhisma having burst it open with whetted shafts. Then deprived of his bow, that foremost of the Kurus, viz. your father, within a moment made another bow ready for use. But Arjuna, waxing wroth, cut off even that bow of his.

48. Then the son of Santanu highly praised Arjuna's lightness of hand saying:—"Well-done well-done, O mighty-armed one, well-done O son of Kunti."

49. Having thus applauded Partha and taking up another bow of great excellence, Bhisma sped, in that battle, arrows against the chariot of the former.

50. Then the son of Vasudeva displayed superior skill in the management of horses in as much as he baffled Bhisma's arrows by a swift whirling of the car in a circular motion.

51. Mangled with the shafts of Bhisma, those two foremost of men, (Arjuna and Krishna) then appeared beautiful like two heifers, enraged, and mangled with scratches of their horns.

52—54. Then that slayer of hostile heroes, that mighty-armed descendant of Madhu's race, viz., the son of Vasudeva, seeing that Arjuna was fighting mildly, and that Bhisma was continually pouring his showers of arrows in battle, also that the latter standing in the centre of the two hosts, was scorching (every thing) like the sun himself and was slaying the foremost combatants of the army of Pandu's son, and was producing in the army of Yudhisthira a total annihilation like that at the end of a Yuga, was unable to bear it any longer.

55. Then, O sire, throwing away the reins of Partha's steeds of argentine hue, that illustrious Yogin (Krishna) waxing irascible, jumped down from that huge chariot.

56—57. Then roaring repeatedly like a lion, Krishna endued with strength and fleetness, and of incomparable effulgence, that lord of the universe, having his bare arms for his weapons and wielding the whip in his hands, and with his eyes coppery in rage, rushed towards Bhisma, splitting the earth with his tread, and desirous of slaying the latter.

58. In that mighty battle, the hearts of your warriors were filled with terror as they beheld him of Madhu's race near Bhisma, ready to fall upon the latter.

59. Then, O mighty monarch, exclamations of 'Bhisma is slain, Bhisma is slain,' were heard there, uttered by your troops inspired with the fear of Vasudeva's son.

60. Then Janarddana, vested in yellow silk raiments and blue in complexion like the lapis lazuli, rushing towards Bhisma appeared beautiful like a rain cloud charged with lightning.

61. Just as the king of beasts uttering loud roars rushes towards the leader of an elephant-herd, so then that foremost of Madhu's race rushed impetuously towards Bhisma, uttering loud roars.

62. Then beholding in that dreadful battle, Krishna of eyes like lotus petals rush furiously towards him, Bhisma began to stretch his strong and mighty bow.

63. Then addressing Govinda with a dauntless heart, he said :—" Come, come, O you of eyes like lotus petals ! O god of gods, I do bow down unto you.

64. Lay me low, O foremost of the Satwata race, this day in this dreadful fight ! O sinless one, slain by you in this battle, O god,

65. I shall reap great good, O Krishna, in every respect in this world. O Govinda to-day, in the three worlds, have I attained great honour in battle.

66—68. Strike me as it pleases you, O sinless one, as I am merely a slave of yours." Meanwhile the mighty-armed son of Pritha, running behind Keshava, seized the latter embracing him with his two arms. That foremost of men viz Krishna of eyes like expanded lotuses, thus held by the son of Pritha proceeded even carrying the latter with him. Then that slayer of hostile heroes, that puissant warrior, the son of Pritha, forcibly encircling (with his two arms) the two legs

69—71. Of Hrishikesha stopped him when he was going to take the tenth step. Then his friend Arjuna, highly distressed, afflictionately addressing Kesava, who was then breathing like a snake and whose eyes were rolling in wrath, said :—' Stop, O mighty-armed one ! It behoves you not to falsify those words of yours viz 'I will not fight,' that you had spoken before, O Kesava. Then, O descendant of Madhus race, men will call your a liar.

72. Let all the burden be on me, I will slay the grandsire ! Iswear, O Kesava, by my weapons, by my truth and by my good achievements,

73. That, O destroyer of foes, I will do everything by which the destruction of the enemy may be accomplished. Even this day behold the invincible mighty car-warrior overthrown

74. By me, with the least difficulty like the crescent moon at the end of a Yuga." Hearing those words of the high-souled Phalguna, that descendant of Madhu's race,

75—76. Without speaking any thing, again mounted the chariot in rage. Then Bhisma the son of Santanu, once more covered those two foremost of men on their cars, with an arrowy downpour, like clouds drenching the mountain breast with showers of rain. Then your sire Devatra took the lives of all hostile warriors,

77. Like the sun drawing energies from all things with his rays at the end of the winter season. As the sons of Pandu broke the ranks of the Kuru troops in battle.

78. So your father also broke the Pandava ranks in battle. The soldiers thus routed, and despondent and cheerless,

79—81. Slain, by hundreds and thousands, by Bhisma, were unable to gaze at the incomparable Bhisma, who was scorching the foe like the sun in the meridian. The Pandava troops then afflicted with terror, O monarch, (fearfully) looked at Bhisma who was achieving great feats with his superhuman prowess. Then, O Bharata, the Pandava troops thus crushed by Bhisma,

82. Could not find a protector, like kine sunk in slough, or like an ephemeral ant afflicted by a powerful creature.

83. The combatants of the Pandava hosts, O Bharata were unable to look at that mighty car-warrior Bhisma, who was incapable of being shaken, who with his arrowy showers was afflicting the hostile kings, and who in consequence of his blazing shafts looked like the shining sun.

84. While he was thus crushing the Pandava troops, the sun of thousand rays went below the horizon. Then the hearts, of all those warriors exhausted with fatigue, yearned for the order of withdrawal.

Thus ends the hundred and seventh chapter, the termination of the ninth day's battle, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CVIII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. While they were thus fighting and when the sun set, the pall of hideous twilight enveloped the earth, and the battle became lost to view.

2—4. Then, O Bharata, king Yudhisthira, beholding that twilight had set in, and that his own soldiers, slaughtered by Bhisma, had thrown down their weapons, andthat terror-struck and repulsed from the field of battle, they are flying away in all directions ; beholding also the mighty car-warrior Bhisma inflamed with rage in battle and afflicting everybody, and seeing also the mighty car-warriors of the Somakas defeated and cheerless, pondered a while and then commanded the withdrawal of the forces.

5. Then king Yudhisthira withdrew his troops; so also the withdrawal of your forces was also done at the same time.

6. Then the mighty car-warriors, having withdrawn their forces, O foremost of the Kurus, entered their tents, with their bodies mangled with wounds.

7. The Pandavas, afflicted with the arrows of Bhisma and thinking of the feats achieved in battle, did not obtain any peace.

8. Having vanquished the Pandavas and the Srinjayas in battle and adored and honoured by your sons, Bhisma then, O monarch,

9. Accompanied by the delighted Kurus, entered his tent. Then night set in, that renders all creatures unconscious (in sleep).

10. In the beginning of that dread time of night, the Pandavas along with the Vrishnis and the invincible Srinjayas, sat together for consultation.

11. The highly powerful heroes, accomplished in drawing conclusion from inferences, coolly consulted about what would be most profitable to them under these circumstances.

12. Thereafter king Yudhisthira, O king, having pondered for a considerable length of time, addressed these words to the son of Vasudeva, casting his eyes on the latter.

13. "Behold, O Krishna, the high-souled Bhisma of fierce prowess crush my army like an elephant crushing a forest of reeds.

14. We dare not even look at that illustrious warrior when he licks, like a raging conflagration, all my troops up.

15. The mighty puissant Bhisma, possessed of sharp weapons and inflamed with rage in battle, appears like the mighty snake Takshaka of great ferocity and virulent venom.

16—17. Indeed the god of Death wrought up with wrath and shooting whetted shafts from his bow, or the king of the celestials armed with the thunder-bolt, or Varuna holding his mighty noose or the god of wealth wielding his mace, may be vanquished in battle. But Bhisma enraged in battle could not be vanquished.

18. When, O Krishna, such is the state of affairs, I am, in consequence of the weakness of my own understanding, sunk in sorrow, having to fight with Bhisma as an opponent in battle.

19. I will again retire, O invincible one, to the forests; even that is better for me now. Battle I no longer like, O Krishna, as Bhisma always slaughters our troops.

20. Just as an insect rushing at a blazing fire reaps only death, so have I reaped the same result having dared a combat with Bhisma.

21. Put as I may, my prowess forth, O descendant of the Vrishni race, I am being driven to destruction for the sake of my kingdom. My brave brothers are all sorely afflicted with the shafts of Bhisma.

22. Through their fraternal affection, they had to go into exile into the woods, for me, deprived of their kingdom. So also, O slayer of Madhu, Krishna had to undergo various troubles for me only.

23. I prize life very much; and it is dear and scarce to be obtained. If I can save it now, I shall husband out the rest of it in the performance of excellent deeds of piety.

24. If, indeed, I and my brothers be worthy of your grace, then O Keshava, advise me what will be beneficial to me, without clashing against our prescribed duties."

25. Hearing these many words of Yudhisthira describing the state of affairs in detail, out of compassion, Krishna spoke these words in reply to console the former.

26. "O son of Dharma, do not indulge so much in grief, O you who are always firm in truth, you who have got, heroic and invincible warriors, all slayers of foes, in your brothers.

27. Arjuna and Bhimasena are both powerful like the Wind and the Fire respectively. The twin sons of Madri equal in prowess even the Lord of the celestials himself.

28. Out of the friendship that exists between us, employ me also (to perform the task of slaying Bhisma). O son of Pandu, I will fight Bhisma. For you, O mighty monarch, what could I not do in battle.

29. Summoning that foremost of men Bhisma in battle, I will slay him, even before the very eyes of the Dhritarastra's troops, if indeed Arjuna desists from slaying the former.

30. If, O son of Pandu, by the slaughter of Bhisma you see victory certain to yourself, then even this day riding on a single car, I will slay the venerable grandsire of the Kurus.

31. Behold, O king, my prowess in battle, to be equal to that of the great Indra himself. I will overthrow him (Bhisma) from his car, in spite of his shooting mighty weapons.

32. He that is inimical to the sons of Pandu, is surely inimical also to myself.

Those that are friendly to you are also so to me and those that are friendly to me are also so to you.

33. Your brother, Arjuna, is my friend, relative and pupil; O ruler of earth, I can cut off and give away my own flesh for Arjuna's sake.

34. This foremost of men also will lay down his own life for my sake. This, O sire, is our understanding, that we will protect one another.

35—36. So, O most excellent king, command me so that I may fight for you. The vow that formerly Partha took at Upaplavya saying 'I will slay the son of Ganga' before the presence of all creatures, even that vow of intelligent Partha should be kept inviolate.

37. But if the son of Pritha permits me, I will with certitude do it for him. As it seems to me the task of Phalguna is easy and it is not difficult for him to perform.

38. Arjuna will slay in battle, Bhisma that conqueror of hostile cities. Putting forth his energies in fight, Partha can achieve what is incapable of being achieved.

39. Arjuna is capable of slaying in battle, O ruler of men, the very immortals along with the Daityas and Danavas, exerting their best in the fight, what to speak of Bhisma.

40. The highly puissant Bhisma the son of Santanu, now perverted in his judgment, decayed in intelligence and in vitality surely knows not what he ought to do."

Yudhisthira said :—

41. It is even so as you say, O mighty-armed descendant of Madhu's race. All these (universe) taken together are not capable of bearing your force.

42. I am sure of obtaining all those things that I may desire,—I, O foremost of men, on whose side you are staying.

43. O foremost of those that are ever-victorious, with yourself as our master, we can conquer in battle, even the celestials with Indra at their head, what to speak of Bhisma that mighty car-warrior.

44. For my own glorification, I dare not falsify your words; so do you render me assistance, O Madhava, as promised, without fighting on my behalf.

45. Before this battle there was an understanding between me and Bhisma. He said:—'I will give you good counsel, but will not fight for your interests.

46. I shall fight for the interests of Duryodhana; this I speak to you, O lord, for certain.' Therefore, O you of Madhu's race, he may offer us salutary advise which will enable us to obtain the kingdom.

47. Therefore once more accompanied by you, O slayer of Madhu, we shall repair to Bhisma for enquiring of him the means of his own death.

48. So, O descendent of the Vrishni race, repairing speedily with you to that foremost of men Bhisma, we shall seek counsel from that descendant of Kuru's race.

49. He, O Janarddana, will truly offer us salutary advice; and O Krishna, in battle we will do, what he shall advise.

50. O you of firm vows, he will give us counsel as well as victory. We became fatherless when we were mere children. It was he who reared us.

51. O Madhava, even such an aged grandsire, I want to slay—him who is the father of our dear-loved father! Fie on the life of a Kshatriya."

Sanjaya said :—

52. Thereupon, O mighty monarch, he of the Vrishni race, said to that delighter of the Kuru race—"O highly wise king, your words find an echo in my soul.

53. Devavrata of fierce vows, is well-accomplished in weapons. He can consume the foe even by his glances only. Let us go to that son of the ocean-going Ganga for asking the means of his death.

54. It behoves him to speak the truth, specially when questioned by you. Therefore let us go to the grandsire of the Kurus for asking him about the means of his death.

55. Repairing to that aged son of Santanu, we shall seek counsel of him. And following the advice he will offer we shall fight with the enemy.

56. Having thus consulted, the heroic Pandavas, together with the highly powerful son of Vasudeva, went, O elder brother of Pandu,

57. Towards the tent of Bhisma, having previously cast off their armours and dresses. Then entering the tent, they all touched his feet with their hands.

58. Then, O mighty monarch, the Pandavas, saluting that foremost of the Bharatas with their bent heads, sought his protection.

59. Then the mighty-armed Bhisma the grand-sire of the Kurus thus addressed them saying:—"All hail, O you of Vrishni's race, all hail, O Dhananjaya.

60. Welcome to the son of Dharma, and also to Bhima and the twins. What act enhancing your delight shall I do now?

61. I shall do it with all my soul even if it be exceedingly difficult of being accomplished," When the son of Ganga had thus repeatedly addressed them with affection,

62. King Yudhisthira with a cheerful heart spoke these words to him affectionately. "O you who are acquainted with all these things, how shall we conquer and how shall we acquire our kingdom?

63. How may stop be put to this destruction of creatures? Say, O lord, all this to me. Tell us yourself the means of your own death.

64. How, O hero, shall we be competent enough to withstand you in battle? You do not disclose even the slightest weakness to your enemy, O grandsire of the Kurus, whereby to overthrow you.

65. You are always seen in battle with your bow drawn to a circle. None can mark when you take up your shafts, place them in the bow-string or draw the string for shooting them.

66. O slayer of hostile heroes, slaying as you do, car-warriors, horsemen and elephant-riders, we behold you, O mighty-armed one, as a second sun on the chariot.

67. What person, O foremost of the Bharatas, dare vanquish you this day, when showering a arrowy downpour, you spread havoc among my troops.

68. My mighty army is every day being reduced by you in battle. How could we vanquish you in battle, how could sovereignty be ours?

69. How also could my troops be saved from this destruction? O grandsire, tell me the means for accomplishing all these ends." Thereupon, O elder brother of Pandu, the son of Santanu said these words to the Pandavas.

70. "O son of Kunti, so long as I am alive, you will not be able to obtain victory, O you who know everything. This I tell you truly.

71. When I shall be slain in battle, the Pandavas will surely win victory, in battle. Smite me down without delay, if you at all long to have victory in this war.

72. I permit you, O sons of Pritha, to strike me as you please. Indeed I consider it to be a favourable circumstance for you that you know me (to be invincible). When I shall be slaughtered, all else will be slaughtered. So do as I tell you."

Yudhisthira said:—

73. Tell us the means by which we may be able to vanquish your enraged self in battle—you who resemble the very god of Death himself wielding the mace.

74. We can vanquish the wielder of the thunder-bolt, or Varuna, or Yama himself, but you are incapable of being defeated by the celestials and Asuras united together with Indra at their head.

Bhisma said:—

75. O son of Pandu, O mighty-armed one, what you have said is indeed true. I am indeed incapable of being vanquished by the celestials and the Asuras united together with Indra at their head,

76. When with my weapons and my excellent bow in hand I engage myself in battle with care. But when I lay aside my weapons, even these mighty car-warriors may slay me.

77. One who lays his weapons aside, one who is fallen, one whose armour and standard have been shattered, one who flies away, one who is panic-struck, one who says "I am yours,"

78. One who is a female, one who bears a feminine designation, one who is disabled, one who has got only one son, and one who is a mean fellow,—with these I do not like to fight.

79. Hear also, O foremost of kings, about the vow that I had formerly taken. Beholding any inauspicious sign I would under no circumstance fight.

80. That mighty car-warrior, O king, that son of Drupada, who belongs to your army, who is known under the name of Sikhandin, who is wrathful in battle, valiant and ever attended with victory,

81. He was a female before, but afterwards attained manhood. You all know truly how all this came to pass.

82. Let the heroic Arjuna clad in male placing Sikhandin in front of him assail me with exceedingly sharp shafts.

83. Beholding then an inauspicious O man in the person of him who was female before, I will not strike though I may be armed with arrows.

84. Availing himself of that opportunity, let Pandu's son Dhananjaya quickly pierce me, O foremost of the Bharatas, on all sides.

85. Except the illustrious Krishna or Dhananjaya the son of Pandu, I do not find any one in the three worlds who can slay me in battle.

86—87. Therefore let Vibhatsu armed with weapons and exerting in battle to the best of his abilities and wielding his excellent bow, overthrow me in battle, placing (this Sikhandin or) any one else before him. Thus victory will be yours with certainty. O formost of kings, O you of chaste vows, do as I tell you. Then you shall be able to slay in battle all the Dhartarastras assembled together.

Sanjaya said :—

88. Then the sons of Pritha, ascertaining all these things, went back to their own camps, having saluted the high-souled Bhisma the grand-sire of the Kurus.

89. When Ganga's son ready to repair to the regions of the departed, had thus spoken, Arjuna, afflicted with grief and with his face covered with blushes of shame, said :—

Arjuna said :—

90. " How, O Madhava, shall I fight in battle, with the venerable and aged preceptor of the Kurus, the grand-sire of accomplished understanding and intelligence.

91. O Vasudeva, while playing in the days of childhood, I used to soil the garments of the high-souled and illustrious one by climbing on his lap with my body smeared with dust.

92. O elder brother of Gada, in my childhood, climbing on the lap of the high-souled father of Pandu (our father), I used to say 'Father';

93. 'I am not your father, but your father's father, O Bharata' even these were the words he used to say in reply to me. Oh he who used to treat me thus how could he be now slain by me!

94. Let him slay all my troops. I will not fight with that high-souled one, whether thereby I reap victory or death. What do you, O Krishna, think ?"

Vasudeva said :—

95. O Jishnu, having promised to slay Bhisma in battle, how can you desist from slaying him without transgressing the duties of a Kshatriya ?

96. Overthrow, O son of Pritha, this Kshatriya ever invincible in battle, from his car. Without slaying Ganga's son in battle you can not hope to win victory.

97. It have been foredoomed, O Partha, by the gods that Bhisma shall go to the abode of Death. That must come to pass which has been destined by the gods.

98. Except yourself, O invincible one, none including the wielder of the thunderbolt himself will be able to fight with Bhisma who resembles Death himself with wide open mouth.

99. Do you slay Bhisma, with great coolness. Hear also these words of mine which were said to Sakra formerly by the highly intelligent Vrihaspati.

100. 'One ought to slay even an aged man, or a person who is older than himself, or one who may be endowed with all virtues, if he comes as an enemy, or indeed any one else who comes for destroying him.

101. This, O Dhananjaya, is the eternal duty prescribed for Kshatriyas viz, they should fight, protect their subjects, and perform sacrifices, all without any maliciousness.

Arjuna said :—

102. Surely, O Krishna, Sikhandin has been born as the Death of Bhisma; for in soon as Bhisma sees the Panchala prince, he desists from striking.

103. Therefore placing Sikhandin in front of him (Bhisma) and stationing him as our van, we shall, by this means, overthrow the son of Ganga. This is my opinion.

104. With my shafts I will check other fierce bow-men of the enemy's host; and Sikhandin will fight with that foremost of warriors namely Bhisma.

105. I have heard that foremost of the Kurus viz Bhisma say—'I will never strike Sikhandin, in as much as formerly born as a daughter he attained manhood subsequently.'"

106. Having formed this resolution the Pandavas with him of Madhu's race went back to their tents with cheerful hearts, and with the permission of the illustrious Bhisma.

Thus ends the hundred and eighth chapter, the consultation after the withdrawal of troops from the ninth day's fight, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CIX.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA.)—Contd.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. How did Sikhandhin proceed in battle against the son of Ganga? How also did Bhisma advance against the Pandavas? Speak to me of all these, O Sanjaya.

Sanjaya said :—

2. Then towards the hour of sunrise, all the Pandava warriors, with the sound of drums, cymbals and Anakas,

3. And with the blare of conchs of the hue of curds, all around, placing Sikhandin at their van, marched forth in battle-array.

4. O mighty monarch, they disposed of their troops in an array capable of destroying all the foes; and O ruler of men, Sikhandin then occupied the van of all the troops.

5. Then Bhimasena and Dhananjaya became the protectors of his car-wheels. Behind him were the sons of Draupadi and the highly puissant son of Subhadra.

6. Then Satyaki and Chekitana, each a mighty car-warrior, became the protector of these last named. Behind them came Dhristadyumna protected by the Panchalas.

7. Then king Yudhisthira that mighty lord, with his twin brothers, Nakula and Sahadeva, proceeded to battle, O foremost of the Bharatas, uttering his war-cries aloud.

8. After him came Virata supported by his own divisions and then came, O mighty-armed one, king Draupada.

9. The five Kekaya brothers, and the highly powerful Dhristaketu, protected, O Bharata, the rear of the Pandava forces.

10. Having thus disposed of their troops in battle-array, the Pandavas, all prepared to lay down their lives in battle, charged your divisions.

11. The Kauravas also, O king, placing at the van of all their troops the mighty car-warrior Bhisma, advanced against the Pandavas.

12. That invincible warrior Bhisma, was protected by your sons, all endued with great might. Next behind him came the mighty bowman Drona along with his highly puissant son Aswathaman.

13. Next behind came Bhagadatta supported by a division of elephants. Kripa and Kritavarman followed Bhagadatta.

14. After them came the powerful Sudakshina, the king of the Kamvojas, Jayatsena of the Magadha kingdom, and the son of Suvala, and Vrihadvala.

15. Other mighty royal bowmen headed by Susarman protected, O Bharata, the rear of your troops.

16. Day after day Bhisma the son of Santanu used to dispose of his troops in battle arrays such as Pisachas, Rakshasas, and Asuras.

17. Then ensued a fight, as they slew one another, between your troops and theirs, that added considerably to the population of Death's domain.

18. The sons of Pritha headed by Arjuna, placing Sikhandin in front of them, advanced towards Bhisma in battle, shooting arrows of various descriptions.

19. Then, O Bharata, your troops wounded with shafts shot by Bhima, exhausted with the loss of blood, repaired to the regions of the departed.

20. Then Nakula, Sahadeva, and the mighty car-warrior Satyaki, all approaching your troops began to afflict them with force.

21. Thus, O foremost of the Bharatas, slaughtered in battle, your troops were unable to resist the mighty army of the Pandavas.

22. Then your troops, being thus slain, crushed and afflicted by the mighty car-warriors, fled in all directions.

23. Being thus slaughtered, O foremost of the Bharatas, by the Pandavas and the Srinjayas, with their sharp arrows, your troops could not find a protector.

Dhritarastra said :—

24. Tell me, O Sanjaya, what did the mighty Bhisma wrought up with wrath do, when he saw my troops thus afflicted by the Parthas in battle ?

25. Tell me also, O sinless one, how that afflicter of foes, that puissant hero confronted the Pandavas and slew the Somakas ?

Sanjaya said :—

26. I shall tell you, O monarch, what did your father do, when the troops of your sons were afflicted by the Pandavas and the Srinjayas.

27. The heroic Pandavas, O elder brother of Pandu, with cheerful hearts, advanced slaying the forces of your son.

28. Then, O foremost of men, Bhisma did not tolerate that slaughter of men, elephants and steeds, of your host, by the enemy.

29—31. Then that fierce bowmen, that invincible hero, ready to lay down his life in battle, showered upon the Pandavas, the Panchalas and the Srinjayyas, a downpour of sharp lances, and Vatsadantas and Anjalikas. Then, O king, wielding his weapons Bhisma with his shafts repulsed the five foremost and mighty car-warriors of the Pandava host who had been vigorously exerting themselves in battle. He held them in check by showering on them many weapons both offensive and defensive, all sped with wrath and force.

32. Wrought up with rage, he slew in battle countless numbers of elephants and steeds. Then, O king, that foremost of men overthrowing many car-warriors from their cars,

33. Many horse-soldiers from the back of horses, and also many foot-soldiers, and elephant-riders from the back of the elephants, inspired terror into the hearts of the foe.

34. Then like the Asuras assailing the wielder of the thunderbolt, the Pandavas assailed, in a body, that single-handed mighty car-warrior Bhisma who was moving swiftly up and down the field of battle.

35. Then Bhisma was seen in all directions, with a terrible form and shooting sharp arrows of which the touch was as fatal as that of Indra's thunderbolt.

36. As Bhisma fought on, his bow that resembled the mighty bow of Indra (Rainbow) was seen to remain continuously in a circular form.

37. Then, O ruler of men, your sons beholding those mighty feats of Bhisma in battle, were amazed, and highly honoured the grandsire.

38. Then like the immortals looking, in the days of yore, at Viprachitti, the Parthas with depressed hearts began to look at your heroic father who was fighting fiercely;

39—40. And they were unable to resist him who then looked like Death's self with wide-open mouth. On the tenth day of the battle, Bhisma began to consume with his sharp arrows the car-host of Sikhandin like fire consuming a forest. Then Sikhandin with three arrows pierced Bhisma between his breasts,

41. Bhisma—who then resembled an enraged snake of virulent venom or the Destroyer himself let loose by time. Thus sorely pierced by Sikhandin Bhisma looking at him

42. And waxing wroth, as if unwillingly said these words with a smile :—"Whether you strike me (with arrows) or not, I will never fight with you;

43. You are even now the same Sikhandin as the creator made you before." Hearing these words of his, Sikhandin overwhelmed with rage,

44. Said these words to Bhisma in battle licking at the same time the corners of his mouth. "I know you, O mighty-armed hero, to be the destroyer of the Kshatriyas.

45. I have heard of the battle you fought with the son of Jamadagni; I have also heard of your divine prowess.

46. Knowing your prowess, I will still fight with you this day, desirous of doing a good turn to the Pandavas and to myself, O afflicter of foes.

47. O foremost of men, I will fight with you this day on the field of battle, and will, without doubt, slay you in battle. This I swear by my troth before you.

48. Having heard these words of mine do what you think to be your duty. Whether you strike me or not, you shall not escape me alive this day. So, O ever-victorious Bhisma, let your eyes take a good view of this world, (as they will no longer see its charms)."

Sanjaya said :—

49. Having thus spoken, he, with five shafts of depressed knots, pierced Bhisma in battle who had already been deeply pierced with the former's wordy arrows.

50. Hearing those words of Sikhandin, the mighty car-warrior Savyasachi (Arjuna) thinking that that was the right moment (to strike Bhisma) urged the former on saying :—

51. 'I shall fight behind you crushing the enemy with my arrows'; now inflamed with wrath, do you assail Bhisma of dreadful prowess.

52. O mighty-armed hero, Bhisma will not be able to cause pain to you in battle, Therefore, O mighty hero, do you now assail Bhisma putting forth all your energies.

53. If, O sire, you do return without slaying Bhisma in battle, you, along with myself, shall be exposed to the derision of the world.

54. O hero, so exert yourself, that we may not be held in ridicule in this fierce battle. Struggling vigorously in battle, do you slay the grand-sire.

55. I, myself O mighty hero, shall look to your protection, repulsing all the car-warriors of the enemy's host. Do you overthrow the grandfather.

56. Drona and his son, Krishna, Suyodhana, Chitresana, Vikarna, Jayadratha the king of the Sindhus,

57. The two Avanti princes Vinda and Anuvinda, and Sudakshina the ruler of the Kamvojas, the heroic Bhagadatta, the mighty ruler of the Magadhas,

58. The valiant son of Somadatta, the Rakshasa, Alamvusha, and the ruler of the Triggarttas along with all the mighty car-warriors,—

59. All these warriors, I will resist like the banks resisting the waves of the mighty main. I will also hold at bay the mighty warriors of the Kuru army all united against us and fighting with us. Do you overthrow the grand-sire.

Thus ends the hundred and ninth chapter, the interchange of words between Bhisma and Sikhandin in the commencement of the tenth day's battle, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma-parva.

CHAPTER CX.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. How did Sikhandin the prince of the Panchalas waxing wroth in battle rush against the son of Ganga, the grandfather of the Kurus, of illustrious soul and of regulated vows?

2. Who were those mighty car-warriors that actively defended Sikhandin in that occasion needing great activity, with their weapons upraised and heart longing for victory?

3. How did also Santanu's son, Bhisma possessed of great prowess, fought on the tenth day, with the Pandavas and the Srinjayas?

4. I am unable to brook the thought of Bhisma overthrown by Sikhandin in battle. Was then his (Bhisma's) car shattered or his bow burst?

Sanjaya said :—

5. Neither was the bow of Bhisma broken nor was his car shattered to fragments, when, O foremost of the Bharata, he fought on with the foe,

6. Slaying them in battle with many shafts of straight knots. Many hundreds and thousands of mighty car-warriors belonging to your army,

7. Many huge-tusked elephants, O king, as also many well-caparisoned chargers, advanced to battle, with the grandsire at their head.

8. In perfect harmony with his vow, O foremost of the Kurus, the ever-victorious Bhisma continuously went on slaughtering the troops of the Pandavas.

9. The Panchalas accompanied by the Pandavas were incapable of withstanding that fierce bowman as he fought on, slaying the foe with his shafts.

10. When the tenth day arrived, Bhisma scattered the hostile army with his whetted shafts, by hundreds and thousands.

11. Then the Pandavas could not vanquish in battle that fierce bowman that sire of Pandu, who then resembled the Destroyer himself with his noose in hand.

12 Thereupon, O mighty monarch, the invincible Vibhatsu, the conqueror of the god of wealth, who was able to use his weapons even with his left hand, rushed to the spot terrifying all the car-warriors present.

13. Then like the Destroyer himself, Pritha's son carreered through the field, roaring constantly like a lion, twanging his bow-string and shooting myriads of arrows.

14. Terrified at his roars, your warriors, O foremost of the Bharatas, fled, O king, out of panic, like deer flying at the sight of a lion.

15. Then beholding the son of Pandu, to be the master of the field, and seeing his own troops greatly afflicted, Duryodhana, oppressed with fear thus addressed Bhisma :—

Duryodhana said :—

16. "Yonder stands the son of Pandu, owning cream-coloured steeds and Krishna himself for his charioteer, consuming my ranks, O sire, like fire itself consuming a forest.

17. Behold, O son of Ganga, O foremost of warriors, my troops routed and afflicted in battle, on all sides by that son of Pandu.

18. Just as a herds-man be labours his herd in the forest (with a cudgel), so, O afflicter of foes, see my army belaboured by Arjuna (with his arrows).

19. Routed and shattered by the arrows of Dhananjaya as my troops are, the invincible Bhima also is slaughtering them.

20. Satyaki, Chekitana, the twin sons of Madri by Pandu, and also Abhimanyu of great prowers,—all these warriors are crushing my hosts.

21. The heroic Dhristadyumna, and the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha, are also forcibly routing and driving away my troops in this fierce battle.

22. Of these troops who are being thus slaughtered by all these mighty car-warriors, I see no other refuge, regarding the staying on the field and fighting with the foe, O Bharata,

23. Than yourself, O foremost of men, who are equal to the celestials in battle. Therefore do you speedily confront those warriors, and so became the protector of my afflicted army."

24. Thus spoken to, O mighty monarch, your sire Devavrata, reflecting for a moment only and forming his determination,

25. Spoke these words to your son, consoling him therewith :—"O Duryodhana, O ruler of men, hear patiently what I now speak to you.

26. Before the battle commenced, O mighty hero, I vowed to you, that slaying ten thousand high-souled Kshatriya warriors

27. Every day, I would desist from fighting. O foremost of the Bharatas, I have acted up to my words.

28. This day, O highly puissant hero, I shall perform a marvellous feat. Either slain I shall lie on the field, or I will to-day slay the Pandavas.

29. To-day, O foremost of male being I will liquidate the debt I owe to you,—debt arising out of the food you gave me—by shuffling off this mortal coil in the very thick of battle."

30. Having thus spoken, O foremost of the Bharatas, that invincible hero scattering his arrows broadcast among the Kshatriyas, rushed against the ranks of the Pandavas,

31. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, the Pandavas began to resist the son of Ganga wrought up with rage, remaining in the centre of his divisions and looking like a snake of virulent poison.

32. Then, O delighter of the Kuru race, on that the tenth day of the battle, Bhisma exhibiting his own prowess, O king, slew hundreds and thousands of warriors.

33. Of those who were the foremost princes amongst the Panchalas, he robbed the strength, like the sun drawing moisture with its rays.

34. Having slain ten thousand swift-moving elephants and also, O monarch, ten thousand chargers with their riders,

35. And full hundred thousands of foot soldiers, that foremost of men, Bhisma, seemed to blaze forth like fire without a streak of smoke.

36. None among the Pandava host was then able to look at him, as he then shone like the lustrous orb of the day shining in the Northern solstice.

37. Then those Pandava troops and the mighty car-warriors of the Srinjaya clan, thus afflicted by Bhisma, in battle, rushed to slay that fierce bowmen.

38. Then fighting with tremendous odds, Bhisma the son of Santanu looked like the mount Meru enveloped by clouds on all sides.

39. Your son Duryodhana supported by a mighty division protected Ganga's son by surrounding him on all sides. Then ensued a terrible combat.

Thus ends the hundred and tenth chapter, the coloquy between Bhisma and Duryodhana in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CXI.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then, O king, Arjuna beholding Bhisma's prowess in battle, addressed Sikhandin saying :—"Confront the grandsire.

2. You should entertain no fear from Bhisma to-day, I will dislodge him from his excellent car with my sharp arrows."

3. Thus spoken to by Partha, and having listened to the former's words, Sikhandin, O foremost of the Bharatas, rushed against the son of Ganga.

4. Then also, O king, Dhristadyumna and the mighty car-warrior the son of Subhadra, filled with delight at having heard Arjuna's word, rushed against Bhisma.

5. Also the two aged warriors Virata and Drupada, and Kuntivoja each protected with an armour, rushed against Ganga's son before the very eyes of your son.

6. Nakula, and Sahadeva, and the highly powerful Dharmaraja Yudhisthira, as also the other inferior soldiers, O ruler of men,

7. All advanced against the son of Ganga. As to your warriors who confronted, to the best of their abilities and to the best of their energies, those united and mighty car-warriors of the enemy, hear me speak.

8. Chitrasena, O king, confronted in battle Chekitana who had been proceeding against Bhisma in battle like a tiger-cub rushing against a bull.

9. Kritavarman checked Dhristadyumna, O king, who having speedily approached Bhisma was then displaying his prowess in battle.

10. O monarch, then with great activity Somadatta's son encountered Bhimasena inflamed with rage and exerting for the slaughter of Ganga's son.

11. Then Vikarna, desirous of protecting the life of Bhisma checked the heroic Nakula who had been shooting myriads of shafts.

12. Then Kripa, the son of Saradwata, wrought up with rage, checked, in battle, Sahadeva proceeding towards the car of Bhisma.

13. Then the powerful Durmukha rushed against the highly powerful Rakshasa of fearful deeds, that son of Bhimasena who was deirous of slaying Bhisma.

14—18. Your son (Duryodhana) resisted Satyaki proceeding to battle. Sudakshina, the ruler of the Kamvojas, checked, O king, Abhimanyu as he was rushing against the car of Bhisma. Aswathaman inflamed with wrath, O Bharata, checked the two aged warriors, those crushers of foes, Virata and Drupada. Then the son of Bharadwaja carefully fighting checked the son of Pandu (Yudhisthira), as he was proceeding desirous of slaying Bhisma. Then, O king, the fierce bow-man Dussasana checked in battle, Arjuna himself, who desirous of reaching near Bhisma was advancing, placing Sikhandin before him, and illumining the ten points of the compass.

19. Other warriors of your host resisted in that batle the mighty car-warriors of the Pandava host as they were proceeding towards Bhisma in battle.

20. Then excited to the highest pitch of fury, the mighty car-warrior Dhristadyumna rushed against Bhisma, repeatedly addressing the troops thus in a loud voice,

21. "Yon delighter of the Kurus Arjuna himself is rushing towards Bhisma. Rush you then upon the latter, and be not afraid. Bhisma will never be able to assail you.

22. Even Vasava himself is not capable of withstanding Arjuna in battle, what to speak of the heroic Bhisma whose energy is gone and life is exhausted ?"

23. Hearing these words of their generalissimo, the mighty car-warriors of the Pandava host, with delighted hearts, rushed against the car of the son of Ganga.

24. Then those warriors of your army, all foremost of men, cheerfully resisted that onslought of the Pandavas that looked like a furiously advancing mass of living energy.

25. Then, O mighty monarch, the great car-warrior Dussasana, desirous of saving Bhisma's life, confronted Dhananjaya, dismissing all fear from his mind.

26. So also the heroic Pandavas rushing towards the car of Ganga's son, assailed your sons, all mighty car-warriors.

27. Then, O monarch, we beheld a wonderful incident, namely that reaching Dussasana's car Partha could not advance further.

28. Just as the banks resistl the mighty main with its waters agitated, so did your son resist that son of Pandu inflamed with rage.

29. Both of them were excellent car-warriors, both were invincible, O Bharata, and both resembled the moon and the sun in splendour and beauty.

30. Then like Maya and Sakra encountering each other in the days of yore, those two heroes encountered each other in battle, highly excited with wrath, and desirous of slaying one another.

31. Then, O monarch, Dussasana wounded the son of Pandu with three shafts in battle, and the son of Vasudeva with twenty.

32. Thereat Arjuna waxing wroth upon beholding him of the Vrishni race afflicted with arrows, sped hundred long shafts at Dussasana in that encounter.

33. Those shafts, penetrating through the latters armour's drank his life-blood. Thereupon, inflamed with rage, Dussasana pierced Pritha's son with five shafts.

34. Then again, O foremost of the Bharata, he pierced Arjuna with three shafts of exceeding sharpness, on the forehead. Then with those arrows, stuck on the forehead, Pandu's son appeared beautiful like

35. The mount Meru with its crests towering high in the heavens. Pierced deeply by your son wielding the bow, that mighty bowman

36. Partha appeared beautiful like the flowering Kinsuka tree. Then that son of Pandu, greatly excited afflicted Dussasana,

37. Like the enraged Rahu afflicting the fullmoon on the fifteenth day of the light half of a month. Then thus afflicted by the powerful Partha, your son, O ruler of men,

38. Pierced the former with arrows winged with the feathers of the Kanka bird and whetted on stone. Then Partha bursting open Dussasana's bow and shattering his car with his arrows,

39. Shot at him numerous dreadful arrows resembling the mace of Death himself.

Then your son cut off those arrows before they could reach him,

40. Sped though they were by Partha exerting his best in battle. Indeed this appeared to be marvellous. Once more your son pierced the son of Pritha with shafts of exceeding sharpness.

41. Thereupon wrought up with rage Partha fixing on his bow-string arrows furnished with golden wings and whetted on stone, discharged them at your son.

42. These shafts, O monarch, entered into the body of the illustrious Dussasana, like swans, O Bharata, diving into the waters of a lake.

43. Thus your son sorely afflicted by the illustrious son of Pandu, quickly avoiding him proceeded towards the chariot of Bhisma.

44. Then indeed Bhisma was like an island to him who was sinking into the fathomless deep (of pain). Then, O ruler of men, regaining his senses, your son,

45. Endued with bravery, and prowess, again began to check Partha with well-sharpened shafts, like Indra resisting Vritra. Your son of huge stature, penetrated Arjuna through and through but the latter did feel no pain at all.

Thus ends the hundred and eleventh chapter, the encounter between Arjuna and Dussasana, in the Bhisma-bad'ha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CXII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA) :—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. The son of Rishyasringa, that fierce bowman resisted in battle Satyaki, who clad in mail was rushing towards Bhisma in battle.

2. Thereupon, O king, he of Madhu's race, wrought up with rage, wounded the Rakshasa with nine shafts, as if smiling.

3. So also, O king, the enraged Rakshasa with nine shafts afflicted the illustrious grandson of Sini of the race of Madhu.

4. Then that slayer of hostile heroes that descendant of Madhus race viz the grandson of Sini, excited to the highest pitch of fury, shot numerous shafts at the Rakshasa in battle.

5. Then the mighty-armed Rakshasa, O you of prowess incapable of being baffled, pierced Satyaki with sharp arrows and uttered aloud his war-cry.

6. Then that powerful descendant of Madhus race also, though deeply pierced by the Rakshasa, depending on his own energy, smiled and uttered his war-cry.

7. Then, Bhagadatta, wrought up with wrath in battle, pierced with whetted shafts that descendant of Madhu's race, like a guide piercing a huge elephant with a hook.

8. Then leaving alone the Rakshasa in battle, that foremost of car-warriors namely the grandson of Sini, hurled darts of depressed knots against the ruler of the Pragjyotisas.

9. Then the ruler of the Pragjyotisas with a sharp-edged broad-headed shaft cut off the the mighty bow of the descendant of Madhu's race, displaying great lightness of hand.

10. Thereupon that slayer of hostile heroes, taking up another bow of great toughness, pierced the enraged Bhagadatta with sharp shafts in battle.

11—13. Thus deeply pierced, that mighty bow-man, licking the corners of his mouth, hurled at Satyaki an iron lance decked with gold and lapises, of great toughness, and terrible like the mace of Death. Then Satyaki with his arrows cut off that lance, O king, that had been coursing swiftly towards him, being shot by the force of Bhagadatta's arm. Then that lance fell down with force on the ground like a large meteor shorn of its splendure.

14. Beholding that lance to be baffled, your son, O ruler of men, checked him of Madhu's race, surrounding him with a large number of cars.

15. Then seeing that mighty car-warrior of the Vrishni race thus surrounded, king Duryodhana highly excited with rage, thus spoke to his brothers :—

16. "Do you all so strive, O Kurus, that this Satyaki may not return back with his life from this mighty host of chariots.

17. If he be slain, I may then consider the whole host of the Pandavas as nothing more than slain." Then accepting his words by saying 'yea', the mighty car-warriors,

18—19. Stationed in front of Bhisma began to fight with the grandson of Sini. Then the powerful ruler of the Kumvojas checked, in battle, Abhimanyu who had been vigorously advancing against Bhisma. Then the son of Arjuna having pierced the king with arrows of depressed knots,

20—21. Once more wounded the king with sixty-four arrows. Thereupon Sudakshina also, desirous of saving Bhisma's life in battle, pierced Abhimanyu with five shafts and the latter's charioteer with nine arrows. Then the battle that ensued consequent upon the encounter of those two heroes, was exceedingly fierce.

22—23. Sikhandin that grinder of foes rushed against the son of Ganga. The two old mighty car-warriors, Drupada and Virata, inflamed with rage, rushed to fight with Bhisma, holding at bay the army of the Kauravas as they advanced. Thereupon that foremost of car-warriors namely Aswathaman, wrought up with wrath confronted both those warriors in battle.

24. Then, O Bharata, a dreadful fight ensued between him and the old heroes. O afflicter of foes, with ten broad-headed shafts Virata wounded

25. The mighty bowman, the son of Drona, the ornament of the field of battle as he advanced with velocity towards them. Drupada also with his sharp arrows pierced Aswathaman.

26. Then Ashwathaman pierced with numerous shafts those two mighty warriors who having neared the son of the preceptor, had been wounding him with arrows.

27. Still the heroes Virata and Drupada advanced towards Bhisma; we then beheld an admirable feat achieved by those two old warriors,

28. In as much as they repulsed all the dreadful arrows shot by Drona's son. Then Kripa the son of Saradwata rushed against the advancing Sahadeva,

29—30. Like one infuriated elephant rushing against a compeer in the same state, in the woods. Then the heroic Kripa quickly pierced that mighty car-warrior the son of Madri with seventy shafts all decked with golden wings. Then the son of Madri burst his bow in twain with his strong shafts.

31. Then the former pierced the latter whose bow has been cut asunder with nine shafts. The latter then taking up another bow capable of bearing great strain,

32. And desirous of saving the life of Bhisma and excited with anger, struck cheerfully on the breast the son of Madri with ten shafts of exceeding sharpness.

33. So also, O king, urged by the desire for slaying Bhisma, the son of Pandu also worked up with rage struck the wrathful son of Saradwata on his breast.

34—35. Then ensued a fierce fight of terrible aspect and capable of inspiring terror. Then that afflicter of foes viz., Vikarna, desirous of rescuing the grandsire, and waxed up with rage, pierced Nakula in battle with no less then sixty shafts. Thus deeply pierced by your highly intelligent son, Nakula also

36. Penetrated Vikarna with seven and sixty sharp arrows. Then for the sake of Bhisma, those two foremost of men, those two afflicters of foes,

37—41. Those two heroes began to assail one another like two heifers amongst a herd of kine. Then for the sake of protecting Bhisma, the mighty Durmukha confronted the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha, who had been advancing to the fight slaying your troops. Then, O king, the son of Hidimva excited with wrath, struck that afflicter of foes viz., Durmukha on the breast with an arrow of straight knots. Then the heroic Durmukha, having cheerfully pierced Bhimasena's son with sixty keen-pointed arrows, uttered his war-cry, standing at the van of the army. Then that mighty car-warrior, the son of Hridika checked that foremost of car-warriors Dhristadyumna as he was advancing desirous of slaying Bhisma. Then the son of Prishata having pierced Hridika's son with five iron darts,

42—43. Once more quickly struck him between his breasts with fifty shafts. Similarly, O king, Hridika's son pierced the son of Prisata with nine arrows excedingly sharp and effulgent and furnished with wings made of the feathers of Kanka birds. Then for the sake of Bhisma, a fierce battle raged between them,

44—45. As they struck one another with great ardour, like that between Vritra and the great Indra. Bhurisravas speedily came upon the mighty Bhimasena who had been falling upon Bhisma. Then the son of Somadatta wounded Bhima in the centre of his chest,

46. With a long shaft of great sharpness and golden wings. With that shaft stuck on his breast, the puissant Bhimasena appeared beautiful,

47—48. Like the Krouncha mountain, O foremost of kings, in the days of yore bearing the lance of Skanda. Then these two foremost of men, inflamed with fury, sped at one another, arrows of solar effulgence and burnished by the forgers themselves. Then Bhima desirous of slaying Bhisma fought with that mighty car-warrior viz Somadattas son,

49. Similarly the latter longing for the victory of Bhisma, struggled with the former, both striving to counteract one another in his feats.

50. The son of Bharadwaja held in check that son of Kunti, Yudhisthira, who was coming upon Bhisma, surrounded by his large division.

51. Then, O king, hearing the clatter of Drona's chariot, that resembled the rumble of the rain-cloud Parjanya, the Prabhadrakas, O sire, quaked (with fear).

52. Thus assailed by Drona that mighty division of the son of Pandu could not stir one step forward, though striving vigorously.

53. Then your son Chitrasena, with a fearful expression, checked in battle Chekitana advancing, O ruler of men, against Bhisma.

54. Then for the sake of Bhisma, that mighty car-warrior (Chitrasena) endued with prowess and a praiseworthy quickness of hand, fought, O Bharata, to the best of his abilities, with Chekitana ;

55. Similarly Chekitana also fought with him with equal ardour. Then fierce was the battle that commenced consequent upon their encountering each other.

56. Then, O Bharata, Arjuna though repeatedly resisted by your son, repulsed the latter's divisions and began to crush your troops.

57. But Dussasana resisted Partha to the best of his powers, determined, O Bharata that the latter might not slay Bhisma.

58. Thus the army of your son being thus slaughtered, the foremost of car-warriors began, O Bharata, to betray signs of agitation.

Thus ends the hundred and twelfth chapter, the single-combats between the hostile heroes, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CXIII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1—2. Then that foremost of men, the valiant Drona, that fierce bow-man possessed of the prowess of an infuriate elephant and of great energy taking up and shaking his bow capable of checking even an infuriate elephant, began to crush the arrayed lines of the Pandavas, having penetrated into their very midst.

3. That highly powerful one conversant with the nature of all omens beholding various omens on all sides, thus addressed his son who had also been consuming the ranks of the enemy.

4. " This indeed is the day, O son, on which the highly powerful son of Pritha desirous of slaying Bhisma in battle, will exert his utmost.

5. My arrows are coming out of their own accord, and my bow seems to gape. My weapons are falling off when I am trying to fix them on the bow-string, and my mind is losing its ardour and warmth.

6. Animals and birds are emitting fearful and inauspicious cries on all sides. The vultures are swooping down upon the mighty host of the Bharatas.

7. The sun seems to be waned in its effulgence ; all the points of the compass have assumed a crimson hue. The earth seems to be pained and to utter cries and to tremble on all sides.

8. The Kanka birds, the vultures and the cranes are incessantly uttering cries. The jackals are uttering inauspicious and dreadful yells foreboding a terrible calamity.

9. Mighty meteors seem to shoot out from the centre of the solar disc. The constellation Parigha with trunkless form seems to over-ride the sun.

10. The solar and the lunar discs have assumed dreadful aspects, foreboding terrible calamity to the kings, in the shape of the mangling of their bodies.

11. The images of gods consecrating the temples of the Kuru king are laughing trembling and dancing, and lamenting.

12. The planets are revolving, keeping the inauspicious sun to their left ; and the charming deity of the moon is risen with his horns downwards.

13. The persons of kings belonging to the host of Dhritarastra's son appear to have lost all splendour, and though clad in armour, they do not seem to be shining.

14. A loud uproar set up by the two armies is being heard, as also the blare of the conch Panchajanya, and the twang of bow of Gandiva.

15. Surely Vibhatsu will, with the help of his excellent weapons, leaving other warriors in battle, confront the grandsire.

16. The pores of the hair of my body are being contracted, and my mind misgives, thinking, O hero of long arms, of the battle that will ensue between Bhisma and Arjuna.

17. Placing before him that prince of the Pachalas, who is of sinful soul and who is ever inclined to deceitful behaviour, Partha is proceeding for battle towards Bhisma.

18. Bhisma had said before, I will never slay Sikhandin. He was created a female by the Creator, but has become a man out of chance only.

19. This mighty son of Yajnasena is thus reckoned as an inauspicious sign. The son of the ocean-going Ganga will not therefore strike that inauspicious person.

20. Thus as I reflect, my mind misgives, knowing that Arjuna is rushing against the old grandsire of the Kurus, highly wrought up with rage.

21. These three namely, the wrath of Yudhisthira, the encounter between Bhisma and Arjuna and my exertions in this battle are surely very harmful to the creatures.

22. The son of Pandu is highly intelligent, endued with strength, heroic, accomplished in the use of weapons, possessed of great agility and lightness; he is capable of shooting his arrows to a great distance, and is firm in shooting them and is conversant with the nature of omens.

23. He is invincible in battle even by the celestials headed by Vasava himself. He is mighty, quick-witted, indefatigable and the foremost of all warriors;

24. He is ever victorious in battle and possessed of dreadful weapons. Avoiding his path do you repair to Bhisma of regulated vows.

25—27. This day you will behold in battle a terrible massacre. Auspicious, mighty and gold-decked armours of heroes will be splintered into pieces with arrows of close knots; the tops of standards, the lomaras and bows, and resplendent and sharp lances, and darts of the effulgence of gold and the caparisons of elephants shall this day be torn and broken by the enraged diadem-decked Arjuna.

28. This is not the time, O son for dependants to take care of their own lives. So, keeping paradise in view, do you rush to battle for winning victory and fame.

29. Yonder is Arjuna, with his banner bearing the emblem of [an ape, crossing on his car the dreadful current of battle, having cars, elephants and chargers for its eddies and which is incapable of being crossed over.

30. Devotion to the Brahmanas, self-control, benevolence, asceticism, and laudable good conduct—these are to be found in that king only who owns for his brothers Dhananjaya,

31. The mighty Bhimasena and the two sons of Pandu begotten upon Madri, and who have the son of Vasudeva of the Vrishni race for his saviour.

32. It is the wrath, engendered by grief, of that Yudhisthira whose person have been consumed by the austerities of asceticism, that is consuming the host of the wicked-souled son of Dhritarastra.

33. Yonder is seen the son of Pritha having Vasudeva for his protector, and checking all the troops of Dhsitarastra's host.

34. Yon is seen the army agitated by the diadem-decked Arjuna, like the waters of the ocean agitated by a mighty whale.

35. Listen to the cries of 'Alas and Oh' and to the shrieks of agony and distress! Go, confront the son of the Panchala king. I will confront Yudhisthira.

36. Protected as it is on all sides with Atirathas, the centre of the very strong array of the mighty king's troops is difficult of being penetrated into, like the bowels of sea being difficult of access.

37. Satyaki, Abhimanyu, Dhristadyumna and Vrikodara, and the twins Nakula and Sahadeva are all engaged in protecting that foremost of men viz king Yudhisthira.

38. Blue-complexioned like the younger brother of Indra, and tall like a mighty Sala tree, yonder is Abhimanyu rushing to fight at the head of his division, like a second Phalguna.

39. Make your excellent weapons ready, grasp your mighty bow, and then rush against the royal son of Prisata and fight also with Vrikodara.

40. What person wishes not his dear-loved son to live for eternal years? But in view of the duties of Kshatriyas, I do command you to fight.

41. Yonder is Bhisma, equal in battle to Death himself or Varuna, O son, consuming the hostile host.

Thus ends the hundred and thirteenth chapter, the colloquy between Drona and Aswathaman in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CXIV.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Having heard those words of the high-souled Drona, Bhagadatta, Kripa, Salya, Kritavarman,

2. The princes Vinda and Anuvinda from Avanti, Jayadratha the ruler of the Sindhus, Chitrasena, Vikarna and Durmarsana and others,

3. These ten warriors of your army engaged with Bhimasena in battle, supported by a large division consisting of troops recruited from various countries,

4. And desirous, O king, of winning great fame in that battle for Bhisma's sake. Then Salya pierced Bhimasena with nine arro ;

5. Kritavarman pierced him with three shafts, Kripa with nine, and, O sire, Chitrasena, Vikarna and Bhagadatta

6. Each pierced Bhimasena with ten arrows separately. The ruler of the Sindhus pierced Bhimasena with three arrows.

7. Vinda and Anuvinda pierced the son of Pandu, with five shafts each; and Durmarsana pierced him with twenty shafts of exceeding sharpness.

8—9. Then, O mighty monarch, that slayer of hostile heroes, viz., the heroic son of Pandu wounded, one after another, all those mighty car-warriors of the Dhritarastra host, of world-wide fame. He pierced Salya with seven arrows, Kritavarman with eight;

10. And, O Bharata, he cut in the middle Kripa's bow with arrows fixed on the string, in that battle. Then again he pierced the latter whose bow had been cut in twain with seven shafts.

11. He also wou Vinda and Anuvinda with three sha each, and Durmarsana with twenty and Chitrasena with five.

12. Then Bhima having pierced Vikarna with ten arrows and the ruler of the Sindhus with five, roared out in delight; and then again he pierced Jayadratha with three arrows.

13. Thereafter that foremost of car-warriors, that son of Gotami, taking up another bow and waxing wroth, pierced Bhima with ten shafts of great sharpness.

14. Then like a huge elephant pierced with the hook, the mighty Bhimasena, pierced with those ten arrows, was worked up with rage, O monarch,

15—16. And he pierced the son of Gotami with numerous arrows in battle. Then with three arrows, that one of effulgence like that of the Destroyer himself despatched to the regions of Death, the steeds and driver of the ruler of the Sindhus. Then that mighty car-warrior quickly jumping down from the car, the steed of which were slain,

17—18. Discharged sharp arrows towards Bhimasena in that battle. Then, O sire, with a couple of broad-headed arrows Bhima cut in twain the bow, O foremost of the Bharatas, of the illustrious ruler of the Sindhus. Then the latter, O king, with his bow burst, his horses and charioteer slain, and deprived of his car,

19. Speedily ascended, O king, the chariot of Chitrasena. Then that son of Pandu achieved marvellous feats in that battle,

20. In as much as piercing all those mighty car-warriors with arrows and resisting them, he deprived, O sire, the ruler of the Sindhus, of his car, before the eyes of all on-lookers.

21. Then Salya did not tolerate the the prowess of Bhimasena; and fixing sharp arrows burnished of the forgers,

22. He pierced Bhima in battle, exclaiming 'Stay, Stay.' Then Kripa and Kritavarman, and the highly powerful Bhagadatta,

23. And Vinda and Anuvinda from Avanti, and Chitrasena, and Durmursana Vikarna, the valiant ruler of the Sindhus,

24. All these subduers of foes, then quickly pierced Bhima (with arrows), for rescuing Salya. He (Bhima) also pierced them in return, each with five shafts,

25. He pierced Salya first with seventy shafts and again with ten shafts. Salya also first piercing him with nine arrows next wounded him with five.

26. Then he pierced Bhima's charioteer deeply into the vitals with a broad-headed shaft. Then the mighty Bhimasena, beholding his charioteer Visoka thus mangled,

27—29. Wounded the king of the Madras in the breast and arms with three arrows. He then also pierced other bowmen in that battle, each with three shafts, and then roared aloud like a lion. Then all those bowmen, fighting with care, pierced Pandu's son, versed in all modes of warfare, in his vitals, each with three shafts of keen points. Though thus deeply pierced that fierce bowman Bhimasena was not pained in the least,

30. Like a mountain washed with thick shower of rain poured down by the clouds. Then possessed with anger that mighty car-warrior of the Pandavas,

31. Of illustrious fame, having pierced the king of the Madras with three shafts, wounded the ruler of the Pragjyotisas, O king, with hundred shafts in battle.

32. Then that high-famed warrior having pierced Kripa with many arrows, cut off the bow and the arrows of the illustrious descendant of the Satwata race,

33—34. With horse-shoe-headed arrow of great sharpness, displaying the while great lightness of hands. Then that afflicter of foes Kritavarman taking up another bow, struck Vrikodara between his two brows with a long and sharp shaft. Bhima then wounding Salya in battle with nine shafts wholly made of iron, pierced, Bhagadatta with three and Kritavarman with eight arrows, and each of the other warriors including the son of Gotami &c, with two shafts.

35. Those heroes also, O king, pierced him with exceedingly sharp arrows. Though thus pierced by all those mighty car-warriors with all kinds of weapons, 36—38. Yet regarding them as mere straws, he careered through the field without the least pain. Those foremost of car-warriors also patiently sped at Bhima sharp arrows by hundreds and thousands. Then the highly powerful heroic Bhagadatta let go his lance of great velocity and of a golden staff at that illustrious warrior Bhima. The mighty-armed king of the Sindhus hurled at the latter a lance and a battle-axe.

39—40. Kripa hurled at Bhima a Sataghni, and, O king, Salya a fierce dart; of the other warriors each, aiming at Bhima, forcibly let go five shafts whetted on stone. Then the son of the wind-god (Bhima), with a horse-shoe-headed arrow, cut that lance in twain.

41. He also severed that battle-axe as if it were sesamum stalk with three arrows; he broke into pieces the Sataghni with nine shafts furnished with wings of the feathers of Kanka birds.

42. Then Bhimasena ever proud in battle cut off every weapon into three parts; and he also pierced all those fierce bowmen opposed to him, each with three arrows.

43. Then when the combat was thus raging fiercely, Dhananjaya came there on his car, and beheld Bhima that mighty car-warrior,

44. Slay in battle his opponents and fight with them with his arrows. Then beholding those two illustrious sons of Pandu together,

45—46. Your warriors, all foremost of men, did not cherish any hope of victory then. Then Arjuna, who was proceeding desirous of slaying Bhisma, with Sikhandin before him, seeing Bhima fight with the ten mighty car-warriors of your army, confronted them in battle.

47. Then, O monarch, out of a desire for doing an act pleasurable of Bhima, Vibhatsu pierced those heroes who had been so coolly fighting with Bhima in battle.

48. Thereupon king Duryodhana urged king Susarman for bringing about the slaughter of Arjuna as also of Bhima.

49. "Go you, O Susarman, speedily surrounded by a large host of your troops. Slay me these two sons of Pandu, viz., Dhananjaya and Vrikodara."

50. Hearing these words of the king, the chief of the Trigarttas, the ruler of Prasthala, assaulting the two bowmen Bhima and Arjuna,

51. Surrounded them on all sides with many thousand chariots. Then ensued a fierce battle between Arjuna and his opponents.

Thus ends the one hundred and fourteenth chapter, the prowess of Bhimasena in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CXV.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Arjuna covered over with his arrows of straightknots that mighty car-warrior Salya who had been fighting very carefully.

2. He pierced Susarman and Kripa, each with three shafts; then in that battle, the ruler of the Pragjyotisas, Jayadratha, the ruler of the Sindhus,

3. Chitrasena, Vikarna, Kritavarman, Durmarsana and, O king, the foremost car-warriors from Avanti,

4. All these warriors were pierced each with three shafts winged with Kanka and peacock feathers, by the Atiratha Arjuna, who had been afflicting your army.

5. Then, O Bharata, Jayadratha who was riding on the car of Chitrasena, having pierced Partha in battle, pierced Bhima also with his arrows.

6. Salya and Kripa those foremost of car-warriors also pierced in battle, Jishnu with myriads of shafts, O king, each capable of penetrating into the very vitals.

7—8. Then, O ruler of men, your sons headed by Chitrasena, in that battle quickly pierced Bhima and Arjuna, O sire, each shooting five arrows of exceeding sharpness. Then these two foremost of car-warriors the two illustrious descendants of the Bharata race, viz., the sons of Kunti,

9. Afflicted in battle the mighty division of Trigartta troops; thereupon Susarman pierced Partha in battle with nine swift-coursing arrows.

10—12. And then he roared out his fierce war-cry, striking terror into the heart of the enemy's host. Other heroic car-warriors pierced Bhimasena and Dhananjaya with straight-going exceedingly sharp arrows, all furnishd with golden wings. Those two foremost descendants of the Bharata race, viz., the two sons of Kunti, sporting on their cars amidst those car-warriors, appeared beautiful, and resembled two enraged lions looking out for flesh amidst a herd of cows.

13. Cutting off the bows and arrows of the heroes in battle, those two fierce warriors began to fell the heads of men by hundreds.

14. Many cars were shattered; and steeds by hundreds were slain and in that fierce conflict, elephants with their riders fell on the ground by hundreds.

15. Here and there car-warriors and horse-men were slain; and many were seen to tremble on all sides.

16. The earth become strewn over with slain elephants, and mangled foot-soldiers and chargers, and with cars broken into splinters.

17. In that battle we beheld the marvellous prowess of the mighty Arjuna, in as much as, checking those heroes by his shafts, he slew troops by hundreds.

18. Then Kripa and Kritavarman, and Jayadratha the ruler of the Sindhus, and Vinda and Anuvinda from Avanti, did not abandon the fight.

19. Then the fierce bowman Bhima and the mighty car-warrior Phalguna began to crush severely the dreadful army of the Kurus.

20. Thereupon, the rulers of earth quickly began to pour on the car of Dhananjaya thousands and thousands of arrows.

21. Then checking those mighty car-warriors with the net-work of arrows woven by himself, Partha began to despatch them to the regions of Death.

22. Then in that battle, the mighty car-warrior Salya inflamed with wrath, pierced, as if sporting, Jishnu on the breast with broad-headed and straight-knotted shafts.

23. Then Partha having cut off the former's bow and gloves with five arrows, pierced him in his vital parts with arrows of great sharpness.

24. Thereupon taking up another bow capable of bearing great strain, the ruler of the Madras waxing wroth, pierced Jishnu in battle,

25. With three arrows, and the son of Vasudeva with five and Bhimasena on the breast and arms with nine shafts.

26. Then, O monarch, Drona and the king of the Magadhas, both being commanded by Duryodhana,, hied to that spot,

27. Where the two mighty car-warriors, Partha and Bhimasena, the sons of Pandu, had been slaughtering the mighty divisions of the Kourava host.

28. O foremost of the Bharatas, then Jayatsena in that battle pierced Bhimasena possessed of terrible weapon, with eight sharp arrows.

29. Then Bhima piercing him with ten shafts again pierced him with five, and he felled the latter's charioteer from his seat on the box of the car.

30. Then borne by the unrestrained steeds flying hither and thither, the ruler of the Magadhas was carried away from the field of battle even before the every eyes of the on-looking troops.

31. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, Drona availing himself of an weakness of Bhima pierced the latter with eight keen-pointed darts whetted on stone.

32. Then, O Bharata, Bhima, that hero ever proud in battle, pierced his sire-like preceptor first with five broad-headed arrows and then with another sixty of the same.

33. Arjuna also having pierced king Susarman with many shafts of iron, began to scatter the latter's host like a tempest scattering mighty masses of clouds.

34. Thereupon, Bhisma, king Duryodhana himself, the ruler of the Kosalas and Vrihadvala, all excited with rage assailed in a body Bhimasena and Dhananjaya.

35. So also the Pandava heroes, Prisata's son Dhristadyumna and others, rushed against Bhisma who then resembled Death with mouth wide open.

36. Sikhandin also approaching the grandsire of the Bharatas delightedly rushed at him, harbouring no fear from that mighty car-warrior.

37. The Parthas accompanied by the Srinjayas, and headed by Yudhisthira himself, with Sikhandin at their van fought on with Bhisma,

38. Similarly all your warriors with Bhisma of regulated vows at their forefront fought with the Partha warriors headed by Sikhandin.

39. Then the contest that ensued between the sons of Pandu and the Kouravas for the conquest of Bhisma, became terrible to the extreme.

40. In that battle, O ruler of men, that may be compared to a game at dice, for the sake of victory or the reverse, Bhisma was the stake of your warriors.

41. Then, O foremost of kings, Dhristadyumna urged on the troops to assail Ganga's son exclaiming, "Fear not, O excellent car-warriors."

42. Hearing the words of their generalissimo, the division of the Pandavas disregarding their lives quickly rushed at Bhisma.

43. Like the banks receiving the surging waves of the mighty main, Bhisma also, O monarch, that foremost of car-warrior, received that assailing host of the enemy.

Thus ends the hundred and fifteenth chapter, the prowess of Bhima and Arjuna, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CXVI.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA.)—Contd.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. How, O Sanjaya, did the highly puissant son of Santanu, viz., Bhisma fight on the tenth day with the Pandavas and the Srinjayas?

2. How did also the Kurus, check the Pandavas in battle? Describe to me the fierce battle that Bhisma, that ornament of battle-field, fought with the foe.

Sanjaya said :—

3. I shall, O Bharata, rehearse to you as to how did the Kurus fight with the Pandavas, and how also did that battle rage.

4. Day after day, the irate mighty car-warriors of your army were conveyed to the regions of the departed by the excellent weapons shot by the diadem-decked Arjuna.

5. That conqueror of assembled enemies, viz., Bhisma, that foremost of Kuru heroes ever redeeming his vows, also destroyed the hosts of the Pandavas.

6. Beholding Bhisma fighting at the head of the Kurus and Arjuna at the head of Panchala troops, we were unable, O afflicter of foes, to divine as to which side would be victorious.

7. Then in that battle on the tenth day when Bhisma and Arjuna confronted one another, the carnage that was caused was indeed terrible to the extreme.

8. Then Bhisma, the son of Santanu, that hero conversant with excellent weapons, slew, O afflicter of foes, many warriors by millions and thousands.

9. Many were the number of those unretreating heroes, whose names and designations and families were not known, who lay slaughtered by Bhisma on the field of battle.

10. Having consumed the Pandava ranks for ten days, the high-souled Bhisma, O afflicter of foes, became disregardful of his life.

11—12. Then wishing his quick slaughter at the face of the armies, and thinking—'I will no longer slay foremost of car-warriors in battle,'—your mighty-armed father Devavrata, addressing Yudhisthira who was then near him said these words :—

13. "O Yudhisthira, O very wise one, O you familiar with all the Sastras! Hear, O sire, I speak these words, that are fraught with moral teachings and that are capable of securing paradise for any one.

14. O Bharata, O sire, I am disgusted with this body of mine. I have passed my days in slaying numerous creatures in battle.

15. So if you desire to do me a good turn, strive your best for slaying me, placing the Panchalas and Srinjayas with Partha, before yourself."

16. Ascertaining that to be the desire of Bhisma, king Yudhisthira of unerring sight rushed against Bhisma in battle with the Srinjayas for his supporters.

17. Thereupon, O king, Dhrishtadyumna and Yudhisthira the son of Pandu, having heard those words of Bhisma urged on their forces saying :—

Yudhisthira said :—

18. Proceed, fight! conquer Bhisma in battle; you will be protected by Jishnu of unerring aim who is ever the conqueror of foes;

19. This fierce bowman the son of Prisata the commander of our hosts and Bhimasena also, will assuredly protect you all in battle.

20. Ho Srinjayas, entertain no fear of Bhisma in battle to-day! Placing Sikhandin in our van we will assuredly conquer Bhisma in battle."

Sanjaya said:—

21. Then on the tenth day, making all these arrangements, the Pandavas determined to conquer or to go to the regions of Brahma; and infuriate with rage, they encountered Bhisma.

22. Placing Sikhandin and Dhananjaya the son of Pandu at their head, they struggled arduously to overthrow Bhisma.

23. Then numerous heroic rulers of various countries commanded by your son, accompanied by their sons, and by their own mighty divisions,

24. As also your highly puissant son Dussasana supported by all his uterine brothers, then began to support Bhisma staying in the midst of the troops.

25. Then all your warriors placing before them Bhisma of regulated vows began to fight with the Parthas having Sikhandin at their van.

26. Then that hero having the ape as the device on his standard, placing Sikhandin before him and accompanied by the Chedis and Panchalas, rushed against Bhisma the son of Santanu.

27. The grandson of Sini fought with Drona's son, Dhristaketu with the descendant of Puru and Yudhamanyu with king Duryodhana and his ministers.

28. Then, O afflicter of foes, Virata supported by his division confronted Jayadratha with his troops, that heir of Vridhakshatra.

29. Yudhisthira encountered the king of Madras supported by his soldiers. Bhimasena also, well protected, assaulted the elephant division of the enemy.

30. The prince of the Panchalas wrought up with rage and supported by his uterine brothers rushed against Drona's son invincible, irresistible, and foremost of all wielders of weapons.

31. That subduer of enemies, viz., prince Vrihadvala, confronted Subhadra's son who bore the device of a lion on his standard and whose flag resembled a shaking Karnikara flower.

32. Then your sons accompanied by other monarchs, fell upon Sikhandin and that son of Pandu namely Dhananjaya, desirous of slaying them both.

33. Then when the fighters of the two hosts rushed impetuously against one another in that terrible combat, the earth shook underneath their tread.

34. Beholding Santanu's son in battle, the divisions of your army and those of the enemy clashed against one another, O Bharata.

35. Then when, infuriated, those two hosts rushed against one another, terrible was the din that filled all the different quarters of the earth, O Bharata.

36. And the din become still more awful being aggravated by the blare of conchs and the sound of drums and the roars of elephants and the war-cries of the troops.

37. Then the radiance emitted from the bracelets and diadems of all the royal warriors—radiance resembling the splendour of the sun or the moon—become bedimmed.

38. Clouds of dust were raised in which played the lightning consisting of the flashes of weapons. The twang of bows also became tremendous.

39. The whizzing of arrows, the blare of conchs, the loud sound of the drums, and the clatter of cars of the warriors of both the hosts were indeed awful.

40. The sky over the head of the two armies assumed a lowering aspect in consequence of the numerous darts, javelins, lances and arrows shot and hurled by them.

41. In that dreadful battle, car-warriors and horsemen, smote down one another. Elephants crushed elephants, and foot-soldiers slew foot-soldiers.

42. Then, O foremost of men, like the fight between two hawks for a piece of meat, the fight, for the sake of Bhisma, between the Pandavas and the Kurus, become very awful.

43. Then dreadful was the encounter in that battle between those two armies, each desirous of slaughtering and gaining victory over its rival.

Thus ends the hundred and sixteenth chapter, the advice of Bhisma, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CXVII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Then for the sake of Bhisma's slaughter, the highly powerful Abhimanyu, O mighty monarch, engaged with your son supported by his large division.

2. Thereupon king Duryodhana waxing wroth, pierced Krishna's nephew on the breast first with nine arrows of straight-knots, and then again with three shafts.

3. Then in that battle, Krishna's nephew, inflamed with wrath, let go at the car of Duryodhana his lance that looked like the sister of Death himself.

4. Your son that mighty car-warrior, O ruler of men, with a horse-shoe-shaped arrow cut off in two that dreadful lance coursing swiftly towards himself.

5. Then the battle that raged between the two horses became awful and admirable to look at; and, O Bharata, it was gratifying to the senses and applauded by the rulers of earth.

6. The two heroes, viz., the son of Subhadra and the chief of the Kurus, fought fiercely with one another, the former for bringing about the slaughter of Bhisma and the latter for gaining victory over Arjuna.

7. Then that afflicter of foes, viz., Drona's son that foremost of Brahmanas encountering Satyaki in battle and waxing wroth, pierced the latter on the breast with a long shaft.

8. Then that grandson of Sini also possessed of generous heart, with nine shafts winged with Kanka feathers, pierced the preceptor's son, O Bharata, in all his vital parts.

9. Thereupon Ashwathaman pierced Satyaki in that battle, first with nine shafts, and next with thirty more on the breast and the arms.

10. Then that illustrious descendant of the Satwata race that great bowman thus deeply pierced by the son of Drona struck the latter with three shafts in return.

11. The mighty car-warrior, the descendant of the Kuru having covered that fierce, bow-man, viz., Dhristaketu with his shafts, wounded the latter on many parts of his body.

12. Similarly the mighty car-warrior Dhristaketu endued with great might, pierced in that battle that descendant of Kuru with three hundred shafts of great sharpness.

13. Thereupon the descendant of Puru, that mighty car-warrior, having cut off the bow of Dhristaketu uttered a loud roar and pierced the latter with many sharp arrows.

14. The latter then taking up another bow, wounded, O king, that descendant of Kuru, with seventy-three sharp shafts whetted on stone.

15. Then those two fierce bow-men, both mighty car-warriors, and of gigantic proportions pierced each other with their thick arrowy showers.

16. Then, O Bharata, those two heroes waxed up with rage, having cut off one another's bow and slain one another's steeds, and being thus deprived of the use of their cars, rushed against one another for fighting with the sword.

17—18. Then, O king, taking up two resplendent shields, made of bull's hide, and embossed and decked with hundred beautiful stars and moons on the ground, as also taking up two swords of dazzling effulgence, those two warriors assailed one another, like two lions, in the deep woods, both striving to consort with the same lioness in her season.

19. Longing to get near each other, they wheeled and moved, displaying various charming circles and various forward and backward movements.

20. Then the wrathful descendant of Puru, with his huge sword, struck Dhristaketu on the frontal bone, saying at the same time 'Stop, stop.'

21. The ruler of the Chedis also, with the sharp end of his mighty sword, wounded that descendant of Puru, that foremost of men, on his shoulder joint.

22. Then, O mighty monarch, those two subduers of foes, rushing against one another in that fierce combat, fell down, overthrown by one another's velocity,

23. Thereupon your son Jayatsena taking up the descendant of Puru carried him away from the field of battle on his own vehicle.

24. The highly powerful son of Madri, viz., Sahadeva, possessed of great prowess and heroism bore away Dhristaketu from the field on his own car.

25. Chitrasena having pierced Susarman with many iron shafts, again pierced him with sixty and again with nine shafts.

26. Susarman also waxing wroth in battle, O ruler of men, pierced your son with sets of ten sharp arrows each time.

27. He also pierced Chitrasena, O king, with nine shafts of depressed knots; then the latter inflamed with rage in battle pierced the former in return (with many shafts compassing the death).

28. Then in that conflict for Bhisma O king, Subhadra's son, acquiring great fame and honour fought with prince Vrihadvala,

29. Displaying his prowess, for helping his father Arjuna then rushing at the car of Bhisma. Then the ruler of the Kosalas having pierced Arjuna's son with five darts made of iron,

30. Once more pierced him with twenty shafts of staight-knots. Then Subhadra's son pierced the ruler of the Kosalas with eight iron-made darts.

31. But he could not make the latter tremble in battle before him, and so again pierced him with many arrows. Then the son of Phalguna cut off the bow of the Kosala king once more ;

32. And he struck him with thirty shafts furnished with wings of the Kanka feather. Thereupon that prince Vrihadvala taking up another bow, 33—34. And waxing irascible, pierced with many an arrow the son of Phalguna. Indeed, O afflicter of enemies, the battle, that took place for the sake of Bhisma, between them both, O king, inflamed with anger and both well-versed in all manner of warfare, was like that between Vali and Vasava in the days of yore on the occasion of the war between the celestials and the Asuras.

35. Bhimasena then fighting with the elephant division looked highly beautiful, like the wielder of the thunderbolt himself running upon the mountains.

36. Those elephants, huge-bodied like the hills, being thus slaughtered in battle fell down on the earth in large numbers, filling the earth with their roars.

37. Those elephants prodigious like hills and resembling broken heaps of antimony appeared beautiful, as they lay prostrate, like so many mountains covering the earth's surface.

38. Then king Yudhisthira that great bowman, protected by a mighty division encountering the Madra king in battle began to afflict him sorely.

39. The highly powerful ruler of the Madras also, for the sake of rescuing Bhisma began to afflict that mighty car-warrior the son of Dharma in battle.

40. The king of the Sindhus having pierced Virata with nine shafts of straight-knots once more pierced him with thirty shafts of keen edges.

41. Then Virata also that leader of a division, O king, in return pierced the ruler of the Sindhus with thirty sharp arrows between his breast.

42. Then those two kings of the Matsyas and the Sindhus, both of charming appearance and both furnished with beautiful armours, weapons and standards, and both wielding excellent bows and swords, appeared highly resplendent.

43. Then Drona being engaged in that dreadful battle with the son of the Panchala king, fought on fiercely with arrows of close knots.

44. Then Drona, O mighty monarch, having cut off the mighty bow of Prisata's son, pierced the latter with a set of fifty shafts.

45. Then that slayer of hostile heroes namely Prisata's son, took up another bow, and then he hurled at Drona a terrible mace resembling the bludgeon of Death himself.

46. Then Drona with fifty shafts, in that battle repulsed that mace decked with plates of gold as it flew swiftly towards himself.

47. Then, O king, that mace cut into fragments by the arrows shot from Drona's bow, and splintered and shattered into pieces, fell down on the surface of the earth.

48. Beholding his mace thus destroyed that afflicter of foes, viz., the son of Prisata hurled at Drona his lance, excellent, and made of iron.

49. Drona, O Bharata, cut off that lance with nine arrows in the battle ; and he then began to afflict the great bowman, viz., Prisata's son in battle.

50. Then, O mighty monarch, for the sake of Bhisma, raged the fierce battle between Drona and Prisata's son,—battle that was dreadful to the extreme and terrible in its aspects.

51. Then Arjuna sighting the son of Ganga rushed at him discharging sharp arrows, like an infuriate elephant rushing in the woods at a compeer in the same state.

52. The highly puissant king Bhagadatta confronted Arjuna, and held the latter in check with a thick shower of arrows.

53. Thereupon Arjuna pierced the elephant of Bhagadatta rushing towards himself in battle, with many keen-pointed and iron-made arrows, all bright as silver.

54. The son of Kunti, O king, urged on Sikhandin, saying "Advance, advance upon Bhisma and slay him."

55. Thereupon, O elder brother of Pandu the ruler of the Pragjyotisas abandoning Pandu's son in battle, rushed swiftly, O king, towards the chariot of Drupada.

56. Thereat Arjuna, O mighty monarch, quickly advanced towards Bhisma, with Sikhandin in front of him, and then there raged a (dreadful) fight.

57. Thereupon, in that battle your warriors, uttering fierce yells, rushed quickly at the son of Pandu. Then all this appeared marvellous.

58. Then, O ruler of men, the army of your sons consisting of various divisions, Arjuna began to scatter away like a strong gale scattering away clouds in the welkin.

59. Then Sikhandin confronting the grandsire of the Bharatas, pierced patiently the latter with myriads of shafts.

60. Then Bhisma began to consume the Kshatriyas in battle, like a fire, having his chariot for its fire-chambers, his bow for its flames, his swords, lances and maces for its fuel and his numerous shafts for its dreadful scintillations.

61. Just as a conflagration fed with a constant supply of fuel leaps from house to house being aided by a breeze, so also did Bhisma then burn the hostile troops displaying his weapons of celestial make.

62. Then that mighty car-warrior Bhisma, holding in check the division of the son of Pandu (Arjuna), slew those Somakas in battle who followed Partha,

63. With arrows furnished with golden wings and of great sharpness and depressed knots; and he filled the points cardinal and subsidiary of the compass with the echoes of his war-cries.

64. He dislodged car-warriors from their cars, and felled, O king, horsemen with their chargers; he also made the mighty car-division look like Palmyra groves, with trees deprived of their leafy heads.

65. Then Bhisma that foremost of all wielders of weapons deprived, O king, the cars, the chargers and the elephants, of their respective riders, in that battle.

66. The troops then, O king, began to tremble, hearing the twang of his bow-string and the slap of his palms, that resembled the thunder itself.

67. Indeed, O lord of men, the arrows of Bhisma did never fail to hit their marks. Shot from his bow, the arrows did not stick merely on the skin of warriors and animals.

68. Then, O king, O ruler of men, we beheld cars deprived of their riders, dragged on all side, with the velocity of the wind by the fleet steeds that were yoked to them.

69—71. Full fourteen thousand high-famed mighty car-warriors of illustrious extraction, ready to sacrifice their lives in battle, and unretreating and heroic, and owner of standards adroned with gold, all belonging to the race of the Chedis, the Kasis and Karushas, confronting the heroic Bhisma who then appeared like Death himself with mouth wide open, were swiftly despatched to the other world with all their cars, elephants and chargers. There was not a single mighty car-warrior, O king, among the Somakas,

72—73. Who having confronted Bhisma in that battle, was able to return alive from the engagement. Beholding all those warriors despatched to the domain of the lord of the departed, people then thought high of Bhisma's prowess. No car-warrior then ventured to encounter that hero.

74. Save and except that heroic son of Pandu, owning cream-coloured steeds, and having Krishna for his charioteer, and that prince of the Panchalas, Sikhandin of immeasurable energy.

Thus ends the hundred and seventeenth chapter, the dreadful battle and carnage, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CXVIII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA.)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then, O foremost of men, Sikhandin having encountered Bhisma in battle, pierced the latter on his breast with ten broad-headed shafts of great sharpness.

2. Then the son of Ganga looked at Sikhandin with his eyes blazing in rage, and, O Bharata, he seemed to burn the latter by his glance only.

3. But, O king, remembering his femininity, Bhisma did not wound him before the eyes of all in that battle. The latter however comprehended it not.

4. Therefore, O monarch, Arjuna said to Sikhandin, "swiftly rush at the grandsire and slay him.

5. What is that you want to speak, O hero? Slay the mighty car-warrior Bhisma, I do not see a man in the whole army of Yudhisthira,

6. Who is able to fight with Bhisma in battle, except yourself, O best of men? This I say to you forsooth."

7. Thus spoken to by Pritha's son, O foremost of the Bharatas, Sikhandin speedily covered the grandsire with arrows of various description;

8. But disregarding those arrows, your sire Devavrata, wrought up with wrath engaged to fight with Arjuna by means of his shafts.

9. That mighty car-warrior also despatched the forces of the Pandavas to the other world, O sire, with his sharp-pointed shafts.

10. On the other hand, O king, the sons of Pandu, supported by mighty divisions covered Bhisma over, like clouds covering the orb of the day.

11. Then, O foremost of the Bharata, that chief of the Bharatas thus surrounded on all sides, began to consume those heroes in battle like a raging conflagration burning the woods.

12. Then we beheld the wonderful prowess of your son as much as he simultaneously fought with Arjuna aud protected the grand-sire.

13. Then all people were gratified with the feat achieved by your high-minded son Dussasana wielding his bow;

14. For then he, single-handed, fought with the Pandavas including Arjuna himself; he then fought so fiercely that the Pandavas were unable to resist him.

15. In that battle car-warriors were deprived of their cars by Dussasana; mighty horse-men and highly powerful elephant-riders,

16. Mangled with his shafts, fell down on the surface of the earth. Huge-tusked elephants afflicted with arrow-wounds ran in all directions.

17. Just as fire fed with fuel fiercely blazes forth with terrible flames, so did your son consume the troops of the Panadvas.

18. None of the heroic car-warriors of the Pandava host, O Bharata, was then able to vanquish, nay to encounter, that warrior of gigantic stature,

19. Except Arjuna the son of the great Indra, having white steeds and owning Krishna for his charioteer. Then, O king, the ever-victorious Arjuna defeating Dussasana in battle,

20. Rushed against Bhisma even before the very eyes of the people assembled there. Though vanquished, your son then depending greatly upon the strength of Bhisma's arms,

21. Furiously fought with the Pandavas comforting his own troops at the same time. Arjuna also, O king, engaged in battle appeared very beautiful.

22. Sikhandin also, O monarch, pierced the grandsire in battle with sharp arrows, of which the touch resembled that of the bolt of heaven and which were mortal like the virulent venom of snakes.

23. These shafts, O ruler of men, did not cause any the slightest pain to your father, and then the son of Ganga received those arrows with a smile.

24. Just as a man burning with thirst eargerly welcomes a shower of rain, so did also the son of Ganga receive the shower of arrows discharged by Sikhandin.

25. Then, O mighty monarch, the Kshatriyas beheld Bhisma look terrible, as he consumed the ranks of the high-souled Pandavas.

26. Then your son commanded, O sire, all your troops saying :—"Assail from all sides the heroic Phalguna.

27. The valiant Bhisma conversant with all duties will protect us in battle." Then those troops of yours dismissing all fears fought on with the Pandavas.

28. (Again did Duryodhana say) "Yonder is Bhisma, with his tall standard marked with the device of a golden palmyra, striving for saving the honour and armours of all the Dhritarastra warriors.

29. Even the celestials striving vigorously cannot overcome the mighty and high-souled Bhisma in battle, what to speak of the sons of Pritha who are mere mortals.

30. Therefore, O warriors, do you not run away getting Phalguna as an adversary in battle. I myself, putting forth my best energies, shall this day battle against the Pandavas,

31. United with all these rulers of earth, all exerting their best in battle." Hearing those words of your son wielding the bow,

32. All the valiant and highly powerful warriors wrought up with rage, belonging to the clans of the Videhas, the Kalingas, the Daserakas, and many other tribes,

33. Fell upon Arjuna in battle. The Nishadas, the Souviras, the Valhikas, the Daradas, the Westerners, the Northerners and the Malavas,

34. Abhishas, the Surasenas, the Sivis, the Vasatis, the Salavas, the Sakas, the Trigarttas, the Ambhasthas with the Kekayas,

35—38. Then rushed upon the son of Pritha like a flight of insects rushing at the flames of a fire. Then, O mighty monarch, that highly powerful hero Dhananjaya, always dreaded in battle, invoking celestial weapons, fixed them on his bowstring, and aiming them at those hundreds of enemy's divisions of car-warriors swiftly consumed them all, by means of those powerful darts of great velocity, like fire burning down a flight of insects. Then the bow Gandiva of that resolute bowman appeared resplendent as he shot myriads upon myriads of arrows from it. Then, O mighty monarch, those Kourava warriors with their tall standards splintered into pieces,

39—41. Ventured not, even in a body, to proceed against Arjuna owning the standard marked with the device of an ape. Afflicted with shafts by the diadem-decked Arjuna, car-warriors fell with their standards, horse-riders with their horses and elephant-riders with their elephants. Then the earth become soon covered with divisions of kings flying in all directions in consequence of the shafts shot by the arms of Arjuna. Then having completely crushed the enemy's ranks, the son of Pritha,

42. Sped numerous shafts at your son Dussasana. Those iron-tipped arrows, having pierced Dussasana,

43. Penetrated the earth like so many snakes entering their holes in ant-hills. Then Arjuna slew the steeds and charioteer of the latter.

44. Then that valiant hero deprived Vivinsati of his car with twenty shafts and wounded the latter with five shafts of straight-knots.

45. Then the son of Kunti, owning white steeds, having pierced Kripa, Vikarna, and Salya with many iron arrows, deprived them of their cars.

46. Thus deprived of their chariots, O sire, Kripa, Salya, Dussasana, Vikarna and Vivinsati,

47. All fled away from the field of battle being completely worsted by Savyasachin. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, having vanquished the mighty car-warriors at the forenoon,

48. Partha then blazed forth in battle like fire without even one curl of smoke. He then, in consequence of his pouring arrowy showers, looked like the sun scattering his myriad rays in all directions.

49. He felled also, O mighty monarch, many rulers of the earth all mighty car-warriors, having compelled them to turn their faces away from the field of battle.

50. Then, O Bharata, between the armies of the Kurus and the Pandavas, he caused a mighty river of bloody current to flow.

51. Large bodies of elephants, steeds and car-warriors were slain by car-warriors; and many were the car-warriors slain by elephants and many the horse-men slain by foot-soldiers.

52. In all directions then fell many heads and bodies cut in the middle, of car-warriors, horsemen and elephant-riders.

53. The field of battle, O king, became strewn with fallen and falling bodies of many royal car-warriors even then decked with bracelets and graced with ear-rings.

54. The field was also covered over with many bodies mangled by car-wheels and trampled upon by elephants. Foot-soldiers, and horsemen with their chargers fled away in all directions.

55. Elephants and car-warriors fell in all directions. Many were the cars that then lay scattered on the field with their wheels, standards and yokes splintered into pieces.

56. Then the field of battle bespattered with the gore of elephants, horses and car-warriors, appeared beautiful like the autumnal sky covered with specks of red cloud.

57. Dogs, crows, vultures, wolves and jackals and other beasts set up loud yells, at the sight of food that was then before them.

58. Then, when Rakshasas and evil spirits were seen to roar there, various kinds of winds began to blow in all directions.

59. Strings of gold and precious standards were seen suddenly to be fluttered by the wind, and began to tremble.

60. Thousands of white umbrellas, and many mighty car-warriors with their standards, were seen strewn on the surface of the earth.

61. Thereupon, O mighty monarch, Bhisma having invoked into existence a celestial weapon rushed at the son of Kunti even before the very eyes of all bowmen.

62. Then clad in mail Sikhandin confronted him rushing in battle. Whereupon Bhisma withdrew that dart resembling fire itself.

63. Meanwhile Kunti's son owning white steeds having confounded the grand sire began to slaughter your forces.

Thus ends the hundred and eighteenth chapter, the fierce battle and carnage, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CXIX.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When the division of the two armies strong in numbers and arranged in order of battle, met one another, all the unretreating heroes, O Bharata, then rushed to battle, keeping in view the regions of Brahma.

2. In that pell-mell fight, neither similar divisions fought with their similars, nor car warriors with car-warriors, nor foot-soldier-with foot-soldiers.

3. Horsemen then fought not with horsemen and elephant-riders fought not with other elephant-riders. But like men siezed with fury, O Bharata, they indiscriminately slaughtered one another, O monarch, in that battle.

4. Fierce and great was the carnage that then spread itself among the ranks of the two armies, as men and elephants, by hundreds, were scattered slain in all directions.

5. In that fierce battle the slaughter was indiscriminate. Then, O Bharata, Salya, Kripa, Chitrasena,

6. Dussasana and Vikarna, all riding on resplendent chariots, and all mighty heroes, made the host of the Pandavas tremble in battle before them.

7. The army of the Pandavas thus slaughtered by those high-souled warriors, was caused to wheel in various motions, like a bark tossed by the wind on the waters (of the sea).

8. Just as bleak wintry cold penetrates into the very vitals of the kine, so did then Bhisma cut the army of the sons of Pandu to the very quick.

9. Then many elephants of your army looking like newly-formed clouds, were felled by the high-souled son of Pritha in that battle.

10. The leaders of hosts of combatants were then seen to be crushed and mangled by the son of Pritha with his arrows and lances shot by thousands.

11—12. Mighty elephants fell there setting up loud yells of agony and distress. The field of battle then looked beautiful being strewn over with the ornament-decked bodies of slain warriors of high soul, as also with their heads graced with ear-rings. In that conflict, O monarch, so destructive of mighty heroes,

13—14. When both Bhisma, and Dhananjaya the son of Pandu were displaying their prowess, your sons beholding the grandsire strive vigorously in battle, O king, rushed at the head all of their troops. Desirous of death in battle, and looking upon heaven as their final goal,

15. They rushed against the Pandavas in that battle destructive of many heroes. The Pandavas also, O monarch, remembering the diverse woes and hardships

16. Inflicted, O ruler of men, on them by you and your son and dismissing all fears, and desirous of attaining to the regions of Brahma,

17. Cheerfully fought on with your troops and your sons. Then that mighty car-warrior the commander of the Pandava host addressing his troops said :—

18. "Rush you, O Somakas, together with the Srinjayas at the son of Ganga." Hearing those words of their commander-in-chief, the Somakas and the Srinjayas,

19. Though afflicted with showers of arrows rushed at the son of Ganga. Thus assailed, O king, your father, the son of Santanu,

20. Influenced by wrath fought with the Srinjayas. To your highly renowned father, O sire, in the days of yore, the intelligent Rama,

21. Imparted a lesson in the use of weapons that were capable of destroying the hostile ranks. Depending upon that instruction of his and thinning the ranks of the enemy,

22. The old grandsire of the Kurus, viz., Bhisma that slayer of hostile heroes day after day slaughtered ten thousand warriors belonging to the Pandava host.

23. On that the tenth day of the battle, O foremost of the Bharatas, from among the Matsyas and the Panchalas, Bhisma, single handed,

24. Having slain ten thousand elephants, slew also seven mighty car-warriors. Then the great grandsire also slew five thousand car-warriors.

25. In that fierce battle in addition to all this, fourteen thousand foot-soldiers, one thousand elephants, and ten thousand steeds

26. Were slain, O ruler of men, by your father through his superior education. Then reducing in number all the divisions led by rulers of earth,

27. Bhisma slew Satanika the dear-loved brother of Virata. Having slain Satanika in battle, the valiant Bhisma

28. Felled thousand royal warriors with broad-headed shafts. All those Kshatriyas of the Pandava host, that followed Dhananjaya,

29—30. Approaching Bhisma, were despatched to the abode of Death. Thus covering the ten points of the compass with the net-work of his arrows, as also the army of the Parthas, Bhisma remained the master of the situation. On that the tenth day of the battle, achieving marvellous feats,

31. Bhisma stayed between the two armies, holding his bow and arrows in his hands. O king, then none of the royal warriors were able to look at him,

32. Who then resembled the summer sun scorching the world from the meridian. Just as in the days of yore, Sakra afflicted the hosts of the Daityas,

33. So did, O Bharata, Bhisma then afflict the ranks of the Pandavas. Then beholding Bhisma thus display his prowess in battle, the slayer of Madhu,

34. That son of Devaki, joyfully addressed Dhananjaya saying :—"Yonder is Bhisma, the son of Santanu staying between the two armies.

35. Slay him by putting forth your prowess, and victory will be yours. Check him through your prowess even there where he is penetrating our ranks.

36. None among us, O lord, is capable of bearing the shafts of Bhisma save and except your mighty self." Then, O king, thus urged on, Dhananjaya owning a standard bearing the device of an ape,

37—38. Rendered Bhisma with his standard, chariot and horses, invisible by his shafts. Then that foremost of the Kuru chiefs (Bhisma) also, with the shower of his own arrows scattered the arrowy downpour discharged by that son of Pandu. Thereupon the king of the Panchalas, and the valiant Dhristaketu,

39. Pandu's son Bhimasena, Prisata's son Dhristadyumna, the twins Nakula and Sahadeva, Chekitana, the five Kekaya brothers,

40. The mighty-armed Satyaki, the son of Subhadra, Ghatatkacha, the sons of Drupada, Sikhandin, the highly powerful Kuntivoja,

41. Susarman, and Virata, these and many other mighty heroes of the Pandava host were then afflicted by the shafts of Bhisma.

42. Then from the ocean of grief in which they were sunk, they were rescued by Phalguna. Thereupon grasping an excellent weapon Sikhandin

43. Assailed Bhisma, being protected by the diadem-decked Arjuna. Then slaying all the followers of Bhisma, and knowing what should be done in battle after what,

44. The unvanquished Vibhatsu rushed even at Bhisma himself. Then Satyaki, Chekitana, Dhristadyumna of the Prisata race,

45. Virata and Drupada, the two sons of Madri begotten by Pandu, all rushed against Bhisma, their attack being covered by the firm bowman Arjuna.

46. Then in that battle, Abhimanyu and the five sons of Draupadi all with weapons upraised rushed against Bhisma.

47. All those firm bowmen, never receeding from the fight, pierced Bhisma on many parts of his body with arrows steadily directed.

48. Then baffling all those arrows shot by those foremost rulers of earth, that warrior of undepressed soul (Bhisma) penetrated into the ranks of the Pandavas.

49. The grandsire then repulsed all those arrows as if in sport. He did not aim any shaft at the prince of the Panchalas, but laughingly looked at him now and then.

50. Remembering Sikhandin's femininity Bhisma sped not a single arrow at the former. But that mighty car-warrior then slew seven of the best car-warriors of Drupada's division.

51. Then as the Matsyas, the Panchalas and the Chedis rushed against that single-handed warrior, loud became the din and confusion that then arose.

52. Then like clouds covering the sun, all those heroes, O afflicter of foes, covered on all sides with foot-soldiers, horse-men and car-warriors and with a net-work of arrows,

53. That single-handed son of Bhagirathi, viz., Bhisma, who was then scorching the foe in battle. Then in that battle between Bhisma on one side and all the Pandava heroes on the other—battle that resembled the one between the gods and the Asuras—Kiritin placing Sikhandin in front of him began to pierce Bhisma,

Thus ends the hundred and nineteenth chapter, the prowess of Bhisma, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CXX.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA.)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thus all the Pandavas, placing Sikhandin before them and surrounding Bhisma on all sides began to pierce him in battle.

2. Then with terrible Sataghnis, with bludgeons, battle-axes, maces, mallets, thick short clubs, and lances, and other missiles,

3. With arrows furnished with golden wings, with darts, javelins and Kampanas, with Narachas, Vatsadantas, and Bhusundis,

4. The Srinjayas united together began to wound Bhisma in battle. Then when his armour was shattered and he himself overwhelmed with many arrows.

5—7. Bhisma experienced no pain, pierced though he was to the very vitals. On the other hand Bhisma then appeared fearful to his enemies like the all-destructive fire at the expiration of a Yuga,—fire, whose flames were constituted by his effulgent arrows and bow, whose (friendly) gale was constituted by the vibrations of air produced by the shafts shot by him, whose heat was constituted by the clatter of his car-wheel, whose splendour was constituted by his mighty weapons, tongues by his variegated bow and fuel by the destruction of heroes. Wheeling in the midst of those car divisions, he sometimes came out of the press,

8. And sometimes again was seen to career rapidly through them. Thereafter without regarding the king of the Panchalas and Dhristaketu,

9—11. Bhisma, O rule of men, penetrated into the very heart of the Pandava ranks. Then with arrows of excellent make and great sharpness, all capable of penetrating all kinds of armour and producing great whizz, and charged with great velocity, Bhisma pierced deeply the following six car-warriors, viz., Satyaki, Bhima, Dhananjaya the son of Pandu, Drupada, Virata, and Dhristadyumna of Prisata's race. These mighty car-warriors also resisting those sharp arrows shot by Bhisma,

12. Pierced him with force, each shooting ten arrows. Those dreadful arrows which that mighty car-warrior Sikhandin shot,

13. And which were furnished with wings of gold and whetted on stone, quickly penetrated the body of Bhisma. Thereupon the diadem-decked Arjuna waxing wroth rushed at Bhisma,

14. And placing Sikhandin before him, he cut off the bow of the latter. Then the following seven mighty car-warriors did not brook that cutting off of Bhisma's bow, warriors namely,

15. Drona, Kritavarman, Jayadratha the ruler of the Sindhus, Bhurisravas, Sala, Salya, and Bhagadatta.

16. These seven car-warriors waxing irascible and displaying weapons of celestial make rushed against the diadem-decked Arjuna.

17. Indeed excited to the highest pitch of fury they fell upon that son of Pandu shrouding him (with those arrows). Great was the din that arose as they rushed against Phalguna's chariot.

18. Hearing that dreadful din, the mighty car-warriors of the Pandava host rushed to battle desirous of rescuing that foremost of the Bharatas, viz., Phalguna.

19. Then Satyaki, Bhimasena, Prisata's son Dhristadyumna, both Virata and Drupada, the Rakshasa Ghatatkacha,

20. The enraged Abhimanyu, all these seven warriors seized with fury and wielding variegated bows rushed to battle, at the top of their speed.

21. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, like the battle between the celestials and the Danavas, the battle between those seven car-warriors of each army raged fiercely causing the hair to stand erect.

22. In that battle, protected as he was by Dhananjaya, that excellent warrior Sikhandin, with ten shafts pierced Bhisma whose bow had been cut off.

23. He then pierced the latter's charioteer with ten shafts and with another one shaft cut off his standard. Then Ganga's son took up another bow of superior toughness.

24—25. But that again was cut off with three sharp shafts by Phalguna. Thus that scorcher of foes that son of Pandu namely Savyasachin, excited with wrath again and again cut off all the bows that Bhisma took up. Then excited with wrath in consequence of his bows being cut off and licking the corners of his mouth,

26. Bhisma took up a lance with lightness, that was capable of rending even the breasts of mountains; and inflamed with rage he hurled that lance at the car of Phalguna.

27. Beholding that lance course towards himself like the blazing bolt of Heaven, the son of Pandu took up five sharp broad-headed arrows.

28. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, inflamed with rage, Arjuna with those five arrows, splintered into five fragments that lance hurled with strength of Bhisma's arms.

29. Then shattered by the wrathful Arjuna decked with a diadem, that lance fell down like forks of lightning torn away from large masses of clouds.

30. Belolding his lance severed, Bhisma became inflamed with rage; and that hero that subduer of hostile cities began to think with the help of his understanding thus :—

31. "I can slay even with a single bow all these Pandavas, if the highly powerful Visaksena (Krishna) be not their protector.

32. I shall not fight with the Pandavas for two reasons, viz., for the unslayableness of the Pandavas and for the femininity of Sikhandin.

33. Formerly on the occasion of his marrying Kali, my father gratified with me, accorded me two boons, viz., death at my pleasure, and unslayableness in battle.

34. I now think that the proper time for my death has arrived." Ascertaining this to be the intention of Bhisma of immeasurable energy,

35. The Rishis and Vasus stationed in the firmament then thus addressed Bhisma saying:—"What you have resolved upon O sire, is also our dear will.

36. Therefore, O monarch, follow up in action what you have resolved; and withdraw your heart from fight." At the conclusion of these words there began to blow an auspicious breeze,

37. Fragrant and moistened with sprinkles of water, from all directions. Celestial drums were also sounded emitting great din.

38. And, O sire, over Bhisma fell a shower of blossoms. As those Rishis and Vasus spoke, O king, none heard then

39. Save the mighty-armed Bhisma and myself through the prowess of the sage (Vyasa). O ruler of men, great was the flurry that was then found among the Gods,

40. As they thought of the fall of Bhisma, that favourite of all the worlds. Then hearing those words of the celestials, that hero of great ascetic wealth, viz.,

41. Santanu's son Bhisma assailed not Vibhatsu, although he was then being pierced by sharp shafts capable of penetrating through all armours.

42. Then, O mighty monarch, Sikhandin inflamed with wrath struck the grandsire of the Bharatas on the breast with nine shafts of great sharpness.

43. Then, O mighty monarch, Sikhandin inflamed with wrath struck the grandsire of the Bharatas on the breast with nine shafts of great sharpness.

44. Then smiling and stretching his bow Gandiva, Vibhatsu wounded Ganga's son with twenty-five short thick shafts.

45. Then again under the influence of wrath, Dhananjaya pierced him quick on all parts of his body and to the vitals, with one hundred shafts more.

46. Thus pierced by many other warriors with thousands of arrows, the mighty car-warrior Bhisma pierced them all in return quickly with his own arrows.

47. Then Bhisma of prowess unfailing in battle, with his own shafts of depressed knots simultaneously baffled all these arrows shot by the hostile warriors.

48. Those arrows furnished with golden wings and whetted on stone that Sikhandin the mighty car-warrior shot at him could not produce any the slightest pain to him.

49. Thereupon inflamed with wrath the diadem-decked Arjuna placing Sikhandin before him rushed at Bhisma and cut off the latter's bow.

50. Then he pierced Bhisma with ten arrows and with another cut down the latter's standard; then with ten other arrows he caused Bhisma's charioteer to tremble.

51—52. Then that son of Ganga took up another bow of great toughness. Then in that battle, within a twinkling of the eye, Arjuna cut off with three sharp broad-headed arrows that bow as soon as it was taken up. Thus Arjuna cut off successively all the bows that the son of Ganga took up one after another.

53. Thereupon Bhisma the son of Santanu did no longer assail Vibhatsu; then the latter pierced the former with twenty-five small arrows.

54. That mighty bowman thus deeply pierced addressing Dussasana said:—"This mighty car-warrior of the Pandava host, viz., Pritha's son Arjuna, inflamed with rage,

55. Is afflicting me in battle with many thousands of arrows. This one is incapable of being conquered even by the wielder of the thunderbolt.

56. Regarding me, I may say that all the heroic celestials, Danavas and Rakshasas, united together, can not vanquish me in battle, what to speak of human car-warriors?"

57. Thus when they were conversing with one another, Arjuna, placing Sikhandin before him, began to pierce Bhisma in battle with shafts of great sharpness.

58. Thus pierced with sharp arrows by the wielder of the Gandiva, Bhisma once more addressing Dussasana smilingly said:

59. "These arrows of touch resembling that of the thunderbolt, coming in an unbroken line towards me have been discharged by Arjuna. Surely they are not Shikhandin's.

60. Eating into my very vitals, anb penetrating even through my invulneraple armour, these arrows are striking me like so many bludgeons. Surely they are not Sikhandin's.

61. Of the touch like that of a Brahmana's rod, of velocity like that of the thunderbolt and incapable of being repulsed, these arrows are sucking out my vital energies. Surely they are not Sikhandin's.

62. Of touch heavy like that of a mace or a bludgeon these arrows are destroying my vital breaths like so many messengers of Death. Surely they are not Sikhandin's.

63. Like infuriate snakes of virulent venom with their tongues protruding out, these arrows are penetrating into my very vitals. Surely these are not Sikhandin's.

64. These are the arrows of Arjuna and not of Sikhandin, arrows that are cutting me to the quick like the bleakness of winter cutting kine to the quick.

65. Save and except the heroic wielder of the Gandiva bow, that owner of the standard marked with the device of an ape, viz., the ever-victorious Arjuna, all the other monarchs united together can not afflict me."

66. Having thus spoken, the highly powerful Bhisma, as if desirous of consuming the Pandavas, hurled at Pritha's son a (terrible) lance.

67. Thereupon with three arrows cutting that lance into three pieces, Arjuna felled it down on the ground, O Bharata, even before the very eyes of all the Kurus heroes.

68. Thereafter Ganga's son grasped a buckler of the polish of gold, as also a resplendent sword, desirous of reaping either victory or death.

69. But before he (Bhisma) could descend from his chariot, Arjuna with his shafts splintered that buckler into hundred fragments. Indeed that looked like something marvellous.

70. Thereupon, king Yudhisthira urged on his own division saying :—"Assail the son of Ganga. Entertain not the slightest fear."

71. Thereupon from all sides, those troops, with darts, lances, arrows, battle-axes, excellent swords, long shafts of great sharpness,

72. With Vatsadantas, and broad-headed arrows, rushed against that single warrior. Then loud was the din of war-cries that rang through the Pandava ranks.

73. Similarly, O king, your sons all desirous of seeing Bhisma victorious rushed forward for rescuing that single hero, and they also set up a mighty uproar caused by their yells and war-cries.

74. Then on that the tenth day when Bhisma and Arjuna contested with one another, fierce was the fight that raged between your soldiers and those of the enemy.

75. Then at the spot where the hostile troops clashed and smote down one another an eddy seemed to start up into existence like that occurring at the spot where Ganga meets the ocean.

76. Deluged with blood the earth then assumed a hideous aspect, and her undulalations were lost to sight.

77. Having slain ten thousand warriors on that the tenth day of the fight, Bhisma stood on the field while his vitals were being pierced into by Arjuna.

78. Then Partha, holding his bow and standing at the head of his divisions, broke the Kuru ranks in the very centre of their array.

79. Then afraid of that son of Kunti viz., Dhananjaya the owner of cream-coloured steeds and afflicted with his sharp arrows, we then began to fly away from the field of battle.

80. Then the Souviras, the Kitavas, the Westerners, the Northerners and the Malavas, the Abhishahas, the Surasenas, the Sinis, the Vasatis,

81. The Salwas, Sakas, the Trigarttas, the Amvastas, the Kekayas,—all these illustrious warriors, afflicted with shafts, and pained with their cuts,

82. Did not abandon Bhisma in battle who had been fighting with the diadem-decked Arjuna. Then surrounding the single car-warrior Bhisma, large numbers of the enemy,

83. Covered him with arrowy showers, having at first defeated the rest of the Kuru warriors. "Slay" "Seize" "Fight" "Cut into pieces,"

84. Such were the cries, O king, that were then heard round Bhisma's chariot. Bhisma then slaughtered his foes by hundreds and thousands.

85—86. But then there was not even a space of two fingers in all his body that was not mangled with shafts. Thus then your father, mangled with keen-pointed darts shot by Phalguna, fell down from his car on the field with his head laid towards the East, a little before sunset before the very eyes of your sons.

87. Then at the overthrow of Bhisma loud lamentations of "Alas" and "Oh" were heard, O Bharata, among the kings, and the celestials in the heaven.

88. Beholding the illustrious grandsire fall, we all became dejected and depressed at heart.

89. That foremost of all bowmen, that mighty-armed hero fell like an uprooted standard in honour of Indra, causing the earth tremble for the while.

90. Covered closely with arrows he did not then touch the earth's surface. Then as that mighty bowman, that foremost of all male beings lay prostrate on his arrowy bed,

91. Being overthrown from his car, a divine inspiration took possession of him. The rain-cloud Parjannya then poured down its contents and the earth quaked.

92. When falling Bhisma had marked the sun to be then on the Southern solstice and that hero considering that hour to be inauspicious for paying his debt to nature did not allow his senses to depart.

93. He then also heard divine utterance in the heaven, viz., "Why should that foremost of all wielders of weapons, Oh, why should the illustrious son of Ganga,

94. Why should that foremost of men give up his life when the sun is in the Southern solstice?" Hearing those words Ganga's son said "I am still alive."

95. Then desirous of yielding his life up during the Northern solstice, the grandsire of the Kurus, viz., Bhisma though fallen on earth still retained his vital breaths.

96. Ascertaining that to be his intention, Ganga, the daughter of the Himalayas sent great sages under the disguise of swans then to Bhisma.

97. Then those sages disguised under the forms of swans inhabiting the Manasa lake flew to the sky, and in a line came to see Bhisma, the grandsire of the Kurus,

98. At the spot where that foremost of men was lying on his arrowy bed. Then coming to Bhisma those sages under the forms of swans,

99. Beheld that perpetuator of the Kuru race, viz., Bhisma laid on his bed of arrows Then beholding that illustrious one, and circumbulating

100. That foremost of the Bharatas, that son of Ganga, the sages, knowing the sun to be then in the Southern solstice addressing one another said :—

101. "Why should the high-souled Bhisma pass away when the sun is in the Southern solstice." Having thus spoken, the swans flew towards the Southern directions.

102. Then that highly intelligent Bhisma beholding them and reflecting for a while said to them, "I shall not yield up my life,

103. As long as the sun will remain in the Southern solstice. This indeed is my determination, I shall repair to my own former abode,

104. When the sun will be in the Northern solstice; this, O Swans, I tell you forsooth. I shall retain my vital breaths looking anxiously forward for the Northern solstice.

105. In as much as my giving up of my life is under my thorough control, therefore shall I retain it desirous of dying during the Northern solstice.

106. The boon that my illustrious father accorded me, viz., that I shall die at my own pleasure, let that boon be true.

107. As the yielding up of my vital breaths lies entirely with me, I shall retain them." Having then thus spoken to the swans, he remained (motionless) on his arrowy bed.

108. Thus when the crest of the Kurus, viz, the highly puissant Bhisma was overthrown the Pandavas and the Srinjayas set up a loud war-cry.

109. When that grandsire of the Bharatas, possessed of great strength was overthrown, O foremost of the Bharatas, your sons knew not what to do.

110. Then the Kurus were totally confounded; and Kripa and Duryodhana and others began to wail aloud drawing long and heavy sighs.

111. With their senses deprived of their powers in consequence of grief, they remained inert and reflected for long and did not think of fighting.

112. They could not then rush against the Pandavas as if their thighs were locked and seized in a vice. When that unslayable son of Santanu. viz, Bhisma endued with great prowess was overthrown,

113. O king, the destruction of the Kuru monarch became apparent. Mangled with sharp shafts and with our foremost heroes slain,

114. And crushed completely by Savyasachin (Arjuna), we did not then know what to do. Then obtaining victory, and a highly blessed state of existence (hereafter), the Pandavas,

115. All endued with heroism and possessed of bludgeon-like arms, blew their mighty conchs and, O ruler of men, the Somakas together with the Panchalas then were filled with great delight.

116. Then when thousands of drums were struck up, the highly powerfnl Bhimasena uttered his fierce war-cries and slapped his arms.

117. On the fall of that illustrious son of Ganga, the heroic combatants of the two armies laying down their weapons, fell to thinking.

118. Some wept aloud, some ran wildly, some were overwhelmed with swoon; some then censured the life of a Kshatriya and some worshipped Bhisma.

119. The sages and the Patriarchs all applauded Bhisma. The ancestral manes of the Bharata race also began to praise him.

120. Then the highly intelligent son of Santanu, viz., Bhisma endued with great prowess, betaking himself to the Yoga taught in the Upanishadas and reiterating prayers in his mind, remained quite, anxiously looking forward for his last hour.

Thus ends the hundred and twentieth chapter, the overthrow of Bhisma, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CXXI.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA.)—Contd.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. How then, O Sanjaya, did my warriors fair, when they were deprived of the aid of the valiant Bhisma of god-like nature, who lived a life of celibacy for the sake of his father?

2. Even then did I regard the Kurus slain by Pandavas, when out of despise, Bhisma desisted from wounding the son of Drupada (Sikhandin).

3. Wretch that I am, I hear this day the news of my father's death. Alas, what greater amount of grief can overtake me, O Sanjaya.

4. Surely, O Sanjaya, my heart is made of the hardest adamant, in as much as, it does not burst forth at the news of Bhisma's slaughter.

5. Tell me, O you of illustrious vows, what did that foremost of the Kurus, that one ever desirous of victory namely Bhisma do, when he was overthrown in battle.

6. Oh, I can not brook even the thought of Devavrata's slaughter in battle. He, who was not formerly slain by the celestial weapons of Jamadagni's son, alas, even he is now slain by Sikhandin the prince of the Panchalas!

Sanjaya said :—

7. Overthrown at the hour of evening, Bhisma, the grandsire of the Kurus, infused grief into the hearts of the Dhartarastras and delight in to those of the Panchalas.

8. He then lay on his arrowy bed with his skin not touching the earth. When Bhisma was overthrown from his car and when he fell on the earth's surface,

9. Loud wails of 'Alas' and 'Oh' were uttered by all creatures. When that ornament of an assembly, when that boundary-tree of the Kurus was overthrown,

10. The Kshatriyas, O king, of the two armies were all seized with panic. Beholding Santanu's son Bhisma, with his armour and standard shattered,

11. The Kurus and the Pandavas, both ceased fighting, O ruler of men; then a pall of darkness overspread the firmament, and the luminary of the day lost its effulgence.

12. On the fall of Bhisma, the son of Santanu, the earth seemed to shriek out fierce yells. This one is the best of all the Veda-knowing sages—This one is the foremost of those conversant with the Vedas,

13. These were the words that creatures then addressed to that foremost of men lying on his arrowy bed. "Formerly knowing his sire Santanu to be under the influence of desire, this one,

14. This foremost of men, deprived himself of the pleasure of carnal intercourse," Even thus, was the foremost of the Bharatas lying on his arrowy bed,

15. Addressed by the seers and Siddhas and Charanas. On the fall of Bhisma, the son of Santanu and the grand-sire of the Bharatas,

16. Your sons, O sire, knew not what to do; and, O Bharata, their faces became cheerless and their appearance lost all beauty and charm;

17. And they stood, ashamed and overwhelmed with bashfulness and with countenances cast down. The Pandavas on the other hand having obtained victory, and remaining the masters of the field,

18. Blew their mighty conchs decorated with net-works of gold. Then, O sinless one, when thousands of trumpets were blown giving breath to their joys,

19. We beheld, O monarch, the valiant Bhimasena, that son of Kunti, dance in consequence of his ecstatic delight.

20. He then slew many hostile warriors possessed of great strength. A great confusion then overwhelmed the Kurus.

21 Karna and Duryodhana breathed long and heavily. When Bhisma the grandsire of the Kurus was overthrown,

22. Distressful cries of Alas and Oh arose from all directions; and all regard for every thing (life and limb) was lost. Beholding Bhisma overthrown, your son Dussasana

23. Ran at the top of his speed towards the division of Drona. Clad in mail and supported by his own division, he was commissioned by his royal brother for the protection of Bhisma.

24. Now that foremost of men went to the division of Drona, making at the same time his own troops cheerless. Beholding him approach the Kurus surrounded him,

25. Desirous, O king, of hearing what Dussasana might say. Then that descendant of the Kuru race spoke to Drona of the slaughter of Bhisma.

26. Hearing that doleful news, Drona suddenly fell down from his car; but the valiant son of Bharadwaja soon regaining consciousness,

27—28. Prevented his own troops, O sire, from fighting any longer. Beholding the Kurus desist from the fight, the Pandavas also prevented their own divisions from fighting, through messengers riding fleet chargers. When the troops of both the armies had ceased fighting,

29. All the kings doffing their armours approached Bhisma. Then hundreds and thousands of warriors giving up fighting,

30. Respectfully paid their homages, (to Bhisma) like the immortals paying homages to the creator himself. Then approaching that foremost of the Bharatas lying on his arrowy bed, all those heroes,

31. The Kurus and the Pandavas saluting him stood there. Then to those Kurus and the Pandavas who stood before him having at first saluted him,

32. The virtuous-souled son of Santanu viz., Bhisma spoke these words:—"Hail, O eminent heroes, hail, O mighty car-worriors.

33. O god-like heroes, I am indeed pleased by looking at you." Having thus addressed them, he with his head hanging down once more said:—

34—35. "My head is greatly hanging down; give me a pillow to place my head on." Thereupon the kings fetched many pillows made of fine stuff and very soft, and also excellent. But the grandsire liked them uot. Thereupon that foremost of men smiling said to those kings:—

36—37. "O kings, these pillows do not suit a hero's bed." Then beholding that foremost of men, that chief of all car-warriors in the three regions, viz., Pandu's son Dhananjaya of long arms, Bhisma addressed him saying:—"O mighty-armed Dhananjaya, my head his hanging, O son, give me a pillow that you think to be suited to this bed of mine.

Thus ends the hundred and twenty-first chapter, the withdrawal of the forces after the tenth day's fight, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CXXII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Then Arjuna, fixing the string on his mighty bow and saluting the grandsire and with his eyes overflowing with tears thus spoke.

2. "Command me, O foremost of the Kurus, O chief of all wielders of weapons. I am your slave, O invincible one. What, O grandsire, shall I do for you."

3. The son of Santanu then thus replied to him saying:—"My head, O sire, is hanging down. Fetch me, O foremost of the Kurus, O Phalguna, a pillow,

4. That will be suitable to my bed, and, O hero, give that to me soon. You only, O Partha, are equal to the task, you are the foremost of all the bowmen;

5. You are conversant with the duties of a Kshatriya and are endowed with keen intelligence and modesty and bravery." Then Phalguna of great might saying yea to his words, prepared to do what Bhisma bade him do.

6. Then taking up the Gandiva bow and shafts of close knots, and purifying them with Mantras and obtaining the permission of that illustrious car-warrior of the Bharatas, Arjuna,

7—8. With those sharp arrows charged with great velocity supported Bhisma's head. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, seeing that Savyasachin had rightly divined his thought, Bhisma of illustrious soul conversant with the essence of all things became gratified with Arjuna; and then greatly praised Dhananjaya for having given him that pillow.

9. Then casting his glances on the Bharatas present there, Bhisma said to that descendant of the Bharatas, namely Kunti's son, that foremost of all warriors, and that enhancer of the delight of his friends:—

10. "O son of Pandu, you have indeed fetched me a pillow becoming my bed. Had you fetched me something else, I would have cursed you in rage.

11. O mighty-armed hero this indeed is the way in which a Kshatriya not transgressing his duties, should sleep on the battle-field lying on an arrowy bed."

12. Having thus spoken to Vibhatsu' he said to all the kings and princes present there, the following words.

Bhisma said :—

13. Behold you all, the pillow the son of Pandu has supplied me with! I shall lie on this bed until the sun rolls back to the Northern solstice.

14—15. Those kings that will then come to me shall see me (give up my life). When the maker of the day (sun), on his swift moving car yoked with seven horses, will proceed towards the point of the compass occupied by Vaisravana, then shall I yield up my vital breaths, like a friend, bidding adieu to his dear friend.

16. O kings, dig up an entrenchment around here; mangled with hundreds of arrows as I am, I will offer my homages to the sun. You, O kings, do desist from the battle, vanishing all thoughts of hostility.

Sanjaya said :—

17. Thereafter there came several practioners of the healing art, all well-trained and skilful in drawing out shafts, carrying with them all the necessary balms and appliances.

18. Beholding them, Ganga's son said to your son :—"Paying proper respect to these physicians, and rewarding them with money, do you dismiss them.

19. Reduced to this condition, what necessity have I of physicians? I have attained to that blessed existence that is so applauded in those that observe the Kshatriya duties.

20. As I lie on this arrowy bed, it is not indeed my duty to allow myself to be treated by these physicians. I should like, O rulers of earth, to be consumed even by these arrows,"

21. Having heard those words of his, your son Duryodhana dismissed all those physicians, having honoured them duly.

22. Then the rulers of the various countries, beholding the religious firmness of Bhisma of infinite prowess, were greatly amazed.

23. Then having offered that pillow to your sire, all those kings, together with the mighty car-warriors of the Kurus and the Pandavas,

24. Again approached the illustrious Bhisma prostrate on his excellent bed of arrows. Then having saluted and three times circumambulated that illustrious one viz.,

25—27. Bhisma, and having arranged for his protection, the heroes entered their respective camps, for taking rest, at the hour of sun-set, with their bodies bespatterd with blood, and thoughtful and extremely pained. Then approaching, at a suitable season, the Pandavas,—those mighty car-warriors cheerfully seated together and rejoicing at the fall of Bhisma,—the mighty Madhava said these words to Yudhisthira the son of Dharma.

28. "Through good fortune, O best of the Kurus, have you attained victory; through good fortune has Bhisma, that mighty car-warrior of un-erring aim, incapable of being slain by men, been overthrown.

29. Or it may be, that having, through Destiny, obtained you that slay with your very glances for a foe, that one though conversant with the use of all weapons has been destroyed by your angry looks."

30. Being thus spoken to, the very virtuous king Yudhisthira replied to Janarddana saying:—"Victory comes to a man through your grace, and defeat overtakes him through your wrath.

31. You are our sole refuge, O Krishna: You give assurances of safety to your devotees. Victory is not a marvel for those whom, O Keshava,

32. You always protect in battle, and for whose welfare you always concern yourself. Having yourself for our protector, I do not consider anything wonderful for us."

33. Thus spoken to, Janarddana smilingly replied:—"Indeed, O foremost of all the rulers of earth, these are words suited to fall from your lips only."

Thus ends the hundred and twenty-second chapter, the giving of a pillow to Bhisma, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CXXIII.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O monarch, after the night had passed-away, all the kings belonging to the Pandava and Dhartarastra hosts approached the grandsire.

2. Then all the Kshatriyas, having saluted that foremost of the Kurus, that hero prostrate on a hero's bed, that chief of all Kshatriyas, stood near him.

3. Repairing there by thousands, maidens covered the son of Santanu on all parts of his body, with pulverised sandal-wood, field-paddy, and garlands of flowers.

4. Women, old men and children, and numerous other, spectators approached the son of Santanu, like the Bhutas approaching the rising luminary of the day.

5. Trumpeteers, courtezans, mimes, actors and dancers and artizans, in crowds, repaired to that venerable grandsire of the Kurus.

6. Desisting from fight and doffing their armours and laying aside their weapons, the Kurus and the Pandavas together,

7. Approached the invincible Devavrata that subduer of foes. Then as in former days, they were friendly to one another, and addressed one another in agreeable words.

8. Then that assembly crowded with numerous Bharata kings, and ornamented by the presence of Bhisma, appeared beautiful like a conclave of the gods in the heavens.

9. And that assembly of kings paying their respects to the son of Ganga, appeared beautiful like that of the gods adoring their lord the venerable Grandsire (Brahma).

10. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, Bhisma, having overcome his pain by his patience, and afflicted with many darts, breathed like a snake.

11. His body was burning with the pain caused by the arrows stuck therein, and he was being deprived of his senses in consequence of the weapon-cuts. Beholding those kings, he then said :—"Bring me water."

12. Thereat those Kshatriyas, O king, brought many excellent viands, and jars filled with cold water.

13. Thereupon Santanu's son beholding water brought for him said :—"This day forward, O son, I will no longer use articles of human enjoyment.

14. I have passed away from the society of men, and am now lying on this bed of arrows. I am lying here expectant of the change in the courses of the sun and moon."

15. Having thus spoken, and censuring those kings with (cruel) words, Bhisma said, O Bharata :—"I desire to see Arjuna."

16. Thereupon that mighty-armed hero Arjuna approaching and saluting the grandsire stood there with palms folded, and said "What shall I do."

17. Beholding that son of Pandu stand before him with folded palms, the virtuous-souled Bhisma highly pleased, said these words to Dhananjaya :—

18. "My body is burning, and I am covered with your arrows. All the vital parts of my body are suffering extreme pain and my mouth is becoming dry.

19. Afflicted as my body is with extreme pain, give me water, O Arjuna, to drink. It is you alone, O mighty bowman, that are capable of supplying me with proper drink now."

20. Thereupon the highly puissant Arjuna saying "yea" to Bhisma's words, mounted on his chariot. Then fixing the string to his mighty bow Gandiva, he began to stretch it.

21. Then hearing the twang of his bow and the slap of his arms that resembled the rumble of thunder, the troops and kings there, were inspired with terror.

22. Thereafter that foremost of car-warriors (Arjuna) circumambulating that prostrate chief of the Bharatas, that foremost of all wielders of weapon, viz., Bhisma,

23. And fixing on his bowstring an effulgent arrow inspired with aphorisms and identified with the Parjannya weapon, before the very eyes of all the people present,

24. Penetrated the earth a little to the right of the spot where Bhisma lay. Thereupon, there gushed out a jet of water pure and auspicious,

25. And cool and nectar-like and fraught with celestial fragrance and tastefulness. Then with that cool jet of water did the son of Pritha gratify

26. That foremost of the Kurus, viz., Bhisma of god-like achievements and prowess. Then seeing that feat of Pritha's son, that resembled that of Indra himself,

27. All the rulers of the earth present there, were filled with wonder. Then beholding that feat of Vibhatsu that indicated his superhuman prowess,

28. The Kurus began to shiver like kine afflicted with the chill of winter. Out of amazement the kings then began to waive their garments ;

29. And the sound of drums and the blare of conchs on all sides became deafening. Then, O king, Santanu's son, being greatly gratified, thus addressed Vibhatsu,

30. Applauding him before all the heroic rulers of earth. "O mighty-armed hero, this feat is not a marvel in respect to you, O delighter of the Kurus.

31. You have been spoken of by Narada as an ancient sage, O you of dazzling effulgence. Having the son of Vasudeva for your help-mate, you shall achieve great feats,

32. That even the lord of the celestials with his heavenly host dare not accomplish. Those that are conversant with the knowledge of every thing, regard you, O Arjuna, to be the foremost bowman among all the Kshatriyas.

33. Among all human wielders of bows, you are unrivalled ; you are the foremost of all men. As man is the foremost of all created beings of this world, as Garuda is the chief of all winged creatures,

34. As the Ocean is the chief of all reservoirs of water, as the cow is the best of all quadruped animals, as the sun is the foremost of all luminaries, as the Himavat is the chief of all mountains, as the Brahmana is the foremost of all castes, so are you the foremost of all wielders of bows.

35. The son of Dhritarastra paid no heed to the (salutary) counsel repeatedly offered by myself, by Vidura, Drona, Rama, Janarddana and Sanjaya.

36. Reft of his reason, and like one senseless, Duryodhana then disregarded our words. Past all counsel, he shall have soon to lie on the field crushed by the might of Bhima."

37. Hearing these words of Bhisma, Duryodhana, the lord of the Kurus, became depressed at heart. Then the son of Santanu, casting his eyes on him once more said :—" Hear me, O king, renounce your wrath.

38. You have seen, even now, O Duryodhana, how the intelligent Partha created that jet of water, cool and fraught with nectarious fragrance.

39. There is none in the universe who can achieve the self-same feat. The weapons of which the presiding deities respectively are Agni, Varuna, Soma, Vayu, Vishnu,

40. Indra, Pasupati, Paramesthi, Prajapati, Dhata, Tashtra, Savita, and Vivavasu,

41. All these weapons are known to Dhananjaya only, as also to Krishna, the son of Devaki, and not to any one else.

42. This son of Pandu, O sire, is incapable of being defeated in battle, by the celestials and the Asuras united together. These are the super-human feats achieved by this illustrious hero.

43. Therefore, O monarch, let peace be soon concluded with that truthful hero that ornament of the field, accomplished in all modes of warfare.

44. As long as the mighty-armed Krishna is under his own control let, O sire, O foremost the Kurus, peace be made with this heroic sons of Pritha.

45. As still, O king, these your uterine brothers and these myriad kings here survive the battle, let peace be concluded.

46. As long as Yudhisthira does not burn down your army with his eyes flashing the fire of wrath, let peace be concluded with him, O sire.

47. As long as Nakula, Sahadeva, and Pandu's son Bhimasena, do not totally crush your army down, let peace be made with them.

48. It likes me best to see amity established between you and the heroic Pandavas. Let the war terminate with my fall. Let, O sire, peace be concluded with the Pandavas.

49. Let these words, O sinless one, uttered by me, be agreeable to you. This conclusion of peace do I consider to be beneficial to you and to your dynasty.

50. Renouncing your wrath, do you conclude peace with the sons of Pritha. Enough has already been accomplished by Phalguna. Let amity be established among you with the death of Bhisma. Let the rest (of the warriors) live! Relent, relent, O monarch!

51. Give half of your kingdom to the Pandavas. Let Yudhisthira repair to Indraprastha. Be not despised by the rulers of the earth for having brewed intestine broils. Do not, O foremost of the Kurus, attain a sinful notoriety.

52. With my passing away, let peace be enjoyed by the people ; let these kings embrace one another out of friendship.

Let father be reconciled to his son, let nephew be reconciled to his uncle; let brother he reconciled to his brother, O king.

53. If through perverted understanding, and possessed by folly, you do not listen to these reasonable words of mine, then—this I tell you for certain—you shall have to rue your folly hereinafter. Therefore let the war end here."

54. Having, out of affection, spoken these words to Duryodhana among all those kings, the son of Ganga remained silent; though his vital parts were then being consumed by those arrow-wounds, he, overcoming his agony, kept himself tranquil.

Sanjaya said:—

55. Hearing these salutary and peaceful words of counsel, fraught with virtue and worldly profit, your son refused to act up to them, like a dying man refusing to take medicine.

Thus ends the hundred and twenty-third chapter, the counsel of Bhisma, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER CXXIV.

(BHISMA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. After Bhisma the son of Santanu had ceased speaking, O mighty monarch, all the rulers of earth that had come there, went back to their respective quarters.

2. Hearing of the slaughter of Bhisma, that best of men, Vikartana's son, terrified to a certain extent, quickly came to the spot where Bhisma lay.

3. There he saw the illustrious hero lying on his arrowy bed, like the heroic lord Kartikeya lying after his birth on his bed of reeds.

4. Then the highly effulgent Vrisha (Karna), with his voice choked with tears of grief, approaching that hero lying with his eyes shut, fell at his two feet.

5. "I am Radha's son, O foremost of of the Kurus, who, whenever he became the object of your sight, was looked upon with enmity by you." These were the words he then addressed to Bhisma.

6—7. Hearing those words of his, the venerable Kuru grandsire, viz., the son of Ganga, slowly looking at him with his eyes covered with film, and seeing the place to be solitary and dismissing his guards and embracing Karna with one arm like a father embracing his son, thus affectionately addressed him saying:—

8. "Come, come, you were ever my opponent, and ever tried to outvie me. Every thing would not surely have faired well with you, had you not come here.

9. You are the son of Kunti, and not that of Radha; Adhiratha is not you father; all this, O mighty-armed one, regarding you, I have heard from Narada,

10. As also from Vyasa. All this therefore can not but be true. I tell you, O son, forsooth, that I entertain no malice agajnst you.

11. I used to apply harsh words to you only for reducing your prowess. O you of excellent vows, you abuse the Pandavas without any reason whatsoever.

12. Your very birth was attended with transgression of virtue. Therefore is your intellect thus (perverted). In consequence of your arrogance and also association with the mean, your heart harbours malice against even the meritorious.

13. For this reason did I use harsh language against you in the assembly of the Kurus. I know your prowess in battle incapable of being borne by the foe,

14. Your devotion to the Brahman, your bravery, and your great love for deeds of benevolence. Among men there is none capable of rivalling you, O you resembling an immortal.

15. Apprehending intestine quarrels, I always applied harsh words to you. In archery, in fixing the arrows on the string, in lightness of hands, in the force of your weapons,

16. You are equal to Phalguna or the illustrious Krishna. In the city of the Kasis, O Karna, holding the bow single-handed.

17. You humiliated in battle all the other kings, for securing the bride for the king of the Kurus. Even the invincible king Jarasandha endued with might,

18. Ever boastful in battle, could never cope with you in fight. You are devoted to the Brahmanas, you always love fair fight. In prowess and in might,

19. You certainly are equal to a celestial child, and are far-superior to men. I relinquish to-day the wrath I formerly harboured against you.

20. Human effort can never overcome Destiny. O slayer of your foes, the Pandavas are your uterine brothers.

21. O mighty-armed hero, if you desire to do what is agreeable to me, then be reconciled to them. O son of the Sun, let hostilities see their end at my fall. Let all kings of the earth be relieved of their burden of anxiety and dangers.

Karna said :—

22. I know all this, O mighty-armed hero; there is nothing to be doubted in what you have spoken. You speak truly, O Bhisma. I am Kunti's son, and not that of a charioteer.

23. I was however disowned by Kunti, and I have been brought up by a charioteer. Having enjoyed the wealth of Duryodhana so long, I can not venture to disappoint his hopes.

24—25. Like the son of Vasudeva who is firmly resolved to do good to the Pandavas, I also, have set at naught, O you that bestow profuse gifts to the Brahmanas, my wealth, my sons, my wife and even my own body and honour. Death resulting from disease is not, indeed, a meet end for a Kshatriya, O you of Kuru's race.

26. For the interests of Duryodhana, I have hitherto always incited the Pandavas against me; the result is inevitable and none possibly can prevent it.

27. What person ever ventures to overcome Destiny by human endeavour? Numerous portents, O grandsire, indicating the destruction of the earth,

28. Were seen and declared in the assembly by you. I perfectly know that the Pandavas and the son of Vasudeva

29. Are invincible by other men. Even with them do I propose to fight. I have firmly set my heart upon vanquishing the sons of Pandu in battle.

30. I can not, on the other hand, renounce this fierce hostility that I cherish for the Pandavas. With a joyful heart performing the duties of my order, I will fight with Dhananjaya.

31. Determined as I am to fight, it behoves you, O sire, to accord me your permission. With your permission, O hero, I intend to fight.

32. It also befits you, to forgive me any cruel word I might have uttered against you at any time, as also any act injurious to you, that I might have done, through malice or fickleness.

Bhisma said :—

33. If indeed you can not cast off the fierce hostility you have inbibed against the Pandavs, then O Karna, I accord you my permission. Fight, actuated by a desire for attaining paradise.

34. Free from wrath and malice, do you carry out the commissions of the king, to the best of your abilities and energies, and observant of the conduct of the righteous.

35. I do accord you my unqualified permission; attain what you desire to attain. Through the instrumentality of Dhananjaya, you shall attain to those (posthumous) regions that are secured by the observance of a Kshatriya's duties.

36. Casting off arrogance and depending on your own prowess and strength, engage yourself in the fight; for, what is there more desirable to a Kshatriya than a righteous battle?

37. For long and strenuously, did I strive to bring about peace. But I failed to accomplish the task; this, O Karna, I tell you forsooth.

Sanjaya said :—

38. When Ganga's son had thus spoken, the son of Radha, having saluted and propitiated the former, mounted his chariot and drove towards the pavilion of your son.

Thus ends the hundred and twenty-fourth chapter, the meeting of Bhisma and Karna, in the Bhisma-badha of the Bhisma Parva.

CHAPTER I.

DRONABHISHEKA PARVA.

Having saluted the Supreme Deity (Narayana) and the highest of all male beings Nara and also the Goddess of Learning (Sarasvati), let us cry "Success"!

Janamejaya said :—

1—2. Hearing that his sire Devavrata of unequalled might, energy, sturdiness, prowess and vigour, had been slain by Sikhandin the son of Panchala, O Brahminical sage, what did the very powerful monarch Dhritarastra with eyes blinded with fast-falling tears, do ?

3. His son, O worshipful one, desired to obtain monarchy after having defeated the mighty warriors, the sons of Pandu, through the assistance of Bhisma, Drona, and other such heroes.

4. O illustrious ascetic, tell me all that the foremost of the Kuru dynasty did, when that chief of all bowmen (Bhisma) had been killed.

Vaishampayana said :—

5. Having heard that his sire (Bhisma) had been slain in battle, that ruler of men, Dhritarastra of the Kuru dynasty knew no rest of mind, being worn out with anxiety and sorrow.

6. When that foremost of the Kurus had been thus brooding over his grief, there came again to him the pure-souled son of Gavalgani.

7. O great king, Dhritarastra, the son of Ambika, then thus questioned Sanjaya who had that night returned from the camp to the city named after the elephant.

8. Hearing of the death of Bhisma, he became exceedingly cheerless, and longing for the victory of his sons, he broke out into lamentations like one sorely distressed.

Dhritarastra said :—

9. O son, having bewailed the high-souled Bhisma of terrific might, what did the Kurus, goaded by Destiny, do ?

10. When that unconquerable and high-souled hero was slain, what, for sooth, did the Kurus, deep down into the sea of sorrow, do ?

11. Verily, O Sanjaya, the innumerable and excellent army of the high-souled sons of Pandu, can strike the worlds with keenest apprehension.

12. Therfore, O Sanjaya, recount to me what the kings did, when Devavrata, the foremost of the Kurus, had been slain.

Sanjaya said :—

13. Hear, O monarch, with singleness of mind, the words, falling from my lips, regarding what your sons did when Devavrata had fallen.

14—15. O monarch, when Bhisma of invincible prowess had been slain, your own warriors and also those of the Pandava host, began to think of the duties of the Kshatriya sect ; and, O lord of men, at the thought, they wondered and were delighted ; and in obedience to their sectarian duties, they bowed down to the illustrious Bhisma.

16. Then those foremost of men prepared for Bhisma of infinite energy a bed furnished with a pillow, made of close-knotted arrows.

17—18. Having arranged for Bhisma's safety and having greeted one another, and with the permission of the son of Ganga and having circumambulated him and looking at each other with eyes coppery with anger, those Kshatriyas, goaded by Destiny, again issued forth for fighting with one another.

19. Then to the voice of the trumpets and to the roar of the drums, the army of your sons and that of their adversaries, formed in battle-array.

20-21. When, O greatest of kings, the son of Janhavi (Bhisma) had fallen and when the greater part of the day had worn out, these foremost of the Bharata race, overpowered by the influence of their wrath, and having their reasons bewildered through fate, and neglecting the salutary counsel of the illustrious son of Ganga, came out in haste grasping their weapons.

22. Owing to your own foolishness and that of your sons, and owing to the death of the son of Santanu, the descendants of the Kuru race together with all the (assembled) kings, appeared to be summoned by the God of death.

23. Like a herd of goats without a herdsman in a wood infested with beasts of prey, they were exceedingly oppressed with fear, being deprived of Devavrata.

24. On the fall of that foremost of the Bharata race, the army of the Kurus resembled the heavenly dome stripped of the stars, or the sky deprived of the atmosphere;

25. Or the earth with her crops blighted; or a discourse teeming with unrefined expressions; or the army of the Asuras when in the days of yore, Vali had been (thoroughly) humiliated,

26. Or a charming lady deprived of her lord; or a stream the waters of which had been dried up; or a doe deprived of her mate, surrounded by wolves in the forests,

27. Or the wide, extended, mountain-cava having its lion slain by the fabulous Sarava. Or the slaughter of Janhavi's son, O foremost of the Bharata race, the army of the Bharatas

28. Resembled a tiny bark thrown up and down on the bosom of the mighty main, driven by the gale rushing from all sides. It was then greatly harassed by the powerful Pandava heroes of infallible aims.

29. Then that host, with its elephants, horses and car-warriors, was much distressed, and exceedingly jeopardised and rendered helpless and terror-stricken.

30. Then, in that army, bereft of Devavrata, the kings and the (common) soldiers, individually struck with panic, seemed to be sinking into the nethermost regions.

31. Thereafter the Kouravas remembered Karna, who was equal to Devavrata himself, and who was the foremost of all wielders of weapons, and resplendent like a guest.

32. Then like the heart of a distressed person looking for a friend, their hearts turned towards him (Karna); and, O Bharata, the kings then broke out into exclamations saying, "O Karna, O Karna."

33—35. "That son of Radha, that benefactor of ours, that progeny of Suta, he that will sacrifice his life in battle, that one of illustrious renown with his followers and friends, has refrained from fighting these ten days; summon him without delay. That foremost of men, that hero of mighty arms, Karna, had been reckoned by Bhisma as only an Ardharatha, in the presence of all the Kshatriyas, during the tale of car-warriors of valour and prowess, in spite of his being equal to two Maharathas.

36. Indeed in that enumeration of Rathas and Atirathas, Karna was thus reckoned,—Karna who is the foremost (of all fighters), who is held in high respect by the heroes, and who would dare give battle even to Yama, Kuvera, Varuna, and Indra.

37. Out of wrath (excited by this classification of himself) he had thus addressed, O king, the son of Ganga:—'O Kourava, I will not fight so long as you live;

38. If you shall slay in battle the sons of Pandu, O you of Kuru's race, I will retire into the woods with the permission of Duryodhana.

39. If, O Bhisma, on the contrary, you, being slain by the Pandavas, are transported to heaven, then will I, riding on a single car, slay those whom you consider to be the mightiest of all car-warriors.'

40. Having thus spoken, the mighty-armed Karna of illustrious renown, refrained, with the permission of your son, from taking part in the battle for these ten days."

41. O Bharata, Bhisma of immeasurable prowess, displaying his might in battle, slew a large number of warriors of the Pandava host in that (sanguinary) engagement.

42. On the fall of that most powerful hero of unerring aim, your sons remembered Karna, like persons desirous of crossing (the ocean) remembering a raft.

43. Your sons and the warriors of your party, together with the (assembled) monarchs then, began to bewail saying 'Karna' they also said 'It is time for you to come.'

44. As during emergencies the heart flies to a friend, so our hearts then flew to Karna of irrepressible manhood who had acquired his knowledge of weapons from the son of Jamadagni.

45. O monarch, he only was capable of saving us from the great dangers of battle, like Govinda always protecting the celestials from all calamities.

Vaisampayana said :—

46. Thereupon breathing (heavily) out like a snake, Dhritarastra spoke these words to Sanjaya who had been thus repeatedly extolling Karna.

Dhritarastra said :—

47. As your heart then were drawn towards Karna, the son of Vikartana, you surely saw that son of Radha, that descendant of Suta, who was ever-ready to lay down his life for you.

48. Did that Karna, of infallible prowess in battle, disappoint Duryodhana and his brothers, who had been all exceedingly distressed, panic-struck and anxious for being extricated from their difficulties ?

49. Was that foremost of bowmen in battle capable of filling up the void created by the fall of Bhisma, the shelter of the Kurus ?

50. Supplying the gap, was Karna successful in striking terror into the hearts of the enemy? Did he also succeed in fructifying the hopes of victory cherished by my sons?

Thus ends the first chapter, the questions of Dhritarastra, in the Dronabhisheka of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER II.

(DRONABHISHEKA PARVA)— Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then Adhiratha's son of the Suta caste, knowing that Bhisma had fallen, became desirous of saving, like a brother, the army of your son from the calamity it was in, like a boat split in the midst of the unfathomable deep.

2. Having heard that the son of Santanu, that foremost of men, the never-dropping one, and the best of all car-warriors, had been slain, O king, Karna the represser of enemies and the foremost of all bowmen, speedily arrived at the field of battle.

3. When that excellent of car-warriors, Bhisma had been slain by the enemy, Karna soon (came to the battle field), desirous of saving the army of your son resembling a boat sunk in the deep, like a father anxious for rescuing his sons.

Karna said :—

4 —5. When that Bhisma, who was endued with resoluteness, intelligenee, prowess, energy, truthfulness, self-control, and with all the other attributes of a hero; who was proficient in the use of celestial weapons ; in whom there were humility, bashfulness, sweet speech and harmlessness ; who was always grateful, the slayer of the enemies of the twice-borns ; in whom there resided all these virtues for ever like the stain in the moon,—when even that Bhisma the destroyer of hostile heroes had obtained his quietus, I consider the remaining warriors as already slain.

6. Owing to the constant connection with action, there is nothing in this world that is eternal. When that one of illustrious vows (Bhisma) has been killed to-day, what man can say with certitude that to-morrow the sun will rise?

7. When that one of prowess equal to that of the Vasus, when he that was born of the energy of the Vasus, when that ruler of earth has gone back to the Vasus, do you then lament for your wealth, your sons, and this army ?

Sanjaya said :—

8. When that giver of boons, that most puissant hero, that lord of men, that one of great vigour had been slain, and when the Bharatas had been vanquished, Karna, with a sorrowful heart, and shedding copious tears, began to comfort (the Kurus).

9. Having heard, O monarch, these wordr of the son of Radha, your sons and yous soldiers, out of grief, broke out into loud lamentations and shed tears from their eyes, which were as copious as their wails were loud.

10. When the sanguinary engagement waged anew and the Kourava host led by kings once more roared forth (their battle-cry), then that foremost of all Maharathis (Karna) addressed these words to the mighty car-warriors, that imparted joy to their hearts.

11. "This transient world is ever flying (towards death) ; considering this I always regard everything as unsteady. When you were all present here, how could that foremost of the Kurus (Bhisma), who resembled a mountain in steadiness, be slain in battle ?

12. When like the sun dropping down on the earth, that foremost of car-warriors, the son of Santanu has fallen, the monarchs (of the Kuru army) are hardly capable of withstanding Dhananjaya, like trees unable to withstand the hurricane that uproots even the hills.

13. As that high-minded one did, so to-day will I protect, in this dreadful battle, this army of the Kurus, whose appearance is cheerless and whose zeal has been destroyed by the enemy, which is helpless, and whose best warriors have already been slain.

14. This heavy burden now devolves on myself; I see that this world is transitory. That most excellent of warriors has also fallen in battle. Why shall I then entertain any apprehension for fighting?

15. Coursing (swiftly) in the battle-field, I shall send, by means of my straight-going shafts, to the abode of Death, the foremost descendants of Kuru's race (Pandavas). Considering fame to be the best of all worldly possessions, I shall kill them in the engagement, or myself lie on the field being slain by them.

16. Yudhisthira is endued with resoluteness, intelligence, piety and vigour; Vrikodara equals a hundred elephants in might; Arjuna also is youthful and the begotten son of the foremost of celestials; so the army belonging to them is not to be easily vanquished even by the immortals.

17. As no one ever returns alive from the jaws of death, so no coward ever returns (alive) after having confronted that hostile army to which belong the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva), each resembling Death himself in battle, and in which are Satyaki and the son of Devaki.

18. Great power, begot of austerities, should be opposed by ascetic wealth. So should the wise oppose might with might. My mind is decided upon withstanding the enemy and it is resolutely fixed upon ensuring the safety (of my own troops.)

19. For certain, O charioteer, I shall to-day oppose their force, and shall defeat them by simply going to the field. This conflict of friends (internecine war) ought not to be tolerated by me. He that helps in rallying a routed army is the true friend.

20. I shall either achieve this pious act of manliness or shall follow Bhisma, renouncing my vital breaths. I shall either slay in battle my myriad enemies, or slain by them I shall attain to the posthumous regions of the heroes.

21. I regard, indeed, this to be my bounden duty, O charioteer, when women and infants wail aloud for assistance, and when Dhartarastra's pride has been humiliated. So I shall this day conquer the enemies of the monarch (Duryodhana).

22. Preserving the Kurus and massacring the sons of Pandu even at the cost of my very life in this dreadful fight, and despatching to Death my myriad enemies in this battle, I shall bestow this monarchy on the son of Dhritarastra.

23. Fasten on me this magnificient, golden and resplendent armour radiant with gems and jewels. Let also my helmet lustrous like the sun and my bows and arrows resembling fire, poison or serpents, be donned.

24. Fasten sixteen quivers (to my chariot); fetch strongest bows, and also arrows, spears, heavy maces, and my conch with its body variegated with gold.

25. Procure also my standard, variegated, beautiful, magnificient, made of gold, burning with the lustre of a lotus, bearing the emblem of the elephant's girth, after having cleansed it with a fine piece of cloth, and having decorated it with festoons of flowers and a net-work of fine wires.

26. O son of a charioteer, bring me also, in all haste, fleetest horses, of the colour of tawny clouds, stout, washed with water hallowed by Mantras, and decorated with rich caparisons made of effulgent gold.

27. Procure, in all haste, a chariot, most magnificient, festooned with garlands of gold, adorned with gems resembling the Sun and the Moon, furnished with all necessary objects and offensive weapons, and yoked with lusty horses.

28. Bring me also beautiful bows of great toughness and bow-strings of finest make, capable of throwing (arrows at great distances), and some large quivers well-stuffed with shafts and several cuirasses (to cover my person).

29. O hero, bring speedily all auspicious articles required at the time of setting out (for battle), and brass and golden vessels filled with curds. Bring garlands of flowers and decorate my person with them; strike up, also, kettle-drums for victory.

30. Drive, O charioteer, quickly thither where Keeritin (diadem-decked), Vrikodara, the virtuous Yudhisthira and the twins are. Confronting them, either I shall slay them, or being slain in battle by my foes, I shall follow Bhisma.

31. That host to which belongs, Yudhisthira, firm in truth, in which are Bhima and Arjuna, and which contains the son of Vasudeva, Satyaki and the Srinjayas, that host I consider to be incapable of being vanquished by these monarchs.

32. Even if all-devouring Death were to guard Arjuna in the encounter, with the utmost heed, still would I slay him, confronting him in battle; or myself hie to the regions of Death following the trail of Bhisma.

33. It is not that, I say, that I shall not go amidst those heroes. Those that sow dissensions among friends, that are of veering devotion and of impious souls, those are not my allies.

Sanjaya said :—

34. Karna then drove out for victory, mounting on an excellent chariot, most lavishly furnished, invulnerable, with a magnificient pole, adorned with gold, auspicious, with (fluttering) penons, and to which were harnessed steeds fleet like the wind.

35—36. Worshipped by the best of the car-warriors of the Kuru party, like Indra by the immortals, that high-souled and most terrible of all wielders of bow, endowed with immeasurable vigour like the sun himself,—riding on his chariot decorated with gold, gems and jewels, mounted with a magnificient standard, to which were harnessed finest animals and the rattle of which resembled the rumbling of clouds,—went, attended by a mighty host, to the battle-field where that foremost of the Bharata race (Bhisma) had obtained his quietus.

37. Then that son of Adhiratha, the mighty bowman and warrior Karna, blessed with a handsome appearance and effulgent like fire, riding on his own auspicious chariot resplendent like fire, shone like the monarch of the celestials himself riding on his own heavenly chariot.

Thus ends the second chapter, the setting out of Karna, in the Dronabhisheka of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER III.

(DRONABHISHEKA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1—8. Seeing the most worshipful champion, the high-souled grandsire Bhisma of immeasurabte prowess, the death of all Kshatriyas, lie on a bed of arrows and resemble the mighty main dried by violent storms, and seeing that hero dragged down from his car by the celestial weapons of Savyasachin, (Arjuna), the hope your sons cherished for victory was gone as also their armours and peace of mind. Seeing that one who was always like an island to persons going down into the unfathomable deep in their attempt to cross it; seeing him pierced with shafts that had flown in an uninterrupted stream like that of the Yamuna, him who appeared like the unbearable Mainaka hurled on the earth by Mahendra; seeing that hero fallen on the surface of the earth like the sun dropped down from the heavens; seeing him who resembled the unconquerable Vritra when he had been vanquished in the days of yore by Vasava; seeing that stupifier of the consciousness of all heroes, that most excellent of champions, that foremost of all bowmen; seeing that hero and foremost of men, your father Bhisma of illustrious vows, that grandsire of the descendant of the Bharatas thrown down and lying prostrate on the field, pierced through and through by the arrows of Arjuna; seeing that hero resting on a couch worthy of a hero,—the son of Adhiratha dismounted from his chariot, greatly distressed and overwhelmed with grief and with his consciousness well-nigh clouded.

9. He (Karna) walked towards him (Bhisma) on foot, distressed and with eyes blinded with fast-falling tears. Then saluting him and folding his palms and having paid his respects, Karna thus spoke.

10. "I am Karna; good betide you; speak to me, O Bharata, in auspicious and sweet language; turn your eyes on me.

11. None can expect to reap the fruits of his meritorious deeds here, since you, O venerable pious old man, lie prostrate on the ground being slain (by your enemies).

12. In replenishing the treasury, in matters of counsel, in arranging troops for battle, and in the handling of arms, I do not, O foremost of the Kurus, find any one else among the Kurus equal to you.

13. I do not see any one else that endued with a pure intelligence, will save the Kurus from their terror. Having slain numerous warriors, you are now repairing to the regions of the Pitris.

14. O foremost of the Bharatas, from this day forward, the sons of Pandu possessed with ire, will slay the Kurus, as tigers slaughter deer.

15. To-day the Kurus will realise the vigour of Savayasachin, who produces the twang of the Gandiva bow; to-day they will be frightened by him as the Asuras were frightened by the wielder of the thunderbolt.

16. To-day the whizzle, resembling the rumble of thunders, of arrows shot from the Gandiva, will strike terrorin to the hearts of the Kurus and other rulers of earth.

17. O hero, to-day the shafts of the diadem-decked Arjuna, will burn down the sons of Dhritarastra, just as a swelling forest-conflagration of terrible flames burns down the trees.

18. Fire and wind coursing together, consume numerous copses, creepers and trees in that part of a forest through which they pass.

19. There can be no doubt that the son of Pritha is like a raging fire; and, O foremost of men, without doubt Krishna resembles the strong wind (that accompanies fire).

20. Hearing the sound of the conch Panchajannya and the twang of the bow Gandiva, all the soldiers will be terror-stricken.

21. O hero, bereft of you, the monarchs will not be able to bear the rumble of the advancing chariot mounted with the banner having for its emblem the (terrible) ape, that belong to that represser of foes (Arjuna).

22. What other monarch, except yourself, is capable of combating with Arjuna, all whose super-human deeds the wise extol.

23. Superhuman was indeed the combat he had with the high-souled Tryamvaka (the three-eyed god). From him did he (Arjuna) secure a boon which is difficult of being obtained by the mean-minded.

24—25. That son of Pandu ever boastful of his prowess is protected by Madhava. What other person can overcome him in battle who could not be vanquished even by you before,—you who, endowed with great prowess, had defeated in battle, Rama, that terrible destroyer of the Kshatriya race, held in high honour by the celestials and the Asuras.

26. With your permission I, as I am unable to tolerate him any longer, can to-day slay, with the dint of my weapons, that son of Pandu, that foremost of warriors in battle who is like a serpent of virulent venom, and is terrible, heroic and capable of slaying his enemies even by his very glances."

Thus ends the third chapter, the eulogy of Karna, in the Dronabhiseka of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER IV.

(DRONABHISEKA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. When he had been thus speaking, the venerable grandsire of the Kurus, pleased with him, addressed to him these words suitable to season and place.

2—3. "May you be the refuge of your friends, even as the ocean is the refuge of the rivers, the sun of the other planets, the pious of the truth, fertile soil of the seeds, and Parjannya of the created beings. May your relations depend on you even as the immortals depend upon the thousand-eyed Indra.

4. May you be the humiliator of the pride of your enemies; and may you be the enhancer of the delight of your friends, the Kouravas, as Vishnu is of the denizens of heaven.

5. O Karna, ever anxious to perform the pleasures of the son of Dhritarastra, you, with the strength and vigour of your arms, did defeat the Kamvojas, having gone to their country, namely Rajapura.

6. You also vanquished the monarchs who was stopping at Girivraja and who was headed by Nagnajit, as also the Amvasthas, the Videhas and the Gandharvas.

7. O Karna, in days gone by, you brought under the authority of Duryodhana the Kiratas obstinate in battle and peopling the strongholds of the Himavat.

8. The Utkalas, the Mekhalas, the Poundras, the Kalingas, the Nishadhas, the Trigartas, and the Valhikas, were also worsted in battle by you.

9. O Karna, desirous of doing good to Duryodhana, you defeated in battle in various lands, O hero, numerous highly vigorous clans.

10. May you, O son, be the shelter of all the Kouravas, even as Duryodhana is, with his friends, relatives and kinsmen.

11. I do bid you farewell in benedictory language; go, and fight with the enemy; command the Kurus in battle, and secure victory for Duryodhana.

12. Like Duryodhana, you are to us our grandson. Therefore, by the ordinances, we are the same to you as we are to him.

13. O foremost of men, the intelligent hold that in this world the connection of the pious with the pious is more closer in respect of relationship than that through the uterus.

14. Therefore being faithfully united with the Kurus, and believing their army to be your own, do you, like Duryodhana himself, protect it:"

15. Having heard these words of him (Bhisma) and having bowed down to his feet, Karna, the son of Vikartana, went to the place where all the bowmen were assembled.

16. Beholding that matchless and extensive encampment of the innumerable army,

Karna encouraged that host of well-accoutered and broad-chested soldiers.

17—18. All the Kurus, having Duryodhana at their head, were greatly delighted; and seeing that mighty-armed and high-souled Karna come with the intent of battle and place himself at the command of the whole host, the Kurus welcomed him, with sounds produced by the striking of the arm-pits, with rending shouts, twang of bow-strings, roars like that of lions and diverse other kinds of sounds.

Thus ends the fourth chapter, the consolation afforded by Karna, in the Dronabhisheka of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER V.

(DRONABHISHEKA PARVA)—Contd

Sanjaya said :—

1. O monarch, seeing that foremost of men Karna seated on his car, Duryodhana highly enraptured, spoke these words.

2. "I consider this army, protected by you, to have found a suitable commander in you. Do you now decide that which will be beneficial (to this army) and which is practicable."

Karna said :—

3. O foremost of men, yourself speak to us, since you are the wisest of kings. A third person cannot so well descry as to what should be done, as he who is interested in any affair.

4. All these rulers of men are desirous of hearing your words; and I am sure you will never speak unjust words.

Duryodhana said :—

5. Owing to his prowess, seniority, knowledge of the Srutis, and the support he obtained from all the warriors, he (Bhisma) was the leader of our host.

6. In the fair battle of these ten days that highly glorious one of generous soul, O Karna, slew a large number of my foes and protected my own army.

7. When that one, who accomplished many difficult acts, is gone to heaven, O Karna, whom do you consider capable of leading (this host into battle)?

8. Like an unmanned boat in waters, the army cannot stand in battle even for a short while without a leader, O Karna, O you who are foremost in battle.

9. An army without a commander is like a boat with none to steer her through, or like a chariot without a driver, going any where.

10. Just as a foreign trader in an unknown country reaps all distress, so an army without a commander is exposed to all dangers.

11. Therefore do you look among all these high-souled warriors of ours and find out a proper person who may, as a commander, fill the place of Santanu's son.

12. The person, whom you will consider to be fit to lead our army, in battle, will undoubtedly be chosen to be so unanimously,

Karna said :—

13. All these foremost of men of high soul are worthy of the leadership (of this host). There is no necessity for making any selection.

14. All of them are perfectly acquainted with the geneologies (of princes) and with the vital parts of the body; they are possessed of prowess, might and intelligence; they are grateful, highly intelligent and ever unretreating from battle.

15. But all of them cannot at the same time assume the leadership; therefore only one among them is to be chosen, in whom there reside superior qualities.

26. If you promote one among several contending rivals, the rest, it is clear, being depressed, will not fight with a desire for doing your good.

17. But this foremost of all the wielders of weapons, this preceptor and teacher, of all the warriors, this Drona who is venerable in years, is worthy of being elected generalissimo.

18. When the indomitable Drona, who is foremost among those conversant with Brahma and is equal to Suka and Angirasa in learning, is here, who else is worthy of being selected as a leader?

19. O Bharata, there is not even a single warrior among this mighty host of kings, who will not follow Drona when he goes to fight.

20. O monarch, this one is the foremost of all leaders of warriors; he is the foremost of all wielders of arms, as also of all intelligent persons, and he is also your preceptor (in arms).

21. As the immortals desirous of defeating the Asuras in battle made Kartikeya their leader, so, do you, O Duryodhana, soon elect this one (Drona) as the leader of your army.

Thus ends the fifth chapter, the counsel of Karna, in the Dronabhisheka of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER VI.

(DRONABHISHEKA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Thereupon having listened to the words of Karna, king Duryodhana thus addressed Drona who was standing in the midst of the soldiers.

Duryodhana said —

2—3. Amongst all this numerous host of kings, there is none who can be as good a protector as you, owing to the superiority of the order to which you belong, to the nobility of your birth, to your knowledge of the Sastras, your age, your intelligence, prowess, skilfulness, invincibility, perfect acquaintance with worldly matters, moral purity, self-control, asceticism, seniority, and gratefulness, as also owing to your being endued with all desirable qualities.

4. Like Indra protecting the celestials, do you protect ourselves. O foremost of the twiceborn ones, being led by yourself, we desire to obtain victory over our enemies.

5. Like Kapala amongst the Rudras; like Pavaka amongst the Vasus; like Kuvera amongst the Yakshas; like Vasava amongst the Marutas;

6. Like Vasistha amongst the Vipras, like Bhaskara (sun) amongst the lustrous bodies, like Yama amongst the Pitris, like Varuna amongst the creatures of the waters;

7. Like the moon amongst the stars, like Usanas amongst the sons of Diti, you are the foremost amongst all commanders of armies; therefore be you our leader.

8. Like Indra slaying the Danavas, do you slay our enemies, O sinless one, by arranging in battle-array this eleven Akshauhini of soldiers which will be placed under your complete disposal.

9. Like the son of Pavaka proceeding before the celestials, do you proceed at the head of this our army; we will follow you in battle like a herd of bulls following the leader.

10. That fierce bowman, that mighty champion, Arjuna, stretching his celestial bow, will not strike us seeing you go before us.

11. O foremost of men, if you accept our leadership, then I am sure to conquer in battle Yudhisthira with all his friends and followers.

Sanjaya said :—

12. When Duryodhana had finished his address, the kings, imparting great delight to your sons by their loud defiant shouts, exclaimed "Victory to Drona."

13. Then the soldiers also filled with delight, and desirous of earning fame, began to extol that foremost of regenerate ones, with Duryodhana at their head. Thereupon, O monarch, Drona spoke these words to Duryodhana.

Thus ends the sixth chapter, the request of Duryodhana, in the Dronabhisheka of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER VII.

Drona said :—

1. I am versed in the Vedas and in their six auxiliaries; and in the science of practical life concerning itself with men. I know the weapons of Tryamvaka and various other weapons and Mantras.

2. Those qualities,—which, you, desirous of victory, have ascribed to me, bringing them to play, I will offer battle to the sons of Pandu.

3. But, O monarch, I shall never slay the son of Prisata in battle; O foremost of men, he has been created to kill me.

4. I shall encounter the hostile array and kill the Somakas. In battle, the Pandavas will not meet me with delightful hearts.

Sanjaya said :—

5. O monarch, then your son, with the permission of Drona, made him the commander of his troops, with ceremonies enjoined by the ordinances for such occasions.

6. As in days of yore, the gods with Indra at their head, invested Skanda with their leadership, so now did the monarchs headed by Duryodhana, invest Drona with the command of the troops.

7. Thereupon on Drona's investiture with the command, the delight (of troops) was manifest by the sound of musical instruments and the deafening blare of the conchs.

8.—9. Then honouring Drona with shouts the like of which fill the ear during a holy day, with souuds of benedictory utterances, with eulogies, songs, and cries of bards, ministrels and panegyrists, with the cries of victory uttered by the foremost of regenerate ones, and with the frolics of mimes, the Kouravas considered the sons of Pandu as already worsted in battle.

Sanjaya said :—

10. Then having been installed on the command of the army, that mighty car-warrior, the son of Varadwaja, arranging the troops in battle-array, marched out, accompanied by your sons, from a desire of giving battle.

11. Donning their armours, the king of the Shindhus, and the Kalingas, and Vikarna, your son, stationed themselves in the right wing of Drona.

12. Then accompanied by a numerous and picked cavalry recruited from men belonging to the Gandhara tribe and armed with lustrous lances, Sakuni marched out as their support.

13. Then Kripa, Kritavarman, Chitrasena, and Vivinsati, having Dussasana at their head, proceeded, covering the left wing.

14. Then riding on horses of great fleetness, the Kamvojas headed by Sudakshina, and the Sakas with the Yavanas, marched forth, forming the support of the last mentioned party.

15—17. Then the Madras, the Trigartas, the Amvasthas, the warriors from the West and the North, the Malavas, the Sivis, the Surasenas, the Sudras with the Malavas, the Souviras, the Kitavas, the warriors from the East and the South,—all these with your son Duryodhana at their head, and the son of Suta at their rear, cheering the hearts of their own partisans, marched forth, and increased the strength of the (advancing) troops. Karna, the son of Vikartana, then marched at the head of all bowmen.

18. His mighty standard, huge and resplendent, and marked with the device of the elephant's girth, imparting delight into the hearts of his own soldiers, burned with effulgence equal to that of the sun.

19. All the kings and the Kurus, seeing Karna, did pay no heed to the calamity that had befallen them in the shape of Bhisma's death, and they all were shorn of their sorrow.

20. Numerous warriors, highly delighted, forming into groups, thus began to talk, "Surely the Pandavas, seeing Karna in the field, will not stay a while in battle.

21. Truly, Karna is powerful enough to gain victory in battle over the celestials led by Vasava himself, not to speak of the sons of Pandu, who are devoid of prowess and energy alike.

22. The sons of Pritha were tenderly treated by the mighty-armed Bhisma in battle. But Karna shall slay them in the encounter with sharpened arrows."

23. O lord of people, thus talking to one another with joyful looks, and honouring and eulogising the son of Radha, they marched along (in battle-array).

24. Our own army, O monarch, was arrayed in the form of a Sakata (or car); and the army of our high-souled enemies, O Bharata, was formed in the shape of a Krouncha (crane),

25—27. By the very virtuous Yudhisthira with a delighted heart. At the head of their array stood the two foremost of men, Visaksena (Vishnu) and Dhananjaya, with their banner, bearing the emblem of the ape, uplifted. That banner of Partha of immeasurable prowess, the hump of the whole army and the refuge of all wielders of bow, that banner which reached the orbit of the sun, seemed to illumine the whole army of Yudhisthira of high soul.

28. That banner of the most intelligent Partha appeared like the burning sun when at the end of a Yuga, it rises to consume the earth.

29. Of all the warriors Arjuna is the foremost of all the bows Gandiva is the best. Vasudeva is the foremost of all created beings, and Sudarsana is the best of all kinds of discus.

30. The chariot, to which were harnessed white horses, carrying these four kinds of energy incarnate, stood at the head of the hostile array, like the discus of Kala raised (for being hurled).

31. Thus those two high-souled heroes stood at the head of their armies. Karna stood at the head of your army and Dhananjaya at the head of the hostile troops.

32. Then, in that battle, the Kouravas and the Pandavas, looked at each other possessed with ire, and each desirous of slaying the other.

33. Thereafter when the mighty car-warrior, the son of Bharadwaja, flew suddenly to the fight, the earth began to shake with the sound of terrible wails.

34. Then thick clouds of dust, blown up by the storm, and resembling heaps of tawny silk, intercepted from the view the welkin and the sun.

35. Though the sky was cloudless yet a shower of flesh, bones and blood fell on the earth; and vultures, hawks, cranes, Kankas, and crows, by thousands,

36. Swooped on your army, over and over again, O king; the jackals yelled forth; and many dreadful and fierce rangers of the sky,

37. Repeatedly placed your army to their right, being desirous of devouring flesh, and thirsting for blood.

38. On the field of battle, illuminating the welkin, dropped many a burning meteor accompanied with thundering sounds and vibrating motions and covering with their tails large areas.

39. Then, O monarch, when the commander of the host (Drona) set out for battle, the wide circumference of the lustrous orb of day, emitted flashes of lightning and thundering sounds.

40. These and many other terrible portents appeared indicating a great loss of life of many heroes in the ensuing encounter.

41. Thereafter the fight between the Kurus and the Pandus, both desirous of killing one another, commenced; and the terrible din rising therefrom filled the whole world.

42. Then, burning with wrath, the Pandavas and the Kouravas, all first-class smiters, began to pierce one another with sharpened weapons, ardently longing for victory.

43. Then that mighty champion (Drona) of great effulgence, charged, with headlong speed, the army of the sons of Pandu, shooting hundreds of sharpened shafts.

44. Beholding Drona charge, the Pandavas along with the Srinjayas received him, O monarch, with showers of shafts in distinct sets.

45. That mighty host (of the Pandavas) along with the Panchalas agitated and routed by Drona, was shattered like rows of cranes by the wind.

46. In the encounter, invoking various celestial weapons Drona, in a moment, sorely oppressed the Pandavas and the Srinjayas.

47. The Panchalas having Dhristadyumna at their head, being slaughtered by Drona, like the Danavas by Vasava, began to quake.

48. Thereupon that mighty car-warrior, the heroic Yajnasena, versed in the knowledge of the celestial weapons, produced by his showers of arrows many a breach, in the columns of Drona.

49. Then that powerful son of Prishata, checking the showers of Drona's arrows with those of his own, slew many a Kuru warrior.

50. Thereupon Drona of mighty arms, again rallying his soldiers and re-arranging them, charged the son of Prishata in battle.'

51. Then towards the son of Prishata he directed a close shower of arrows, like Meghavat exceedingly enraged shooting his shafts towards the Danavas.

52. Thus agitated by Drona with his arrows, the Pandavas and Srinjayas, again and again, broke their lines, like a herd of inferior beasts attacked by a lion.

53. Then, O monarch, like a circle of firebrands, the mighty Drona careered through the army of the Pandavas; and that was a wonderful sight.

54—55. Riding on his own excellent cars, that resembled a city careering through the skies; that was well-supplied with the implements of war according to the military science, the banner of which was fluttering on the air, the rattle of which was resounding all round the field, the steeds of which were well-driven, and the flagstaff of which was shining like a rod of crystal—riding on such a chariot, Drona inspired the hostile army with terror and massacred it (right and left).

Thus ends the seventh chapter, the display of Drona's prowess, in the Dronabhisheka of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER VIII.

(DRONABHISHEKA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Seeing Drona thus destroy their horses, drivers, cars and elephants, the Pandavas were greatly afflicted, and could not check his career.

2. Thereupon king Yudhisthira said to Dhristadyumna and Dhananjaya, 'Check the career of the Pot-born Drona by surrounding him with great heed.'

3. Thereupon the mighty car-warriors namely Arjuna, and the son of Prishata together with their followers, encompassed Drona, as he was rushing at them.

4. The Kekayas, Bhimasena, the son of Subhadra, Ghatotkacha, Yudhisthira, the twins Nakula and Sahadeva, the king of the Matsyas, the son of Drupada,

5. And the five sons of Draupadi greatly delighted, and Dhristaketu along with Saty . . the wrathful Chekitana, and Yuyutsu th. . ghty car-warrior,

6. And, O monarch, all the other rulers of earth who followed the Pandavas in battle, achieved many feats (of valour), in accordance with their prowess and nobility of birth.

7. Seeing the Pandavas protect their army in battle, the son of Bharadwaja, rolling his eyes in anger, cast his glances (on the army).

8. Working himself up with ire, that one (Drona), indomitable in war, seated on his chariot, blew the Pandava host off like the storm blowing thick clouds off.

9. Charging cars, steeds, men, and elephants on all sides, Drona roamed in the field like one insane, and though grown up in years, he resembled one endued with the energy of youth.

10. O monarch, his horses, of chestnut colour, of excellent breed, of wind-like speed, and of indefatigable energy, assumed a beautiful appearance being bespattered with blood.

11. Beholding that one of regulated vows rush at them like the god of Death enraged, all the warriors of the Pandavas sped on all directions.

12. As some fled, and some rallied and some looked at Drona, and some stood on the field, the noise (of the confusion) they caused was dreadful and deafening.

13. That noise that imparted delight to the heroes, and enhanced the terrors of the cowards, filled the whole interval between he earth and the skies.

14. And again did Drona, shouting forth his own name, made himself terrible in battle by piercing his enemies with hundreds of arrows.

15. O sire, then the mighty Drona careered fiercely amid the army of the sons of Pandu, like the god of Death himself ; and he appeared like one young, though bearing the weight of years.

16. Severing down many heads as well as arms decorated with ornaments, and rendering the seats of many a car empty, he sent up terrific roars.

17. In consequence of his rapturous roars, and of the fleetness of his arrows, O master, the warriors began to shake in battle, like kine shivering with cold.

18. A terrible sound caused by the rattle of Drona's chariot, by the contraction and stretching of his bow-string, and by the twang of his bow, filled the concave dome.

19. Thousands of arrows shot from his bow fell, covering cardinal points, upon the elephants, steeds, chariots, and foot-soldiers (of the hostile array)

20. Then the Pandavas along with the Panchalas, rushed at Drona wielding a bow of great strength, and resembling a blazing fire in consequence of his weapons.

21. Then he began to despatch them with their elephants, steeds, and foot-soldiers to the regions of Death ; and within a short while Drona made the earth muddy with blood.

22. A net-work of arrows, woven by Drona who had been scattering celestial weapons, and shooting shafts on all sides, was seen to overshroud the cardinal points.

23. Like flashes of lightning amid dense masses of clouds, his standard could be seen whirling amongst foot-soldiers,chariots, horses and car-warriors.

24. Afflicting with arrows the five foremost among the Kekayas, and the king of the Panchalas,Drona,of irrepressible vigour, armed with a bow and arrows, charged the division commanded by Yudhisthira.

25. Thereupon, Bhimasena, and Dhananjaya, and the grandson of Sini, and the sons of Drupada and the son of Saibya, the ruler of the Kasis, and Sibi himself, greatly delighted and sending up loud shouts, covered Drona with a stream of shafts.

26. Then numerous arrows shot from the bow of Drona, and adorned with golden wings, piercing through the bodies of elephants and young steeds, stuck themselves on the ground, with feathers crimson with blood.

27. Then the field of battle, being covered over with fallen bands of warriors, (shattered) chariots and carcasses of elephants and horses mangled with arrows, appeared like the firmament overhung with dense masses of black clouds.

28. Then Drona desirous of the prosperity of your sons, having in battle trampled down the divisions led by the grandson of Sini, Bhima, and Arjuna and having crushed the son of Subhadra, and the king of the Panchalas and the ruler of the Kasis, and many other warriors,

29. And having achieved these and other wondrous feats in battle, O foremost among the Kurus, that high-souled one, Drona, left this world for heaven, after having consumed this earth like the sun that rises at the time of the world's annihilation, O monarch.

30—36. Having achieved these great feats of valour, that chastiser of hostile armies, that possessor of a golden car, that hero, who had killed in battle hundreds of thousands of the soldiers of the Pandavas, was himself slain by the son of Prishata. Having slain more than two Akshauhini of unreturning heroes, that Drona of (unrivalled) intelligence, at last attained to the highest state of existence. O monarch, having achieved these most difficult feats, that one of a golden car was slain by the Pandavas and the Panchalas of inauspicious and heartless of deeds. When the preceptor was slain in battle, O king, a loud roar of all creatures as also of the warriors filled the sky. The loud cry of 'O fie' uttered by creatures arose in the welkin resounding through the earth, the heavens and the interval between them, and the cardinal and the subsidiary quarters. Then all the celestials and the Pitris, and the friend of the mighty car-warrior Bharadwaja (Drona), saw him slain in battle. The son of Pandu having obtained victory gave forth roars resembling those of a lion ; and the (foundation of) the earth shook with those loud leonine roars of theirs.

Thus ends the eighth chapter, the audition of the account of Drona's death, in the Dronabhisheka of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER IX.

(DRONABHISHEKA PARVA)—

Continued.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. What was Drona doing when the Pandavas and the Srinjayas slew him in battle,—he who was so skilful in the use of weapons amongst all wielders of arms ?

2. Did his chariot give way ? Did his bow snap in two in the act of smiting ? Did Drona go mad, and for that reason met with his death ?

3—5. O son, how was it that the son of Prishata, the prince of the Panchalas, slew that invincible hero, who scattered thick shower of arrows decked with golden wings, who was (wonderfully) light-handed ; that foremost of the regenerate who was proficient in everything, thoroughly familiar with all modes of warfare, and capable of shooting his shafts to a long distance ; who was self-controlled, skilful in the use of weapons, and blessed with the possession of celestial weapons, that mighty warrior who performed many dreadful feats and who was ever heedful in fight ?

6. Since that heroic Drona was slain by Parshata of illustrious soul, it is evident, I think, that Destiny is more powerful than exertion.

7. In that mighty warrior, the knowledge of all the four kinds of weapons was present. Do you say to me that that Drona, that preceptor of all wielders of arrows and weapons is slain ?

8. Hearing the death that hero of golden car covered over with tiger-skins, whose effulgence was like that of gold, I cannot to-day discard my grief.

9. Surely, O Sanjaya, no man ever dies through sorrow caused by another's calamity ; since I, unfortunate as I am, am still alive having heard of Drona's death.

10. I do consider Destiny to be, by far, the superior ; and exertion is of no avail. Surely my heart is so hard as if it were made of adamant,

11—13. Since it does not break into hundred pieces, although I have heard of the slaughter of Drona. How could he had been struck by death, on whom the Brahmanas and the princes danced attendance being desirous of receiving lessons in the Vedas and in divination, and in the use of bows. I can not even conceive the fall of Drona which is like the drying up of the ocean, the removal of the Meru mountain and the dropping of the lustrous orb from the heavens. He was the represser of the wicked and the protector of the pious.

14—15. That afflicter of enemies, who has sacrificed his life for the pitiable Duryodhana, on whose prowess rested the hope of victory of my wicked sons, who was equal to Vrihaspati and Usanas in intelligence,—how could he have been slain ? His stout chestnut-coloured steeds, decked with golden trappings,

16. Fleet as the wind, yoked to his car, beyond the reach of all weapons in battle, endued with great strength, emitting neighs (in joy), well-trained, of the Sindhu breed, excellently dragging the chariot,

17. Of great sturdiness, were exhausted in the very midst of the fight ? Unmoved in battle by the sight of the elephants as those huge monsters roared out with the sound of conchs and kettledrums,

18. By the twangs of bow-strings, and showers of arrows and other weapons, foretelling victory over enemies (by their mere appearance), of inexhaustible breath, and indefatigable,

19. Those fleet horses harnessed to the car of the son of Bharadwaja, were they over-powered? Even such steeds were yoked by that foremost of human heroes to his golden car.

20. Why could he not cross the ocean of the Pandava army, mounted on his own best of cars effulgent like gold?

21. What feats did that son of Bharadwaja achieve in battle, who made all the heroes cry, and on whose knowledge of weapons all the bowmen in the world depend?

22—23. What feats did Drona perform in battle, Drona who was endued with great strength and was ever devoted to truth? What car-warriors felled in battle Drona of fierce deeds, that foremost of bowmen, that foremost of commanders who was like Sakra himself in heaven? Did the Pandavas fly on all directions seeing him of the golden car,

24—25. Him endued with great might who invoked in the battle many celestial weapons? Did the very virtuous king Yudhisthira, with his younger brothers, and his army having the prince of the Panchalas for its reins, encompass Drona on all sides? Surely Partha checked the career of other car-warriors with his straight-going arrows.

26. Then, of course, the son of Prishata, that perpetrator of evil deeds, assaulted Drona. Indeed I do not see any one capable of bringing about the death of Drona,

27—29. Save the fierce warrior Dhristadyumna supported by Arjuna himself. I think that when these heroes namely the Kekayas, the Chedis, the Karushas, the Matsyas, and the other rulers of earth, encompassing the preceptor hemmed him in on all sides, like ants pressing upon a serpent, and that when he was occupied in the achievement of some difficult feat, then the vilest among the Panchalas must have slain him. He who, having studied the four Vedas along with their auxiliaries, and the Histories constituting the fifth Veda,

30—31. Became the refuge of the Brahmanas as the ocean is that of the rivers, that afflicter of enemies who led the life both of a Brahmana and a Kshatriya, how could that Brahmana, venerable in years meet his death through weapons. Intolerant in spirit, he was ever humiliated, and had to undergo troubles for my sake.

32—33. Through the son of Kunti he reaped the fruits of his own actions however undeserving he might have been of them. How could that one, on whose feats of valour depends the world of bowmen, who was ever devoted to truth, and of pious deeds, who was foremost like the Sakra in heaven, who was endued with great vigours and strength, how could that one be slain by persons hankering after prosperity?

34. How could that one of great lightness of hand, endued with might, a firm wielder of bow and the grinder of his foes, how could that one be slain by the sons of Pritha like a timi slain by the smaller fishes?

35. He, meeting whom no person desirous of victory, ever returned with life, he whom when alive the following two sound never left, namely,

36. The sound of the recital of Vedic verses, by those desirous of acquiring Vedic knowledge, and the twang of the bowstrings, caused by those wishing to acquire skill in bowmanship; he who was never depressed, who was the foremost among men, and was ever attended with prosperity and was invincible,

37—38. He who was equal to the elephant and the lion in prowess, even he has been slain! I can not even tolerate the thought of Drona's death. How, O Sanjaya, the son of Prishata, slew in battle that most invincible hero whose might was never checked and whose fame was never soiled even before the very eyes of the foremost of men? Who were those persons who fought in Drona's front, and protected him from near?

39. Who were they who brought up his rear and obtained that end which is so difficult of being attained? Who were they that covered the right and the left wings of that high-souled one?

40. Who went before him when that hero fought in the battle? Who were they that courted death that stood face to face to them regardless of their body?

41—44. Who were those heroes that attained the highest state of existence, in the battle with Drona? Did those vile Kshatriyas entrusted with the protection of Drona, out of apprehension, abandon him in (the thick of) the fight? Was he slain by the foe while there helpless? Out of fear Drona would never turn his back on the field of battle, though the danger might be very great. How could he have been slain by the enemy? O Sanjaya, although in a very critical situation, an illustrious person should do this, namely, display his prowess to the best of his might; all this was in Drona. O son, my mind is loosing consciousness; refrain for a while from this discourse. O Sanjaya, regaining my consiousness, I shall again question you.

Thus ends the ninth chapter, the grief of Dhritarastra, in the Dronabhisheka of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER X.

DRONABHISHEKA PARVA—
Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Thus having questioned the son of Suta, Dhritarastra, sorely oppressed with the sorrow of his heart and despondent of the victory of his sons, dropped down on the ground.

2. Seeing him unconscious and fallen down on the ground, the attendants sprinkled him with very cold and holy-scented water, fanning him all the while.

3. Beholding that great king fallen down, the Bharata ladies surrounded him on all sides, and began to chafe him (gently) with their hands.

4. Then those beautiful ladies, with their voices choked up with the vapour of grief, gently raised the monarch from the surface of the earth, and placed him on his throne.

5. Placed on the throne, the monarch overwhelmed by the influence of the swoon, remained motionless, while he was fanned from all sides.

6. Slowly regaining consciousness, that ruler of earth began to quake, and he again questioned the son of Gavalgani, of the Suta tribe, regarding the events of the battle, as they occurred.

Dhritarastra ssid:—

7—9. That Ajatasatru (Yudhisthira) who like the rising sun drives away darkness by his own radiance, who (charges an enemy), like a tremendous and infuriated elephant in rut, incapable of being defeated by a rival leader of herds, charging a rival proceeding with cheerful face towards a female of the species, what great warrior of of my host faced that Ajatasatru, as he charged, in order to keep him away from Drona? That foremost of men, that hero, who has slain in battle many brave warriors,

10. That mighty-armed, intelligent and and brave hero of invincible might, who, single-handed, can consume the whole host of Duryodhana by means of his terrible glances,

11. That destroyer by his glances, that one ever inclined to gain victory, that wielder of bow, that hero of eternal renown, that self-controlled warrior held in high respect by the whole world—what warriors of my army did surround that hero?

12. Who were those warriors of my host that encountered that irrepressible prince, that wielder of bow, that hero of unfading glory, that foremost of men, that son of Kunti?

13—14. That hero who rushing with headlong speed charged Drona, who achieves grand feats at the expense of the enemy, that most puissant one of gigantic stature and great vigour, who equals ten thousand elephants in strength,—what warriors surrounded that Bhimasena as he charged my army?

15. As that mighty car-warrior of excessive energy, Vibhatsu, resembling a dense mass of rain-clouds, came, creating terrible sounds like the clappings of the thunder-bolt, like Parjanya itself

16. Showering torrents of arrows like Indra showering rain, and causing the cardinal quarters to reverberate with the sound of his palms and rattle of his chariot-wheels,

17. (When that terrible hero) whose bow was effulgent like a flash of lightning, whose chariot resembled a cloud having for its thunder the rattle of its wheels, (that hero) the whizz of whose arrows made him all the more fierce,

18—20. Whose ire is like a dreadful cloud, who is fleet like the mind or the wind, who always pierces the enemy to the very core of his heart, who, armed with shafts, is dreadful to gaze at, who profusely fills all the cardinal quarters with human blood like Death himself, who, with a terrific roar and a dreadful countenance, wielding the Gandiva, pours, in one continuous shower, on the head of my warriors led by Duryodhana, shafts whetted on stone and decked with the feathers of vultures,—when that intelligent Vijaya came, what became the state of your mind?

21. When that son of Pritha bearing the device of the foremost of apes on his banner, came, overspreading the sky with his shower of shafts, what became the state of your mind at the sight of him?

22. Did Arjuna rush to battle, killing your warriors by the very twang of his bow Gandiva, and achieving dreadful feat (as he advanced)

23. Did Dhananjaya deprived you of your lives with his arrows, like the hurricane scattering masses of gathering clouds, or felling forests of reed by blowing through them?

24. What man is powerful enough to encounter the wielder of the Gandiva bow in battle? Even hearing him to be on the head of the (hostile) array, all ranks of soldiers give way.

25. In that battle, in which soldiers trembled and even heroes were inspired with fear, who were they that did not forsake Drona, and who were those mean fellows that fled out of terror?

26. Who were they that, in that battle, shunning this mortal coil, courted Death standing before them in the shape of Dhananjaya who had obtained victory even over superhuman combatants?

27. My warriors cannot withstand the impetus of that one having white horses harnessed to chariot, nor can they bear the twang of the Gandiva, that resembles the rumbling of clouds in the rainy season.

28. I consider that chariot which has Vishaksena for its driver, and Dhananjaya for its warrior, to be unconquerable even by the celestials and Asuras united together.

29. Delicate, youthful, brave, of a handsome appearance, that son of Pandu who is intelligent, skilful, accurate in his memory, of prowess incapable of being thwarted, in battle,

30. When that Nakula giving forth a loud roar and afflicting the whole army, rushed upon Drona, what warriors tried to check his career?

31. When Sahadeva, resembling an infuriated snake of mortal poison, rushed at Drona, afflicting his enemies, when that one owning white horses and incapable of being conquered in battle,

32. When that one of illustrious vows, of never-failing aim, of bashful nature and invincible prowess, when that Sahadeva charged, who were those heroes that withstood him?

33. That hero who having completely crushed the army of king Souvira, took for his consort the desirable princess of the Bhojas and graceful in limbs of the body,

34. That foremost of men Yuyudhana who is ever endued with truthfulness, resoluteness, bravery, and Brahmacharyya,

35. That warrior possessed of great physical strength, who always does what is true, who is never depressed, and who is invincible, and equals Vasudeva in battle and is considered to be a second Vasudeva,

36. Who, by the teachings of Dhananjaya has become foremost in the act of using arrows, who is equal to the son of Pritha in the use of weapon, what warrior of my army kept him away from Drona?

37. That foremost hero among the Vrishnis, that bravest among all wielders of bow, who is equal to Rama himself in the use of weapons, in glory and in prowess,

38. That one of the Satwata race in whom there are truth, firmness, intelligence, prowess, the knowledge of the Vedas, and the most excellent weapons, as the triune world is in Kesava himself,

39. That mighty champion who is endued with all virtues, and who is incapable of being opposed even by the celestials, what warriors (of my army) approaching him, surrounded him on all sides?

40. That foremost among the Panchalas, that hero of noble extraction, and a favourite of all high-born persons, always achieving excellent feats in battle, namely Uttamaujasa,

41. That one ever intent on doing good to Dhananjaya, and born for doing evil only to me, who resembles Yama, or Vaisravana, or Aditya, or Mahendra, or Varuna,

42. That prince renowned as a great car-warrior, and ever ready to sacrifice his life in the very thick of battle, what heroes of my army surrounded him?

43. That one who alone deserting the Chedis had sided with the Pandus, namely Dhristaketu, what heroes surrounded him when he advanced towards Drona?

44. That heroic Ketumat, who slew the Prince Durjaya when he took shelter in Girivraja, what hero of my army kept him (Ketumat) away from Drona?

45—46. What warriors of my army encountered Sikhandin when he rushed at Drona—Sikhandin, the foremost of men, who has realised the pleasures (in himself) of manhood and femininity, that son of Jajnasena, who is ever cheerful in battle, and who became the cause of the death of the high-souled Devavrata in battle?

47. That most excellent hero among the Vrishnis, that foremost of all wielders of bow, that hero, in whom reside all virtues even in a greater degree than in Dhananjaya himself,

48. In whom always exist truth, (the knowledge of) the best weapons, and Brahmacharyya, who is equal to the son of Vasudeva in prowess, and to Dhananjaya in strength,

49. Who resembles Aditya in effulgence, Vrihaspati in intelligence—namely, the high-souled Abhimanyu who is like Death himself with a gaping mouth,

50. What heroes surrounded him when he advanced towards Drona? That youthful hero of unripe understanding, that slayer of hostile heroes, namely Subhadra's son, 51—52. When he charged Drona, what became the state of your mind then?

When those foremost of princes, the son of Draupadi, in battle rushed at Drona like streams flowing towards the ocean, what heroes obstructed them? Those boys, who having abandoned all boyish sports, for twelve years,

53. And observing excellent vows danced attendance on Bhima in order to receive lessons in the use of weapons, those boys, namely Kshatranjaya, Kshatradeva, Kshatravarma, and Manada,

54. Those heroic sons of Dhristadyumna, what warriors kept them away from Drona? That one whom the Vrishnis consider superior in battle to hundred warriors,

55. That mighty warrior Chekitana, what hero of my army tried to keep him away from Drona? The five Kekaya brothers, virtuous and endued with prowess incapable of being thwarted,

56. Resembling the Indragopakas (in complexion), furnished with red armours and weapons and banners, those heroes who are the sons of the sister of the Pandavas' mother and who ever long for the victory of the Pandavas,

57—60. What heroes of my army surrounded them when they assaulted Drona with a view to kill him? That lord of battles, desirous of slaying whom the enraged monarchs united together for six months in Varanavata could not defeat, that best of all wielders of bows, that hero of great strength and unerring aim, that foremost of men, Yuyutsu, who in a battle in Varanasi, overthrew from his car with a broad-headed shaft, the great warrior the son of Kasiraja, desirous of siezing a maiden, what hero kept him away from Drona? That mighty warrior Dhristadyumna, that principal counslleor of the sons of Pritha,

61—62. Who is ever engaged in doing harm to Duryodhana, who has been created to slay Drona, what warriors of my side surrounded him, when consuming in battle all warriors, and shattering all the ranks of my soldiers, he advanced towards Drona? That foremost of all men conversant with the weapons, who has been reared, as it were, on the very lap of Drupada,

63. That Sikhandin, guarded by Arjuna's weapons, what warriors of my army kept him away from Drona? That one who, as if with a leathern belt, encompassed this extensive earth,

64—66. With the deafening rattle of his chariot, that foremost of warriors, the chief of all slayers of enemies, who in lieu of other sacrifices accomplished ten horse-sacrifices with ample food, drink and Dakshina, that one who ruled his subjects, as if they were his own sons, that son of Usinara who in his sacrifice gave away kine as numerous as the sand that overspread the banks of the Ganges-stream, whose this deed no man has been or will be able to imitate;

67—69. After the accomplishment by him of this feat, the very gods had exclaime saying 'We do not see in the three worlds with all their mobile and immobile creations, a second person save Usinara's son, who has attained to regions, after death, which are unattainable by human beings'—who amongst my warriors, opposed that Saivya, that grandson of the Usinara's son, while he assaulted Drona?

70. What warriors of my host obstructed that squadron of cars, belonging to Virata, the king of the Matysas, the slayer of his enemies, as it careered towards Drona?

71. That one endued with great strength and prowess, born of Vrikodara in the course of a single day, that heroic Rakshasa of potent illusive powers, of whom I entertain great apprehension,

72. Who is always desirous of victory for the sons of Pritha, who is a thorn in the sides of my sons, what hero of my army kept that Ghatotkacha of gigantic body away from Drona?

73. O Sanjaya, what cannot be vanquished by them for whose interests these and other such numerous (heroes) are ever ready to sacrifice their lives in battle?

74. Those sons of Pritha, whose well-wisher and refuge is that wielders of Saranga bow, those sons, how could they suffer defeat in battle?

75. The son of Vasudeva is the supreme preceptor of the worlds, the Lord of all and the Eternal; that master Narayana, that one of divine soul is the refuge of men in battle.

76. His divine achievements are extolled by the wise; I shall also recite them with reverence, regaining my equanimity.

Thus ends the tenth chapter, the words of Dhritarastra, in the Dronabhisheka of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XI.

(DRONABHISHEKA PARVA)—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. Hear, O Sanjaya, of the celestial feats of the son of Vasudeva,—feats which Govinda achieved and which no other person has ever been able to achieve.

2. While he was being reared in the family of the cowherds, that illustrious one, even in his early years, made the might of his arms, O Sanjaya, known to the three worlds.

3. (Even then) he slew the Asura Haya-raja (prince of steeds) who was equal to the Uchaisravas in might and the wind itself in fleetness, and who infested the woods on the shores of the Yamuna.

4. In his early years, he killed with his two arms only, the Danava in the form of a bull, of terrible deeds and born as Death himself to the cows.

5. He of eyes resembling lotus petals, also slew the great Asuras, named, Pralamva, Naraka, Jamva, Peeta, as also, Mura of god-like nature.

6. Also Kansa of great vigour who was protected by Jarasandha himself, was slain with his followers, in battle, by Krishna with his prowess alone.

7—8. The mighty sovereign of the Surasenas, by name Sunaman, of great prowess in battle, the master of a complete Akshouhini, endued with activity and the second brother of Kansa the ruler of the Bhojas, with all his soldiers, was consumed in battle by that slayer of enemies, viz., Krishna with Valadeva as his second.

9. That highly passionate Brahmanical sage, by name Durvasa, was adored by him (Krishna) along with his wives. The sage (pleased with him) accorded boons to him.

10. That one of eyes resembling lotus petals, that most puissant hero, (Krishna), carried away the daughter of the king of the Gandharas, after having defeated, at a Sayamvara (Self-choice), all the rulers of the earth.

11. Like horses, those exasperated kings were harnessed to his bridal chariot, and lacerated with the cut of his whip.

12. That Janarddana, through the instrumentality of another, slew Jarasandha of mighty arms, the lord of a complete Akshauhini.

13. That puissant one, slaughtered, like a beast, the king of the Chedis, that powerful leader of kingly hosts, when the latter disputed with him about the (sacrificial) Arghya.

14, Madhava, by his prowess, hurled into the bosom of the sea, the fortress of the Danavas known as Soubha, situated in heaven, protected by Salwa and considered to be invulnerable.

15. He obtained victory in battle over the Angas, the Bangas, the Kalingas, the Magadhas, the Kasis, the Kosalas, the Vatsyas, the Gargas, the Karushas and the Poundras,

16. The Avantyas, the Southerners, the Mountaineers, the Daserakas, the Kashmirakas, the Auroshikas, the Pishachas, the Samudgalas,

17. The Kamvojas, the Vatadhanas, the Cholas, the Pandyas and, O Sanjaya, the Trigarttas, the Malavas, the Daradas incapable of being defeated,

18. The Khasas and the Sakas, comfrom various directions, and the Yavanas with their followers,—that one of eyes resembling the petals of a blue lotus, conquereed all these tribes in battle.

19. In days gone by, entering into the abode of the sea-monster Makara, he defeated in battle Varuna, surrounded by all kinds of sea-animals, and hidden underneath watery depths.

20. Hrishikesha obtained the celestial conch called Panchajanya, after having slain in battle Panchajana, who lived in the nether regions.

21. That puissant hero, obtained his indomitable weapon of fire, the discus (Sudarsana),by propitiating Hutasana (Fire) by helping it to burn down the Khandava forest, in which act he was assisted by the son of Pritha (Arjuna).

22. Riding on the son of Vinata, and creating quite a panic in the city of the Immortals, that hero carried away the Parijata tree from the abode of the great Indra.

23. That act Sakra submissively brooked, for he was perfectly acquainted with the prowess of Krishna. We have never heard of a king who has not been worsted by Krishna (in battle).

24. That most marvellous act, which he achieved in my assembly hall, O Sanjaya, who else, save that one of eyes resembling lotus petal, is capable of doing?

25. Since inspired by reverence I have heen able to recognise Krishna as the Lord, every thing in the Vedas is well-known to me and is before my eyes.

26. Verily, O Sanjaya, none can reach the end (of the account) of achievements of Hrishikesha who is endued with prowess, and intelligence.

27. Then also Gada, Samva, Pradyumna, Viduratha, Agaboha Anirudha, Charudeshna along with Sarana,

28. Ulmuka, Nisata, the powerful Jhilhivobhru, Prithu, Viprithu, Somika and Arimejoya,

29. These and other most puissant Vrishni heroes, skilled in the art of smiting, will, standing on the field, betake to the ranks of the Pandava host,

30. Being called to do so by that foremost of Vrishni warriors, viz., Keshava of high soul; then me-seems, everything (on my side) will be in great dangers.

31. The heroic Rama, decked with garlands of wild flowers, equal in strength to two thousand elephants, resembling the peak of the Kailasa mountain and armed with the plough, will be there where Janarddana is.

32. That son of Vasudeva, whom all the regenerate ones call the Father of all, O Sanjaya, will battle for the interests of the sons of Pandu?

33. When that one, O son, O Sanjaya, clothes himself in mail for the interests of the Pandavas, none will come forth as his antagonist.

34. If, per chance, the Kurus obtain victory over the Pandavas then that one of the Vrishni race, for the interests of these latter will take up his excellent weapon (the discus).

35. Then that foremost of men, that mighty-armed hero, having slain in battle the Kauravas and the (assembled) monarchs will offer the whole earth to Kunti.

36. What other car can encounter in battl, that car of which the driver is Hrishikesha and the warrior is Dhananjaya?

37. In any way, I do not see victory for the Kurus. Recount to me then, all as to how the battle raged.

38. Arjuna is the soul of Kesava, and Krishna is the soul of the diadem-decked (Arjuna). In Arjuna victory ever resides, and eternal glory is in Krishna.

39. In all the regions, Vibhatsu is unconquerable. All virtues are in Kesava in an extraordinary degree.

40. Duryodhana, through foolishness cannot recognise Krishna or Kesava; he is befooled by Destiny and the noose of Death hangs over him.

41. Duryodhana knows not Krishna of the Dasarha race, and Arjuna the son of Pandu; they both are supreme Divinities, of high soul, known on earth as Nara and Narayana.

42—44. On earth they appear to men as two different persons, though in reality they are of one and the same soul. That highly-renowned invincible pair, can with the fiat of their will slay this host, if only they wish it. But for humanity's sake, they do not wish it. O son, the slaughter of Bhisma and Drona, of high souls, appears to be like the overturning of the Yuga and the stupefaction of the senses. In this world neither by Brahmacharyya, nor by the study of the Vedas,

45. Nor by the performance of rites, or by the dint of weapons, can any one be saved from Death. Those two heroes, held in high honour by the worlds, accomplished in the use of weapons, and invincible in battle,

46. Namely, Bhisma and Drona,—hearing of their death, why do I, O Sanjaya, still live? That prosperity, seeing which attend Yudhisthira before, we were so jealous,

47. To-day, deprived of that prosperity, we shall have to live, in consequence of the death of Bhisma and Drona. This complete annihilation of the Kurus has come consequent upon my actions.

48. For the destruction of those, O you of the Suta caste, who are ripe for it, even the straw behave like a thunder-bolt. In this world Yudhisthira is going to obtain prosperity which is infinite,

49. Yudhisthira, through whose wrath Bhisma and Drona have met their ends. Righteousness has naturally attached itself to Yudhisthira, while it is hostile to the cause of my sons.

50. Time so cruel, that [illegible] for destroying every one, cannot be overcome! O son, things calculated in one way even by intelligent persons,

51. Result in an altogether different way, through the agency of Destiny; this is my belief. Therefore relate to me truly all that occurred, on the advent of that dreadful but enevitable calamity (the death Drona), generating most grieving thoughts, and incapable of being crossed over by us.

Thus ends the eleventh chapter, the lamentation of Dhritarastra, in the Dronabhisheka of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XII.

(DRONABHISHEKA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Alas! I shall relate to you everything, as I saw with my own eyes, how Drona fell being slain by the Pandus and the Srinjayas.

2. The mighty car-warrior, the son of ...adwaja, having been installed as the ...mander of the army, said these words ... your son, in the very midst of the ...oldiers.

3. " O monarch, in as much as, to-day ...u have honoured me with the generalship ... this army, immediately after that fore-...most of the Kouravas, the son of the river (Ganga),

4. O Bharata, reap the adequate fruit of that act of yours. What desire of yours shall I fulfil now? Ask whatever boon you may like?"

5. Thereupon king Duryodhana, accompanied by Karna, Dussasana and others, thus spoke to the invincible preceptor, the foremost of all victors.

6. "If you would at all accord me a boon, then having captured that foremost of car-warriors, Yudhisthira alive, do you bring him to me."

7. Thereupon the preceptor of the Kurus hearing these words of your son, spoke the following words, thereby imparting great delight to the troops.

8. "Fortunate is the king, the son of Kunti, whose capture only you desire. O invincible one, you do not ask for any other boon, such as his slaughter.

6. Why, O foremost of men, do you not desire his slaughter? For what reason do you not allude to his death? Surely O Duryodhana, you are not wanting in policy.

10. It is wonderful that the virtuous king Yudhisthira should have none deadly inimical to him. As you desire him to live, either you intend to preserve your own race,

11. Or, O foremost of the Bharatas, having defeated the Pandavas in battle, you desire to re-establish brotherly feelings (with them), by giving them back their kingdom.

12. Praised be that king the son of Kunti. The birth of that intelligent one was auspicious. The fact of his being Ajatasatru (having no enemy) is verified to-day, in as much as even you are affectionate towards him."

13. O Bharata, when your son had been thus addressed by Drona, the feeling that was then present in his heart, suddenly ...ound vent.

14. Even beings like Vrihaspati himself ...nnot suppress the outward manifestations ...ernal feelings. Therefore, O monarch, ... transported with joy, spoke these

15. "On the event of the death of the son of Kunti in battle, O preceptor, victory cannot be mine. If Yudhisthira were to be slain, Partha is sure to slay all of us.

16. Even the immortals cannot slay all of them in battle; so he that will survive the rest of them is sure to extirpate us all.

17. If Yudhisthira, ever truthful to his promises, be brought here alive, he being once more defeated at dice, the Pandavas obedient to him, will again repair to the woods.

18. In this way, it is obvious, that my victory will endure for a long time. It is for this that I do never desire the death of the virtuous king Yudhisthira."

19. Being apprised of his crooked intentions, Drona of keen intellect and conversant with the science of polity, accorded the boon to him after a little reflection, modifying it thus.

Drona said :—

20. "If in battle, the heroic Arjuna does not protect king Yudhisthira, then you may already regard the foremost of the Pandavas, brought under your control.

21. Even the celestials with Indra at their head, and united with the Asuras themselves, can not cope with Partha in battle; for this reason, O son, I do not venture to advance against him.

22. No doubt, he is my disciple, and I am senior to him in the use of weapons. But he is youthful, blessed with a good fortune, and assiduous in (the execution of) his intents.

23. Moreover, he has obtained weapons from Indra and Rudra; besides he has been, O king, incensed by you. It is for these reasons, that I venture not to perform what you ask me to do.

24. Withdraw Arjuna from the battle by what means so-ever that can be done. On Partha being removed, the righteous Yudhisthira is as good as vanquished by you.

25. O foremost of men, victory depends on his capture, and not on his death; and his capture can be brought about by this artifice.

26. I, having siezed that king devoted to truth and righteousness, will, O monarch, no doubt, bring him under your control to-day,

27. Provided, he remains even for a moment before me in battle; of course, if that foremost of men, the son of Kunti Dhananjaya be removed from the field of battle.

28. But, O king, before the eyes of Phalguna, Yudhisthira cannot be captured in battle, even by the celestials and the Asuras exerting jointly with Indra at their head."

Sanjaya said :—

29. When under these circumscriptions, Drona had promised the capture of king Yudhisthira, your greatly-foolish sons regarded the latter as already seized.

30. Your son was perfectly aware of the partiality Drona cherished for the Pandavas; so to make Drona strictly redeem his promise, Duryodhana gave publicity to that counsel.

31. Thereafter, O grinder of your foes, Drona's promise regarding the seizure of amongst the eldest of the Pandavas, was proclaimed all his soldiers by Duryodhana himelf.

Thus ends the twelfth chapter, the granting of a boon by Drona, in the Dronabhisheka of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XIII.

(DRONABHISHEKA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When Drona had promised the capture of the king under these limitations, your soldiers, hearing of the probable capture of Yudhisthira,

2—3. Uttered many loud shouts like the roars of lions, accompanying them with the noise of their (flying) shafts and the sound of their conchs. The virtuous king Yudhisthira, O Bharata, was soon apprised, in detail, of everything regarding the purposes of the son of Bharadwaja, by his trusty emissaries. Thereupon having summoned together all his brothers and the other monarchs of his host,

4. The very righteous king addressed these words to Dhananjaya :—"O foremost of men, to-day you have heard of the design of Drona.

5. Adopt such course of action, as will prevent the execution of that design. True it is that Drona the destroyer of his foes, has pledged his oath with certain limitations;

6. But those limitations, O mighty warrior, have been all made dependent on you, by him (Drona). Therefore, O mighty-armed one, do you this day fight by my side, so that Duryodhana may not secure the fruition fo his desire through the agency of Drona."

Arjuna said :—

7. As, the slaughter of my own preceptor can never be perpetrated by me, so also, O monarch, I can never agree to abandon you.

8. Rather, O son of Pandu, I would give up my life in battle, than be antagonistic to my preceptor, at any time.

9. Having captured you in battle, the son of Dhritarastra, desires to possess the kingdom; but in this world of living beings, he will never obtain the fruition of his desire.

10. The conclave dome with the stars may drop down; the earth itself may be shattered to pieces; yet Drona will never capture you, so long as I live.

11. Even if the wielder of the thunderbolt himself, or Vishnu accompanied by the the celestials, assists him in battle, still, he shall never capture you in battle.

12. O foremost of monarchs, so long as I am alive, you need not entertain any apprehension from Drona the foremost of all wielders of weapon or any body else.

13. Moreover, O foremost of kings, I say that my resolution is decided. I never think of purjuring myself; I never think of my defeat. I never think of keeping the least part, of any vow I may take, unredeemed.

Sanjaya said :—

14. Thereupon, O monarch, in the camp of the Pandavas, chonchs and drums and Mridangas together with the Anakas, were simultaneously sounded.

15. There arose also loud shouts, like the roar of lions, uttered by the high-souled Pandavas; and the deafening sound resulting from the twang of their bow-strings and the striking of their palms against their arms, reached the very skies.

16. Hearing that blare of the conchs sounded by the highly-puissant sons of Pandu, your soldiers in their camp struck up various instruments.

17. Thereafter, O Bharata, your, as well their, divisions were formed into battle-array; and slowly they advanced desirous of encountering one another in battle.

18. Then raged a dreadful and hair-stirring battle, between the Pandavas and the Kurus, as also between Drona and the Panchalas.

19. Struggling to the best of their endeavours, to slay the divisions of the Srinjayas could not accomplish their [purp]ose, as the divisions were protected by [Drona] himself.

[2]0. So also the car-warriors of your [so]n's host, skilful in smiting down the enemy [cou]ld not vanguish the Pandava division [protected] by the diadem-decked Arjuna himself.

... Protected by Drona and Arjuna [respecti]vely, the two armies, appeared to [be st]ill like two blossoming forests, in the [silence o]f the night.

... Then, O monarch, that one (Drona) [on] the golden car like the sun him[self in ra]diance, crushing hosts of the Panda[vas, careere]d at will through its various divi[sions].

... [The]n the Pandavas and the Srin[jayas consi]dered, through fright, that single [warrior,] mounted on a swift-moving car [of grea]t activity in battle, as multiplied ...

... [dre]adful shafts shot by him, whizzed in all directions, terrifying, O monarch, the army belonging to the son of Pandu.

25. Drona then appeared like the mid-day sun burning with a hundred light rays that drew out the perspiration from the body.

26. O Bharata, as the Danavas were unable to look at the great Indra, so none among the army of the sons of Pandu, was able to look at his wrathful self (Drona) in battle.

27. Then that most puissant son of Bharadwaja, stupefying the whole host, speedily blew off the division of Dhristadyumna with his sharpened arrows.

28. Obstructing the points of the compass, and overspreading the whole welkin with his straight-going shafts, Drona commenced crushing the division of the Pandava host, even at the place where the son of Prishata was.

Thus ends the thirteenth chapter, the solemn declaration of Drona to capture Yudhisthira, in the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XIV.

(DRONABHISHEKA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then Drona creating great confusion [amo]ng the ranks of the Pandava host, [roame]d ... under foot, like a forest-confla[gration burnin]g down trees.

2. The Srinjayas began to tremble with fear, seeing that enraged hero of the golden car (Drona), consume their division like a raging conflagration.

3. In that battle, they heard the twang of the constantly stretched bow of that warrior of great activity,—twang that resembled the rumbling of the thunder.

4. Terrible shafts shot by that one of great lightness of hands, completely crushed car-warriors and cavalry and elephants horses and infantry,

5. At the expiration of the Summer, like the rain-cloud, assisted by the strong gale, showering its contents, Drona, pouring streams of iron-tipped arrows, struck terror into the hearts of his enemies.

6. Then, O king, that puissant one careering through the troops of the enemy and agitating them, aggravated their fears.

7. Like flashes of lightning traversing dense masses of clouds, his bow of golden effulgence, was repeatedly seen to flash in his whirling car that resembled a mass of cloud itself.

3. That hero, ever devoted to truth, endued with intelligence, and ever firm in righteousness, then caused a dreadful river with swelling currents, to flow there, that appeared like the one seen at the end of a Yuga ;

9.. That had its origin in the flow of Dronas wrath ; that was infested with numerous carnivorous animals ; that was filled with waves consisting of the troops ; that ate away the trees (standing on its banks) consisting of heroic warriors ;

10. That had blood for its waters, cars, for its eddies, elephants and horses for its banks, armours for its rows of lotuses, and flesh for the mire filling its bed ;

11. That had, fat, marrow and bones, for its beaches, and excellent head-gears for its froth ; that had the raging encounter for the cloudy canopy over its surface, and the split lances for the fishes that abounded in it ;

12. That was inaccessible in consequence of the corpses of large number of men, elephants and horses ; that flew in strong currents constitued by the impetus of the shafts ; that had the slain bodies for logs of timber floating on it ; that swarmed with tortoises constitued by cars ;

13. That had heads for pebbles scattered on its banks ; that had scimitars for the fishes abounding in it ; that had elephants and chariots for its lakes ; that was adorned with may ornaments ;

14. That had mighty car-warriors for its hundred little whirlpools; that was ornamented with little wavelets constituted by the dust of the earth; that was capable of being crossed over in battle by those endued with great prowess, and incapable of being crossed by the cowards;

15. That had heaps of corpses obstructing its navigation; that was haunted by Kankas, and vultures; that carried, by thousand, mighty car-warriors to the regions of Death;

16. That was infested by snakes consisting of the (broken) spears; that abounded in aquatic fowls consisting of living fighters, that had torn umbrellas for its large swans, and (fallen) diadems for its smaller birds;

17. That had wheels (or discs) for its turtles, and maces for its sharks, and arrows for its smaller fishes; that was resorted to by fearful swarms of crows, vultures and jackals;

18. And, O foremost of kings, that bore in hundreds to the regions of the ancestral manes, beings slain by the powerful Drona in that battle,

19. That was choked up with heaps of dead bodies; that had hair for its mosses and weeds. O monarch, such a river Drona caused to flow, that enhanced the apprehension of the cowards.

20. Then all those divisions having Yudhisthira at their head, assaulted on all sides that mighty car-warrior Drona who had been uttering loud shouts.

21. Then all your heroic troops endued with steady prowess received (unflinchingly) that rushing army on all sides; the result was horripilating.

22. Sakuni. conversant with hundred kinds of deceitful practices, encountered Sahadeva, piercing the latters charioteer, chariot and flag-staff with sharpened shafts.

23. Thereupon the son of Madri, wrought up with ire, cut down with his arrows, the standard, bow, charioteer, and steeds of the son of Suvala, and then pierced the latter with sixty shafts.

24. Thereupon the son of Suvala, grasping a mace, jumped down from his best of cars; then with the stroke of his mace, he felled, O king, the driver of Sahadeva, from his chariot.

25. Then, O monarch, those two heroic mighty warriors deprived of their cars, armed with their clubs, began to roam in the field of battle like two mountains adorned with peaks.

26. Drona, having pierced the king of the Panchalas with ten swift-going (was, in return, pierced by him with n shafts; and he then again pierced latter with a still larger number of arrows

27. Bhimasena pierced Vivinsati w twenty keen-pointed shafts; but b so pierced, he did not tremble; and t indeed marvellous.

28. But, O mighty sovereign, suddenly deprived Bhimasena of h standard and bow; and then t highly applauded him.

29. But the latter did not tol act of prowess achieved by his in battle; and then with his mac the excellently-trained horses of

30. Then like an infuriate rushing at an infuriated rival, Vivinsati, grasping a buckler, ju from his car the steeds of which slain, and assaulted Bhimasena.

31. The heroic Salya, pierced, smilingly, his own dear nephew Nakula, as if in dalliance, with arrows, in order to excite the latter's wrath.

32. But the mighty Nakula, cutting down, in that battle, Salaya's steeds, umbrella, standard, charioteer and bow, blew his conch.

33. Dhristaketu having sundered in twain various shafts shot by Kripa, pierced the latter with seventy arrows; and then with three more cut off the device on Kripa's standard.

34. Thereupon Kripa encompassed him with a mighty shower of arrows; thus holding Dhristaketu in check, the Vipra fought on with him, in battle.

35. Satyaki pierced Kritavarman in the middle of his breast with a Naracha; then again piercing him with seventy arrows, he drove many more inside the latter's body laughing all the while.

36. The warrior of the Bhoja race, then pierced Satyaki with seven and seventy keen-pointed arrows; but he failed to move the latter like the fleet wind failing to move the mountain.

37. Senapati sorely pierced Susarman to the very quick. The latter also struck the former on the shoulder-joint with a Tomara (or lance),

38. King Virata, with the highly puissant Matsyas, oppossed in battle the son of Vikartana. And there raged a wonderful combat.

39. Then a great feat was a the son of the charioteer, whe quickly formed Drona's support, out of a ...ire for capturing Yudhisthira. Thereupon a dreadful fight ensued.

Thus ends the nineteenth chapter, the fight of Arjuna, in the Samsaptaka-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XX.

(SAMSAPTAKA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O monarch, the mighty car-warrior, the son of Bharadwaja, having passed the night, thus addressed Sujodhana saying :—'I am yours.'

2. Having made arrangements for Partha's encounter with the host of the Samsaptaka, (you have done well).' When the son of Pritha had gone out to slay the Samsaptaka,

3. Drona, having formed his soldiers in battle-array, charged the mighty host of the Pandavas, O foremost of the Bharatas, with the desire of capturing the very virtuous king Yudhisthira.

4. Beholding the son of Bharadwaja, form his forces in an array figuring the appearance of Suparna, Yudhisthira disposed his forces in counter-array in the shape of a semi-circle.

5. The mighty car-warrior, the son of Bharadwaja himself formed the mouth of the Suparna ; and king Duryodhana along with his uterine brothers and his followers formed its head.

6. Kritavarman and the effulgent Goutama formed its two eyes ; Bhutasarman, Kshemasarman, the puissant Koraskatsha,

7. The Kalingas, the Singhalas, the Easterners, the Sudras, the Ahiras, the Kamvojas, as also the Hansapadas,

8. The Sur isenas, the Madras, the Kekayas, the Daradas, with hundreds and thousands of elephants, steeds, chariots, and foot-soldiers, formed its neck.

9. Bhurisrava, and Salya, Somadatta as also Vahlika, these heroes surrounded by a Akshouhini of soldiers stationed themselves in the right flank.

10. Vinda and Anuvinda of the kingdom of Avanti, and Sudakshina ... badge ruler of the Kam... ...ions in the ... When that fierce and panic... ing battle was thus raging, Drona confound-warriors and mighty elephants slew other elephant.

38. And in a moment a dreadful battle raged between elephants bearing raised standards and their powerful rivals rushing at them.

39. And in consequence of those prodigious creatures rushing against one another and tearing another with their tusks, fire and smoke were engendered there by such friction of bodies and clashing of tusks.

40. Deprived of the flag-staffs on their backs, those elephants, owing to the fire enkindled by the friction of their tusks, appeared like masses of clouds charged with lighting covering the skies.

41. The earth, over-spread with dragging (their rivals) and falling and roaring elephants, appeared like the autumnal clouds.

42. There arose a roar, emitted by those elephants when they were being slaughtered by showers of shafts and spears, that resembled the rumbling of clouds during a cyclone.

43. Some of those huge elephants being struck with arrows and some with lances, were inspired with panic, and others began to roar aloud.

44. Some elephants being struck by a keen- others with their tusks gave out fierce roars of distress that resembled the rumbling of all-destructive clouds (at the end of a Yuga).

45. Some elephants turned back by powerful rivals, being urged on by the strokes of the hooks, again returned to the charge, crushing the hostile ranks (in their march).

46. Elephant-drivers assaulted other elephant-drivers with shafts and lances ; and they fell down on the ground from their respective elephants and lost hold of their weapons and hooks.

47. Many elephants, deprived of the riders on their backs, coursed wildly hither and thither resembling clouds torn from prodigious masses, and they fell down, encountering one another.

48. Bearing on their backs slains and fallen warriors or those whose weapons had fallen off their grasps, huge elephant roamed in all direction as if deprived of their mates.

64. When that fierce and panic-inspiring battle was thus raging, Drona confound-earth suddenly quaked and emitted loud sound.

51. The ground, strewn with mangled elephants and their drivers and with broken standards appeared as if it were covered over with hills.

52. In that battle elephant-drivers riding on their respective beasts, and their beasts torn with broad-headed shafts by car-warriors of might, fell scattering their lances and hooks on all sides.

52. Other elephants, smitten with long-shafts, gave forth crane-like cries and ran on all sides, crushing friends and foes alike.

54. Strewn with carcasses and corpses of elephants, horses, car-warriors and heroes, the field, O monarch, became miry with flesh and blood.

55. Huge cars with wheels and without wheels and having their riders on, were thrown up by elephants, being smashed with the point of their tusks.

56. Cars without riders, steeds deprived of their riders, and elephants having their drivers slain, ran in all directions being overwhelmed with panic.

57. In that battle, father slew his son and son slew his father; thus raged the fierce fight in which nothing could be distinguished.

58. In that gory mire men sank ankle-deep; and they looked like mighty trees the lower portion of which were enveloped in a forest conflagration.

59. Their garments and coats of mail and umbrellas and standards being steeped in blood, everything in that battle appeared to be crimson.

60. Large bodies of fallen steeds and car-warriors and men were again hacked into pieces by rolling car-wheels.

61. That sea of troops appeared vested with a terrible beauty, having elephants for its strong currents, slain warriors for its (floating) moss, and (shattered) cars for its fearful eddies.

62. Warriors desirous of the wealth of victory launching into that sea on board the vessels consisting of their respective vehicles, produced stupefaction in their enimies instead of themselves sinking down to the bottom.

93. When all the warriors having proper individual devices (of heraldry) were covered over with showers of arrows, none among them lost heart, though every body was deprived of his particular badge.

64. When that fierce and panic-inspiring battle was thus raging, Drona confounding the senses of his enemies, at last rushed at Yudhisthira.

Thus ends the twentieth chapter, the fierce fight, in the Samsaptaka-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXI.

(SAMSAPTAKA-BADHA PARVA)

continued

Sanjaya said:—

1. Seeing Yudhisthira approach him, Drona received him with a continuous downpour of arrows, like one undaunted.

2. Thereupon a very great confusion arose in the army of Yudhisthira which resembled that which prevails in a herd of elephants when the leader is attacked by a lion.

3. Then the heroic Satyajit of prowess invincible, beholding Drona the preceptor desirous of capturing Yudhisthira, rushed at him with fury.

4. Then the war-like Acharyya and the prince of the Panchalas fought with one another, agitating the armies hostile to each, like Indra and the son of Virochona.

5. Then the mighty warrior Satyajit of prowess invincible, displaying excellent weapons, pierced Drona with a keen-pointed shaft.

6. Thereafter he discharged at the charioteers of Drona, five arrows deadly as the venom of snakes, and each resembling Death himself. (Struck by those arrows) the charioteer lost all consciousness.

7. Then he suddenly pierced Drona's horses with ten swift-going-arrows. Thereafter wrought up with ire, he pierced the two Parshni-drivers of Drona with ten shafts each.

8. Then at the head of his division, he wheeled in circular motion riding on his chariot. Then filled with rage he cut down the flag-staff of Drona, the grinder of foes.

9. Then that crusher of foes, Drona, seeing these feats of his enemy in battle, thought in his mind that his (foe's) hour was come.

10. Then having severed the bow of his enemy Satyajit along with arrows placed on it, the preceptor Drona pierced him with ten whetted shafts capable of penetrating to the very vitals.

11. Thereupon that puissant hero (Satyajit), O monarch, having speedily grasped another bow, struck Drona with thirty arrows furnished with Kanka-feathers.

12. Beholding Drona thus resisted in that battle by Satyajit, O monarch, the Pandavas shouted forth and waived their garments.

13. Inflamed with warth, the mighty Vrika pierced Drona on the chest with six shafts. O king, that feat appeared, indeed, marvellous.

14. Then that mighty car-warrior Drona endued with great speed, being completely covered by an arrowy downpour, put forth all his energy causing his eyes to expand with rage.

15. Thereafter Drona, having cut asunder the bows of Satyajit and Vrika, killed the latter along with his driver and horses, with six shafts.

16. Thereafter Satyajit having taken up a bow still tougher, pierced Drona, along with his steeds, drivers and standard, with several shafts.

17. Humiliated in battle by the prince of the Panchalas, Drona was no longer able to brook it; then for the destruction of his enemy, he speedily shot shafts at him.

18. Then pouring arrows by thousands, Drona covered the steeds, the standards, the handle of the bow and the two Parshni-drivers of his enemy.

19. Inspite of his bows being thus repeadly cut off, the prince of the Panchalas conversant with the knowledge of excellent weapons, continued to fight with him of the chestnut steeds (Drona).

20. Then beholding Satyajit swell with energy in that battle, Drona with a half-moon-shaped arrow, severed the head of that one of illustrious soul.

21. When that mighty car-warrior the leader of the Panchalas was slain, Yudhisthira being afraid of Drona, fled away, being borne by fleet steeds.

22. The Panchalas, the Kekayas, the Matsyas, the Chedikas, the Karusas and the Kosalas, desirous of rescuing Yudhisthira, rushed at Drona with delight.

23. Thereupon, the preceptor, the crusher of large bodies of foes, desirous of capturing Yudhisthira, consumed those troops like fire consuming heaps of cotton.

24. Then Satanika the younger brother of the king of the Matsyas, seeing Drona repeatedly consume the divisions, rushed at him.

25. Then deeply piercing Drona and his charioteer and steeds, with six shafts effulgent like the rays of the sun and polished by the forgers, Satanika uttered loud shouts.

26. Engaged in a heartless act and attempting to accomplish a difficult one, he covered the mighty car-warrior the son of Bharadwaja, with an arrowy down-pour.

27. Then Drona, with a shaft like a razor speedily severed from his trunk, the head graced with ear-rings, of Satanika thus roaring at him. Thereat all the Matsyas took to their heels.

28. Having vanquished the Matsyas, the son of Bharadwaja obtained victory over the Chedis, the Karusas, the Kekayas, the Panchalas, the Srinjayas, and the Pandus.

29. Beholding that one of the golden car, endued with bravery, excited with wrath, consume their divisions like fire burning down a forest, the Srinjayas trembled.

30. The twang of the bowstring of that one of great activity was heard in all directions, when he stretched his bow to slay his enemies.

31. Fierce arrows, discharged by that one endued with great lightness of hands, crushed elephants and steeds and foot-soldiers, car-warriors and warriors riding on elephants.

32. As at the expiration of the Winter, mighty masses of thundering rain-clouds assisted by violent winds, pour down showers of rain, so Drona pouring showers of arrows, struck terror into the hearts of his opponents.

33. That puissant hero, that mighty warrior, that giver of assurances of safety to his friends, traversed in all directions, agitating the host of the enemy.

34. The bow of golden effulgence of Drona of immeasurable prowess was seen in all directions, like flashes of lightning illumining the clouds.

35. As he careered with speed in that battle, the device of an altar decorating his banner, O Bharata, appeared like the crest of the Himalayas.

36. Drona caused a dreadful carnage among the host of the Pandavas, like that which Vishnu the revered of all the celestials and the Asuras, caused among the host of the latter.

37—43. That hero of truthful speech endowed with great wisdom and strength, and endued with invincible prowess, that Drona of generous heart, created a river on the field of battle, that was dreadful and capable of enhancing the fear of the cowards. Armours constituted its bellows, and standards its whirlpools; and it carried away a large number of mortals as it flowed. Elephants and horses formed its great alligators and swords were its fishes, and it was incapable of being tided over. It was terrible-looking and the bones of heroes formed the peblebs (in its bed) and drums and cymbals its tortoises. Shields and armours constituted its boats and the hair of warriors the moss and weeds that floated over it. Shafts constituted its wavelets, and bows its currents; and it abounded in snakes formed of the arms of warriors. It was of fierce current and carried away the Kurus and the Srinjayas alike. The heads of human beings formed its stones, and their thighs its fishes, and the maces its rafts; it was covered with froth formed of head-gears, and was infested with reptiles formed of the entrails (of animals) of awful appearance; it carried away heroes (to the other world); its mire was constituted by flesh and blood. Elephants were its alligators and standards the trees (on its banks). It drew down in its bottom thousands of Kshastriyas. It was fierce, clogged with corpses, and had horse-soldiers for its sharks; and it was extremely difficult of being crossed over! and it flowed to the regions of Death.

44. That river swarmed with hosts of monsters and dogs and jackals. It was haunted by cannibals of dreadful appearance on all sides.

45. Thereupon seeing that mighty car-warrior Drona consume their hosts like the god of Death himself, the Pandava warriors headed by the sons of Kunti, rushed at him from all sides.

46. Firmly united together, those heroes surrounded Drona on all [sides who was burning down every thing, like the sun scorching the world with his rays.

47. Then for supporting that heroic warrior, with upraised weapons, your warriors, princes and monarchs, rushed (into the thick of the fight).

48. Then Sikhandin pierced Drona with five straight-jointed shafts, Kshatradharma with twenty, and Vasudeva with five.

49. Uttamoujas in that battle, pierced him with three shafts, Kshatradeva with five, Satyaki with hundred and Yudhamanyu with eight.

50. Yudhisthira pierced Drona with a dozen shaft,and Dhristadyumna pierced him with ten and Chekitana with three shafts.

51. Then Drona of never-failing aim and resembling an elephant with rent temples, passing over the car host of the Pandavas, felled Dhirasena.

52. Then getting near king Kshema, who was fighting fearlessly, Drona pierced him with nine arrows, and he fell down dead from his chariot.

53. Penetrating into the heart of the (hostile) host, resisted in all directions, he became the protector of all others, and had no need of protecting himself.

54. He then struck Sikhandin with twelve arrows and Uttamoujas with twenty shafts. And with a broad-headed arrow he despatched Vasudeva to the regions of Death.

55. With eighty shafts he pierced Kshemavarman, and with twenty-six he struck Sudakshina. With broad-headed shafts he brought down Kshetradeva from the terrace of his car.

56. Having pierced Yudhamanyu with sixty-four shafts and Satyaki with thirty, that one owning the golden chariot rushed at Yudhisthira with violence.

57. Then that foremost of kings Yudhisthira speedily fled away from the preceptor being borne by his fleet steeds. Then the prince of the Panchalas charged Drona.

58. Drona struck him along whith his horses, charioteer and bow. Then from his car he fell down dead like a luminary dropped from the heaven.

59. Upon the death of that renouned prince of the Panchalas, loud cries of 'kill Drona, kill Drona' were herd there.

60. Then that puissant Drona began to crush the host of the Panchalas, the Matsyas the Kekayas, the Srinjayas, the Pandavas, all burnrng with rage.

61. Satyaki, Chekitan, Dhristadyumn and Sikhandin, Vardakshemi, the son of Chitrasena and Senavindu, and Suvorcha.

62. These and numerous other rulers of different countries, were all defeated by Drona who was supported by the Kurus.

63. O Monarch, your warriors having been crowned with victory in that dreadful battle began to slaughter the Pandavas as they were flying in all directions.

64. O Bharata, the Panchalas, the Kekayas, and the Matsyas, thus slaughtered on all sides, like the Danavas by Indra, began to quake (with fear).

Thus ends the twenty-first chapter, the fight of Drona, in the Samsaptaka-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXII.

(SAMSAPTAKA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. When in that fierce fight, the son of Bharadwaja had shattered the host of the Pandavas and the Panchalas, did any one else approach him for battle?

2—5. Alas, seeing Drona stationed in battle, like an yawning tiger or an elephant with rent temples, prepared to sacrifice his life in fight, clad in coat of mail, proficient in all modes of warfare, that illustrious bowman, that foremost of men, that producer of apprehensions in his enemies, grateful, devoted to truth, always desirous of doing good to Duryodhana,—alas seeing him stationed at the head of his forces, did any one meet him with a praiseworthy determination for fight,—determination that invests Kshatriyas with renown, that cowards can not form, and that distinguishes the foremost of men? Relate to me, O Sanjaya, who were those heroic warriors, that encountered the son of Bharadwaja, seeing him stationed at the head of his army?

Sanjaya said :—

6. Seeing the Panchalas, the Pandavas, the Matsyas, the Srinjayas, the Chedis and the Kekayas, fly from the field having been broken in their ranks by the shafts of Drona,

7. Seeing them thus routed by those thick showers of swift-falling arrows discharged from the bow of Drona, like frail barks driven adrift by the surging bellows of the mighty main,

8. The Kouravas uttering many loud war-cries, and with the sound of many other musical instruments, impeded the flight of the chariots, the elephants and the men (of the hostile host) on all sides.

9. Beholding them (the routed army), king Duryodhana standing in the midst of his own troops and surrounded by his own kinsmen greatly delighted, smilingly said these words to Karna.

Duryodhana said :—

10. Behold, O son of Radha, the ranks of the Panchalas shattered by the shafts of Drona, the resolute bowman, like a herd of wild deer frightened by a lion.

11. Meseems they will never again seek to fight, in as much as they are now broken by Drona like mighty trees broken by the tempest.

12. Afflicted by the gold-winged shafts of the illustrious Drona, they are flying away by diverse paths; and they seem to whirl round and round.

13. Impeded by the Kouravas and by the high-souled Drona, they are huddling together, like a herd of elephants encompassed in a conflagration.

14. Like a tree penetrated by a cluster of bees, they are being pierced by the keen-pointed arrows of Drona; they are huddling together as they are hastening away from the field of battle.

15. O Karna, there the highly enraged Bhima, forsaken by the Pandavas and the Srinjayas, and surrounded by my own warriors, affords great joy to me.

16. With certitude, that fool to-day beholds the world full of Drona. Surely that son of Pandu has to-day become hopeless of his life and his kingdom.

Karna said :—

17. Never will this mighty-armed hero abandon fighting so long life will remain in him; nor will this foremost of men brook the war-cries of others.

18. I think also, that the Pandavas, brave, endued with might, learned in the use of weapons, and invincible in battle, will never be routed in battle.

19. Remembering the woes inflicted on them by our attempts at poisoning and burning them, and by our defeating them at dice, as also bearing in mind the hardships they had to undergo in their exile in the woods, the Pandavas, I think, will never abandon battle.

20. Already the mighty-armed Vrikodara of immeasurable prowess, has turned back; this son of Kunti will now certainly slay many foremost of our car-warriors.

21. He will slay crowds upon crowds of our host, using his sword, bow, darts, iron mace, and horses, elephants, men and chariots as implements for striking.

22. Car-warriors headed by Satyaki, and the Panchalas, the Kekayas, the Matsyas, and specially the Pandavas, are following him (in battle).

23. Those mighty car-warriors, brave, endued with strength and prowess, are again urged on to battle, by the wrathful Bhima.

24. Those foremost of the Kurus desirous of supporting Vrikodara, are surrounding Drona on all sides, like the clouds surrounding the sun.

25. Inspired with a singleness of purpose, they will surely afflict the unprotected Drona of resolute vows, like flights of insects about to die afflicting a burning lamp.

26. Accomplished in the use of weapons, certainly they are capable of encountering the son of Bharadwaja. I consider the burden now devolving on him to be very heavy.

27. Let us then swiftly repair to the spot ere Drona is stationed. Let not the Pandavas slay Drona, like a pack of wolves slaying a mighty elephant.

Sanjaya said :—

28. O monarch, hearing the words of the son of Radha, king Duryodhana, with his brothers rushed where the car of Drona was.

29. Then there arose a mighty uproar caused by the Pandava warriors, who actuated by the desire for slaying the unsupported Drona had all returned to the field, riding on best steeds of various colours.

Thus ends the twenty-second chapter, the fight of Drona, in the Samsaptaka-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXIII.

SAMSAPTAKA-BADHA PARVA—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. Describe to me, O Sanjaya, the distinctive marks of the cars of all those heroes, who, wrought up with rage and headed by Bhima, then rushed at Drona.

Sanjaya said :—

2. Seeing Vrikodara rush into battle, (on a car drawn by steeds of chappled hue) the heroic grandson of Sini advanced, being borne by steeds of the colour of silver.

3. Inflamed with ire, the invincible Yudhamanyu proceeded towards the car of Drona, being borne by excellent steeds of variegated hue.

4. The son of the ruler of the Panchalas, namely Dhristadyumna, proceeded, being borne by steeds of great fleetness caparisoned with gold trappings and of the hue of pigeons.

5. Desirous of supporting his father (Dhristadyumna) and wishing his complete success, Kshatradarman of regulated vows followed (in a car drawn by chestnut steeds).

6. Kshastradeva, the son of Sikhandin, himself urging well-trapped steeds of the hue of lotus-leaves, and with pure white eyes, advanced towards Drona.

7. Steeds of the Kamvoja breed beautiful to look at and decked with the feathers of the Suka bird, bearing Nakula, quickly made against your army.

8. O Bharata, delighted steeds of the colour of clouds, inflamed with rage, bore Uttamoujasa to battle against the invincible Drona who was standing with arrows fixed (on the bow-string.)

9. Steeds of the fleetness of wind and of variegated hue, carried Sahadeva with uplifted arms to that dreadful battle.

10. Steeds of the hue of the tusks of elephants, of the fleetness of wind, of black mein and of great impetuosity, carried king Yudhisthira, the foremost of men.

11. Riding on horses caparisoned with gold trappings, and all fleet as the wind, many warriors followed Yudhisthira.

12. After king Yudhisthira, came Drupada, the ruler of the Panchalas, with a golden umbrella held over his head and himself protected by all those soldiers.

13. That mighty warrior among all monarchs, namely, Santabhi, advanced, borne by excellent steeds capable of putting up with every noise.

14. Accompanied by various mighty car-warriors, Virata speedily followed him. The Kekayas, and Sikhandin, and Dhristakstu.

15—17. Surrounded by their respective forces, followed the king of the Matsyas. Excellent steeds of the colour of trumpet-flowers bearing this latter, appeared very beautiful. Fleet steeds decked with golden chains and resembling turmeric in colour, appeared highly beautiful as they carried the son of that slayer of foes, namely, Virata the royal chief of the Matsya. The five Kekaya brothers were borne by horses of crimson colour.

18. All these heroes accomplished in battle, having complexions effulgent like gold, owning standards of red hue, and bedecked with golden chains,

19—20. Were seen, clad in mail, and showering arrows, like the clouds showering (torrents of) rain. Steeds of the hue of ivory and that of unbaked earthenware pots, carried Sikhandin, the Panchala prince of immeasurable energy. In all, twelve thousand mighty car-warriors of the Panchala race proceeded in battle.

21. Of these twelve thousands, six thousand followed Sikhandin. O sire, the son of Sisupala, the foremost of men,

22. Was borne by sportive steeds of the hue of antilopes. Dhristaketu, the foremost of the Chedis, endued with great prowess,

23—24. And invincible in battle, was carried by horses of Kamvoja breed and of variegated hue. Excellent steeds of the Sindhu breed, of beautiful limbs and of the colour of the smoke emitted by burning straws, quickly bore the prince of the Kekayas, namely, Vrihatkshastra. Possessed of eyes of the hue of jasmine, of lotus-hue, of Valhika breed, and decked with gold trappings, such steeds

25. Bore the heroic son of Sikhandin viz., Kshatradeva. Decorated with caparison of gold, and of the hue of silk, steeds,

26. Of quiet nature, bore into battle Senavindu, that chastiser of foes. Excellent steeds of the colour of cream, carried into battle the youthful,

27—28. Delicate and mighty car-warrior, the son of the king of the Kasis. White horses, having black necks, and endued with the fleetness of the mind, and obedient to the (reins of the) driver, O monarch, bore prince Prativindhya. Steeds of the hue of the Masa flower carried in battle Sutasoma, the son of Partha, whom the latter had obtained through (the favour of) Soma.

29. Of the radiance of a thousand Moons, he was born in the city of the Kurus, known as Udayendu. In as much as, in an assembly of the Somas he won great renown, he came to be styled Sutasoma.

30. Steeds, resembling the flower of the Sala in hue, and radiant like the rising sun, bore the glorious son of Nakula, by name Satanika.

31. Decked with caparisons of gold, and possessed of the hue of the peacock's neck, steeds bore in battle, that foremost of men Srutakarman, the son of Droupadi (by Bhima).

32. Excellent steeds of the colour of the feathers of the kingfisher, carried into battle, Srutakirti, the son of Droupadi, who was equal to Partha in his knowledge of the Srutis.

33. Tawny-coloured steeds bore in battle prince Abhimanyu, who is said to be one and a half time superior in battle to both Krishna and Partha.

34. Huge-bodied steeds bore to battle Yuyutsu, who alone, among the sons of Dhritarastra, had sided with the Pandavas, (deserting his own brothers).

35. Steeds, plump, decked with golden caparisons, and of the hue of the stalk of paddy, bore to that dreadful battle, Vardhakshemi of great activity.

36. Steeds, having black legs, caparisoned with golden breast-plates, and obedient to the driver, bore to battle, the youthful Souchithi.

37. Quiet steeds of the hue of red silk, decked with chains of gold and having their backs covered with armour of the same metal, bore Srenimat.

38. Crimson steeds bore the assaulting Satyadhriti, who was proficient in the sciences dealing with the use of weapons and the bow and also in the divine Vedas.

39. He that was the commander of the Panchala forces, and that considered Drona to be the victim destined to fall by his hand, that Dhristadumnya was borne by steeds of the hue of pigeons.

40. Satyadhriti and Souchithi both irrepressible in battle followed him, as also Srenimat, Vasudana, and Vibhu the son of the ruler of Kasis.

41. These were borne by fleet steeds of the best Kamvoja breed, decked with chains of gold. Resembling Yama, or Vaisravana, they proceeded striking terror into the hearts of his enemies.

42. The Pravadrakas of the Kamvoja country, six thousand strong, with uplifted arms, with excellent steeds of various hues, with gold-decked standards mounted on their cars,

43. With their stretched bows discharging arrows that produced confusion in the hostile host, and with a determination to die together, followed Dhristadyumna.

44. Excellent steeds of the hue of yellow silk, decorated with beautiful chains of gold cheerfully bore Chekitana.

45. Borne by excellent steeds of the best breed, and of the colour of rainbow, came Kuntibhoja or Purujit the maternal uncle of Savyasachin.

46. Steeds of the appearance of the star-studded firmament, bore king Rochamana to battle.

47. Steeds of the colour of the red deer having white stripes all over their body, bore the prince of the Panchalas, the son of Gapati, by name Singhasena.

48. Excellent steeds of the hue of the mustard flowers belonged to that foremost among the Panchalas, who was well known as Janamejaya.

49. Fleet, huge-bodied steeds of the hue of Masa, decked with gold chains, with backs white like the hue of curds and faces beautiful like the moon, speedily bore the ruler of the Panchalas.

50. Brave and gentle steeds resembling reed-stalks, and of the hue of the palms of the lotus, bore Dandadhara.

51. Steeds, of the hue of donkeys, with backs of the hue of mice, and with necks proudly drawn up, bore Vyagradatta.

52. Dark-spotted steeds, decorated with beautiful garlands, bore that foremost of men Sudhanwan, the prince of the Panchalas.

53. Steeds of the impetuousity of Indra's thunderbolt, of the hue of the Indragopakas, and variegated with patches, bore Chitrayudha.

54. Decorated with golden garlands, and having bellies of the hue of the Chakravaka, steeds bore the son of the ruler of the Kosalas, by name Sukshatra.

55. Excellent and tall steeds, of huge bodies, variegated hue, exceedingly docile and caparisoned with golden chains, bore Satyadhriti accomplished in battle.

56. Sukla proceeded to battle with standards, armours, bow and steeds, all of the same white colour.

57. Ocean-bred steeds of the hue of the moon, bore Chandrasena of fierce energy, the son of Srudrasena.

58. Steeds of the hue of the blue lotus, and decked with ornaments of gold, and adorned with beautiful garlands of flower, bore to battle Saiva owning a beautiful chariot.

59. Excellent steeds of the hue of the Kalaya flower, covered with red and white stripes, bore to battle Rathasena difflcult to be repressed in battle.

60. Steeds of the hue of the blue parrot, bore that king who had slain the Pattacharas, and who was regarded as the best hero among all men.

16. Superior steeds of hue resembling that of the Kinsuka flowers, bore Chitrayudha, decorated with beautiful garlands, and owning beautiful armour, weapons and standard.

62. King Nila proceeded to battle, with standards, armour, bow and steeds, all of the same blue colour.

63. Chitra advanced to battle, with car-fence and standard and bow, all set with various kinds of gems, and with excellent steeds and beautiful banners and banner-staffs.

64. Excellent steeds that resembled in colour the hue of the Puskara flower, bore Hemvarna the son of Rochamana.

65. Mettled chargers of gentle appearance, possessed of vertæbral columns erect like reed-stalks, having white testes and endued with the colour of the hen's eggs, bore Dandaketu.

66—70. The heroic Sarangadwaja endowed with the wealth of energy, the ruler of the Pandyas, mounted on chargers of the colour of the moon-beams, and clad in coats of mail set with lapises, rushed at Drona stretching his bow of superior make. His dominions having been invaded, and his relatives having escaped, his sire had been slain, O monarch, in battle by Krishna; securing weapons then from Bhisma, Drona, and Rama, and Kripa, he became, in the use of weapons, equal to Rukmi, Karna, Arjuna and Achyuta. He then became intent on destroying the city of Dwaraka, and on subjugating the whole world. But his wise friends out of a desire to do good to him, prevented him from that course. Abandoning all thoughts of revenge, he is now ruling his own dominions.

71. Steeds of the hue of the Atarusha flower bore one hundred and forty thousand foremost car-warriors who followed that king of the Pandya.

72. Chargers of various hues and appearance and stature and face, bore the heroic Ghatotkacha, the device on whose banner was a car-wheel.

73. Setting at naught the opinions of the assembled Bharatas, that prince who alone out of his reverence for Yudhisthira had sided with him abandoning all his cherished hopes,

74. That mighty-armed Vrihanta of red eyes was borne by huge-bodied, greatly powerful steeds, as he sat in his chariot.

75. Excellent steeds of the hue of gold followed behind the virtuous Yudhisthira, that foremost of kings, as he advanced on his car.

76. Hosts of the Pravadrakas of divine appearance, proceeded to battte, on superior chargers of various beautiful colorus.

77. All of them possessing golden standards, full of energy and accompanied by Bhimasena, appeared, O monarch, like the celestials headed by Indra.

78. Dhristadyumna liked that assembled host very much. But the son of Bharadwaja, excelled the rest of the warriors in splendour.

79. O monarch, his standard, with a black deerskin fluttering from its top and bearing the beautiful waterpot, and made of the finest gold, appared exceedingly beautiful.

80. The standard of Bhimasena bearning the device of a mighty lion in silver, with two eyes of the lapis lazuli, appeared highly resplendent.

81. The standard of Yudhisthira endued with great energy bearing the emblem of the golden moon surrounded by the planets, looked exceedingly charming.

82. Two prodigious Mridangas of celestial make called Nanda and Upanandaka were tied to it. Struck by machanical arrangements, they emitted melodies that enhanced the joy of all.

83. For striking terror into the hearts of the enemy, we saw that tall and fierce standard of Nakula, mounted on his car, that bore the device of Sarabha having golden back.

84. On the standard of Sahadeva, was seen a charming swan of irrepressible might made of silver, decked with bells and banners, and capable of enhancing the grief of the enemy.

85. The standards of the five sons of Draupadi bore as their device the beautiful images of Dharma, Maruta, Sakra, and of the twin Aswins of high-soul.

86. On the car of the youthful Abhimanyu, O monarch, there was a standard of best make, bearing the device of a golden peacock, which was as radiant as molten gold.

87. O monarch, the device of a vulture enhanced the beauty of the standard of Ghatotkacha; his steeds had the power of ranging everywhere at will, like those of Ravana in days of yore.

88. In the hands of Yudhisthira was the bow called Mahendra of celestial make; the celestial Vyavya was, O king, in the hands of Bhimasena.

89. For preserving the triune world Brahma had created a bow; that bow of celestial make and ever indestructible, was in the hands of Phalguna.

90. The Vaishnava bow was wielded by Nakula and the bow Aswina by Sahadeva; the Poulasta of terrible appearance and celestial make, was held by Ghatotkacha.

91. O Bharata, these five jewels of bows, namely the Rudra, the Agneya, the Kouveryya, the Yamya and the Girisha were held by the five sons of Droupadi.

92. That foremost of bows of best make called Rudra which the son of Rohini had obtained, that bow was given, out of delight, to the high-souled son of Subhadra, by Rama.

93. These and many other standards, decked with gold, of heroic warriors were seen there, that enhanced the grief of the foes.

94. Then, O monarch, the host led by Drona, which abounded in myriads of standards and which numbered not a single coward, looked like images painted on canvas.

95. Then in that battle we heard, O monarch, the names and lineage of various heroic warriors, as they rushed at Drona, like to what is heard at a Swayamvara.

Thus ends the twenty-third chapter, the description of standards &c, in the Samsaptaka-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXIV.

(SAMSAPTAKA BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. O Sanjaya, those heroic sovereigns who now returned to the charge, being headed by Vrikodara, were capable of crushing even the host of the celestials themselves.

2. Led by Destiny, man surely engages in any action, and it is through the decrees of Destiny that his various acts are attended with various results.

3. That Yudhisthira, who wandered exiled in the woods, for a long time, wearing matted locks and black deer-skin and who also had to wander incognito,

4. Even that very Yudhisthira is now leading this mighty host in battle! What else but evil, can befall my son through this adverse influence of Destiny?

5. Surely man is born subject to the decrees of Destiny; and so he is compelled by it to do what he does not at all desire.

6. Becoming addicted to the vice of gambling at dice, Yudhisthira reaped great affliction; but now through the agency of Destiny, he has again been united to his supporters.

7. 'To-day the Kekayass are rallying to me; the Kousikas, the Kosalas, the Chedis, the Vangas and others are all betaking to me.

8. All this extensive earth has taken my side, O sire, and not that of the sons of Pritha.' O Suta, these were the words that were spoken to me by the wicked Duryodhana before.

9. Drona, guarded amidst this host of his warriors, was slain by the son of Prisata in battle; what can it be but the decree of Fate?

10. Amidst that royal host how could Death approach that mighty-armed Drona who ever delighted in battle, and who was accomplished in the use of all sorts of weapons?

11. I am plunged in distress and a swoon overwhelms me. Oh, I can not live hearing both Bhisma and Drona slain.

12. O Suta, that which the prophetic Khatwa said to me, seeing me, infatuated with the affection for my son, O sire, everything of that has now overtaken me and Duryodhana himself.

13. It would have been very cruel had I saved the rest of my progeny by abandoning Duryodhana, but then the rest could have lived.

14. The monarch, that abandoning righteousness, pursues interest, is debarred from the enjoyment of felicity and imbibes meanness.

15. O Sanjaya, to-day, when the hump of this kingdom has been crushed, I see that nothing will be left of it, as it has lost all energy (by the death of Drona.)

16. When those two foremost of men, viz. Bhisma and Drona of forgiving nature who used to be our primary support, when they both have been killed, how can any thing remain of this kingdom?

17. Relate to me, in detail, as to how that battle raged; who were they that fought, who assaulted (the enemy) and what mean fellows fled, out of terror?

18. Tell me also what that foremost of car-warriors, namely, Dhananjaya, did? We are much afraid of him and of his brother, Vrikodara, who is our (implacable) enemy.

19. Tell me, O Sanjaya, of the terrible collusion that took place between the Pandava hosts and the remnant of my army, when the former returned to the charge?

20. What also, O sire, was the state of your mind when they returned to the attack. What heroes of our army withstood them on the field of battle?

Thus ends the twenty-fourth chapter, the words of Dhritarastra, in the Samsaptaka-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXV.

(SAMSAPTAKA-BADHA PARVA)

Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When the Pandava host returned to the battle, a mighty apprehension took possession of ourselves covered (by the arrows) like the lustrous rob covered over by a (continuous) mass of rain-clouds.

2. Thick clouds of dust raised by them covered over your army; and our sight being intercepted, we thought Drona to be slain.

3. Beholding those mighty and heroic warriors intent on the perpetration of a very heartless act (i.e., the slaughter of Drona), Duryodhana encouraged his troops without the least delay, saying :—

4. "O rulers of men, do you check the Pandava host, according to your strength energy, and prowess and according to the opportunities that may present themselves."

5. Thereafter your son Durmarsana beholding Bhima near him, fell upon him; and desirous of saving Drona's life, he covered the latter with a downpour of arrows.

6. Wrought up with ire, he assaulted Bhima with his arrows, even like Death himself in that battle. Bhima also pierced him with arrows and thus a fierce combat raged between them.

7. In that battle, heroic warriors endowed with prudence, and accomplished in smiting, being commanded by their leaders withstood their adversaries, disregardful of their kingdom and the fear of death.

8—9. Like one infuriate elephant resisting another, Kritavarman checked the grandson of Sini. That fierce bowman, the ruler of the Sindhus, with his keen-pointed shafts kept the mighty warriors Kshatra varman away from Drona, as the former advanced towards the latter. Kshatravarman cutting down the bow and banner of the ruler of the Sindhus,

10. And excited with wrath, pierced him in his vitals with ten Narachas. Thereupon the ruler of the Sindhus, with an admirable lightness of hand, taking up another bow, 11—14. Pierced Kshatravarman in that battle with arrows, all made of iron. With all his endeavours, Suvahu kept away from Drona, his brother, the mighty and heroic car-warrior Yuyutsu, who was fighting for the Pandavas. Yuyutsu cut off with two whetted and well-tempered and razor-like arrows, the two arms of Suvahu which were wielding the bow and the arrows and which resembled a couple of bludgeons. The ruler of the Madras, resisted king Yudhisthira of righteous soul, that foremost of the Pandavas, like the banks resisting the agitated ocean. Him the righteous king Yudhisthira covered with many shafts capable of penetrating into the very vitals.

15—17. The lord of the Madras piercing Yudhisthira with sixty-four arrows uttered a loud war cry; but while the former was still roaring, with two razor sharp arrows, the foremost of the Pandavas severed his bow and banner. At this the warriors shouted forth (in joy). Then king Valhika also at the head of his army, resisted, with his arrows, king Drupada as the latter was advancing leading a formidable division. Thereat between those two old men supported by their respective army, a fierce encounter raged,

18—21. Which resembled that between two mighty leaders, with rent temples, of two different herds of elephants. Vindha and Anvindua of the Avanti country, at the head of their army, encountered Virata, the ruler of the Matsyas, at the head of his troops, like Indra and Agni encountering the Danava Vali, in the days of yore. Then between the Matsyas and the Kekayas a confused combat raged in which the horses, warriors, the car-warriors and the elephant-warriors fought undauntedly, and which resembled the encounter between the celestials and the Asuras. Bhutakarma, the ruler of the Savas, kept away from Drona, Nakula's son, Satanika, as the latter advanced discharging a net-work of arrows. Thereat the son of Nakula with three well-sharpened Vallas (broaded-headed arrows),

22—26. Made Bhutakarma headless and armless in that battle. Vivinsati checked the heroic Sutasoma endued with prowess, as he was advancing towards Drona discharging innumerable shafts. Sutasoma also excited with anger and clad in mail pierced his uncle Vivinsati with straight-going shafts, and he desisted from attacking the latter. Then Bhimaratha, with six swift-going shafts, made wholly of iron, despatched Salwa together with his steeds and charioteer to the regions of Death. O mighty monarch, the son of Chitrasena resisted your grandson Srutakarman, as the latter rushed at (Drona), being drawn by steeds resembling peacocks. Those two grandsons of yours, of prowess difficult of being checked, desirous of slaying each other,

27—29. Fought admirably with each other for bringing about the success of their respective sire's purposes. The son of Drona, seeing Prativindhya stand before him in that battle, checked him with arrows, in order to do honour to his sire. Wrought up with rage, Prativindhya with whetted shafts pierced him who bore the device of the lion's tail in his banner and who was anxious to serve his father's interests. O foremost of men, like a sower sowing seeds in the sowing season,

30—35. The son of Droupadi, covered the son of Drona with an arrowy downpour. The son of Dussasana resisted the mighty car-warrior Srutakirti, the son of Arjuna by Droupadi, as the latter was rushing at Drona. But that son of Krishna equal to Krishna (in prowess), cutting off with three wellsharpened Vallas, the bow, banner, and charioteer of the former (the son of Dussasana), advanced towards Drona. Lakshmana checked that slayer of Pattachara who is regarded, O king, as the bravest among the two hosts. But the latter, O Bharata, appeared resplendent, having cut off Lakmshana's bow and banner-mark and showering myriad shafts on him. The youthful Vikarna, endued with great intelligence, opposed, in that battle, the youthful Sikhandin, the son of Yajnasena, as he advanced. Thereat the son of Yajnasena covered the former with a net-work of arrows.

36—39. Your son endued with prowess appeared beautiful by defeating that shower of arrows. Angada checked the heroic Uttamaujasa, with a down-pour of arrows, as the latter advanced in that battle against Drona. The awful encounter between those two foremost of men enhanced the delight of all the soldiers as also of them both. The mighty bowman Durmukha endued with prowess, resisted with shafts called Vatsadantas, the heroic Purujit as the latter advanced towards Drona. But this latter struck Durmukha between his two eye-brows with a Naracha.

40—41. Thereupon the countenance of Durmukha appeared charming like a lotus with its stem. Karna checked with an arrowy shower the Kekaya brothers owning crimson standards, as they rushed towards Drona. Greatly afflicted, they also covered Karna with a down-pour of arrows.

42. Karna also covered them repeatedly with showers of arrows. Neither they nor Karna was to be seen being covered over with (clouds of) shafts.

43—46. Their steeds, drivers and standards and cars were all lost to sight being covered with thick arrowy showers. Your three sons, viz., Duryaja, Jaya, and Vijaya resisted the three, viz., king Nila, the ruler of Kasis, and king Jayatsena. Then the fierce combat between them afforded delight to the lookers-on like that between a tiger, a lion, and a wolf on the one side and a bear, a buffalo and a bull on the other side. Kshemadhuri and Vrihanta, these two brothers together wounded with keen-pointed shafts, him of the Satwata race, as he advanced towards Drona in that battle. Then the battle between those brothers and Satyaki became exceedingly wonderful, 47—48. Like that between a lion and a couple of leader-elephants with rent temples in the woods. Excited with wrath the ruler of the Chedis, kept away, by discharging shafts, from Drona, king Ambastha who always delighted in battle. Then Amvastha pierced him with a long shaft that penetrated into his very bones.

49—53. Loosing hold of his bow furnished with arrows, he fell down from his chariot. The generous son of Saradwata namely Kripa, with arrows called Kshudrakas, resisted Vardhakshemi of the Vrishni race, whose very appearance reflected wrath. Then those that saw Kripa and him of the Vrishni race—the heroes accomplished in various modes of warfare—engaged in battle with each other, became absorbed in that encounter, and they could attend to no other action. The son of Somadatta for adding to the glory of Drona, opposed the ever vigilant king Manimanta as the latter rushed towards Drona. Tho son of Somadatta then with great activity, cut off the the latter's bowstring, banner, charioteer, umbrella and flag-staff and felled him from his car. Then the slayer of foes, Yupaketu (owning the devise of a sacrifical stake on his standard) jumping down, with lightness, from the car,

54. Cut off with a best-tempered sword king Manimanta with his steeds, charioteer, standard and chariot. Thereafter remounting his own chariot, and grasping another bow, 55—58. And himself urging his steeds, he began to consume the host of the Pandavas. Vrishasena, a worthy combatant, checked with an arrowy shower, king Pandya who was rushing to batte like Indra rushing after the Asuras for slaying them. With maces, bludgeons, scimitars, axes stones, and other weapons, and with short clubs, mallets, discs, Vindipalas, battle-axes, and with dusts, wind, fire, water, ashes, gravels, straw, trees, afflicting, smiting, breaking, slaying, routing and throwing down, and terrifying the hostile troops, came Ghatotkacha, desirous of getting near Drona.

59. Excited with wrath, the Rakshasa Alumvusha began to strike that Rakshasa (Ghatotkacha) with various kinds of weapons and various implements of war.

60. The encounter that then took place between those two foremost of the Rakshasas, resembled that which took place between Sumeru and the king of the immortals, in days gone by.

61. Good betide you. Thus amidst that dreadful general engagements, hundreds of single combats were fought between the car-warriors, elephant-warriors, horse-warriors and foot-soldiers of your army and theirs.

62. Indeed the battle that then raged between the warriors that were intent on destroying and protecting Drona, indeed such a battle was never seen or heard of before.

63. Many were the combats that were seen raging on that field ; O lord, some of which were dreadful, some worderful and some exceedingly terrible.

Thus ends the twenty-fifth chapter, the description of single combats, in the Samsaptaka-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXVI.

(SAMSAPTAKA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. When the Pandavas returned and when divisions clashed against divisions, how did the warriors of my army and those belonging to the sons of Pritha, endued with activity, fight?

2. What also did Arjuna do to the car-warriors of the Samsaptaka host, and what, O Sanjaya, did the Samsaptakas do to Arjuna in return?

Sanjaya said :—

3. When the Pandavas did return to the charge and when divisions clashed against divisions, your son (Duryodhana) himself at the head of the elephant division, rushed at Bhimsena.

4. Like an elephant challenged by another or like a bovine bull summoned by a rival, Bhimasena, challenged by the king himself, rushed against that elephant division.

5. And, O sire, that son of Pritha, accomplished in battle, and endued with strength of arms, soon shattered that host of elephants.

6. Those elephants, prodigious like mountains, and with ichor exuding from all parts of their bodies, were crushed and compelled to turn back by the Nurachas of Bhimasena.

7. Indeed as a raging tempest tears away a net-work of clouds, so did the son of the Wind (Bhima) shatter that host (of elephants).

8. Scattering arrows on that herd of elephants, Bhima appeared beautiful, like the sun scattering his shining rays on all objects of the world.

9. Afflicted with the shafts of Bhima and bespattered with blood, those elephants looked beautiful like various masses of clouds in the heavens streaked with the rays of the sun.

10. Thereupon Duryodhana excited with wrath, approached and pierced with whetted shafts the son of the Wind who was afflicting his [(Duryodhana's) own division of elephants.

11. Thereat, with blood-red eyes, Bhima within a while, desirous of dragging the king to destruction, began to pierce the latter with winged shafts.

12. Then Duryodhana, covered with arrows on all parts of his body, and wrought up with rage, began to pierce the son of Pandu, viz., Bhimasena, with Narachas of the effulgence of the rays of the sun, laughing all the while.

13. Duryodhana had an (artificial) elephant embossed with gems and jewels as the device gracing his banner; this elephant together with the former's bow, the son of Pandu severed with two Vallas in all haste.

14. Beholding Duryodhana afflicted by Bhima, O sire, the sovereign of the Angas, riding on an elephant, came with a view to afflict Bhima.

15. Seeing that best of elephants make towards himself with a roar resembling the rumble of the clouds, Bhima struck it sore with a Naracha between its two frontal globes.

16. That Naracha, penetrating through the body of the elephant at last struck on the ground. Then that elephant fell like a mountain struck with the thunder-bolt.

17. The Mlechha king who could not extricate himself from the dropping elephant was also falling with it; with an admirable lightness of hand, Vrikodara cut off the head of that monarch.

18. At the fall of the heroic ruler of the Angas, his division fled in all directions. Horses, elephants and car-warriors, seized with panic, began to crush the foot-soldiers in their flight.

19. When that host had been thus broken and routed in all directions, the sovereign of the Pragjyotisas rushed at Bhima, riding on his elephant.

20. With its two forelegs and its trunk contracted and with its eyes rolling and inflamed with fury, that elephant seemed to consume the son of Pandu.

21. It then shattered to pieces the car of Vrikodara together with the steeds harnessed thereto. Thereat running on his legs Bhima hid himself underneath body of the elephant.

22. The son of Pandu did not really fly, for he was acquainted with the science called Anjalikavedha; getting underneath the elephant's body, he began to strike it with his bare arms repeatedly.

23. He began to afflict that elephant that was intent on slaying him; whereupon the elephant began to whirl round like a potter's wheel in rapid motion.

24. Possessed of the might of ten thousand elephants, the glorious Vrikodara, having struck the elephant, came out from underneath its body and stood before Supratika.

25. Holding down Bhima with its trunk, Supratika then struck him with its knees; and winding its trunk round the neck of Bhima, it really tried to kill him.

26. Whirling round Bhimasena freed himself from the twine of the elephant's trunk. Then once more Vrikodara got under the body of that elephant.

27. Then when he saw a rival elephant of his own army make towards the one (underneath which he was standing), Bhima issuing out from under the body of the elephant, ran away with speed.

28. Thereupon a loud cry of 'Alas, Bhima is slain by the elephant' was set up by all the troops, O sire.

29. Frightened by that elephant, the Pandava army suddenly fled, O king, there where Vrikodora was standing.

30. Thereupon, considering Vrikodara to be slain, king Yudhisthira assisted by the Panchalas, environed Bhagadatta on all sides.

31. That foremost of car-warriors Yudhisthira, having surrounded Bhagadatta with cars on all sides, covered the latter with keen-pointed shafts by hundreds and thousands.

32. Baffling those myriad shafts with his iron hook, the Mountain-king, (Bhagadatta) agitated with his elephant the host of the Pandavas and the Panchalas.

33. Then, O ruler of men, we did indeed, behold a wonderful feat achieved in that battle by the old Bhagadatta, through the instrumentality of his elephant.

34. Then the sovereign of the Dasarnas advanced against the ruler of the Pragjyotisas, mounted on a swift-coursing elephant, exuding the temporal juice and moving in a tortuous motion.

35. Then the encounter that ensued between those two elephants of prodigious appearance, resembled the fight, in the days of yore, between winged mountains covered with trees.

36. Thereafter the elephant of the ruler of the Pragjyotisas, turning and wheeling round, slew the elephant of the king of the Dasarnas, by ripping open its flanks.

37. King Bhagadatta also, with seven Tomaras of the effulgence of the sun's rays, slew his adversary riding on an elephant just when the latter was about to slip down from his seat.

38. Thereupon Yudhisthira lacerating king Bhagndatta (with many shafts), surrounded him on all sides with a numerous host of car-warriors.

39. Mounted on his elephant and surrounded on all sides by the car-warriors, he (Bhagadatta) appeared beautiful like fire illumining a mountain surrounded by forests.

40. Then mounted on his elephant, he remained inside that compact circle of fierce bow-men riding on chariots and pouring showers of arrows.

41. Thereafter the king of the Pragjyotisas, poking his prodigious elephant, urged it towards the chariot of Yuyudhana.

42. Thereat the mighty elephant twining with its trunk the car of Sini's grandson, threw it violently to a distance ; but Yuyudhana escaped.

43. His charioteer jumping upon the car, urged the mighty steeds of the Shindhu breed yoked thereto, and stopped reaching the spot where Satyaki was standing.

44. Then that elephant, availing itself of that breach in the circle of cars, came speedily out of it and began to overthrow all the rulers of the earth.

45. Those foremost of men being frightened by that swift-coursing elephant, regarded that single one to be multiplied into hundred elephants, in that battle.

46. The Pandavas crushed by Bhagadatta mounted on his elephant, appeared like the Danavas crushed by Indra mounted on the Airavata.

47. When the Panchalas were flying on all sides, a deafening and dreadful din was created by their elephants and steeds.

48. Thus when the Pandavas were being afflicted by Bhagadatta in that battle, Bhima wrought up with wrath once more rushed against the ruler of the Pragjyotisas.

49. Then that e,ephant drenching with the woater spouting from its trunk the horses of the advancing Bhima, frightened them, and they carried away Bhuma from the field.

50. Thereafter Ruchiparvan the son of Kirti speedily rushed at him, mounted on his chariot and pouring showers of arrows like Death himself.

51. Then that ruler of the mountain tracts possessed of shapely limbs, despatched, with a straight shaft, Ruchiparvan to the regions of the son of Vivaswan (Death).

52. On the fall of that hero (Ruchiparvan), thc son of Subhadra, the sons of Droupadi, Chekitana, Dhristaketu, and Yuyutsu, began to afflict that elephant,

53. Desirous of slaying it ; and uttering dreadful roars, they began to pour on it their arrows like showers of rain.

54. Then that elephant urged with heels toes, and the hook, by its skilful rider, rushed (at them) with speed, with its trunk stretched and eyes and ears fixed.

55. Then trampling upon the steeds of Yuyutsu, the animal crushed his charioteer ; and, O monarch, Yuyutsu fled, forsaking his car, in all haste.

56. Then the warriors of the Pandava host out of a desire for slaying that foremost of elephants, speedily drenched it with the shower of their arrows, uttering loud shouts all the while.

57. At this juncture, your son with speed rushed, against the car of Subhadra's son. King Bhagadatta riding on his elephant and discharging arrows at the foe,

58. Appeared resplendent like the sun scattering his rays on the earth. Then the son of Arjuna pierced him with twelve shafts and Yuyutsu with ten.

59. The sons of Droupadi and Dhiristaketu also pierced him with ten shafts ; with those arrows shot with great care stuck on its body, the elephant appeared beautiful,

60. Like a mighty rain-cloud struck with the rays of the sun. Urged on by the skill and vigour of its rider, and smitten with the shafts of the enemy,

61. That elephant began to throw down right and left, the warriors of the hostile host. Like a cow-herd belabouring with his cudgel the herd in the forest,

62. Bhagadatta began to smite the hostile troops repeatedly. Like the cawing of the crows pounced upon by the hawks,

63. A confused noise was heard among the Pandava hosts, as they fled with speed.

64. O monarch, then that foremost of elephants being struck with the hook resembled the winged mountains of yore. It struck panic into the hearts of the enemy, like to what the merchants (on board) experience when the (tempest-tossed) sea rushes against them.

65. O monarch, then in that battle, a loud din, was raised by the elephants, car-warriors steeds and kings, as they fled ni fear; and that din filled the earth, the welkin, the cardinal and subsidiary directions of the compass.

66. That monarch (Bhagadatta) with that foremost elephant of his, thoroughly agitated the host of the enemy, like Virochana agitating in battle the celestial host well-protected by the immortals in the days of yore.

67. The friend of fire (tempest) then began to blow violently. A cloud of dust in a moment covered the firmameut and the forces. People began to regord that single elephant at muntiplied into many and careering in all directions.

Thus ends the twenty-sixth chapter, the fighting of Bhagadatta, in the Samsaptaka of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXVII.

(SAMSAPTAKA-BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. As you have enquired of me of the feats of Partha in that battle, hear, O you of mighty arms, what he achieved in that battle.

2. Seeing the cloud of dust and hearing the noise created by the troops when Bhagadatta was achieving feats of valour, the son of Kunti thus addressed Krishna.

3. "O slayer of Madhu, as the ruler of the Pragjyotisas has advanced with impetuousity to the battle, riding on his elephant, this loud noise may be attributed to him.

4. Well-versed in the management of his vehicle the elephant, he is in no way inferior to Indra in battle; and I think, he is either the first or the second of all the elephant warriors on the face of this earth.

5. His elephaut is also the foremost of of the species, whom no rival dares encounter in battle; the animal is well accomplished in all tactics and indefatigable and beyond the reach of all weapons in battle.

6. O sinless one, that elephant capable of bearing the showers of all kinds of weapon and even the tongues of fire, will alone, this day, destroy all the troops of the Pandavas.

7. Save and except us two, there is none who is capable of resisting that animal. Therefore with speed do you drive where the ruler of the Pragjyotisas is.

8. I will, this very day, send, as a dear guest to the slayer of Vala (Indra), this my adversary who is proud of the prowess of his elephant and of his venerable age, in battle."

9. No sooner had Arjuna uttered these words than Krishna drove to the spot where Bhagadatta had been crushing and shattering the Pandava army.

10. As Arjuna winded his way towards Bhagadatta, the fourteen thousand mighty car-warriors, viz., the Samsaptakas summoned him delightfully from behind.

11. Of these fourteen thousand, ten thousand mighty car-warriors belonged to the Trigartta clan, and the (remaining) four sand were the followers of the son of Vasudeva.

12. Beholding then the ranks of his own army broken by Bhagadatta and O sire, being summoned on the other-hand by the Samsaptakas, Arjuna was seen devided in his heart (purpose).

13. He began to reflect :—'Which of these two acts will now be beneficial for me viz., to turn back to the Samsaptakas, or to repair to Yudhisthira.'

14. Then, O perpetuator of the race of the Kurus, deciding with the help of his understanding, Arjuna set his heart steadily on the destruction of the Samsaptakas.

15. Then that son of Vasava bearing the device of the monkey-chief on his standard, suddenly wheeled round with the intent of slaughtering, single handed, those thousands of car-warriors in battle.

16. Even this was what both Karna and Duryodhana had decided to be the means for bringing about the death of Arjuna; and for this they had planned the double encounter.

17. Then the son of Pandu wavered between his two purposes (of slaying the Samsaptakas, and of meeting Bhagadatta). But he baffled the purposes of his enemies by slaying then the foremost among the Samsapatakas,

18. Thereat, O monarch, the mighty car-warriors of the Samsaptaka host showered upon Arjuna hundreds and thousands of straight-jointed shafts.

19. Covered with those shafts, neither the son of Kunti, namely Partha, nor Krishna the assuager of the grief of men, nor horses nor chariots, O monarch, could be seen.

20. Then when Janarddana was overwhelmed with a swoon, and was covered with drops of perspiration, the son of Pritha fell to slaughter them in large numbers with his Brahma weapon.

21. Hundreds of arms with arrows, bow-strings and bows in their grasps, being severed, and also, standards, horses, charioteers, and car-warriors, all fell down on the earth.

22. Elephants, resembling in stature huge hills covered with trees, or masses of rain clouds, and furnished with trappings, having their riders slain, fell down on the ground being struck with the arrows of Partha.

23. Greatly afflicted with the shafts of Partha, steeds with riders on their backs, fell down dead on the ground, with their caparisons and reins severed and their Vandha rent.

24. Severed by Kiritin with his broad-headed arrows, the arms of men, having swords, lances and rapiers for their nail, and grasping bludgeons, mallets, and battle-axes, fell down.

25. Heads, O sire, resembling the rising sun, or the lotus or the moon, being severed by the arrows of Arjuna, fell down on the earth.

26. When the enraged Phalguna had been thus slaying his foes, the forces seemed to be on fire, being struck with beautiful but deadly shafts of various appearances.

27. Then all beings honoured Dhananjaya, who had been agitating the forces like an elephant crushing the lotus-stalks, by saying 'Well done,' 'Well-done.'

28. Beholding that feat of the son of Pritha, which was equal to the one achieved by Vasava himself, Madhava, highly amazed thus spoke to the former, with his hands folded.

29. 'I think, O Partha, the feat you have to-day achieved in battle is difficult of being performed even by Indra, or Yama or Kuvera himself.

30. I have seen you to-day slay simultaneously in battle, hundreds and thousands of mighty car-warriors of the Samsaptaka host.'

31. Then completely slaying those Samsaptakas who stayed in battle, Partha said to Krishna, 'Now hasten towards Bhagadatta.'

Thus ends the twenty-seventh chapter, the slaughter of the Samsaptakas, in the Samsaptaka-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

(SAMSAPTAKA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Upon Partha's desire for advancing against the divison of Drona, Krishna urged his steeds covered with golden caparisons, fleet as the mind and white in hue.

2. Beholding that foremost of the Kurus make towards his brothers afflicted sore by Drona, king Susarman with his brothers followed him, desirous of battle.

3. The invincible Arjuna owning white steeds then thus addressed Krishna saying :—' O Achyuta, this Susarman assisted by his brothers challanges me (to fight).

4. O slayer of foes, on the other hand, the ranks of my troops are being shattered, (by Drona) ; to-day my mind is undecided in its purposes, which is caused by the Samsaptakas.

5. Shall I slay the Samsaptakas or shall I save my own army afflicted by the foe. Know this to be what I am thinking of ; tell me what would be beneficial for me ?

6. Thus spoken to, the descendant of the Dasarhas (viz. Krishna), turned the car, and drove the son of Pandu to the spot whence the ruler of the Trigarttas was summoning Arjuna.

7. Thereat Arjuna piercing Susarman with seven swift-coursing arrows, cut down his standard, bow and chariot with a couple of razor-sharp arrows.

8. Then with six swift-flying arrows Partha speedily despatched to the mansion of Death the brother of the ruler of the Trigarttas, with his steeds and charioteers.

9. Thereat Susarman, aiming at Arjuna, hurled an iron dart resembling a snake and he threw a lance at the son of Vasudeva.

10. Having cut down the dart with three shafts and the lance also with another three, Arjuna compelled Susarman to turn back, depriving him of his senses by means of an arrowy down-pour.

11. None among your host ventured to oppose him, O monarch, as he came looking fierce and showering arrows like Vasava pouring rain.

12. Then Dhananjaya advanced slaying all the mighty car-warriors of the Kouravas, with his arrows,just as fire advances consuming heaps of straw and fuel &c.

13. Like the touch of fire, people were unable to bear the unbearable impetuousity of that intelligent son of Kunti.

14. The son of Pandu overwhelming with his arrowy showers the hostile host, made, O monarch, towards the rulers of the Pragjyotisas, like Suparana pouncing down (upon his prey).

15—16. Then the ever-victorious Arjuna held in his grasp the bow, that was prolific of benefit for the sinless Pandavas, and that was capable of enhancing the grief of the enemy in battle, for the destruction of the Kshastriyas, brought about, O king, by your son's recourse to the deceitful game at dice.

17. Then, O monarch, your troops being thus agitated by the son of Pritha, was broken like a frail bark grounded on a rock.

18. Thereupon, ten thousand bowmen, brave and inflamed with a fierce determination for battle, and disregardful of victory or defeat, turned upon (Arjuna).

19. With their hearts shorn of fear, those mighty warriors completely encompassed him. Thereat Partha capable of bearing all burdens how heavy sover, took up that burden in that battle.

20. Then Partha began to crush your forces just as an infuriate elephant of six years of age, with rent temples crushes and tears an assemblage of lotus plants.

21. When the troops were being thus crushed, Bhagadatta, the ruler of men, riding on the self-same elephant, rushed suddenly at Dhananjaya.

22. Thereupon Dhananjaya that foremost of men, received him. (Bhagadatta), opposing him with his car. Then a fierce encounter raged between that car and that elephant.

23. Riding on their car and elephant respectively which were equipped according to the rules of the military science, those two heroes Dhananjaya and Bhagadatta careered through the field of battle.

24. Then staying on his elephant that resembled a mass of clouds, the mighty Bhagadatta showered upon Dhananjaya a down-pour of arrows, like Indra showering rain.

25. Then the son of Vasava (Arjuna) endued with prowess, cut off with his arrowy showers, the arrows of Bhagadatta, before they could even reach him.

26. Then, O sire, the king of the Pragjyotisas, baffling that shower of arrows, pierced the mighty-armed son of Pritha, as also Krishna, with his arrows.

27. Thereafter covering Krishna and Partha with a thick net-work of arrows, Bhagadatta urged his elephant towards them in order to slay them.

28. Thereat beholding that infuriate elephant make towards themselves like Death himself, Janarddana with swiftness moved his car in a manner as to leave the elephant on the left.

29. Thus Dhananjaya, though he got an opportunity of slaying that mighty elephant and its rider from the right side, yet did not avail himself of it, recollecting the laws of fair combat.

30. The elephant, O sire, trampling down upon other elephants, cars and steeds, sent them all to the regions of Death. Thereat Dhananjaya was inflamed with wrath.

Thus ends the twenty-eighth chapter, the fight of Bhagadatta, in the Samsaptaka-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXIX.

(SAMSAPTAKA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. Wrought up with rage, what did Arjuna the son of Pandu do to Bhagadatta? What did also the ruler of the Pragjyotisas do towards Pritha's son? Tell me all as it happened.

Sanjaya said :—

2. When Krishna and Arjuna were both thus engaged with the ruler of the Pragjyotisas, all creatures regarded them as placed within the teeth of Death.

3. Then, O mighty monarch, from the back of the elephant he rode, the ruler of the Pragjyotisas poured incessant showers of arrows on the two Krishnas (Arjuna and Krishna) stationed on the same chariot.

4. Thereafter Bhagadatta, with iron shafts furnished with golden wings, whetted on stone and discharged from a full-drawn bow, pierced the illustrious son of Devaki.

5. Those superbly ornamented arrows of the touch of fire, shot with force by Bhagadatta, entered the earth, having pierced through the son of Devaki.

6. The son of Pritha then cut off Bhagadatta's bow, and slew that warrior who was supporting the latter from his flanks; he then engaged with the Pragjyotisa king as if in sport.

7. Thereat Bhagadatta sped at Arjuna fourteen lances of great sharpness and of the solar effulgence; but Arjuna cut each of them into three pieces.

8. Thereafter Arjuna shattered into pieces the armour covering Bhagadatta's elephant, with a mighty shower of arrows; the armour then dropped down on the earth.

9. With its armour shattered, and mangled with numerous arrow-wounds, that elephant appeared like a prince of mountain shorn of its cloudy envelope, and with its breast drenched with showers of rain.

10. Thereupon the ruler of the Pragjyotisas hurled at Vasudeva's son a dart having a golden staff and an iron head; but Arjuna cut that dart in two.

11. Thereafter having severed with arrows the umbrella and the standard of the king, Arjuna quickly pierced the ruler of the mountain-provinces with ten shafts, smiling the while.

12—13. Then that ruler of the Pragjyotisas was sorely wounded by Arjuna's arrows furnished with beautiful wings formed of the feathers of the Kanka birds. Thereafter Bhagadatta, O ruler of men, waxing wroth, hurled lances at the head of Pandu's son owning white steeds. And then he uttered a loud war-cry. Then by those lances, the diadem of Arjuna was displaced.

14. Then putting his displaced diadem in its proper place, Phalguna said to king Bhagadatta:—"Take you a full view of this world."

15. Thus spoken to, king Bhagadatta, inflamed with rage, took up a lustrous bow and covered Pandu's son and Govinda with a shower of arrows.

16. The son of Pritha then having cut-off Bhagadatta's bow and quivers, quickly pierced the latter in all his vital limbs with two and seventy arrows.

17. Thus pierced and pained to the extreme, Bhagadatta invoked the Vaishnava weapon and inspiring its hook with sacred aphorisms, he let it go, in rage, at the breast of Pandu's son.

18. Thereupon Kesava, covering Pritha's son, recieved upon his own breast that weapon capable of slaying every being, hurled by Bhagadatta.

19. On the breast of Keshava that weapon became changed into a celestial garland. Thereafter with a sorrowful heart Arjuna thus addressed Keshava:—

20. "O sinless one, without fighting for you, I will drive your steeds, in battle. Even these, O lotus-eyed one, were the words you spoke before. Why then do you not keep your promise inviolate?

21. It is only then when I shall be involved in a calamity or shall be incapable of resisting (my foes and their weapons), it is then only that you shall take it upon yourself to protect me; but not when I am competent and standing thus.

22. Equipped with my bows and arrows, I am competent enough to conquer the worlds with all the celestials, Asuras, and mortals dwelling in them; this fact indeed you also know."

23. Thereupon the son of Vasudeva addressing Arjuna spoke these words in reply:—"Hear, O sinless one, O son of Pritha, this ancient and mysterious piece of history.

24. Ever occupied as I am in achieving the welfare of the worlds I have four semblances. Dividing myself into parts I do try to bring about the world's benefit.

25. One of my semblances, remaining on earth, is even now practising ascetic austerities. Another keeps an eye over the world engaged in good and evil deeds.

26. My third semblance, staying in the world of men, is engaged in the performance of acts, and my fourth semblance sleeps a sleep extending over four thousand years.

27. This last-mentioned semblance of mine that awakes at the end of the every thousand years, accords excellent boons at that time, to those who really deserve them.

28. On one such occasion, the Earth knowing that the boon-giving hour has come, solicited a boon for her son Naraka; hear, I shall tell it to you.

29. "Possessed of the Vaishnava weapon let my son be unslayable, both by the gods and the demons. It behoves you to grant me that weapon."

30. Listening then to that prayer for the boon that the earth wanted me accord to her son, I gave the excellent and irresistible Vaishnava weapon to him.

31. I then said:—"O Earth, let this weapon be infallible in protecting Naraka. None, I say, will be able to slay him.

32. Protected by this weapon, your son, the crusher of hostile hosts, will, in all times and everywhere, be invincible."

33. Then saying "Be it so", that intelligent goddess went away, satisfied at the fruition of her desire. Her son Naraka, that afflicter of hostile heroes, also accordingly became invincible.

34. Then, O son of Pritha, that weapon of mine was secured by the ruler of the Pragjyotisas from Naraka; and O sire, there is none unslayable by it in all the worlds, not excluding Indra and Rudra themselves.

35. For your sake therefore, O Arjuna, I did baffle the weapon. Now slay the mighty Asura deprived of his excellent weapon.

36. Now slay in battle your invincible opponent Bhagadatta, that enemy of the gods, like myself slaying, in days of yore, Naraka, for the worlds' benefit."

37. Thus spoken to by the high-souled Kesava, Pritha's son, suddenly covered Bhagadatta with a shower of sharp arrows.

38. Then the mighty-armed and high-souled Arjuna dauntlessly wounded Bhagadatta's elephant between its frontal globes with a (long) lance.

39. Then like the thunder-bolt rending a mountain open, that dart flying towards the elephant penetrated into its body to the very wings, like a snake entering into its hole in an ant-hill.

40. Then like the wife of a poor man, refusing to carry out the orders of her husband, that elephant though often urged by Bhagadatta, refused to obey his orders.

41. With its limbs paralysed it fell down striking the earth with its tusks. Then that huge elephant gave up its breath uttering a yell of distress.

42. Thereafter the son of Pandu pierced the heart of king Bhagadatta with a crescent-shaped arrow of straight knots.

43. His bosom being torn open by the diadem-decked Arjuna. king Bhagadatta lost the grasp of his bow and arrows, being deprived of vitality.

44. The precious cloth that had constituted his turban now fell off from his head like a petal falling off from a lotus when its stem is struck violently.

45. He himself decorated with a garland of gold fell down from the back of his mountain-like elephant, decked also with trappings of gold, like a blossoming Karnikara tree falling down from the crest of a hill, being uprooted by the violence of the wind.

46. Then in that battle, the son of Indra having slain that monarch equal to Indra in prowess and who was a friend of Indra, began to crush, inspired with the hopes of victory, other warriors of your army, like a violent gust of wind crushing large number of trees.

Thus ends the twenty-ninth chapter, the slaughter of Bhagadatta, in the Samsaptaka-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXX.

(SAMSAPTAKA-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Having slain the ruler of the Pragjyotisas who was the friend and favourite of Indra, and who was possessed of immeasurable prowess, the son of Pritha circumambulated him.

2. Thereafter, Vrisaka and Achala, the two sons of the king of the Gandharas, both competent to subjugate hostile cities, began to afflict the son of Pandu in battle.

3. Those two heroic bowmen assailing Arjuna simultaneously from the rear and the van, began to pierce him with swift-flying arrows coursing with vehemence.

4. Thereupon with whetted shafts Pritha's son cut off into fragments the steeds' the charioteer, the bow, the standard, the umbrella and the chariot of Vrisaka the son of Suvala.

5. Thereafter Arjuna with showers of arrows and various other weapons, began to afflict the Gandharas headed by Suvala and others.

6. Then wrought up with wrath, Dhananjaya despatched, by means of his arrows, to the regions of Death, five hundred heroic Gandhara warriors with their weapons held over their heads.

7. Meanwhile the mighty-armed Vrisaka alighting from his chariot of which the horses were slain, ascended the car of his brother with agility, and grasped another bow.

8. Then those two heroic brothers Vrisaka and Achala, both riding on the self-same car, began incessantly to pierce Pritha's son with their arrowy downpour.

9. Then those two kings, your brothers-in-law, viz., Vrisaka and Achala of illustrious souls, began to wound Partha sorely, like Vala or Aritra wounding Indra himself.

10. The two Gandhara kings of unerring aims, again and again pierced Pandu's son like the summer and the rainy months of the year piercing the world with heat and rain respectively.

11. Thereat, O monarch, Arjuna with a single shaft slew those two foremost of men, those two princes, viz, Vrisaka and Achala who had been riding on the same chariot side by side.

12. Thereupon those two heroic brothers with red eyes, possessed of long arms, having similar features and looking like two lions, fell down from their car.

13. Then their bodies, so much tended by their friends and favourites, falling from the car, lay prostrate on the Earth, spreading sacred fame in all the ten points of the compass.

14. Thereafter, O ruler of men, your sons beholding their two unretreating and heroic maternal uncles slain, began unceasingly to discharge weapons.

15. Then, conversant with hundred kinds of illusion, Sakuni beholding his two brothers slain spread a mighty illusion for confounding the two Krishnas.

16. Then clubs, iron-balls, Sataghnis, rocks, darts, maces, bludgeons, swords, tridents, mallets, battle-axes,

17. Kampanas scimitars, nails, Mushalas, axes, razors, horse-shoe-headed arrows, Nalikas, Vatsadantas and shafts of bony-heads,

18. Discuses, Vishikhas, lances, and many other kinds of weapons began to fall upon Arjuna from all the cardinal and subsidiary points of the compass.

19. Also asses, camels, buffalos, tigers, lions, deer, leopards, bears, wolves, vultures, monkeys, and various reptiles,

20. And diverse kinds of Rakshasas, and flights of birds, all burning with hunger and rage, assailed Arjuna from all sides.

21. Thereat that heroic son of Kunti, by name Dhananjaya, versed in the use of celestial weapons, discharging a net-work of arrows, simultaneously attacked them all.

22. Attacked by that hero with excellent and strong arrows, those beasts and reptiles and birds, emitting loud yells of agony, began to give the ghost up on the field of battle.

23. Thereupon Arjuna's chariot was enveloped in a pall of gloom and harsh voices were heard to reproach Arjuna from within that gloom.

24. Then in that fierce battle, Arjuna, with a mighty and lustrous weapon of the finest make called Gotishka, dispelled that dreadful and palpable darkness capable of inspiring every one with terror.

25—26. When that gloom had been dispelled, frightful waves of waters started into existence. Thereupon for destroying these water-waves, Arjuna discharged the Aditya weapon; that weapon then dried up almost all the water-waves. Thus various kinds of illusions created by Suvala's son,

27. Arjuna smilingly nullified by means of the virtue of his weapons. When all his illusions had been nullified, struck with the arrows of Arjuna and seized with terror,

28. Sakuni fled like a mean deserter being borne away by fleet coursers. Then Arjuna conversant with the use of all weapons, displaying to his foes his great light-handedness,

29. Poured showers of arrows on the host of the Kouravas. Then that army of your son, thus smashed by Pritha's son,

30. Became split up in twain, like a current of Ganges water dividing into two streams when it is, obstructed by a hillock. Some among those foremost of men, then sought shelter from Drona;

31. And others, O king, being afflicted sore by the diadem-decked Arjuna, flew towards Duryodhana's division. Then we could not see Arjuna, as the army was enveloped in a cloud of dust.

32. I could then only hear the twang of the Gandiva-bow on my right side, as also the sound and blare of conch-shells, and drums, and the din of many other musical instruments.

33. But rising above all those noise and din, the twang of the Gandiva reached the very heavens. Then on the Southern part of the field, again raged a fight between numerous warriors on the one side,

34. And Arjuna on the other. I, however, followed Drona's division. Then the diverse divisions of Yudhisthira's army began to strike down the enemy's host on the field.

35. Then, O Bharata, like wind scattering masses of clouds in the heavens, Arjuna began to scatter the various divisions composing the army of your son.

36. None could then ressist that fierce bowmen, that excellent of all male beings, as he advanced, like Indra, pouring incessantly showers of arrows.

37. Then all those troops of yours, thus slaughtered by Partha, and overwhelmed with intense pain, began to fly, and in flying crushed many of their own number.

38. The arrows, sped by Arjuna, furnished with wings of Kanka feather and capable of piercing into every body, began to fall even like flights of locusts covering all the ten points of the compass.

39. Those arrows, O sire, penetrating through horses, car-warriors, elephants and foot-soldiers, entered the earth, like snakes entering their holes in ant-hills.

40. Arjuna did not shoot more than one arrow at any elephant, man, or horse. Each of these, afflicted by one shaft only, began to fall down and give up the ghost on the field.

41. Over-strewn with slain men, and elephants, and horses mangled with arrows, and filled with the yells of dogs and jackals, the field of battle assumed an awful appearance.

42. Afflicted with arrows, then father deserted his son, friend forsook his friend, and son abandoned his father. Then with their hearts intent on saving themselves, men even forsook their very vehicles, being pained by the arrows of Partha.

Thus ends the thirtieth chapter, the retreat of Sakuni, in the Samsaptaka-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXXI.

(SAMSAPTAKA-BADHA PARVA).—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. What, O Sanjaya, was the state of your mind when my army was routed and crushed by Pandu's son and when you speedily fled away from the field?

2. The re-assembling of broken and routed troops is ever very difficult; tell me all about it, O Sanjaya.

Sanjaya said:—

3. In spite of all these, O ruler of men, many excellent heroes, desirous of doing good to your son and of keeping their reputation unsullied, followed Drona's track.

4. During that fierce encounter, they dauntlessly followed their commander, achieving numerous feats of valour, with weapons upraised and with Yudhisthira within accessible distance.

5. Availing themselves of an error of the heroic Bhimasena, of Satyaki of immeasurable prowess and of the mighty Dhristadyumna, the Kuru leaders fell upon the Pandava divisions.

6. The fierce Panchalas urged on their troops saying "There is Drona, there is Drona," whilst your sons urged on the Kurus, saying, 'Let not Drona be slain'.

7. Then one side saying "Fall upon Drona, fall upon Drona," and the other side saying, "Let not Drona be slain," a game of dice seemed to be played between the Kurus and the Pandavas, in which Drona was the stake.

8, Dhristadyumna, the Panchala prince, proceeded to those spots wheresoever Drona sought to assail the car divisions of the Panchalas.

9. Thus during that sanguinary engagement in which no rule for selection of antagonists was followed, heroes encountered heroes, uttering aloud their respective war-cries.

10. The Pandavas then became incapable of being shaken by their enemies, whilst they themselves, keeping alive the memory of all the wrongs they had to suffer, made the ranks of their foes tremble with fear before them.

11. Then in that fierce fight, the naturally modest Pandava warriors, under the influence of animosity and urged on by their energy, rushed to battle reckless of their lives and desirous of slaying Drona.

12. When those heroes of immeasurable energy played in that battle, as if in a game of dice, staking their very lives, there seemed to be a collision of iron against adamant.

13. Even the oldest men could not recollect, O monarch, of having seen or heard of such a battle before.

14. In that battle distinguished by the slaughter of heroes, the earth seemed to tremble, being oppressed with the burden of the living oceans that rushed against one anoanother.

15. The fierce yells uttered by your troops, tossed and agitated as they had been, filling the very heavens, seemed to penetrate even to the heart of the army of the Ajatasatru Yudhisthira.

16. Meanwhile the Pandava hosts' having reached by thousands Drona who' had been coursing through the field of battle became shattered and broken with the sharp shafts of the latter.

17. When those troops were thus being crushed by Drona of marvellous achievements, the generalissimo of the Pandava hosts himself encountered Drona.

18. Then we beheld the marvellous fight between Drona and the Panchala prince, and my firm conviction is that that battle has no parallel.

19. Then like fire burning down houses, Nila resembling a veritable fire, of which the arrows were the scintillations, the bow the flames, began to consume the Kuru army.

20. Thereat seeing Nila consume the troops, the highly puissant son of Drona, who had long been desirous of fighting with the former, smilingly addressed these smooth words to him (Nila).

21. "What do you gain, O Nila, by consuming with your arrowy flame so many of my common soldiers? Fight with me single-handed as I am; and waxing wroth, do you strike me as you can."

22. Then Nila, possessed of a countenance beautiful like a full-blown lotus, began to pierce with his arrows him whose body resembled a cluster of lotuses and whose eyes resembled lotus-petals.

23. Thus pierced deeply by him, Drona's son, with ten whetted and broad-headed arrows, cut off the bow, the standard, and the umbrella of his adversary.

24. Then jumping down from his car, Nila, armed with an excellent sword and buckler, desired to sever from Aswathaman's trunk his head, like a bird (bearing away its prey in its clutches).

25. Thereat, O sinless one, Drona's son with a broad-headed shaft smilingly severed from Nila's trunk his head graced with a fine nose and decked with ear-rings, and resting on elevated shoulders.

26. Then Nila, whose countenance resembled in splendour the full moon, whose eyes were like petals of lotuses, whose stature was tall, whose complexion was like that of the lotus, thus slain, fell down on the earth.

27. After Nila of furious energy had been thus slain by the preceptor's son, the host of the Pandavas, was greatly agitated with grief.

28. Then, O sire, all the mighty car-warriors of the Pandava host began to think, "How indeed, would the son of Vasava (Arjuna) be able to save us from our foes,

29. When that heroic and mighty warrior is engaged in the southern part of the field in crushing the enemies' troops, and in slaughtering the remnant of the Samsaptaka and the Narayana troops."

Thus ends the thirty-first chapter, the slaughter of Nila, in the Samsaptaka-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXXII.

(SAMSAPTAKA-BADHA PARVA)—continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Vrikodara could not tolerate that slaughter of his own troops. He therefore, wounded Valhika with sixty, and Karna with ten shafts.

2. Thereupon Drona, desirous of taking his life out of him, pierced him in all his vital parts, with whetted shafts of exceeding sharpness, all coursing in straight lines.

3. Once more, desirous of giving Bhima no respite, Drona stuck twenty-six arrows, all resembling fire in touch and venomous serpents in fierceness, on the former. Then again Karna pierced him with twelve and Aswathaman with seven arrows;

4. King Duryodhana also covered him with six arrows. The highly puissant Bhimasena also pierced them in return;

5. He pierced Drona with fifty shafts and Karna with ten arrows, and Duryodhana with twelve and Drona's son with eight swift-coursing arrows.

6. Then uttering a loud war-cry, he engaged himself in battle. In that fight in which the warriors fought heedless of their lives and in which death seemed to be the common lot of all,

7. Ajatasatru (Yudhisthira) urged on his troops to the rescue of Bhima. Those troops then approached Bhimsena of infinite prowess.

8—9. Then, Yuyudhana and others, the twin sons of Madri by Pandu, and other car-warriors headed by Bhima, assembled and united together and wrought up with rage, all foremost of men, fell upon Drona's division protected by many foremost archers, desirous of breaking and shattering it.

10. Then that foremost of car-warriors namely Drona, received unflinchingly those highly puissant heroic car-warriors, all masters in the art of fighting.

11. Then your troops, disregarding their kingdoms and the fear of death, encountered those of the Pandavas. Horse-soldiers slew horse-soldiers, and car-warriors slew car-warriors.

12. There were then veritable showers of lances and swords; and the battle was fought with battle-axes. Dreadful sword-fights producing great carnage were also fought.

13. The battle was all the more dreadful in consequence of the tremendous rush of elephants against elephants. Some fell down from the backs of the elephants, some from the backs of the horses, topsy turvy.

14. Others fell down, O sire, from their chariots, with hearts torn open with arrows. In that terrible crush as men fell down deprived of their armours,

15. Elephants crushed their heads having attacked them on the breast. Elsewhere might be seen elephants crushing other excellent prostrate warriors.

16. Many elephants (as they fell down) striking the earth with their tusks, were seen to mangle therewith large bodies of car-warriors. With darts sticking to their trunks, many other

17—18. Elephants careered through the field crushing men by hundreds. Some elephants again pressed and squeezed many fallen men, steeds, car-warriors and elephants, all furnished with iron armours, as if they were merely thick stalk of reeds. On beds of arrows furnished with vulterine feathers, many rulers of men,

19. Endued with modesty, laid themselves down with pain, their hour having come. In that battle father rushing on his car, slew his own son ;

20. Son also, out of confusion and disregardful of anything, fell upon his own father. Axels of cars were shattered, standards were torn to pieces, umbrellas were felled to the earth ;

21. Dragging halves of broken yokes, horses began to ran away. Arms with swords in their grasps fell, as also heads graced with ear-rings.

22. Chariots, dashed against the earth by powerful elephants, became splintered into pieces. Wounded severely by elephants, steeds fell down with their riders.

23. Then there raged a fierce and dreadful fight in which nobody payed any regard to others. "Alas ! Oh father ! Oh son ! Where are you, O friend ! stay ! Where do you run to !

24. Smite ! Catch ! Slay !" These and many other exclamations, mingled with loud laughters, roars, and war-cries, were uttered and heard there.

25. The blood of men and steeds and elephants mingled together, flowed in one current, and caused the Earth's dust to disappear, and inspired terror into the hearts of the cowards.

26. In that fight one hero having his car-wheel entangled with that of another and being too near to use any other weapon, smashed the other's head with a mace.

27. In that battle where there was no chance of safety, heroes, desirous of each other's safety, dragged one another by the head and fought with one another with blows, teeth and nails.

28. Upraised arms, with swords in grasp, of some heroes, were severed ; the arms of others with bows or hook or arrows in grasp, were also lopped off.

29. Here one warrior loudly challenged another ; there, another turned away his face from the field. Another lopped off from the trunk the head of another who happened to encounter him.

30. Some rushed to fight uttering fierce yells. Some became inspired with terror at the sound. Some slew with his sharp arrows a friend or a foe.

31. Here an elephant huge like the summit of a hill, slain by a lance, lay on the field, like a flat island in a river during the summer season.

32. There like a mountain with rellets flowing down its breasts, stood an elephant exuding the temporal juice, having crushed with its huge legs a car-warrior together with his steeds and charioteer.

33. Many weak-hearted cowards were overwhelmed with swoons at the sight of heroes accomplished in the use of weapons fighting with one another, literally bathed in blood.

34. Everything rolled in confusion and nothing could be distinguished. Soldiers enveloped in dust fought on regardless of one another.

35. Then the generalissimo of the Pandava troops saying "This is the opportune moment" quickly led the Pandavas ever endowed with activity, to the battle.

36. At his command the mighty-armed Pandavas, like a flock of swans descending on the breast of a lake, came down upon Drona's car, spreading slaughter as they proceeded.

37. Then near the chariot of the invincible Drona, loud cries of "Seize," "Do not fly," "Be not afraid" "Cut to pieces" were heard.

38. Thereupon Drona, Kripa, Karna, Drona's son, king Jayadratha, the two princes from Avanti, viz., Vinda and Anuvinda, and Salya, checked that assault (of the Pandava troops).

39. Those irressistible and invincible warriors, the Panchalas and the Pandavas, all inflamed with righteous indignation, did not avoid Drona, though afflicted with showers of arrows.

40. Thereat Drona, excited to the highest pitch of fury, spread a great carnage among the ranks of the Chedis, the Panchalas, and the Pandavas, by means of arrows which he discharged by hundreds.

41. Then, O sire, the twang of his bow and the slap of his palms were heard in all the points of compass, resembling the rumble of thunder, and inspiring terror into the hearts of many a man.

42. At this juncture, the ever-victorious Arjuna, having vanquished the numerous host of the Samsaptakas, came to the spot where Drona had been crushing the Pandava ranks.

43. Then Phalguna showed himself in that part of the field, after having vanquished and slain the Samsaptakas and crossed many a lake whose waters were constituted by gore and whose mighty eddies were constituted by the numerous shafts.

44. Then we beheld the standard, bearing the emblem of the ape, of that one of illustrious renown and equal to the sun in effulgence, shine on that part of the field.

45. Having dried up the Samsaptaka ocean with his weapons that constituted his rays, that son of Pandu then looking like the sun during the Dissolution period at the end of a Yuga, began to scorch the Kourava ranks.

46. Like the comet risen at the end of a Yuga burning every creature, Arjuna then began to blast with the power of his weapons the Kuru hosts.

47. Pierced by him with thousands of shafts, elephant-riders, horse-soldiers and car-warriors, fell down on the earth, with hair dishevelled and bodies mangled with arrow-wounds.

48. Some uttered distressful cries, some emitted loud roars; others again struck by the shafts of Pritha's son, fell down deprived of life.

49. Remembering the duties of a warrior, Arjuna then desisted from slaying those among the hostile warriors who were falling or fallen or those who turned away from the field of battle.

50. The Kuru warriors then, deprived of their cars, and filled with wonder, and with their faces turned away from the field of battle, began to utter cries of "Oh"! and "Alas" and called upon Karna saying "O Karna, O Karna."

51. The son of Adhiratha then hearing those distressful cries of those who deserved his help, proceeded to face Arjuna, saying at the same time, "Be not afraid, O warriors."

52. Then that foremost of the Bharata combatants, that delighter of all the Bharata heroes, viz., Karna, that foremost of all conversant with the use of weapons, invoked into existence the Agneya weapon.

53. Dhananjaya however with the network of arrows woven by himself, repulsed the arrowy downpour of that hero (Karna) of bright shafts and effulgent bow.

54. Similarly the son of Adhiratha repulsed the arrows of Arjuna of blazing energy. Thereafter the former repulsing the weapons of the latter with his own weapons and discharging myriads of shafts, uttered loud roars.

55. Meanwhile Dhristadyumna, Bhima, and Satyaki, these mighty car-warriors, having approached Karna, pierced him each with three straight-flying arrows.

56. Thereupon Radha's son, having at first resisted Arjuna's weapons by his arrowy showers, cut off the bow of those three warriors with three darts.

57. Then with their bows severed, those warriors appeared like serpents without venom. Then from their respective cars, hurling lances at the foe, they uttered loud war-cries.

58. Then those mighty and blazing lances hurled with fury by the arms of those heroes, coursed swiftly towards Adhiratha's son, looking like so many (flying) snakes.

59. Severing each of those lances with three swift-coursing arrows and speeding at the same time myriads of shafts at Arjuna the highly puissant Karna uttered a loud roar.

60. Then Arjuna also piercing Radha's son with seven swift-flying arrows, slew the younger brothers of Karna with three shafts of great sharpness.

61. Thereafter Pritha's son having slain Satrunjaya also with six straight-going arrows, speedily deprived Vitapa of his head with lances, as the latter stood on his chariot.

62. Thus those three uterine brothers of Suta's son were slain by the single-handed diadem-decked Arjuna even before the very eyes of all the Dhartarastras.

63. Then like a second son of Vinata, Bhima jumping down from his chariot, slew with his sword of excellent make five and ten warriors of Karna's party.

64. Then once more ascending his car and taking up a bow he pierced Karna with ten and his horses and charioteer with five shafts.

65. Dhrishtadyumna also grasping an excellent sword and an effulgent buckler, slew Chandravarman and Vrihatkshatra the ruler of the Nishadhas.

66. Thereafter mounting on his chariot and taking up a bow, the prince of the Panchalas pierced Karna with seventy-three shafts uttering loud shouts all the while.

67. The grandson of Sini, of splendour equal to that of Indra himself, also grasping a fresh bow pierced the son of Suta with sixty-four arrows and uttered a roar like that of a lion.

68. Then with two well-directed broad-headed shafts he burst open Karna's bow; and once more he pierced Karna on the arms and breast with three shafts.

69. Thereupon king Duryodhana, Drona, and Jayadratha, with a combined effort, rescued Radha's son who had been sinking in the ocean of Satyaki.

70. Then hundreds of foot-soldiers, horse-men, elephant-riders and car-warriors, all accomplished in smiting, rushed to the rescue of Karna, inspiring terror into the hearts of the enemy.

71. Dhristadyumna, Bhima, Subhadra's son and Arjuna and Nakula and Sahadeva, all then protected Satyaki in that conflict.

72. Thus for the destruction of all the bowmen, raged the awful battle between your warriors and those of the enemy, in which everybody fought reckless of his life.

73. Foot-soldiers, car-warriors, elephant-riders and horse-men were engaged with elephant-riders, horse-men, car-warriors and foot-soldiers; car-warriors fought with elephants, infantry and cavalry; and cars and and infantry were engaged with cars and elephants.

74. Horses were seen engaged with horses, elephants with elephants, car-warriors with car-warriors and foot-soldiers with foot-soldiers.

75. Thus raged between those high-souled and fearless warriors, the fierce fight marked by carnage, enhancing the delight of the flesh-eating animals and adding to the population of Death's domain.

76. In that battle many were the car-warriors, elephant-riders and foot-soldiers and horse-men that were slain. Elephants were crushed by their rivals. Car-warriors with weapons held over head, were slain by car-warriors and horse-men by horse-men and large bodies of infantry by infantry.

77. Elephants were slain by car-warriors, steeds were crushed by excellent elephants, men were killed by horses, and horses again by excellent car-warriors. With their eyes, tongues, and teeth protruding out, and with their armours and ornaments shattered, many a creature lay on the earth deprived of the vital spark.

78. Others, again, of dreadful aspect being slain by others armed with various and excellent weapons, fell down on the earth; they then were pressed inside the earth being trod upon by elephants and steeds, and being crushed and mangled by sharp edges of car-wheels.

79. When that dreadful destruction of beings went on enhancing the joys of beasts and birds of prey and cannibals, mighty heroes, inflamed with wrath, coursed over the field of battle smiting one another with impetuosity.

80. When the ranks of both the armies were greatly thinned, the combatants, with bodies bespattered with blood, looked at one another. At that moment, O Bharata, the orb of the day disappearing below the horizon, the two armies slowly returned to their respective encampments.

Thus ends the thirty-second chapter, the terrible carnage, in the Samsaptaka-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA.)

Sanjaya said :—

1. Ourselves being at first broken and routed by Arjuna of immeasurable prowess, and also the vow of Drona being unfulfilled in consequence of Yudhisthira being well guarded,

2. All your warriors, with their armours shattered, were then regarded as vanquished. Soiled with dust and sorely pierced with anxiety, they began to look askance at all the ten quarters of heaven.

3. Withdrawing from the field with the consent of Bharadwaja's son, after being vanquished by their adversaries of unerring aim, and humiliated by them in the conflict,

4. They heard, as they retired, the infinite virtues of Phalguna extolled by all beings, as also of the friendship of Keshava for Arjuna spoken of by all.

5—6. Then they passed the night like doomed men, in silence and in anxious contemplation. At the break of day, king

Duryodhana depressed at the aggrandisement of the enemy, inflamed with rage, addressed these words, before all those warriors to Drona, out of affection and affectionate angers, "O you learned in the art of speaking,

7. Indubitably, O foremost of the twice-born ones, you have taken us to be men doomed to be slaughtered for your sake, in as much as, to-day getting Yudhisthira near you, you did not seize him.

8. The enemy whom you would seize in battle could not escape you if once you get him within sight, even if he be protected by the immortals themselves.

9. Pleased with me, you accorded me, a boon; but now you seem unwilling to verify your words. Noble men do never falsify the hopes of those who are devoted to them,"

10. Thus spoken to, Bharadwaja's son felt greatly ashamed ; then he thus addressed the king in reply :—" It behoves you not to entertain such an uncharitable opinion regarding myself, who am ever striving to bring about your good.

11. All this universe, with all the celestials, Asuras, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the reptiles and the Rakshasas, is not competent enough to conquer that army (of the Pandavas) when it is protected by the diadem-decked Arjuna.

12. Except that of the three-eyed Mahadeva, whose might can avail anything against that army which number among it Govinda the world's creator, and have Arjuna for its generalissimo ?

13. But this, O sire, I tell you truly, and this will never be false, that to-day I shall slay a mighty hero, the foremost among the many car-warriors of the enemy.

14. I will also form an array that will be invulnerable even to the celestials themselves. Do you, by some means or other, take Arjuna away from the field.

15. There is nothing unknown to him, nothing incapable of being achieved by him in battle,—he who have acquired all knowledge of warfare from different quarters."

16. After Drona had spoken in the above manner, the host of the Samsaptakas, once more challenging Arjuna led him to the Southern part of the field.

17. Then there took place a battle between Arjuna and his opponents, the like of which had never been seen or heard of before.

18. Then the array formed by Drona ishoneresplendent, O king, and it appeared incapable of being looked at, like the midday sun shining in the meridian and scorching the world underneath.

19. Then, O Bharata, at the command of his father's eldest brother, Abhimanyu penetrated, in that battle, into that impenitrable array (of the Kurus) figuring the discus.

20. Having achieved many difficult feats and having slain thousands of warriors, Subhadra's son encountered six warriors simultaneously. At last succumbing to Dusasana's son,

21. O ruler of earth, O afflicter of your foes, he gave his life up in battle. At the death of Abhimanyu we were enraptured and the Pandavas were depressed with grief. After Subhadra's son had been slain, the troops were withdrawn by us.

Dhritarastra said :—

22. Hearing of the death of the youthful son of that foremost of men (Arjuna), my heart, O Sanjaya, seems to be split up into pieces.

23. Heartless, indeed, are the duties of the Kshatriyas as specified by the law-givers, in as much as these duties even enjoin a hero, desirous of sovereignty, to shoot weapons at a mere child.

24. Describe unto me, O Gavalgana's son, how did so many warriors accomplished in the use of weapons, slay that veritable child, brought up in luxury, and careering (then) dauntlessly in the field ?

25. Tell me, O Sanjaya, how in battle did the dauntless son of Subhadra, endued with immeasurable might sport, having penetrated into our car-division.

Sanjaya said :—

26. That which you ask me to describe, O foremost of kings, viz., the slaughter of Subhadra's son, I shall describe in detail, Hear, O king, attentively.

27. I shall tell you, how that hero played amidst us, having penetrated into our ranks ; as also how, many irresistible heroes inspired with hopes of victory were afflicted by him.

28. Like the denizens of a wood abounding in numerous copses, creepers and trees, when encompassed by a terrible forest-conflagration, the combatants of your host were then all seized with panic.

Thus ends the thirty-third chapter, the consultation for forming the circular array, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. The five Pandava brothers, all of fierce deeds in battle, and all incapable of being overcome by fatigue as is apparent from their achievements, when aided by Krishna, could not be vanquished even by the celestials.

2. In righteousness, in deeds, in lineage, in intelligence, in renown, in fame and in prosperity—in all these virtues, there neither was nor is, nor will be, a person equal to Yudhisthira.

3. King Yudhisthira is constantly in the enjoyment of heavenly bliss, in consequence of his devotion to truth, righteousness, control of passions, worship of the Vipras and such other qualities.

4. The Destroyer at the end of a Yuga, the highly puissant son of Jamadagni, and Bhimasena on his car, O king, these three are held to be equal (in prowess).

5. Of the wielder of Gandiva ever competent to fulfil his vows in battle, of that son of Pritha, I do see no equal on the face of the earth.

6. Devotion to the elders, secrecy of counsels, modesty, self-control, beauty of person and heroism, these six virtues are ever present in Nakula.

7. In knowledge of the Srutis, in gravity, in humility, in righteousness, in personal beauty and in prowess, the heroic Sahadeva equals the two immortals viz, the twin Aswinis.

8. All those illustrious qualities that are present mostly in Krishna and in the Pandavas, all those qualities were to be seen combined in Abhimanyu.

9. Abhimanyu was equal to Yudhisthira in patience, to Krishna in conduct, to Bhima of terrible deeds in his achievements.

10. He was equal to Dhananjaya in beauty of person, prowess, and scriptural knowledge; and to Nakula and Sahadeva in humility.

Dhritarastra said :—

11. O Suta, I desire to hear in detail how the invincible son of Subhadra, viz., Abhimanyu was slain in battle.

Sanjaya said :—

12. Be patient, O mighty monarch. Bear your unbearable burden of grief. I shall speak of the dreadful carnage of your relations. Now hear me attentively.

13. The circular array, O monarch, was then formed by the preceptor, in which were duly stationed kings, each equal to Indra himself.

14. At the head of the array (entrance) were stationed all the princes of the effulgence of the sun. Then there was a veritable assembly of princes.

15. All of them swore to help one another, all owned standards decked with gold; all wore red raiments and all were decorated with crimson ornaments.

16. All of them possessed crimson flags, all had golden garlands; all were smeared with sandal-paste and other perfumed unguents, and all of them wore floral garlands and fine attires.

17. In a serried file, they rushed against Krishna's nephew, desirous of fighting with him. All of them, firm bowmen, then numbered no less than ten thousand strong in all.

18. Placing at their head your handsome grandson Lakshmana, they proceeded to battle, resolved to share one another's grief, emulating one another in deeds of valor,

19. Striving to outvie one anothers and intent on one another's good. O foremost of kings, Duryodhana was stationed in the very centre of your troops.

20. The king then was surrounded by such mighty warriors as Karna, Dussasana, and Kripa. With a white umbrella held over his head, he appeared beautiful like the king of the celestials.

21. Fanned by the moving yak-tails, he appeared like the sun himself. In the very van of those troops was stationed Drona the generalissimo of the Kuru hosts.

22. There also was stationed the handsome ruler of the Sindhus, immovable like the mount Meru itself. By the side of the ruler of the Sindhus, headed by Aswathaman,

23. Stood, O mighty monarch, your thirty sons, all resembling the celestials themselves. That gamester, the ruler of the Gandharas, Salya and Bhurisravas,

24. These mighty car-warriors shone in the flank of the king of the Sindhus. Then raged a combat between your troops and those of the enemy,—combat, that was fierce in the extreme and horripilating and in which the warriors regarded Death to be their goal.

Thus ends the thirty-fourth chapter, the construction of the circular array, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXXV.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. The Parthas then led by Bhimasena marched against that invincible array of your soldiers protected by the son of Bharadwaja.

2. Then Satyaki, Chekitana, Prishata's son Dhristadyumna, the powerful Kuntivoja, the mighty car-warrior Drupada,

3. The son of Arjuna, Kshatradharman, the puissant Vrihat-kshattra, the ruler of the Chedis, Dhristaketu, the two sons of Madri, Gototkacha,

4. Yudhamanyu of great prowess, the unvanquished Sikhandin, the irrepressible Uttamonjas, the mighty car-warrior Virata,

5. The wrathful sons of Droupadi, the valiant son of Sisupala, the highly powerful Kekayas, and the Srinjayas by thousands,

6. These and many others followed by their respective clansmen, all accomplished in the use of weapons, and invincible in battle, rushed with impetuosity at the son of Bharadwaja, out of a desire for battling with him.

7. The highly puissant son of Bharadwaja getting the warriors within reach dauntlessly checked them with a mighty downpour of arrows.

8. Like a mighty wave of waters checked by an immovable hill or like the swelling ocean checked by the banks, those warriors of the Pandava army were dashed back by Drona.

9. Afflicted, O king, with the shafts shot from Drona's bow, the Pandavas could not stand in front of Bharadwaja's son.

10. Then we beheld the wonderful strength of Drona's arms, in as much as, the Panchalas aided by the Srinjayas was not able to assail him.

11. Beholding then the infuriate Drona rush towards himself, king Yudhisthira reflected upon the diverse measures for resisting the former.

12. At last regarding Drona to be incapable of being checked by any one else, Yudhisthira placed that unbearable and heavy burden on the son of Subhadra.

13. Then addressing that slayer of hostile heroes, namely, Abhimanyu, who was in no way inferior to the son of Vasudeva and was supperior to Arjuna himself in infiniteness of prowess, king Yudhisthira said these words :—

14. "O son, do you so act, that coming back, Arjuna may not have reason to reproach us. The means for breaking the circular array, is not known to any one of us.

15. O mighty-armed one, either you or Arjuna, or Krishna, or Pradyumna, can penetrate into the circular array. I do not find a fifth man to do it.

16. It behoves you, so, O son, O Abhimanyu, to accord the boon that your sires, your uncles, and all these soldiers beg of you.

17. Quickly taking up your arms, smite down this array of Drona so that returning from the fight with the Sampaptakas Dhananaya may not blame us."

Abhimanyu said :—

18. Desiring victory to my sires, I will, without delay, penetrate into the middle of Drona's firm and fierce and excellent array of troops in this battle.

19. My father has taught me the way to penetrate this kind of array. But I do not know how to come out of the array, if per chance some danger overtake me there.

Yudhisthira said :—

20. Pierce, O foremost of warriors, this array, and create an opening for us to penetrate into it. Pursuing the very track you shall create, we will follow you.

21. Seeing you penetrate the hostil ranks, we will follow you, O sire, who are equal to Dhananjaya himself in battle, protecting you from all sides.

Bhima said :—

22. I will follow you, so also will Dhristadyumna and Satyaki and the Panchalas, the Kekayas, the Matsyas, and the Prabhadrakas.

23. When the array will once be penetrated into by you, we will again and again destroy it, slaying foremost of the enemie's warriors.

Abhimanyu said :—

24. I will break through this invincible array of Drona, like an insect under the influence of anger entering into the flames.

25. I will this day achieve that feat that will redound to the good of both the families (of my father and mother). I will do what will please my sire and my maternal uncle.

26. All creatures will see the enemies' host crushed in large bodies by myself, an unaided child.

27. I will not consider myself to be begotten by Partha, or born of Subhadra, if to-day, encounterring me, anybody escapes with his life.

28. If to-day, on a single car I cannot cut the whole race of the Kshatriyas into eight pieces in battle, I will not regard myself as the begotten son of Arjuna.

Yudhisthira said :—

29. May your might, O son of Subhadra, increase even as you speak, in asmuch as you venture to break through this impenetrable array of Drona,

30. Being protected by these foremost of men, all fierce bowmen possessed of great strength, all resembling the Sadhyas, or the Rudras or the Marutas, all who equal the Vasus, the fires, and the Adityas in prowess.

Sanjaya said :—

31. Hearing those words of Yudhisthira, Abhimanyu commanded his charioteer saying :—"Quickly urge, O Sumitra, the steeds towards Drona's divisions."

Thus ends the thirty-fifth chapter, the determination of Abhimanyu, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. The son of Subhadra, having heard the words of the intelligent king Yudhisthira commanded his charioteer to drive his chariot against the army of Drona.

2. Thus commanded by him with the words—Proceed, Proceed—the charioteer, O king, then replied to Abhimanyu saying ;—

3. "Heavy is the burden, O long-lived one, that has to-day been placed on you by the Pandavas. Ascertaining by your judgment as to whether you have the strength to bear it or not, you should engage in the fight.

4. The preceptor Drona, by continued labours, has acquired the excelleut weapons, and he is an adept in the art of warfare. You, on the other hand, have been brought up in all luxury and are unaccustomed to the toils and severities of fight."

5. Thereupon Abhimanyu, with a smile, replied to his charioteer saying :—" O charioteer, who is indeed this Drona? What avails all this vast host of the Kshatriyas?

6. I would engage even with Indra on the back of his elephant Airavata, and attended by the complete host of the immortals. I do not care anything for all this Kshatriyas to-day.

7. This host of the enemy is not competent to fight even with the sixteenth part of myself. Getting, O son of a driver, my uncle, the world-conquering Vishnu,

8. Or my father, for my antagonist in battle, I will not this day be overcome with terror.," Thereafter Abhimanyu setting at naught those words of his charioteer,

9—10. Commanded him saying :—"Quickly drive towards the division of Drona." Then the charioteer with a heart scarcely cheerful, urged on his steeds, three years of age and decked with caparisons of gold.' Then urged on towards the army of Drona by Sumitra, those steeds,

11. Endued with great fleetness and prowess, rushed, O king, against Drona himself. Beholding Abhimanyu thus advance, all the warriors, headed by Drona, of the Kourava host, advanced to meet him who was on the other hand followed by the Pandavas.

12. Then like a young lion falling upon a herd of elephants, the son of Arjuna equal to Arjuna in prowess, owning an excellent standard bearing the device of a Karanikara tree, clad in fine coats of mail, fearlessly rushed against Drona, out of a desire for battle.

13. Filled with delight, the warriors of Drona's division began to strike Abhimanyu as he strove to break through their ranks. Then for a moment only there reigned a confusion, that resembled the eddy that is produced there where the Ganges stream flows into the waters of the ocean.

14. Then as the heroes fought on and slew one another, O king, there commenced a pell-mell and awful fight.

15. When that awful conflict raged fiercely, the son of Arjuna breaking through the enemies' array entered it even before the very eyes of Drona himself.

16. Then large bodies of elephant-riders, horse-men, car-warriors and foot-soldiers, all delighted, surrounded that mighty hero who penetrating into the enemies' ranks, had already began to smite them down.

17. With the sound of various musical instruments, with shouts and slappings of arm-pits and war-cries, with yells, leonine roars, with cries of Slay, Slay,

18. With a dreadful and confused din, with exclamation of Do not go, Stop, Come to me, with repeated voices saying, Here am I, Come &c,

19. With roars of elephants, with the tinkling of ornaments, with roars of laughter, with the clatter of car-wheels and horse-hoofs,—filling the earth with all these sounds, the Kourava warriors assailed the son of Arjuna.

20. That hero endowed with great lightness in discharging weapons, and possessed of the knowledge of the vital parts of the body, swiftly and firmly shooting arrrows capable of penetrating into the very vitals, began to slaughter those advancing warriors of the enemy.

21. Though thus slaughtered by diverse shafts of exceeding sharpness, and rendered quite helpless, yet they, in that battle, fell upon Abhimanyu like flights of insects falling upon fire.

22. Then with their bodies and their severed limbs, Abhimanyu covered the earth like a priest covering the altar with Kusa-grass during a sacrifice.

23—26. Then Arjuna's son quickly lopped off by thousands the arms of your warriors; some of these arms were protected with gloves made of iguana skin, some held bows and shafts; some grasped swords, or bucklers or iron hooks and reins, some held lances and axes; some clutched maces or iron ball or spears. Some had in their grasps scimitars or crows or battle-axes; some held short darts, or shafts or Kampanas; some held goads and huge conch-shells, some wielded piked lances and Kachgrahas, 'some had mallets or other kinds of missiles; some had nooses, some heavy clubs, and brick-bats. All of these arms again were ornamented with bracelets and bangles and smeared with fragrant perfumes and unguents.

27. Then covered with those effulgent arms all bathed in the crimson fluid, the field, O sire, O mighty monarch, appeared as if strewn over with five-headed serpents torn to pieces by Garuda.

28—30. Then Phalguna's son spread the earth with the severed heads of the enemy—heads graced with beautiful noses and countenances and tresses of hair, and without bloches, and adorned with ear-rings; heads from which blood flowed copiously and in which the nether lips were bit in anger; heads that appeared like lotuses severed from their stems owing to their being decked with beautiful garlands, and tiaras, and turbans, and pearls and gems, and owing to their being possessed of the splendour of the sun or the moon; heads that laved with fragrant perfumes could speak sweet and salutary words, when the vital spark was in them.

31—33. Then, O Bharata, Arjuna's son careered in all directions over the field, having shattered with his arrows, cars, equipt with all the necessaries of war, and looking like the vapoury edifices in the air; having shafts in front and excellent bamboo poles, and looking beautiful with standards mounted on them. They were all deprived of their Janghas, axels, perriferries, and Dascnas, wheels, standards, and terraces; the implements of war in them were all splintered into pieces; the precious clothes that covered them were all blown away and warriors on those cars, were slain by thousands.

34—35. Then again with arrows of keen points and edges he cut down the enemy's elephants, with their riders, standards hooks, banners, quivers, armours, girths, neck-ropes, caparisons, blankets, bells, trunks; and also the foot-soldiers that guarded those elephants from the back.

36—39. Numerous steeds of the Vanayu' the Lilly, the Kamvoja, and the Valhika breed with tails, ears, and eyes fixed and motionless, endued with great fleetness, well-broken, ridden by accomplished warriors armed with swords and spears, were seen to be deprived of the fine ornaments of their heads as also of their fine tails; they were deeply pierced, and lay covering the field. Their tongues and their eyes were fixed, and their livers and entrails were drawn out; their riders had been slain; their bells torn, and they enhanced the delight of flesh-eating animals. Their armours and other leathern fences were cut open and they lay weltering in the urine and excreta they themselves had discharged. Thus slaughtering your steeds and elephants, Abhimanyu appeared highly beautiful.

40. Achieving, single-handed, these most difficult of feats, like the incomprehensible Vishnu in the days of old, Abhimanyu crushed your army consisting of three kinds of forces,

41. Even like the three-eyed Deity of infinite prowess crushing the Asura host. In that battle, the son of Arjuna having achieved feats incapable of being achieved by the enemy,

42—43. Began to break through your infantry divisions on all sides. Thus then beholding the army mangled with sharp arrows of the single-handed son of Subhadra like the army of the Asuras mangled by Skanda, your sons looked vacantly at all the ten points of the compass.

44. Their mouths became parched up; their eyes rolled; their persons were covered with drops of perspiration. Desponding to conquer their antagonist, they exerted themselves in flying away from the field.

45. Desirous of saving their lives, they called out one another by their appellation and family-names. Forsaking on the field their wounded fathers, sons, brothers, friends and relations, they strove to fly away from the field urging the horses and elephants that carried them to the top of their speed.

Thus end the thirty-sixth chapter, the display of Abhimanyu's prowess, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then beholding his army routed by Subhadra's son of immeasurable energy, king Duryodhana worked up to the highest pitch of fury, himself proceeded against the former.

2. Then seeing the king turn back upon Subhadra's son in battle, Drona addressed the warriors saying "Save the king.

3. The highly puissant Abhimanyu is slaying even before our very eyes, every one he is aiming at. Assail him, and be not afraid; and rescue the king of the Kurus."

4. Thereupon grateful, mighty and friendly warriors, ever attended with victory though inspired with fears, yet surrounded your heroic son in order to rescue him.

5. Drona and Drona's son, Kripa, Karna, Kritavarman, and Suvala's son, Vrihadvala, the ruler of the Madras, Bhuri, Bhurisravas, and Sala,

6. Pourava and Vrishasena, all shooting sharp arrows, covered Subhadra's son with thick downpour of arrows.

7. Then thus confounding the latter, they rescued Duryodhana. But Arjuna's son did not tolerate this snatching away of the monarch from his very mouth.

8. Compelling those mighty car-warriors with their horses and charioteer to turn their faces away from the field of battle, by means of his arrowy downpour, the son of Subhadra sent up a loud war-cry.

9. Hearing that war-cry of his, resembling the roar of a lion desirous of prey, the warriors of your army headed by Drona and inflamed with rage, did not brook it.

10. Completely surrounding Abhimanyu with their host of cars, your warriors O sire, began to shoot at him myriads of arrows of diverse description all falling in thick showers.

11. But your grandson, with his own sharp arrows severed all these shafts even when the latter were coursing through the sky; in return also he pierced your warriors; indeed that feat then appeared wonderful.

12. Thereupon your warriors, excited with wrath in consequence of being wounded with shafts of the touch of fire and desirous of slaying the unretreating son of Subhadra, surrounded him on all sides.

13. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, with his arrows that served the purpose of banks, Arjuna's son held in check the agitated ocean that was then identified with the vast number of your troops.

14. None among those heroes, viz., Abhimanyu on one side and all your warriors on the other, who were then fighting with and slaying one another, turned away from the field of battle.

15. Thus when that awful and terrible combat raged fiercely, Dussaha pierced Abhimanyu with nine arrows.

16. Dussasana pierced him with twelve, Kripa the son of Saradwata with three, Drona with seventeen arrows, all resembling so many snakes of virulent poison.

17. Vivinsati pierced him with seventy, Kritavarman with seven, Vrihadvala with eight and Ashwathaman with seven arrows.

18. Bhurisravas wounded him with three arrows, and the king of the Madras with six swift-coursing shafts. Sakuni pierced him with a couple of shafts and king Duryodhana with three.

19. Abhimanyu, on the other hand, O mighty monarch, pierced each of them with three straight-flying arrows, displaying his prowess and appearing to dance all the while with his bow in hand.

20. Then Abhimanyu, enraged in consequence of your sons seeking to terrify him displayed his marvellous might that he had acquired through his culture and practices.

21. Then borne by his well-trained steeds possessed of the fleetness of Garuda or of the wind, and perfectly obedient to the behests of him who held their reins, Abhimanyu quickly repulsed the heir of Asmaka.

22. Standing before him, the prosperous and mighty son of Asmaka, pierced him with ten arrows, saying all the while, stay stay.

23. Then with ten arrows Abhimanyu smilingly cut down to the earth, his charioteer, horses, standards, arms, bow, and head.

24. When the heroic ruler of the Asmakas had thus been slain by the son of Subhadra, the whole of his army being completely agitated, took to flight.

25. Thereupon Karna, Kripa, Drona, Drona's son, the ruler of the Gandharas, Cala, Salya Bhurisravas, Kratha, Somadatta, Vivingsati,

26. Vrishasena, Susena, Khundadin, Pratardonna, Vrindara, Lalitha, Pravahu, Dirghalochana,

27. And king Duryodhana, all excited with rage, covered him with a shower of arrows. Thus deeply pierced with straight-g ng arrows by those mighty bowmen, Abhimanyu

28. Sped at Karna an arrow capable of penetrating through his armour and body. That swift-flying dart piercing through Karna's armour and body,

29. Entered, O king, the earth, like a snake entering its hole in an ant-hill. Pained to the extreme in consequence of that deep wound, and over-whelmed with a swoon,

30—31. Karna trembled in battle like a hill during an earth-quake. Then with other sharp arrows the valiant Abhimanyu inflamed with rage, slew Sushena, Dirghalochana, and Kundavedhin. Thereafter Karna pierced him in return, with twenty-five long shafts.

32. Aswathaman pierced him with twenty, and Kritavarman with seven arrows. Then that enraged grandson of Sakra, with his body stuck all over with arrows,

33. Looked, as he careered through the forces, like the Destroyer himself with noose in hand. Then he covered Salya who was standing near him with a thick shower of arrows;

34. And then that mighty-armed hero sent up a loud war-cry, that inspired terror into your troops. Pierced with straight arrows capable of penetrating to the vitals shot by Abhimanyu accomplished in all weapons,

35. Salya squatted down on the terrace of his car, O king, and fainted away. Beholding him thus deeply pierced by the illustrious son of Subhadra,

36. All the troops began to fly away, even before the very eyes of the son of Bharadwaja. Beholding that mighty-armed hero Salya, covered with gold-winged shafts, your troops fled like herds of deer frightened by the lion.

37. Then Abhimanyu, extolled by the ancestral manes, the celestials, and Charanas and Siddhas, and also by various kinds of beings inhabiting the earth, with eulogies about his heroism and bravery in battle, appeared blazing like fire fed with clarified butter.

Thus ends the thirty-seventh chapter the display of Abhimanyu's prowess, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. What warriors of my army then tried to resist the son of Arjuna in battle when he was thus crushing my troops with his straight-flying arrows?

Sanjaya said :—

2. Hear, O king, of the wonderful acheivements of the prince (Abhimanyu), when he was engaged in breaking through the car-division protected by Bharadwaja's son himself.

3. Seeing Salya the ruler of the Madras worsted in battle by Subhadra's son with his arrows, his younger brother, inflamed with wrath proceeded to battle, showering shafts in all directions.

4—6. Thereupon the light-handed son of Arjuna, with his arrows, cut off his antagonist's head and neck, arms and legs, four steeds, umbrella, standard and charioteer; his triple bamboo pole fixed to the car, his car-terrace, car-wheels, yokes, shafts, quivers, car-bottom, his banner, his implements of war with which the car was furnished and also the two persons engaged in protecting his car-wheels. No one was then able to discern him (in consequence of the swiftness of his movement). Salya's brother then pierced through his ornaments and attires, fell down dead on the ground,

7. Like a mighty mountain-crest broken by the overwhelming vehemence of a tempest. His followers then seized with panic, fled in all directions.

8. Beholding that feat achieved by Arjuna's son, all creatures were filled with delight and they applauded him, O Bharata, saying, "Well-done" "Well-done,"

9—10. When Salya's brother had thus been killed, many of his soldiers, loudly proclaiming their names, places of residence, and families, rushed against Arjuna's son, being excited with rage and wielding in their arms various kinds of weapons. All those warriors was possessed of great strength, ; some of them rushed on their car, others on steeds, others on elephants and some on foot.

11. With the whizz of their arrows, with the loud clatter of their car-wheels, with war-cries, with roars, whoops and exclamations, with leonine roars and cries,

12. With the twang of their bow-strings, and with many other kinds of sound—seeking to terrify Arjuna's son, they rushed at him saying, "You shall not escape us today with your life, even if it cost us our own lives."

13. Hearing them thus speak, the son of Subhadra smilingly pierced those with shafts who had smitten him first.

14. Holding diverse kinds of weapons, all beautiful and swift-going, to the gaze of the peeple, Arjuna's heroic son battled with them mildly.

15. Then, in no way less than Krishna and Arjuna, Abhimanyu began to display all those weapons he had received from Vasudeva's son and Arjuna.

16. Setting at naught the heavy burden he had drawn upon himself, and dismissing all fears away, Abhimanyu then scattered his arrows (in all directions). No interval could then be noticed between his taking up and shooting the shafts.

17. Only his bow drawn to the fullest stretch could then be seen blazing like the burning disc of the sun in the autumnal sky.

18. Then, O Bharata, there were heard the twangs of his bow and the slapping of his palms, resembling the rumble of rain-clouds surcharged with thunder during the rains.

19. Bashful, unenvious, handsome and devoted to the elders, the son of Subhadra, out of respect for his heroic opponents fought on with arrows and other weapons,

20. Mildly ; but gradually he grew fierce, O king, like the blazing autumnal Sun at the end of the rainy seasons.

21. Then like the lustrous orb shooting his rays, he, excited with wrath, shot hundreds of diverse kinds of arrows, all whetted on stone and furnished with golden wings.

22. Then with horse-shoe-headed arrows, calf-tooth-headed shafts, with Vipatas, with long shafts, with crescent-headed arrows and with Anjalikas, that illustrious warrior

23. Began to mangle the car-division of your army, even before the eyes of Bharadwaja's son. Thereupon the army afflicted with his shafts turned its face away from the field of battle.

Thus ends the thirty-eighth chapter, the display of Abhimanyu's, prowess in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XXXIX,

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—

Dhritarastra said :—

1. Upon hearing that Subhadra's son, single-handed as he was, held in bay the entire army of my son, my heart, O Sanjaya, is simultaneously filled with shame and delight.

2. O son of Gavalgani, relate to me in detail the fight with prince Abhimanyu, that seems to be much like that between Skanda and the Asuras.

Sanjaya said :—

3. Yes ; I will tell you all about the dreadful carnage, the dreadful battle that was fought between the one and the many.

4. Then mounted upon his car and exerting his best, Abhimanyu began to shower shafts upon your warriors, all subduers of their foes, mounted on cars and exerting to the best of their might.

5—6. Roving like a circle of fire, he then struck his arrows on Drona, Karna, Kripa, Salya, Drona's son, Bhoja, Vrihadvala, Duryodhana, Somadatta's son, the valiant Sakuni, and various other kings and princes and diverse kind of troops.

7. With his excellent weapons slaying his foes, the highly puissant son of Subhadra, endued with fierce energy, was then seen, O Bharata, on all directions.

8. Beholding those feats of Subhadra's son of immeasurable prowess, your troops trembled repeatedly.

9. Thereupon the highly wise and valiant son of Bharadwaja, with his eyes blooming forth in delight, addressing Kripa quickly said.

10. Beholding then Abhimanyu proficient in battle he said these words to Kripa, O Bharata, thereby seeming to pierce the very vitals of your sons.

Drona said :—

11. "Yonder advances the youthful son of Subhadra at the head of the Parthas, imparting delight to all his friends, to king Yudhisthira,

12. To Nakula, to Sahadeva, to Bhimasena the son of Pandu, to his friends, relatives, kinsmen and to all who are passive and neutral spectators.

13. I do not regard any other bowman equal to him in fight. If he wills, he can annihilate this vast host; but why does he not wish it?"

14. Thereupon hearing the words of Drona that betrayed how delighted he was (at Abhimanyu's feat), your son enraged with Abhimanyu, smiled looking at Drona.

15. Thereafter, king Duryodhana addressing Karna, king Valhika, Dussasana, the ruler of the Madras, and many other mighty car-warriors present, said ;—

16. "The preceptor of all venerable Kshatriyas, this one foremost of all those conversant with Brahma, does not, out of affection, wish to slay the son of Arjuna.

17. None can escape him in battle, no, not even the Destroyer himself, if he comes as an antagonist. What then, O friends, shall we say of a mortal! I say this forsooth.

18. He spares the son of Arjuna for he is his pupil. Pupils, their sons and grandsons, are ever dear to the righteous people.

19. Thus protected by Drona Abhimanyu is prizing his valor highly. Indeed he is a fool proud of himself. Crush him without delay."

20. Thus spoken to, O king, they rushed against the son of Subhadra the daughter of the Satwata race, all inspired with wrath and a desire to slay the latter, before the very eyes of Bharadwaja's son.

21. Then that foremost of the Kurus viz., Dussasana, having heard the words of Duryodhana, addressed these words to him in reply :—

22. "I tell you, O mighty monarch, I will slay this one before the very eyes of the sons of Pandu, and at the sight of the Panchalas themselves.

23. To-day, like the Rahu devouring the maker of the day, I will devour the son of Subhadra." Then raising his voice, Dussasana once more spoke to the Kuru kings thus :—

24. "Hearing that the son of Subhadra has been slain by me, the two Krishnas, both braggards, will surely go to the regions of the departed, leaving this world of animate beings.

25. Then it is evident also, that hearing of the death of these latter, the other sons of Pandu, with all their allies and friends, will give up their lives in the course of a single day, out of despair.

26. It seems therefore, that this one enemy of yours being slain, all the rest of them will be destroyed. Wish me well, O king, even I will slay this your enemy.

27. Having thus spoken, O king, your son Dussasana waxing wroth and sending up a loud war cry, rushed at Subhadra's son, covering him at the same time with a shower of arrows.

28. Then, O subduer of your foes, beholding your wrathful son advance furiously towards himself, Abhimanyu wounded him with twenty-six arrows of exceeding sharpness.

29. Then like an elephant with its temples rent, Dussasana infuriate with rage, fought on with Abhimanyu the illustrious son of Subhadra.

30. Then those two heroes well-versed in the art of driving cars, fought on describing beautiful circles, right and left, with their cars.

31. The combatants then set up a loud din, with the sounds of their Pandavas Mridangas Dundubhis, Krackachas, mighty Anakas, Bheris and Jharjharas, mingled with their war-cries, such as is produced by the great reservoir of saline water.

Thus ends the thirty-ninth chapter, the encounter between Dussasana and Abhimanyu, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XL.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya Said :—

1. Then the highly intelligent Abhimanyu with his body mangled with arrow-wounds smilingly addressing his antagonist Dussasana stationed before him, spoke these words.

2. "It is by good luck that to-day I find before me that vain warrior of cruel deeds and lost righteousness who ever brays loudly in his own applause.

3. In as much as in the midst of the assembly of courtiers and at the very hearing of king Dhritarastra, you pierced the very virtuous king Yudhisthira with harsh words,

4. And in as much depending on the unfair game at dice and on the skill of Sakuni therein, you, intoxicated with joy, addressed many wild words to Bhima,

5—7. In consequence of all these acts and in consequence of the wrath of all those illustrious heroes, the present fate has overtaken you. O wicked-minded one, do you now reap the fatal fruits of your robbery of other peoples' possessions, of your wrathful temperaments, of your hatred for peace, of your covetousness, of your ignorance, harmfulness and persecution of others, as also of depriving my sires, all fierce bowmen, of their kingdom, and of your own unrighteousness. This day before the eyes of all these warriors I will chastise you with my arrows.

8. This day I will free myself from the burden of anger I bear against you, as also from the debt I owe to my sires and to the angry Krishna, who ever desire your death.

9. To-day, O descendant of the Kuru race, I will in battle pay off the debt I owe to Bhima; you shall not this day escape me with life, provided you do not abandon the fight."

10. Having thus spoken, that mighty-armed hero, that slayer of hostile heroes, fixed on his bow-string an arrow, endued with the effulgence of Yama, Fire, or the Windgod, and calculated to bring about Dussasana's death.

11. Flying towards Dussasana's breast, that arrow pierced his shoulder-joint up to the very bones, like a snake piercing into an ant hill.

12. Then again he struck Dussasana with twenty-five arrows that resembled fire in their touch, and were shot from his bow drawn back even to his very ears (i.e. fully).

13. Thus deeply pierced and pained to the extreme, Dussasana squatted down on the terrace of his chariot and, O mighty monarch, he became uncouscious in a swoon.

14. Thereupon his charioteer quickly carried away from the field the unconscious Dussasana who had been sorely afflicted by Abhimanyu's arrows.

15. The Pandavas, the sons of Droupadi, and Visaka and the Kekayas and the Panchalas, beholding that act of Subhadra's son sent up a loud roar like that of a lion.

16. Then filled with joy, the troops of the Pandavss struck up numerous musical instruments of various description and shape, from all sides.

17. Beholding that feat achieved by Subhadra's son, they were amazed. Then seeing their most implacable and arrogant adversary thus worsted,

18. The five mighty car-warriors, viz., the five sons of Droupadi bearing on their standards as device the images of Yama, Maruta, Indra and the Asuras.

19. As also Satyaki, Chekitana, Dhristadyumna Sikhandin, the Kekaya brothers, Dhristaketu, and the Matsyas, the Panchalas, and the Srinjayas,

20. And the Pandavas, were all enraptured and then headed by Yudhisthira, they rushed to battle desirous of breaking through Drona's division.

21. Then there commenced a fierce battle between the foe and your troops, all unretreating heroes, bent on achieving victory.

22. Thus, O king, when the awful battle raged furiously, Duryodhana addressing Radha's son said these words.

23. "Behold the heroic Dussasana worsted by Abhimanyu—he who had been ere now slaying and scorching the foe like the sun himself.

24. Yonder rushes the infuriate Pandavas, looking like so many mighty lions, with weapons uplifted, to the rescue of Subhadra's son."

25. Thereupon inflamed with wrath Karna ever bent on doing good to your son, covered the invincible Abhimanyu with many sharp arrows.

26. Then as if in contempt, the valiant Karna pierced the followers of Subhadra's son in battle with sharp shafts of excellent make.

27. Thereupon the high-souled Abhimanyu, who was longing to meet Drona himself, quickly pierced, O king, Radha's son with seventy-three shafts all whetted on stone.

28. Then there was no car-warrior save and except Drona himself who could have checked that grandson of the wielder of the thunderbolt, who had then been afflicting the mighty car-warriors sorely.

29. Thereafter displaying many excellent weapons, Karna, that most honoured of all bowmen, desirous of victory pierced Subhadra's son with hundreds of shafts.

30. Then that puissant pupil of Rama, that foremost of all men learned in the use of weapons, began to afflict Abhimanyu who was incapable of being vanquished by the foe.

31. Though thus afflicted with showers of weapons hurled by Radha's son, yet the son of Subhadra equal to an immortal, did not flinch.

32. Thereafter having cut off the bows of warriors, with broad-headed shafts of depressed knots all whetted on stone, Arjuna's son began to afflict Karna in return.

33. Then with arrows, shot from his bow drawn to a circle, and resembling snakes of virulent poison in touch, Abhimanyu quickly cut off Karna's umbrella, standard, horses and charioteer, smiling all the while.

34. Then Karna sped at him five shafts of straight-knots; but the son of Phalguna dauntlessly received all those arrows.

35. Then that valiant hero in a moment cutting off with a single shaft Karna's bow and standard, felled them to the ground.

36. Seeing Karna in such a plight his younger brother, stretching his bow with great force impetuously rushed at Subhadra's son.

37. At this, the Parthas sent up a loud uproar; their followers beat and blew many musical instruments; and they all applauded the sons of Subhadra.

Thus ends the fortieth chapter, the defeat of Karna and Dussasana, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XLI.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Then that brother of Karna armed with a bow and stretching its string repeatedly, soon placed himself between those two high-souled car-warriors.

2. Then as if smiling he pierced the invincible Abhimanyu together with his umbrella, standard, charioteer and steeds with ten sharp arrows.

3. Then beholding Abhimanyu, who had been achieving superhuman feats after the manner of his father and grandfather, afflicted with those shafts, your warriors became enraptured.

4. Thereupon Abhimanyu smiled and bending his bow shot a winged shaft that lopped off his antogonist's head, and then the latter fell down from his chariot.

5. Then, O monarch, Karna was extremely pained on seeing his brother slain and overthrown like a blossoming Karnikara tree thrown down by the wind from the mountain top.

6. Thereafter having compelled Karns to turn back from the field with arrowa furnished with Kanka feathers, Subhadra's son quickly assailed other mighty bowmen.

7. Then Abhimanyu possessed of fierce energy and great renown, wrought up with rage, began to break through the various division of cars, elephants, steeds, and infantry.

8. Meanwhile Karna who had been afflicted by Abhimanyu with his myriads of shafts, fled away from the field of battle, being borne by fleet steeds. Your army then began to give way.

9. Then when the sky was covered with the arrows of Abhimanyu, like the flights of locusts or thick showers of rain, O king, nothing could be distinguished.

10. Amongst all your warriors then thus slaughtered by Abhimanyu with his sharp shafts, none stayed on the field, except the ruler of the Sindhus.

11. Thereupon, that foremost of princes viz., Subhadra's son, blowing his conch fell, O foremost of the Bharatas, upon the army of the Bharatas.

12. Then like fire set to work on a heap of dried grass, consuming the hostile ranks, Arjuna's son moved in circles amidst the Kourava host.

13. Breaking through the hostile array, he began to afflict car-warriors, elephant-riders, horse-men and infantry with his great arrows; and thus made the earth impassable with headless trunks.

14. Mangled with the shafts of excellent make, shot from the bow of Subhadra's son, the Kouravas fled in fear of their lives, slaying, as they ran, their own partisans that happened to meet them.

15. Those dreadful shafts of terrible effects and touch, penetrating through car-warriors, elephants and horses, struck on the earth's surface.

16. With weapons in grasp, with finger-preservers, with maces in clutch, and with Angadas and decked with golden ornaments, arms were seen to be strewn on the ground.

17. Arrows and bows and swords and corpses and heads with ear-rings and garlands were seen on the ground by hundreds.

18. Strewn over with Upashkaras, Adishthanas, long poles, and with shattered Akshasas and broken wheels and yokes, thousands in number,

19. With arrows, bows, swords, fallen standards; with backless bows and shafts scattered about,

20. With the bodies of slain Kshatriyas, horses and elephants, the field of battle looking fierce soon became impassable.

21. Then as the princes were being slaughtered by Abhimanyu, they created a loud noise enhancing the apprehension of the cowards, by calling one another by their names.

22. That din, O foremost of the Bharatas, filled all the points of the compass with its echo; the son of Subhadra then assailed the Kourava host killing excellent car-warriors, steeds and elephants.

23. Then like fire set to a heap of straw, Arjuna's son began to consume his foes; and he was then seen to stand in the very centre of the Bharata troops.

24. Then surrounded as he was by our troops and covered with dust, we could not obtain sight of him, when he, O Bharata, careered through the cardinal and subsidiary directions.

25. The next moment, O Bharata, we beheld him shining like the mid-day sun, and wrenching the lives out of elephants, steeds and men.

26. We then beheld, O mighty monarch, Abhimanyu afflict his foes. In that battle that grandson of Vasava viz., Abhimanyu equal to Vasava himself in prowess, shone, O mighty monarch, in the very centre of your troops.

Thus ends the forty-first chapter, the display of Abhimanyu's prowess, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XLII.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. When that heroic Abhimanyu, that veritable child brought up in great luxury, proud of the strength of his arms, expert in the art of fighting, of noble blood, ready to sacrifice his life in battle,

2. Penetrated into our ranks, borne by his excellent steeds, three years old, was there any one else of the army of Yudhisthira, who then followed him?

Sanjaya said :

3. Yudhisthira, Bhimasena Sikhandin, Satyaki, the twins Nakula and Sahadeva Dhristadyumna, Virata, Drupada with the Kekayas,

4—5. Dhristaketu, and the Matsyas, all inflamed with rage, rushed to battle. Then Abhimanyu's sires accompanied by his maternal uncles, all accomplished in slaying their opponents, formed in battle-array, rushed, desirous of rescuing him, through the breach he himself had created in the enemies' ranks. Seeing those heroes rush to battle, all your warriors turned their faces away from the field of battle.

6. Thereupon beholding the mighty army of your son give way, your son-in-law endued with fierce energy, proceeded to rally them.

7. Then, O monarch, Jayadratha the royal son of the Sindhu king, checked the Parthas backed by their troops, when they tried to rescue their son (Abhimanyu).

8. That mighty bowmen of great skill in archery, viz., the son of Vridhakshatra then checked, displaying his celestial weapons, the Pandavas, like an elephant playing on the low-lands.

Dhritarastra said :—

9. I consider, O Sanjaya, that a heavy burthen was then placed upon the king of the Sindhus, in as much as he had to withstand the enraged Pandavas desirous of rescuing their son.

10. It appears to me that the Sindhu ruler was endowed with wonderful might and heroism. Tell me of the feats and heroism of that illustrious warrior.

11. What gifts did he make, or what sacrifice did he accomplish, or what austerities did he undergo by virtue of which he was able to resist, single-handed, the enraged sons of Pritha?

Sanjaya said :—

12. On the occasion of the abduction of Droupadi, Jayadratha was humiliated by Bhimasena. Out of a feeling of this humiliation, the king performed rigid austerities for securing desirable boons.

13. Withholding his senses from the objects pleasurable to them, and suffering (patiently) the pangs of hunger and thirst, he tortured his body till his swollen veins appeared to view.

14. Chaunting the eternal hymns of the Vedas, he worshipped the God Sarva (Mahadeva). Thereupon that illustrious God, ever compassionate towards his devotees, became gracious on him.

15. The god Hara revealing himself in a dream to the son of the ruler of the Sindhus, addressed him thus :—"Ask the boon you like; I am pleased with you, O Jayadratha, what do you desire ?"

16. Thus spoken to by Sarva (Mahadeva), king Jayadratha bowing down to him with folded palms and subdued soul, said :—

17. "I desire that I may check in battle on a single car and single-handed, the Pandavas, possessed though they are of extraordinary prowess and energy." This was the boon which he asked from the god.

18. Thus addressed, that God of gods, spoke unto Jayadratha, in the following manner :—" O gentle one, I accord you the boon ; save and except Dhananjaya, the son of Pritha,

19. You shall vanquish in battle the other four sons of Pandu." "So be it" said Jayadratha in answer to what the God of gods had said and then awoke from his sleep.

20. In consequence of having received this boon and through the virtue of the celestial weapon he possessed, he was competent to check the Pandava hosts, single-handed.

21. The twang of his bow-string inspired the hostile warriors with fear, filling at the same time, the hearts of your troops with joy.

22. The Kshatriyas then beholding the king of the Sindhus take upon himself the whole burden of the onset, rushed with deafening war-cries at the divisions of Yudhisthira.

Thus ends the forty-second chapter the fight between Jayadratha and the Pandavas, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XLIII.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)— Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. You ask me, O mighty monarch, to describe the prowess of the ruler of Sindhus. I shall describe all that in detail. Hear how he fought with the sons of Pandu.

2. Excellent steeds of the Sindhu breed obedient to the behests of the charioteer, and fleet as the wind itself, carried him to the field of battle.

3. He rode a chariot duly furnished with the implements of war, and looking like an aerial castle. His mighty standard decked with the device of an argentine boar, appeared highly resplendent.

4. With white umbrellas, with penons, and with the yak-tails that were used to fan him, with all these emblems of royalty, he appeared beautiful like the moon in the midst of myriad of stars.

5. His iron-made car-fence embossed with pearls, diamonds and gold, appeared effulgent like the welkin bespangled with the luminaries.

6. Stretching his mighty bow and shooting numerous shafts, he filled up the Kourava array there where Arjuna's son had created breaches.

7. He wounded Satyaki with three arrows, Vrikodara with eight, Dhristadyumna with sixty and Virata with ten and

8. Drupada with five sharp arrows and Sikhandin with ten. He pierced the Kekayas with twenty-five, the Droupadeyas with three shafts each.

9. Then piercing Yudhisthira with seventy arrows, he mangled the rest of his army with a mighty downpour of arrows ; and that feat appeared indeed wonderful.

10. Thereupon, O king, the highly puissant son of Dharma (Yudhisthira), laughing the while, cut off, with a sharp and well-tempered arrow the bow the ruler of the Sindhus.

11. But the latter, taking up within the twinkle of an eye another bow, pierced Pritha's son with ten shafts, and the others following him, with three shafts each.

12. Beholding that light-handedness displayed by Jayadratha, Bhima, with three broad-headed shafts, once more cut off and felled to the ground the bow, the standard and the umbrella of the former.

13. Taking up and stringing another bow, that puissant hero (Jayadratha) cut down, O sire, the standard, the bow, and the steeds of Bhima.

14. Thereupon Bhima with his bow burst open, jumped down from his excellent chariot of which the steeds were slain, and leapt upon the car of Satyaki like a lion leaping upon the top of a hill.

15. At this, your troops filled with delight, cried out saying 'Well done, Well done,' and they applauded that feat achieved by the Sindhu king again and again.

16. Then all creatures praised that feat of his which was nothing less than checking the enraged Pandava hosts by means of the force of his weapons.

17. The track that the son of Subhadra had marked out for the Pandavas by the numerous slain warriors and elephants, was then blockaded by the king of the Sindhus.

18. Then the Matsyas, the Panchalas, the Kekayas and the Pandavas, all these heroic warriors exerting their best, tried to follov Abhimanyu, but they could not withstand the ruler of the Sindhus.

19. Every one of your enemies who tried to penetrate through Drona's array was checked by the ruler of the Sindhus in consequence of the boon the latter had obtained from Mahadeva.

Thus ends the forty-third chapter, the fight between Jayadratha and the Pandavas, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XLIV.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thus when the Pandavas intent on securing victory were resisted by the Sindhu ruler, there commenced an awful fight between your warriors and those of the enemy.

2. Penetrating into your ranks, Arjuna's son invincible and of unerring aim, and endued with great energy, began to agitate your troops, like a mighty whale agitating the sea.

3. Then according to their ranks, the foremost warriors of the Kouravas rushed against Subhadra's son, that subduer of foes, who had been agitating his enemies with his arrowy downpour.

4. The clash between these warriors, endued with infinite energy and scattering a shower of arrows on one side and Abhimanyu on the other, became awful.

5. Then impaled by the enemies with crowds of cars, the son of Arjuna slew the driver of Vrisasena and also cut off the latter's bow.

6. Then again that highly powerful hero pierced Vrisasena's horses with straight-flying arrows ; the latter then was carried away from the field of battle by those steeds of the fleetness of the wind.

7. At this opportnnity, the charioteer of Abhimanyu drove his vehicle out of the press of hostile charioteers, and then the troops filled with delight exclaimed aloud saying 'Well done, Well done.'

8. Thereupon approaching Abhimanyu who, excited with rage, had been crushing the foe with his arrows like a lion crushing other animals, Vasatiya fell upon him with great impetuousity.

9. He then covered Abhimanyu with sixty shafts all furnished with golden wings, and also thus addressed him—'You shall not escape me alive in battle, so long as I am alive.'

10. Him cased in iron male, the son of Subhadra pierced on the breast with an arrow capable of flying to a great distance ; and he fell down on the earth deprived of life.

11. Beholding Vasiatya slain, the foremost of the Kshatriyas all excited with rage, surrounded, O king, your grandson, desirous of taking his life out of him.

12. They stretched their bows of different shapes, in many different ways. Thereupon commenced a terrible conflict between Subhadra's son and his adversaries.

13. Then the son of Phalguna inflamed with wrath, cut off their bows and arrows, and the various limbs of their body and their heads adorned with ear-rings and garlands of flowers.

14. Then severed arms were seen on the field with fingers-protectors and grasping swords, lances, axes and bludgeons and adorned with golden ornaments.

15. With garlands of flowers, and ornaments and cloths, with tall standards lopped off, with armours, and bucklers and golden chains, and diadems and umbrellas and chamaras,

16. With yokes, and braces, and shafts and axels of cars, with shattered whee ls Akshas, and yokes by thousands,

17. With Arnukarshas, penons, and fallen charioteers and steeds, with broken cars, with elephants steeds, the earth then became literally covered over,

18. Then the field of battle assumed a dreadful aspect being strewn over with many slain heroic Kshatriya rulers of many countries, who had fought for securing victory.

19. The very form of Abhimanyu could not then be discerned, as he careered through the field of battle moving in all the directions, subsidiary and cardinal.

20. His golden coat of mail and his buckler and his ornaments and his arrows and bow only were seen by us then.

21. Then no one was able to cast his eyes on him (Abhimanyu), when he was slaying hostile warriors with his arrows, staying in their midst like the very sun in the heavens.

Thus ends the forty-fourth chapter, the display of Abhimanyu's prowess, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XLV.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then engaged in depriving the heroes of their lives, the son of Arjuna resembled the Destroyer of all creatures snatching their lives out of them, at the time of the universal annihilation.

2. Endued with prowess equal to that of Sakra, that grandson of Sakra, namely Abhimanyu of infinite might, agitating your forces, appeared highly beautiful.

3. Then, O foremost of kings, entering into the very heart of the hostile army, that slayer of those best among the Kshatriyas, fell upon Satyasravas like a fierce tiger falling upon a deer.

4. When Satyasravas had thus been pounced upon, the other mighty car-warriors, with haste taking up various kinds of weapons, rushed against Abhimanyu.

5. 'I shall meet him first, I shall meet him first'—boasting in this way, those foremost Kshatriyas then encountered Arjuna's son, out of a desire for slaying him.

6. Then beholding the divisions of those rushing Kshatriyas advance towards him, Abhimanyu met them, even like a whale meeting a shoal of small fishes in the sea.

7. Just as rivers never course back from the ocean they fall in, so no one among them who did not fly, returned back with his life, after having encountered Abhimanyu.

8. Then the army began to reel like a boat on the ocean, overtaken by a mighty tempest and having its crew afflicted with fear through the violence of the wind.

9. Thereafter the mighty Rukshmaratha, a son of the ruler of the Madras, dauntlessly spoke these words, with a view to inspire confidence into the hearts of the panic-struck troops.

10. "O heroes, you need not fear; Abhimanyu is nothing so long as I am here. For certain, I will capture him alive (to-day)."

11. Having thus spoken that highly puissant hero rushed upon Abhimanyu, borne on a resplendent chariot duly furnished with the implements of war.

12. Piercing Abhimunyu on the breast with three shafts, he uttered his war-cry; and then again, he pierced him on the right and the left arms with three sharp shafts each.

13. But the son of Phalguna cutting off his bow, his right and left arms, and his head graced with beautiful eyes and eyebrows, soon felled them on the earth.

14. Beholding Rukshmaratha the illustrious son of Salya, who had promised to capture alive or consume Abhimanyu, slain by this latter,

15. Many princely warriors, O king, accomplished in smiting down, and formidable in battle, all friends of Salya's son (Rukshmaratha), came upon Abhimanyu, with their standards decked with gold, raised high.

16. Then those mighty car-warriors stretching their bows huge like palmyra trees, covered the son of Arjuna on all sides with showers of arrrows.

17. Beholding Subhadra's heroic and invincible son encountered, single-handed as he was, by many brave, youthful, irate princes endued with skill acquired through practice and teaching,

18. And also beholding him covered with a shower of arrows (shot by his adversaries), Duryodhana became highly gratified; and thought Abhimanyu already a visitor of the mansion of Vivaswata's son (Death).

19. Within a wink's time, all those youthful princes, each shooting sharp shafts of various shapes and furnished with golden wings, intercepted the son of Arjuna from the view.

20. Then, O sire, we beheld Abhimanyu's car and driver and his standard, covered with arrows, as if by flights of locusts.

21. Thereupon like an elephant pierced deeply, the son of Arjuna, deeply pierced with those arrows, became inflamed with rage; and he then invoked into existence the Gandharva weapon and its consequent illusions, O Bharata.

22. This weapon was secured by Arjuna from the Gandharvas Tamvuru and others, through his ascetic austerities. Now Abhimanyu confounded his foes with that weapon.

23. He was then seen, O king, sometimes as a single individual, sometimes as a hundred and sometimes as a thousand. He then moved over the field, displaying his weapons, like a circle of fire.

24. Then, O king, confounding the kings hostile to him with the illusions caused by his car, his coat of mail, and his weapons, he mangled, O king, their bodies in hundred pieces.

25. The vital breaths of living creatures were then snatched out of them by his arrows; and, O king, they reached the other world when their bodies fell down on earth

26. The son of Phalguna with sharp broad-headed shafts, cut off their bows, their steeds, their charioteers, their standards and arms with bracelets, and also their graceful heads.

27. Like a grove of mango trees, five years old and on the point of bearing fruit, laid low by the tempest, those hundred princes were slain and felled by the son of Subhadra.

28. Boholding those young and delicate heroes reared up with all possible care and resembling furious snakes of virulent poison, slain by the single-handed son of Subhadra, Duryodhana became filled with fear.

29. Then beholding his car-warriors, his elephants, his steeds and foot-soldiers, smashed, the enraged Duryodhana quickly rushed at Abhimanyu.

30. For a moment only a fierce battle raged between them, which virtually remained unfinished when your son, afflicted with arrows turned away from the field of battle.

Thus ends the forty-fifth chapter, the defeat of Duryodhana, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XLVI.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)— Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. What you are saying to me, O Suta, about the fierce and awful battle between one and the many, and the victory of that high-souled one,

2. This story of the prowess of Subhadra's son is wonderful and none the less incredible. But I ~~do not~~ regard it altogether impossible with respect ~~to~~ them whose sole refuge is virtue.

3. After Duryodhana had been repulsed and the hundred pinces slain, what measure was adopted by my warriors against Subhadra's son.

Sanjaya said :—

4. Their mouths were parched up and their eyes began to roll. They perspired and their hair stood erect. Desponding of conquering the enemy, they exerted their best to fly away.

5. Abandoning their slain brothers, fathers, sons, friends, relatives and kinsmen, they fled urging their elephants and steeds on.

6. Beholding then the troops thus broken, Drona and his son, and Vrihadvala, Kripa, Duryodhana, Karna, Kritavarman, and Suvala's son,

7. All these warriors excited with rage rushed against the invincible son of Subhadra. Then those warriors also, O king, were almost beat back by your grandson (Abhimanyu).

8. A single warrior only, viz., Lakshmana, brought up in luxury, versed in the use of arrows and weapons, endued with great energy, and dauntless through pride and youth, rushed against Arjuna's son.

9. Preyed upon by anxiety on account of his son, his father (Duryodhana) turned back; and other mighty car-warriors also followed Duryodhana's example.

10. These warriors all showered arrows on him (Abhimanyu), like clouds showering in torrents rains on mountains; he, in return, though single-handed, routed them like the dry and confused wind scattering masses of clouds.

11—12. Then like one infuriate elephant meeting another in the same state, Krishna's nephew encountered your grandson Lakshmana, invincible, of great personal beauty, standing near his father with his bow ready for use, endued with heroism, brought up in all luxury and resembling the son of the God of wealth.

13. Encountering Lakshmana, that slayer of hostile heroes, that son of Subhadra, was pierced on the breast and the arms with exceedingly sharp shafts.

14. Then that mighty-armed ~~grandson~~ of yours (Abhimanyu), O mighty monarch, excited with rage like a snake struck with a rod, addressing your other grandson (Lakshmana), thus spoke :—

15. "Look well on this earth, for you shall be required soon to go to another world. I will despatch you to the abode of Death even before the very eyes of your on-looking friends".

16. Having thus spoken, that slayer of hostile heroes, that mighty-armed hero, viz., Subhadra's son, took out a broad-headed shaft that resembled a snake that had recently cast its slough off.

17. That shaft sped by the force of his arms, cut off the beautiful head of Lakshmana, graced with ear-rings and a beautiful nose and charming locks and eye-brows.

18. Beholding Lakshmana slain, people began to wail aloud saying 'Oh' and 'Alas.' Thereupon at the death of his dear-loved son, Duryodhana became inflamed with rage.

19. And then that foremost of the Kshatriyas commanded his other Kshatriya warriors saying 'Slay him.' Thereupon Drona, his son, Kripa, Karna, and Vrihadvala, and

20. Kritavarman the son of Hridika, these six warriors surrounded Subhadra's son. But the son of Arjuna piercing them with whetted shafts, and beating them back,

21—23. Angrily and with vehemence, fell upon the mighty division of the ruler of the Sindhus. Thereupon the Kalingas, the Nishadhas, and the puissant son of Kratha, clad in mail, covered his path with their mighty elephant division. The battle then that commenced between Abhimanyu and the other warriors was dreadful and fierce to the extreme.

23. Then the son of Arjuna began to crush that division of elephants, like the wind that blows in all directions destroying masses of clouds in the heaven.

24. Thereafter Kratha covered Arjuna's son with showers of arrows; meanwhile many other car-warriors headed by Drona, turning back to the field of battle,

25. Rushed at Subhadra's son, discharging numerous weapons of celestial make. Beating back all of them with arrows, Arjuna's son afflicted Kratha's son,

26. With innumerable groups of arrows, in all haste and inflamed with a dersire for slaying his antagonist. Then the bow, the arrows, the bracelets, the arms, and the head decked with a diadem, of Kratha's son,

27. His umbrella, standard, charioteer and horses, were all felled by Abhimanyu. When that one (Kratha's son) possessed of a high lineage and character, acquainted with the Srutis and endued with wealth of weapons and fame was thus slain, almost all the remaining heroic warriors turned away from the field of battle.

Thus ends the forty-sixth chapter, the slaughter of Kratha's son, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva

---

CHAPTTR XLVII.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. When that youthful and invincible son of Subhadra, ever unretreating in battle, penetrating into the ranks of my troops was achieving feats worthy of his own family,

2. And when borne by his three-year-old steeds of great strength and excellent breed, he appeared to sail through the skies, what heroes of my army then strove to resist him ?

Sanjaya said :—

3. Penetrating into the heart of your troops, Abhimanyu, the delighter of the Pandavas, with his sharp arrows compelled all the kings to turn their faces away from the field of battle.

4. Thereupon Drona, Kripa, Karna, the son of Drona, Vrihadvala and Kritavarman the son of Hridika, these six car-warriors surrounded him.

5. Beholding a very heavy burden (of keeping the rest of the Pandavas at bay) placed on the shoulder of the Sindhu king, your troops, O mighty monarch, assailed Yudhisthira.

6. Other mighty warriors stretching their bows full six cubits long, covered the heroic son of Subhadra with a shower of arrows.

7. Then that slayer of hostile heroes, namely Subhadra's son, assailed by means of his arrows, all those mighty car-warriors all well accomplished in all kinds of learning.

8. And he then pierced Drona with fifty arrows and Vrihadavala with twenty; and Kritavarman with eighty and Kripa with sixty.

9. The son of Arjuna then pierced Ashwathaman with ten shafts furnished with wings of gold, charged with great force and shot from the bow drawn back to the very ear.

10. Then in the very midst of the hostile troops, the son of Phagulna pierced Karna in one of his ears with an excellent barbed arrow, carefully tempered and whetted.

11. Then having felled Kripa's steeds and the two supporters of his flanks, Abhimanyu pierced him on his breast with ten shafts.

12. Thereafter the valiant Abhimanyu slew the warlike Vrindaraka the enhancer of the glory of the Kurus, even before the very eyes of your heroic son.

13. Then Drona's son dauntlessly struck Abhimanyu with twenty-five short arrows, when the latter was occupied in slaying the best among his enemies.

14. Thereupon, O Sire, Arjuna's son pierced Aswathaman in return with whetted shafts, before the presence of all the warriors of your army.

15. Then Drona's son having pierced Abhimanyu with sixty fierce and resplendent shafts of exceeding sharpness, could not make the latter tremble; and then the latter remained unmoved like the Mainaka hills.

16. Then that hero of puissant might and fierce energy, pierced the son of Drona who had been afflicting him, with thirty seven arrows, all straight-going and furnished with wings of gold.

17. Thereupon Drona desirous of saving his son, stuck hundred shafts on Abhimanyu; and Aswathaman also desirous of rescuing his father, pierced him with sixty shafts,

18. Karna then pierced Abhimanyu with twenty-two broad-headed shafts, Kritavarman with fourteen, Vrihadvala with fifty and Kripa the son of Saradwata with ten.

19. In return, Abhimanyu pierced each of them with ten shafts. Then the ruler of the Kosalas pierced him on the breast with a barbed dart.

20. Abhimanyu then felled on the ground his horses, his standards, his bow and his charioteer. Thereupon deprived of the use of his car, the king of the Kosalas grasping his sword and shield,

21. Strove to take off the head, graced with ear-rings, of Phalguna's son, from his trunk. Then the latter, pierced the ruler of the Kosalas, by name prince Vrihadvala on the breast, with arrows; and the latter fell down with his breast cleft open. Then ten thousand high-souled kings broke away,

22. Uttering abusive language (against Duryodhana), armed though they were with swords and bows. Thereafter having slain Vrihadvala in battle, Subhadra's son careered through the field, and paralysed the mighty car-warriors of your army with a downpour of arrowy showers.

Thus ends the forty-seventh chapter, the defeat and death of Vrihadvala, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Once more did the son of Arjuna pierce Karna on his car, with barbed arrows; and then for angering the latter, again pierced him with fifty shafts more.

2. Thereupon Radha's son pierced him in return with as many arrows. Covered all over with arrows, O Bharata, he then looked exceedingly beautiful.

3. Excited with wrath, Abhimanyu also caused Karna to be covered over with streams of blood; the heroic Karna also appeared beautiful being mangled with shaft-wounds and bathed in blood.

4. Then both those high-souled warriors, mangled with arrow-wounds and steeped in blood, appeared like two Kinsukas covered with blossoms,

5. Then Subhadra's son slew six of Karna's ministers all versed in various modes of warfare, together with their horses, charioteer, car and standards.

6. Then Abhimanyu fearlessly pierced the rest of the mighty car-warriors in return, with ten shafts each; that feat of his seemed exceedingly wonderful.

7. Thereafter having slain the son of the ruler of the Magadhas with six swift-coursing arrows, Abhimanyu felled the youthful Aswaketu together with his horses and charioteer.

8. Next slaying with a sharp, horse-shoe-headed arrow, the Bhoja prince of Martikavata having the device of an elephant on his banner, the son of Arjuna sent up a tremendous war-cry and began to scatter his arrows on all sides.

9. Thereupon the son of Drona pierced his four horses with four arrows, and charioteer with one shaft and then he pierced Arjuna's son with ten arrows.

10. Thereafter Krishna's nephew having pierced Dussasana's son with ten swift-coursing arrows, spoke these words at the top of his voice, with eyes red in rage.

11. "Your father has fled from the battle like a veritable coward. It is fortunate that you know how to fight. But to-day you shall not escape me alive."

12. Having spoken only these words, he hurled at him a Naracha burnished by the forger himself.

13. Then leaving alone the son of Drona, Arjuna's son struck Salya with three arrows. Him Salya pierced in return with nine shafts furnished with vulterine feathers,

14. On the breast, like one not at all afraid. That feat appeared to be highly wonderful. The son of Arjuna then cutting off his bow and slaying his two flank-supporters,

15—16. Pierced him with six iron-made shafts; and then Salya ascended another chariot. Then having slain Satrunjaya, Chandraketu, Mahamegha, Suvarchasam, and Suryyavasa, he pierced the son of Suvala. Souvala then piercing him with three arrows, thus addressed Duryodhana:—

17. 'Let all of us united together, crush this one; for, fighting singly, he will slay us all. O king, with the assistance of Drona and Kripa and others, do you think out the means of slaying this one.

18. Thereafter Vikartana's son Karna, addressing Drona said these words:—"Tell us the means of his death, before he slays us all."

19. Thereupon the fierce bow-man Drona replied to them all saying:—"With all your watchfulness, have you been able to detect any weakness in this youthful prince?

20. He is carreeing in all directions; yet has any of you been able to find out any laches in the prince? Behold the lightness of hands of this son of Arjuna, this foremost of all men!

21. In the course of his car-motion, only his bow drawn to a complete circle can be seen and not his arrows,so swiftly does he let them off!

22. Indeed this slayer of hostile heroes, this son of Subhadra is affording me great delight, though with his shafts he is afflicting my vital limbs, and confounding my senses.

23. This son of Subhadra careering through the field of battle, delights me greatly, in as much as many mighty car-wariors inflamed with rage cannot detect any the slightest weakness in him.

24. I do not find any very great difference between the wielder of the Gandiva bow and this one of great lightness of hands, filling the points of the compass with his mighty shafts."

25. Then once more Karna, afflicted with the arrows of Arjuna's son said to Drona:—"Afflicted sore by Abhimanyu, I am staying here, only because, as a warrior, I should stay here.

26. The fierce and exceedingly dreadful darts, corroding like fire, of this very furious prince, are this day sucking my heart's strength in battle."

27. Then softly and with a smile, the preceptor replied unto Karna saying:—'This Abhimanyu is faithful, his prowess is great and his armour is incapable of being penetrated into.

28. I have taught the father of this hero, the diverse methods of wearing coats of mail; assuredly this subjugator of hostile fortresses, knows all those methods of wearing armours.

29. But exerting yourself carefully, you can, with arrows, cut off his bow, his bow-string, the reins of his steeds and his two supporters of the flanks.

30. O mighty bow-man, O son of Radha, if you are competent, then do all these. Then compelling him to turn his face away from the field, do you strike him from behind.

31. As long as he wields the bow, he is incapable of being defeated even by all the Gods and the Asuras united together. So if you can, deprive him of the use of his car and his bow."

32. Then, Vikartana's son, Karna, hearing those words of the preceptor quickly cut off Abhimanyu's bow with his arrows, when the latter was light-handedly scattering his shafts.

33. Then Kritavarman of the Bhoja race, slew his steeds, and Kripa the son of Gotama despatched his two flank-supporters. The rest covered him with arrowy showers, when he was deprived of the use of his bow.

34. Then these six mighty car-warriors with great activity, when activity was so necessary, ruthlessly covered that young careless hero who was fighting with them single-handedly, with showers of arrows.

35. Then that handsome hero whose car had been rendered useless and whose bow had been cut off, grasping his sword and buckler and remembering his duty, jumped up into the sky.

36 Exhibiting great prowess and great lightness, Arjuna's son roved in the air like the king of the birds, in various motions, known as Koriska and others.

37. 'With the sword in his hand he may fall upon me,'—thinking thus those mighty bowmen with their eyes up-turned and very watchful for finding Abhimanyu's weakness, began to pierce him.

38. Then that conqueror of enemies, viz., Drona of mighty energy quickly cut off the jewel-decked hilt of Abhimanyu's sword with a single shaft furnished with a horse-shoe-head.

39. Then Radha's son also cut off his excellent buckler with many sharp arrows. Then deprived of his sword and his shield he came down from the sky upon the ground, with all his limbs intact. Then raising a car-wheel, he furiously rushed against Drona.

40. His person shining with the dust from the car-wheel and himself wielding the car-wheel in his upraised arm, Abhimanyu appeared highly beautiful, and for a while imitating the son of Vasudeva, he became terribly fierce in that battle.

41. With his robes dyed with the blood flowing in profusion (from his wounds), with his brow formidable in consequence of the wrinkles thereon, himself sending up loud war-cries, that highly powerful Abhimanyu appeared superbly beautiful staying in the midst of those foremost of kings.

Thus ends the forty-eighth chapter, the fight of Abhimanyu, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XL.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. That delighter of Vishnu's sister (Subhadra), that Atiratha Abhimanyu, then furnished with the weapon of Vishnu himself, looked highly beautiful like a second Janarddana on the field of battle.

2. With the ends of his locks blazing in the air, with that best of weapons raised in his hands, his person became difficult of being looked at even by the very gods. The rulers of the earth beholding it,

3. And the wheel in his hands, became seized with anxiety. They then cut it off into many fragments. Thereupon that mighty car-warrior, the nephew of Krishna took up a heavy mace.

4. Then the mighty-armed Abhimanyu deprived of his car, his bow, his sword and his car-wheel by the enemy, rushed (with that mace in his hand) upon Ashwathaman.

5. Then, O foremost of kings, Aswathaman, beholding that upraised mace resemble the blazing bolt of heaven, leapt off three steps from the terrace of his car.

6. Slaying with his mace the horses and the two flank-supporters of Aswathaman, the son of Subhadra, with his body covered all over with arrows looked like a porcupine.

7. Then Abhimanyu crushed down on the ground Suvala's son Kalikeya and slew seventy-seven of the latter's followers of the Gandhara race.

8. Next he slew ten car-warriors of the clan of Brahma-vasatiya; and then seven warriors of the Kekayas and then ten huge elephants.

9. Then he pressed down upon the ground the car and horses of Dussasana's son. Thereupon, O sire, Dussasana's invincible son excited with rage and upraising his mace,

10. Rushed against Abhimanyu crying at same time, "Wait" "Wait." Then those two heroes with maces upraised, both desirous of compassing one another's death,

11. Those two cousins, began to strike one another, like the three-eyed (Mahadeva) and the Asura Andhaka fighting in the days of yore. Then striking one another by the ends of their clubs, they both fell down on the ground,

12. Like two uprooted standards raised in honour of Indra. Then that enhancer of the glory of the Kurus namely Dussasana's son rising first,

13. Smote Subhadra's son on the crown of his head as the latter was rising up. Confounded with the great force of that mace-stroke and overpowered by the fatigue of the fight,

14. That slayer of hostile heroes namely Subhadra's son fell down senseless on the ground. Thus, O king, was the one slain by many in battle,

15. One who grinded the whole army of the Kurus, like an elephant crushing lotus-stems. Then that heroic warrior slain by the Kurus, appeared beautiful like a wild elephant slain by the hunter.

16. Then your troops surrounded the fallen hero, who then looked like an extinguished fire that had consumed a whole forest during the summer season ;

17. Or like a tempest with its fury subsided after it has broken down numerous tree-tops ; or like the setting sun that had scorched the Bharata army with its rays ;

18—19. Or like the moon devoured up by the Rahu; or like the ocean with its waters dried up. Then the mighty car-warriors of your army beholding Abhimanyu whose countenance wore the splendour of the full moon, and whose eyes were black like the wings of the raven, lie prostrate on the naked earth, uttered repeated lion-like roars being filled with great delight.

20. Indeed, O king, your warriors were transported with delight, while tears rolled down from the eyes of the warriors of the other host.

21. Then beholding that hero lying prostrate on the ground like the moon dropped from the skies, many creatures and rulers of men, on the skies, uttered woeful cries saying :—

22. "Slain by the six mighty car-warriors of Dhritarastra's host headed by Drona, this single hero is lying on the field of battle. We hold this to be very unfair."

13. When that hero had been slaughtred, the earth appeared highly beautiful like the starry firmament decked with the full-moon herself.

24. The earth was then covered over with arrows furnished with golden wings, and inundated with waves of blood. And overspreaded with the beautiful heads of the heroes, adorned with ear-rings,

25. And precious and variegated head-gears, and streamers and chamaras, and splendid blankets, and gem-embossed weapons of good make,

26. And the bright ornaments of cars and horses and men and elephants, and sharp and well-tempered swords looking like snakes freed from their slough,

27. And bows, and shattered arrows, and darts and scimitars and spears and kampanas, and various other kinds of weapons, (offensive and defensive), she looked exceedingly beautiful.

28. In many places the field of battle became impassable being choked with dead and dying steeds bespattered with blood all felled by the son of Subhadra, and lying with their riders slain.

29. With iron goads, and elephants prodigious as hills, furnished with shields and weapons, and with standards lying about, crushed with shafts ;

30. With excellent chariots deprived of steeds and charioteers and their warriors, lying scattered on the field, crushed by elephants and looking like agitated takes ;

31. With large bodies of foot soldiers, armed with various weapons and lying slain on the field, the earth assuming an awful aspect struck terror into the hearts of the cowards.

32. Beholding Abhimanyu equal to the sun or the moon in splendour lie dead on the field, your troops obtained great joy whilst the Pandavas were highly distressed.

33. When the young Abhimanyu still in his minority was slain, all the troops of the Pandavas fled even before the very eyes of the very virtuous king Yudhisthira.

34. Then upon the death of Abhimanyu, seeing his troops routed, Ajatasatru Yudhisthira addressed these words to the heroic warriors of his army :—

35. "This heroic son of Subhadra who without turning back from the battle has been slain by the enemy, has ascended to heaven. Stay you all, and do not fear. We shall yet conquer the foe."

36. Possessed of great energy and great effulgence, the virtuous king Yudhisthira that best of all warriors, himself overwhelmed with grief, tried to console them with those words.

37. (He went on) :—Having at first slain many hostile princes resembling snakes of virulent poison, the son of Arjuna has followed in their wake.

38. Having slain ten thousand car-warriors, and that mighty car-warrior namely the ruler of the Kosalas, Abhimanyu, equal to krishna and Arjuna, has indubitably gone to the manson of Sakra (Indra).

39. Having slain car-warriors, steeds, foot-soldiers and elephants by thousand, he was not satiated with what he achieved in battle. We should not bewail this performer of pious deeds ; he surely has attained the regions of righteousness, that men acquire by deeds of piety.

Thus ends the forty-ninth chapter, the slaughter of Abhimanyu in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER L.

(ABIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thus having slain one of their best warriors and having been afflicted with their shafts and covered with blood, we returned to our quarters in the evening.

2. Gazed at by the foe and nearly senseless and overpowered with fatigue, we then,

O mighty monarch, slowly left the field of battle.

3. Then approached that wonderful hour, that joining between the day and the night, harbingered by the inauspicious yells of the jackals; and the sun then assuming the pale-red tint of the lotus-filaments, went down below the horizon, having neared the Western hills.

4. Then the sun robbed the radiance of of our excellent swords, lances, scimitars, car-fences, shields and ornaments; and causing the sky and the earth to assume the self-same hue, he then betook to his favourite shape of fire.

5. The earth was then covered over with motionless carcasses of myriads of elephants, all lifeless, resembling the peaks of cloud-clapt hills cleft open by the bolt of Heaven, and with their banners and goads scattered about and their guides dislodged from their backs.

6. The field of battle appeared beautiful with huge chariots splintered into pieces and with their warriors, drivers, ornaments, steeds, standards, streamers crushed, shattered and torn to pieces. Those cars then, O monarch, resembled animate beings deprived of their vital breaths by the enemy with his arrows.

7. Then the earth assumed a dreadful and repulsive aspect, being strewn over with numerous horses and their riders all lying dead, with precious housings and blankets of various kind scattered about, and in consequence of the tongues, teeth, entrails and eyes of those creatures being drawn out of their places.

8. Men adorned with precious armours, ornaments and garments and weapons, deprived of life, lay prostrate on the field with slain horses and elephants and shattered chariots, on the naked earth, totally helpless, although quite deserving of precious blankets and beds.

9. Greatly delighted dogs, jackals, and crows, and numerous other flesh-eating birds, and wolves and hyenas, and ravens and other blood-drinking animals, and various clans of Rakhasas, and large bodies of Pisachas, repairing to the field of battle,

10. Tore open the corpses and drank their fat marrow and blood and then fell upon eating their flesh. They began also to drink the secretions of rotten corpses, while some of the Rakshasas laughed terribly and dragged out dead bodies by thousands.

11—12. An awful river like the Vaitarani itself difficult of being tided over, was created there by many best of car-warriors. Its waters were formed by the blood of slain creatures. Chariots formed the rafts on which to cross it; elephants constituted its rocks, and the heads of men formed its pebbles. It was muddy with the flesh of slain elephants, men, and horses. Various kinds of weapons constituted the garlands floating on it. That dreadful current of blood flowed through the middle of the field of battle carrying with it living being to the doleful abodes of Death.

13. Drinking and eating in that stream numerous Pisachas of terrible and repulsive aspect rejoiced. Dogs and jackals and flesh eating birds, all partaking of the same food, and striking terror into the hearts of the living creatures held a great feast (on its banks).

14. Then at the advent of night, looking upon that fierce field of battle that had increased largely the population of Deaths regions, and that was infested with dancing headless trunks of soldiers, they slowly went away from it.

15. Then as they left it, they saw the mighty car-warrior Abhimanyu, who resembled Indra himself, lying on the field of battle, with precious ornaments displaced and falling off, and appearing like a sacrificial fire on the alter no longer fed by oblations of clarified butter.

Thus ends the fiftieth chapter, the description of the field of battle, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LI.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

When that hero that leader of a car-division viz., Subhadra's son had been slain in battle, leaving their cars and doffing their coats of mail and throwing aside their bows, all the Pandavas,

2. Sat surrounding king Yudhisthira. They were then brooding upon their grief with their hearts occupied with the thought of the deceased son of Subhadra.

3. Then upon the death of his brother's son, the heroic and mighty car-warrior Abhimanyu, King Yudhisthira began to lament totally unmanned by grief.

Yudhisthira said :—

4. Desirous of doing an act agreeable to me, he (Abhimanyu) penetrated the array of Droma with the least difficulty, like a lion penetrating into the midst of a herd of kine.

5. Meeting with him in battle, fierce bowmen, endowed with heroism, accomplished in the use of weapons, and incapable of being easily defeated in battle, were compelled to turn back.

6. Our implacable enemy Dussasana having encountered him in battle, was quickly compelled by his shafts to retreat, being nearly deprived of his senses.

7. Having crossed the ocean-like host of Drona's troops difficult of being defeated, that nephew of Krishna was despatched to Death's mansion, upon encountering the son of Dussasana.

8. Oh, now that Abhimanyu is slain, how shall I look upon Kunti's son Arjuna or upon the auspicious Subhadra bereft of her that dear-loved son!

9. What meaningless, disjointed and incoherent words shall we have to say to-day to both Hrishikesha and Dhananjaya!

10. It is myself, desirous of my own good and intent on victory, that have done this injury to Subhadra, Arjuna and Keshava!

11. A covetous man never finds his own short-comings; and it is from folly, that covetousness proceeds. Desirous of collecting the honey, I could not see that such a fall threatened me.

12. He who was a mere boy, and who should have been indulged with good food, conveyance, beds and ornaments, alas, even such a boy was placed by us in the thick of battle!

13. Like a steed of spirited mettle that sacrifices itself rather than obey the reins, how could that boy of tender years, unskilled in the modes of warfare reap good in such a perilous situation?

14. Alas, after him, to-day we also shall lay ourselves down on the field of battle, being consumed by the glances of grief cast by Vibhatsu inflamed with rage.

15. Arjuna is free from covetousness, intelligent, bashful, forbearing, handsome, powerful, endowed with well-developed limbs, respectful to the elders, heroic, amiable, and devoted to truth;

16. The feats of that one of fierce deeds even the gods applaud; that one of puissant energy slew the Nivatakavachas and also the Kalakeyas;

17. By him were the opponents of the great Indra, the dwellers of the golden cities, viz. the Poulamas slain with their followers, within the twinkling of an eye;

18. That lord gives assurance of safety to those who seek to be protected from their enemies. Alas, to-day, we have not been competent through fear, to save the son even of that one!

19. Surely a great fear has overtaken the mighty host of the son of Dhritarastra. Filled with rage at the slaughter of his son, the son of Pritha (Arjuna) without doubt extirpate the Kouravas.

20. It is also evident that the mean-minded Duryodhana, having mean counsellors, that destroyer of his own partisans, seeing the destruction of his troops and overtaken by grief, shall give up his life.

21. Beholding this son of Indra's son endowed with unequalled energy and prowess fallen on the field of battle, neither victory, nor kingdom, nor immortality, nor equality of rank with the celestials, does afford me the least joy."

Thus ends the fifty-first chapter, the lamentations of Yudhisthira, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LII.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Thus when the son of Kunti, king Yudhisthira, was indulging in lamentations, there came to him the mighty sage Krishna Dwaipayana.

2. Then having duly worshipped him, Yudhisthira resumed his seat; and afflicted with grief at the death of his brother's son, he then thus addressed the Rishi.

Yudhisthira said:—

3. The son of Subhadra has been slain in battle when fighting with many, by several fierce bowmen of vicious tendencies, who, mighty car-warriors as they were, surrounded him on all sides.

4. That slayer of hostile heroes that son of Subhadra, was a mere child in years and in understanding. And he fought in battle against overwhelming numbers.

5. During the course of the fight I said to him "Open a passage for us." Then he penetrated into the hostile array, and then we could not follow him, prevented by the ruler of the Sindhus.

6. Those who live by fighting should surely desire equal combats. But this battle that the enemy fought with Abhimanyu was an extremely unfair one.

7. It is this that burns me with the fire of grief, and draws tears of sorrow from my eyes. Brooding over this thought I can not regain the tranquility of my mind.

Sanjaya said :—

8. Then the almighty Vyasa addressing Yudhisthira who was thus bewailing and was unmanned by the force of his grief, spoke the following words.

Vyasa said :—

9. O Yudhisthira, O son of superior wisdom, O son who are well-learnt in all the branches of knowledge, O foremost of the Bharatas, people of your stamp are never confounded in seasons of calamity.

10. This hero (Abhimanyu), this foremost of all male beings, has attained paradise after having slain numerous enemies in battle and having achieved many feats not at all boy-like.

11. O Yudhisthira, this law (that created being shall die) can not be violated. O Bharata, Death takes away all,—Gods, Danavas, and Gandharvas, (without exception).

Yudhisthira said :—

12. These rulers of earth, all endued with great might, are now lying on the bare ground of the battle-field being slain and deprived of their senses.

13. Some of them possessed strength equal to that of ten thousand elephants; some, on the other hand, possessed the impetus and force of the very tempest. They have all been slain in battle by beings of their species and are all equal now.

14. I do not see the slayer of these created beings in battle, (save one of their own class). They were possessed of prowess and endued with might and energy.

15. Alas even those who entertained in their heart the hope of conquering one another in battle, are now lying slain deprived of their senses, in spite of all their wisdom.

16. The significance of the word 'Death' has to-day been clearly brought home (to our minds), as almost all these rulers of earth possessed of fierce prowess, lie dead on the field of battle.

17. These heroes having succumbed to their foes, are now lying motionless and shorn of their pride. Many princes inflamed with wrath have fallen upon the fire of their antagonist's anger.

18. On this point a great doubt has taken possesion of me, namely, whence has the word "dead" been derived? Whose offspring is Death? whence does it come, and why does it take away creatures? O you equal to a celestial, O grandsire, speak to me about all this.—

Sanjaya said :—

19. Then that illustrious sage spoke these comforting words to Yudhisthira, the son of Kunti, who had been questioning him in the above manner.

Vyasa said :—

20. On this subject, O monarch, an ancient story is cited as an example,—story that was related to Akampana by Narada.

21. So far as I know, O king, Akampana, while in this world, was also afflicted with the overwhelming and unbearable grief caused by his son's death.

22. I shall now recount to you the excellent story of the origin of Death. Hearing that story you shall be freed from grief and from the bondage of affection.

23. Listen to me, O Sire, as I go on repeating that ancient story. This story is excellent, and enhances the period of life, and kills sorrow and bestows health.

24. It is holy, capable of destroying large numbers of foes, and the most auspicious of all auspicious things. Verily this story is like the study or recital of the Vedas themselves.

25. It should, O king, be every morning listened to by those foremost of the twice-borns, who desire to obtain long-lived sons, sovereignty and their own welfare.

26. In the days of yore during the Krita-Yuga, O Sire, there lived a certain king by name Akampana. Once on a time, on the field of battle, amongst his foes, he was on the point of succumbing to his enemies.

27. He had a son by name Hari, who was equal to Narayana himself in might; he was exceedingly handsome, accomplished in the use of weapons, intelligent, powerful and equal to Sakra in battle.

28. Surrounded by countless foes on the field of battle, he shot thousands of shafts at the warriors and elephants that encompassed him.

29. Having achieved many feats difficult of being achieved, that afflicter of foes, O Yudhisthira, was slain amidst his troops by his adversaries.

30. Performing the funeral ceremonies of his son, king Akampana became purified. But bewailing his son, day and night, he could not regain his peace of mind.

31. Then cognisant of his grief caused by the death of his son, there came near him the celestial sage Narada himself.

32. That monarch of illustrious qualities, beholding the sage come, worshipped him duly and then spoke to him these words.

33. And then that ruler of men spoke to the Rishi all that had happened, his defeat by his foes and the slaughter of his son by them.

Akampana said :—

34. My son of great energy and might equal to Indra or Vishnu him-elf in effulgence, has been killed in battle by his numerous enemies, when engaged in fighting vigorously with them.

35. But, O illustrious sage, who is this Death, what is his prowess, might and manliness? O foremost of intelligent beings, I desire to know the real truth about all these questions.

Vyasa said :—

36. Having heard those words of his, the lord Narada, that bestower of boons, related this story that is capable of destroying the great sorrow caused by the death of one's son.

37. Hear, O mighty-armed monarch, this long story, exactly, O ruler of earth, as I myself have heard it.

38. In the beginning of the creation, the Grandsire Brahma created all beings. Then that highly powerful one, seeing that the beings of his creation suffered no decay,

39. Fell to thinking, O king, as to how he should cause their destruction. Meditating long over the subject, he then failed to find out any means of destruction, O ruler of earth.

40. (Then he waxed wroth); and inconsequence of that wrath then, a fire sprang out from the skies. That fire spread in all the quarters of heaven, and it began to consume all the regions of the universe.

41. Thereat heaven, earth and the welkin, all became overspread with tongues of flame. And that Almighty lord then burnt down the universe with its mobile and immobile creatures and objects.

42. Then mobile and immobile, all creatures were annihilated. Verily the puissant Brahma did all this, frightening the worlds with the fierceness of his angers.

43. Thereupon Hara, otherwise called Sthanu, wearing matted locks on his head, that Lord of all the night-rangers, sought shelter from the divine Brahma that foremost of all gods.

44. Thus when Sthanu had fallen (at Brahma's feet) desirous of doing good to the creatures, that highest divinity, the foremost of all ascetics, burning with effulgence said :—

45. What desire of yours shall we fulfil, O you that deserve to have all your wishes gratified! O son, you are born out of our will. We shall accomplish all that is dear unto you. Speak, O Sthanu, what you desire (to have).

Thus ends the fifty-second chapter, the consolation of Yudhisthira's grief, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LIII.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sthanu said :—

1. O Lord, you did take great pains for creating various creatures. All these different sorts of beings have been created and reared by you.

2. Those very creatures are now being burnt down by the fire of your anger. Seeing their condition, I am filled with compassion; O Lord, O illustrious One, be merciful on them.

Brahma said :—

3. I had no desire for destroying the worlds. I wanted to leave them in peace; I always desired the earth's welfare. But then anger took possession of me.

4. The goddess of earth, over-burdened with the heavy weight of creatures, always solicited me for destroying the beings on her surface, O mighty God.

5. Then though thinking in many ways, I could not find out the means for destroying the infinite creation. At this, anger entered into me.

Rudra said :—

6. Be propitiated, O ruler of the universe, and do not cherish wrath for the destruction of creatures. Do you not any longer destroy the mobile and immobile creatures.

7. Through your grace, O almighty Lord, the universe is divided in three divisions, viz., the Past, the Present and the Future. Let it remain as it is;

8. You have, O lord, blazed up in anger t from anger this fire has proceeded, and tha fire now consumes rocks, trees and rivers ;

9. And all kinds of shrubs and grass. Verily that fire is blasting the mobile and immobile universe.

10. Behold the mobile and immobile universe reduced to ashes. Be propitiated, O almighty God! give not way to wrath. Even this boon do I beg.

11. All created things, O Divine Being' that belong to you, are being consumed; therefore withdraw your energy, let it be quenched in your ownself.

12. Look at the creatures of your own creation, filled with a desire for doing good to them all. Do that by which all these beings endued with life, may continue to ilve.

13. Let not these beings with their prowess of propagation weakened, be exterminated. O Creator of the world, you have employed me to be their protector.

14. O Lord of the universe, let not this mobile and immobile universe be destroyed. You are inclined to show mercy and it is for this reason that I now speak thus.

Narada said :—

15. Hearing these words (of Mahadeva) the Divine Brahma, desirous of accomplishing the good of the created beings, withdrew in his own inner self his anger that had been excited.

16. Quenching that fire, the illustrious benefactor of the universe, the Supreme Lord, declared the duties of Production and Emancipation.

17. When that high-souled god had thus extinguished that fire of his wrath, there came out from the various outlets of his sense-organs, a female figure.

18. She was dark and red and tawny and her tongue, countenance and eyes were red, and she was adorned with two shining ear-rings and various other brilliant ornaments.

19. Coming out of his body, she betook to the southern quarter, and she smilingly cast glances at those two lords of the universe.

20. Then Brahma, that controller of the creation and destruction of the world, called her by the name of Death. And, O ruler of men, he said to her :—" Slay these beings of my creation.

21. You are the offspring of the wrath I harboured for the destruction of the universe. Therefore kill you all these creations including the learned and the idiot,

22. At my own behest. Thus you shall attain your own good." Thus spoken to by him, that lady of lotus-like eyes, called "Death,"

23. Meditated for a long time, and then began to wail aloud helplessly in plaintive voice. Then the grandsire with two hands caught the tears that flowed from her eyes, for the welfare of all creatures, and entreated her in the following words.

Thus ends the fifty-third chapter, the story of the origin of Death in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LIV.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA.)

Continued.

Narada said —

1. Then that helpless lady restraining her grief within herself, thus addressed the lord of the people, with folded palms and bending like a creeper with humility.

Death said :—

2. O most eloquent of all speakers, how shall I, created a female by you, do such heartless and mischievous deeds, knowing them at the same time to be so?

3. I fear sin greatly; O illustrious lord, be propitious on me. Sons, friends, brothers, fathers and husbands are always dear to creatures.

4. If they are destroyed by my hands, they that will incur the loss, shall endeavour to avenge themselves on me. It is them that I fear. The drops of tears that will fall from the eyes of grief-stricken and bewailing persons,

5. Fill me with terror. Thus affrighted, O illustrious Lord, I seek thy protection. O foremost of the celestials, O Divine Being, I will not go to Yama's abode.

6. O you that bestow boons, I do propitiate you, by bending my head low, and by folding my hands, O Grandsire of the worlds, I desire the fulfilment of even this wish of mine at your hands.

7. O Lord of the creation, I desire to carry on ascetic austerities through your grace. O great Lord, O divine being, accord me this boon.

8. Permitted by you, I shall go to the excellent hermitage of Dhenuka, and there shall I practice ascetic austerities of the most severe sort, being engaged in worshipping yourself.

9. O Lord of the celestials, I shall not be able to destroy the dear lives of living creatures, when they will weep in grief. Save me from unrighteousness.

Brahma said :—

10. You have been created, O Death, for causing the destruction of creatures; go, destroy all the creatures; entertain no scruples whatsoever.

11. This must have happened and nothing could have prevented it. Carry out my command; none in the world will find any fault with you.

Narada said :—

12. Thus spoken to, the lady became pleased, and she stood with her face turned towards the illustrious god. And out of desire for doing good to the creatures, she did not set her heart upon the destruction of creature.

13. Then that Divinity, the Lord of the lords of creatures also remained silent for a while; and the grandsire soon became satisfied with his ownself.

14. Then turning his eyes upon the creatures he smiled. Then the creatures lived cheerfully as before, undisturbed by premature death.

15. When that invincible and illustrious divinity had cast his wrath off, that lady also went away from the presence of that intelligent being.

16. Then without having promised the destruction of creatures, she went away, O king; and then Death hastily came to Dhenuka.

17. There she practised a vow excellent and greatly severe. There she stood on one leg for sixteen times ten billions of years,

18. And five times ten billions also, through compassion for living creatures and through desire for doing them good, all the time withholding her senses from their dear objects.

19. Once more, O monarch, she stood there on one leg for twenty one times ten billions of years.

20. Then she roved for ten times ten thousand billions of years with the animals. Then once again repairing to the holy river Nanda that was full of cool and translucent water,

21. She passed in those waters eight thousand years. Practising austere penances on the banks of the Nanda, she purged herself of all her sins.

22. Then observant of her vows, she first visited the sacred Kousiki; living upon air and water only, she practised penances there.

23. Going then to Panchaganga and afterwards to Vetasa, that already-purified lady, pulled her own body down by performing various kinds of asceticism.

24. Repairing next to the Ganga and thence to the great Maru, she remained inert like a block of stone, devoting herself in the practice of Pranayama (suspension of breaths).

25. From that place repairing to the crest of the Himavat Mountain, where, in the days of yore, the gods had performed their sacred sacrifices, that excellent and auspicious damsel stood on her tip toe for a billion of years.

26. Thence going to Puskara and Gokarna and Naimisha and Malaya, she pulled her health down by the practice of penances after her own choice.

27. Without worshipping any other god and with firm devotion to the Grandsire, she lived and propitiated him in every way and everywhere.

28. Thereafter the undeteriorating Creator of the universe, thus propitiated, spoke to her with a softened and joyful heart thus :—

29. " O Death, what for are you undergoing all these severe ascetic penances ?" Thereat Death once more addressed the illustrious divinity, the Grandsire, saying :—

30. "O God, I shall not be able to destroy the living creatures. They are all in the enjoyment of health and do not envy one another. O Lord, even this is the boon that I want at your hands, O master of all.

31. I am afraid of sin; and it is for this reason that I am engaged in the practice of ascetic austerities. O blessed Lord! vouchsafe assurances of eternal safety to me overwhelmed with terror.

32. A woman by birth, helpless and sinless, I implore your mercy, be you my refuge." Thereupon that Divinity possessed of the knowledge of the past, the present, and the future thus spoke to her again.

33. "In destroying all these creatures, O Death, you shall reap no sin. My words, O handsome damsel, can never be false.

34. Therefore, O blessed lady, destroy these four kinds of creatures. Eternal virtue shall always be yours.

35. Yama, the Regent of the worlds and the various maladies, shall help you in your work of destruction. Myself and the celestials also will bestow boons on you;

36—37. So that purged of all sins and perfectly purified, you shall attain glory." Having been thus spoken to, O mighty monarch, she, with her palms folded, thus addressed the Lord, saluting him by bending her head low.—"If, O lord, such be the state of things, and if it cannot do without me,

38. Then I place your behest upon my own head. However hear what I have to say. Let covetousness, anger, animosity malice, dissensions and folly and shamelessness and other stern passions tear to pieces the frames of corporeal beings."

Brahma said :—

39. It shall be as you desire, O Death, Do you begin to destroy the creatures. No sin will hang on you ; I shall not seek to injure you, O blessed damsel.

40. These tears of yours which I hold in my hands, even they will become maladies, starting into existence from the creatures themselves. They will destroy men whose life-time has been exhausted. No sin will hang on you. Do not be frightened.

41—42. Verily sin shall not be yours. You shall be the righteousness of living creatures ; and the presiding deity of that righteousness. Devoted to virtue and observant of your duties, you shall control all creatures. Therefore destroy always the lives of these corporeal creatures. Renouncing both desire and anger, snatch out the lives of all living creatures. In this way you shall secure eternal merit. Sin will destroy those who are vicious in their conduct of life.

43. Carrying out my command, purify yourself. The task of plunging those who are wicked, in their own sins, will be left to you. Therefore renounce desire and anger and begin destroying those creatures possessed of life."

Narada said :—

44. Thereafter that lady, seeing that she was persistently called by the name of Death, became afraid of acting otherwise. And in fear of Brahma's malediction, she said :—'Yea.' Unable to set at naught the behests of Brahma, she began, renouncing wrath and desire, to deprive living creatures of their lives, when their last days came.

45. Death is the lot of all living creatures. Maladies originate out of living creatures. Maladies are the abonormal conditions of living beings, and they are pained by them. Disease and death fall to the share of all creatures. Therefore do you not indulge in fruitless grief.

46. Upon the death of living creatures, their senses go with them ; and achieving their respective functions (in the other world, they come back with their possessors, (when they are born anew). Thus all creatures including the gods going thither, have to act like mortals, O best of all kings.

47. The wind that is tremendous, of dreadful roars and great strength, omnipresent and endowed with energy infinite, even that wind will tear open the bodies of living creatures. It will, in this action, put forth no active energy, nor will it suspend its workings.

48. Even all the gods are qualified with the adjective mortal. Therefore, O foremost of kings, do not bewail your son. Your son having ascended to heaven, is enjoying perpetual happiness, in those delightful regions allotted to the heroes.

49. Renouncing all grief, he has obtained the fellowship of the virtuous. Death has been ordained for all corporeal beings by the Creator himself. So when their days are numbered, they suffer destruction. The death of creatures is brought about by their ownselves.

50. Creatures destroy themselves. Death does not destroy any one, armed though she is with the mortal dart. Therefore the wise, knowing death to be unavoidable being ordained by Brahma, never lament for those that are dead. Now knowing that death is ordained by the highest divinity, renounce, without delay, your sorrow for your son."

Vyasa said :—

51. Having heard these words of grave signification uttered by Narada, king Akampana, addressing his friend Narada said.

52. "O illustrious one, O foremost of the Rishis, I am gratified and my sorrow has left me. Hearing this story from you, I am contented and I salute you."

53. Thus spoken to by that monarch, Narada, that excellent of all the foremost sages, that celestial sage of immeasurable soul, speedily went back to the Nandana forest.

54. The frequent audition as well as the recital of this piece of history is held to be purifying, fame-giving, leading to paradise, life-giving and fraught with all blessings.

55. Having heard this instructive story, renounce your sorrow, O king Yudhisthira, you know the duties of a Kshatriya and the region they attain to after death.

56. The mighty car-warrior Abhimanyu endued with great energy has ascended to heaven, having slain his enemies in battle, before the presence of all bowmen.

57. That mighty car-warrior, that fierce bowman, has been slain, when fighting, with swords, lances, maces and bows.

58. He is the sinless son of the moon and is now dissolved in the lunar essence. Therefore, O son of Pandu, mustering all your courage, yourself accompanied by your brothers, speedily march out for battle inflamed with wrath and without allowing your senses to become stupefied.

Thus ends the fifty-fourth chapter, the colloquy between Death and the Lord of Creation, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LV.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Having heard of the origin of Death and her strange deeds, the very virtuous king Yudhisthira, once more humbly addressing Vyasa said these words :—

Yudhisthira said :—

2. In many blessed countries there were many many monarchs, of virtuous deeds and of prowess equal to that of Sakra (Indra) himself. O Brahman they were royal sages, sinless, and lovers of truthful speech.

3. Once again, do you address me in words of grave signification, and comfort me with the story of the feats of those royal sages of ancient days.

4. What was the amount of the sacrificial gifts made by them? Who were those royal sages of high soul and virtuous practices that made them? Tell me all this, O almighty Rishi!

Vyasa said :—

5. There lived in days gone by, a king known by the name of Srinjaya. He had a son who was named Swaitya; the sages Parvata and Narada were his friends.

6. Once on a time desirous of an interview with him, the Rishis entered his palace. Being duly adored by him, they continued to live there happily.

7. One day when Srinjaya was seated with the sages at his ease, his very beautiful daughter of pure smiles came to him.

8. Then saluted by that daughter of his, he greeted her with benedictions after her own desire, when she was standing beside him.

9. Beholding that girl, Parvata smilingly said these words to Srinjaya :—"Whose daughter is this girl of restless glances and auspicious marks?

10. Is she the effulgence of the solar orb or the blazing flame of Fire? Or is she Sri, or Hari, or Kirti or Dhriti, or Pushti, or Siddhi or the splendour of the moon?"

11. Thereupon king Srinjaya replied to the celestial sage who spoke those words, thus :—"O Almighty Rishis, this damsel is my daughter and she solicits my blessings."

12. Thereafter Narada addressed the king saying :—"O monarch, if you desire to secure great good, give me this your daughter in marriage."

13. Filled with delight (at the Rishi's proposal) Srinjaya said to Narada :—"I shall give her in marriage to you." Thereat the other sage Parvata excited with wrath, said these words to Narada.

14. "You have accepted this girl for your wife, whom before you I had chosen in my heart to be my wife; and because you have done this, you shall not, O Brahmana, go to heaven at your will."

15. Thus spoken to, Narada said to him these words in reply :—"The husband's heart, his speech, the giver's consent, the speeches of both of them, the actual gift made with the sprinkling of water,

16. The mantras specified for holding the bride's hands,—these have been said to be the indications by which one becomes known as the husband of a damsel. But these ceremonials are not sufficient, the essential one being the walk for seven paces after the marriage.

17. Without any provocation whatever, you have pronounced a curse on me. Therefore you also shall not go to heaven save in my company."

18—20. Thus having cursed each other those two sages continued to live there. Meanwhile Srinjaya, desirous of obtaining a son, and purifying himself, began to gratify the Vipras to the best of his resources, with drinks, garments and foods. After a while, those Brahmanas devoted to the study of the Vedas, and acquainted with the contents of the scriptures and their various auxuliaries, being gratified with the king, who desired to have a son, came in a body to Narada, and said to him;—"Give this king a son of the sort he desires."

21. Thus spoken to by the regenerate sages, Narada said 'Let it be so'; and then he addressed Srinjaya saying :—'O royal sage, the Brahmanas have been gratified with you and they desire to bestow a son on you.

22. Good betide you. Ask for the boon about the kind of the son you wish to have.' Thus addressed, the king with folded palms, solicited the boon of getting a son endued with all qualities,

23. Famous, possessed of glory, highly energetic and subduer of all foes, whose urine, excreta, secretions and perspiration would be gold."

24. The king then obtained a son in due time who came to be called Suvarnasthivi on earth, and through the virtue of that boon the child began to increase the wealth of his father beyond all limit.

25. King Srinjaya then caused all objects of his desire to be made of gold; and his houses and walls and fortresses and the residencies of the Brahmanas,

26. His beds, conveyances, plates and all kinds of cups, saucers, &c., and the mansion he possessed, and all implements and utensils, domestic and otherwise,

27. Were caused to be made of gold. In the course of time his treasure went on increasing. Then certain robbers hearing of the prince and seeing him to be such,

28. Banded together and endeavoured to do mischief to the king. Some of them said, "We shall seize the son of the king.

29. He is the mine of gold of his father. Let us therefore try to seize him." Thereafter those robbers, led by covetousness, entered the king's palace;

30. And forcibly took away the young prince Suvarnasthivi; seizing him, and carrying him to the woods, those idiots not knowing what to do with him,

31. Out of avarice slew him and cut him to pieces. But they found not any gold inside his frame. When that child was deprived of his life, all the gold consequent on the sages' boon, disappeared.

32. The robbers then, ignorant and idiotic as they were, slew one another; for having slain that wonderful prince, they also met with their destruction.

33. These robbers of wicked deed were plunged to an awful and unimaginable hell. Then beholding his son obtained through a boon slain, that one of great asceticism, viz.,

34. King Srinjaya began to lament plaintively being afflicted with terrible grief. Hearing the king afflicted with grief caused by his son's death thus lament,

35. The celestial Rishi Narada revealed himself before the king. And he spoke these words to the bewailing and woe-stricken and senseless

36. King Srinjaya. O Yudhisthira listen now to those words.

Narada said :—

You shall have to die, O Srinjaya, with many of your desires unfulfilled,

37. Although we the reciters of the sacred Veda live under your roof. O Srinjaya, we had to hear of the death of even Avikshita's son Marutta.

38—40. Piqued with Vrihaspati, he had compelled even Samvarta himself to be a office-bearer in one of his great sacrifices. To that royal sage, the illustrious divinity (Mahadeva) had given wealth in the shape of a golden plateau of Himavat. Therewith Marutta had accomplished numerous sacrifices. After the accomplishment of his sacrifices, various tribes of celestials, the creators of the world, accompanied by Indra and headed by Vrihaspati, used to come to him. All the carpets and furnitures of his sacrificial compound were made of gold.

41—43. At his sacrifices the twice-born sects desirous of food all ate as it pleased them—food that was purified and suited to their tastes. At all his sacrifices, milk and curds and clarified butter and honey and other kinds of drinks and edibles, all of the finest sort, and garments and ornaments precious and desirable, used to be given to Brahmanas thoroughly acquainted with the scriptures. The very gods became the distributors of food in Marutta's palace.

44—47. The Viswadevas were the courtiers of that royal sage, the son of Avikshita. By him were propitiated the dwellers of heaven with oblations of clarified butter; gratified therewith, the gods, in their turn, increased that sovereign's wealth of corn by profuse showers of rain. He always contributed to the pleasure of the Rishis, the ancestral manes, and the celestials, and thereby made them propitious, as also by practising Brahmacharyya, by the study of the Vedas, by observance of obsequial rites and by offering all kinds of gifts. His beds and carpets and conveyances and his vast treasures of gold difficult to be given away, in reality, all that vast amount of wealth of his, were voluntarily distributed among the Brahmanas. Indra himself wished him well. His subjects were made happy by him.

48. Performing all acts through piety, he finally attained to the eternal regions of bliss acquired by his religious merit. With his children, counsellors wives, descendants, relatives,

49—50. King Marutta, in the days of his youth, ruled his dominions for a thousand years. When even such a monarch,

O Srinjaya, superior to you in respect of the four cardinal virtues, and who, superior to you, was much more superior to your son, had to suffer death, do not lament for your son, saying 'O Swaitya,' who performed no sacrifice and made no sacrificial presents.

Thus ends the fifty-fifth chapter, the story of Swaitya, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LVI.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Narada said :—

1. O Srinjaya, we heard also of the death of king Suhotra, who was the foremost of all heroes, invincible and interviewed by the gods themselves.

2. Having obtained his kingdom by virtue, he used to question his Rittijwas, family priests, and Brahmanas about his welfare and then used to live up to their instructions.

3. Knowing virtue to be identified with the protection of his subjects, acts of charity and performance of sacrifices and the subjugation of foes, Suhotra desired the increase of his wealth.

4. He worshipped the gods according to the ordinances of the holy texts, and conquered his foes by means of his arrows. He pleased all creatures with his own excellent acquirements.

5. During his time of rule, the Earth was freed from the depridation of Mlechchas and the forest-thieves, and the Parjannya showered gold throughout the whole year.

6—7. In those days of his the rivers ran liquid gold, and were open to the use of everybody. Parjannya then poured on his kingdom large numbers of golden alligators, crabs and fishes of various classes, and many other objects of desire; the artificial lakes of his dominions were full two miles long.

8. Then king Suhotra beholding thousands of dwarfs, hunch-backs, alligators and sharks and tortoises, all made of gold, was greatly amazed.

9. That royal sage, having performed a sacrifice in Kurujangala, gave away that unlimited quantity of gold to the Brahmanas, even before the accomplishment of that sacrifice.

10. Having celebrated a thousand horse-sacrifices, a hundred Rajasuya sacrifices, and, numerous other Kshatriya sacrifices, in all of which he gave away vast wealth as sacrificial presents,

11. And also having accomplished numerous daily rites from specific wishes, that king ultimately attained to a very desirable end. O Srinjaya, when even such a king suffered death, who was superior to you in all the four virtues,

12. And so was superior to your son,—you should not lament for your son saying 'O Swaitya' who performed no sacrifice and gave away no sacrificial presents.

Thus ends the fifty-sixth chapter, the story of Suhotra, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LVII.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Narada said :—

1. O Srinjaya, we also heard of the death of the heroic king Pourava, who gave away a thousand times thousand horses that were all white in colour.

2. At the celebration of the horse-sacrifice by him, the number of Brahmanas learned in the Siksha and Aksharas that then presented themselves from different countries, was indeed countless.

3. These Brahmanas, purified by the Vedas, by learning, by the observance of vows, all of benevolent dispositions and of amiable features, received from the monarch gifts of such things as garments, horses, precious beeds, carpets and conveyances.

4. They were always entertained by actors, dancers, ministrels perfectly accomplished and well-acquainted with their respective arts, and engaged in sports and always striving for pleasing the former.

5, At each of his sacrifices, in due time, he used to give away as Dakshina, ten thousand elephants of golden effulgence, with their temporal juice trickling down,

6. And also golden chariots decked with standards and flags. He also used to give away as Dakshina a thousand times thousand damsels, all adroned with golden ornaments,

7. And chariots, elephants and horses for mounting, and mansions and fields and hundreds of cows, and thousands of high-souled cattle-tenders all decked with chains of gold. People conversant with the history of the past ages sing this song, viz.,

9. That in that sacrifice king Pourava gave away as gifts kine with calves, having horns of gold, hoofs of silver and udders of brass, as also numerous male and female slaves, asses, camels, and sheep.

10. He also gave away as presents, diverse kinds of gems, and numerous piles of food and edibles, even before the accomplishment of his sacrifices.

11. That monarch of the Angas, ever devoted to the performance of sacrifice, celebrated many auspicious sacrifices suited to his order, one after another, according to their respective efficacy; and these sacrifices yielded all his objects of desire.

12. O Srinjaya, when even such a king suffered destruction, who was superior to you in all his four cardinal virtues and so who was far superior to your son, you should not lament for your son saying, Oh Swaitya and should not grieve for his having performed no sacrifices and made no sacrificial presents.

Thus ends the fifty-seventh chapter, the story of king Pourava, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LVIII.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Narada Said:—

1. We heard, O Srinjaya, that even Sini, the son of Usinara, had to suffer death, who had put, as it were, a leathern band round the entire earth.

2. He made the earth with her mountain and the islands and seas and forests resound with the clatter of his car-wheels. That subduer of foes, viz., Sini himself, every day used to slay the foremost of his opponents.

3. He celebrated various sacrifices attended with profuse sacrificial presents; that highly puissant and intelligent monarch acquired enormous quantity of wealth.

4. In battle he came to be recognised as the head of all the Kshatriyas. Having brought the entire earth under his control, he performed many Horse-sacrifices,

5. Productive of great merit without any the least obstruction, giving away as sacrificial presents thousands and millions of golden nikshas, numerous elephants, steeds, and other kinds of animals, large quantities of grain and countless deer, cows and sheep.

6—9. And Sini also offered as a gift to the Brahmanas this earth consisting of various different kinds of soil. Indeed Usinara's son Sini gave away as presents as many kine as is the number of rain drops showered on the earth, or the number of stars in the firmament or the number of sand grains on the bed of the river Ganga, or the number of stones that compose the mount Meru, or the number of gems or aquatic animals in the ocean. The Lord of creation has not come across or will not come across, in the past, the present or the future, another king competent to bear the burden that king Sini bore on his shoulders. The sacrifices celebrated by king Sini were numerous and attended with all sorts of rites.

10. In his sacrifices, the stakes, the carpets, the horses, the walls and the arches were all made of gold. Edibles and drink suited to the taste and perfectly pure, were used to be supplied in abundance; and the Brahmanas that came there were countless.

11. Viands and edibles of every discription were used to be distributed with agreeable words,(such as 'take, accept'&c.). There milk and curds used to be collected in lakes of large dimensions. In his sacrificial compound, flowed rivers of drink and stood hills of white edibles.

12. "Drink" "bathe" 'eat' and 'do as you like", these were the words that used to be heard there. Pleased with his deeds of piety, Rudra bestowed a boon on him, saying:—

13. "As you give away numerous presents, let your wealth, your devotion, your renown, your meritorious deeds, the love that people cherish for you and the paradise that you shall attain to, let all these of yours, be inexhaustible."

14. Having obtained even such a desirable boon, in due time, Sini had to go to heaven. O Srinjaya, even when such a king had to suffer death who was superior to you in respect of the four virtues,

15. And consequently who was far more superior to your son, you should not lament for your son saying—O Swaitya—who performed no sacrifice and made no gifts.

Thus ends the fifty-eighth chapter, the story of king Sini, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LIX.

(ABHIMANYU BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Narada said:—

1. O Srinjaya, we heard that even Rama that son of Dasaratha, had to suffer death. His subjects were as much delighted with him as a father is pleased with the sons of his own loins.

2. In that one endowed with immeasurable energy, innumerable virtues resided. At the command of his father that undeteriorating one, for fourteen long years,

3. Lived in the woods with his wife and his younger brother Lakshmana. While in the forest of Janasthana, that foremost of men slew Rakshasas,

4. Fourteen thousand in number, for the protection of the ascetics. When he was living there, the Rakshasa, by name Ravana,

5. Stole away his wife, the princess of Videha, having deceived both himself and his follower Lakshmana. That son of Poulasta invincible by his enemies who had injured him, Rama

6. Slew in battle, being excited with rage, like the three-eyed Mahadeva slaying the demon Andhaka; that one (Ravana) incapable of being slain by the celestials and the Asuras, that thorn in the sides of the Gods and Brahmanas,

7. Namely that descendant of Poulasta, the mighty-armed Rama slew in battle, with all his followers. In consequence of his showing mercy towards his subjects he used to be honoured by the celestials themselves.

8. That one (Rama), served even by the Gods and the sages, filled the earth with his fame. Having acquired immeasurable kingdoms, he used to treat his subjects with kindness.

9. Cherishing his subjects virtuously, that lord without any hindrance, accomplished one hundred of that mighty sacrifice Aswamedha together with the sacrifice called Jaruthya.

10. He created great joy in Indra by pouring libations of clarified butter on the fire. And, O king, he celebrated many other kinds of sacrifice, all productive of great religious merit.

11. Rama conquered hunger and thirst and he was beyond the influence of maladies that trouble the corporeal creation. He was always attended with all kinds of virtues, and burnt in his own energy.

12. Indeed Rama, the son of Dasaratha surpassed in beauty all other created beings. The Rishis, the celestials, and the mortals all together

13. Lived on the face of the earth, when Rama ruled over the kingdom. Then the lives of animate beings never terminated untimely.

14. When Rama ruled his dominions, the vital breaths known as Prana, and Apana, and Samana and others, all duly performed their functions. All splendour appeared to increase and evil portents were never seen.

15. All his subjects then enjoyed length of days; men then were not taken away in the prime of their life. The denizens of heaven, highly satisfied, used to obtain, according to the (ordinances of the) four Vedas,

16. Libations of clarified butter and other offerings of edibles presented by men. His dominions were not infested with gnats and flies, and they were free from snakes and other reptiles,

17. Living creatures died not being drowned and prematurely; fire did not consume anything then. Then there were none, of vicious propensities, and covetous and ignorant.

18. His subjects, belonging to all the four castes, were engaged in the performance of righteous and desirable deeds. The Rakshasas then, used to hinder the adoration of the Pitris in Janasthana.

19. The Lord Rama slaying them, caused the offerings and the adoration to be once more made to the ancestral manes, and the gods. Men then became fathers of thousand sons and their duration of life covered a thousand years.

20. Then seniors in age had never the misfortunes of performing the obsequies of their juniors. Youthful, of a dark blue complexion, of red eyes, possessing the tread of an infuriate elephant, 21—22. Having arms hanging down to the knees and of well-shape, of shoulders resembling those of the lion, and of great might, that delighter of the hearts of beings, namely Rama, ruled his kingdom for eleven thousand years. His subjects were then always occupied in talking about him.

23. While Rama ruled his kingdom, the world became most charming and captivating. At last, taking his subjects belonging to all the four orders with him, Rama ascended to heaven,

24. Having perpetuated his own line in eight separate dynasties of kings. When,

O Srinjaya, even such a king died who was superior to you in respect of the four cardinal virtues,

25. Consequently, who was far more superior to your son, you should not lament for your son saying "O Swaitya" who performed no sacrifce and made no sacrificial presents.

Thus ends the fifty-ninth chapter, the story of Rama, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LX.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Narada said :—

1. O Srinjaya, we also heard that king Bhagiratha, fell a prey to death, Bhagiratha who caused the banks of Ganga—called Bhagirathi after him—to be covered with flights of golden steps.

2. He gave away to Brahmanas, kings and princes, a thousand times thousand damsels, all adorned with ornaments of gold.

3. All those damsels were mounted on chariots; and to all the chariots were harnessed four steeds; and again every chariot was attended with a hundred elephants all decked with chains of gold.

4. A thousand horses followed each king and after each horse, came a hundred cows and after the cows came sheep and deer, countless in number.

5. Bhagiratha gave away enormous gifts at his sacrifices in consequence of which, large used to be the concourse of people at them. Afflicted with the heavy burden of men, Ganga saying 'protect me', sat down upon his lap.

6. And because in the days of yore Ganga sat on his lap, she, like Urvasi, came to be regarded as his daughter and was named after him. Then having become the kings daughter, she became his son (i. e. she procured, like a son, the salvation of his ancestors).

7. Gandharvas of melodious voice and solar effulgence, greatly pleased, sang this song in the hearing of the anscertral manes, the celestials and the human beings.

8. Thus, O Srinjaya, that Goddess namely the ocean-going Ganga, chose the Lord Bhagiratha that descendant of Ikshaku, that performer of sacrefices with profuse gifts, to be her father.

9. His sacrifices were always honoured by the presence of the celestials with Indra at their head. Removing all obstructions, the Gods used to appropriate their respective shares, and to facilitate those sacrifices in every way.

10. That self-controlled king Bhagiratha highly pleased used to give to the Brahmanas all their objects of desire, and all things that any one of the Brahmanas used to set his heart upon.

11. He had nothing that he would have hesitated to give to the Brahmanas. Every one obtained from him everything he wanted; that king also, through the grace of the Brahmanas, ascended to regions of Brahma.

12. For the self-same object for which the sages living on the rays of the sun, used to dance attendance upon the Sun, for that very object they used to wait upon the Lord Bhagiratha, that ornament of the three worlds.

13. When, O Srinjaya, even such a king had to suffer death, who was superior to you in respect of the four cardinal virtues and consequently far superior to your son you should not lament for your son saying, —'Oh Swaitya'—who did not perform any sacrifice or make any sacrificial gift.

Thus ends the sixtieth chapter, the story of Bhagiratha, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXI.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Narada Said :—

1—3. We also heard, O Srinjaya, that Dilipa the son of Ilvala had to suffer death. In the celebration of his hundred sacrifices were present countless number of the twice-born ones acquainted with the knowledge of the reality about things, devoted to the performance of sacrifices and blessed with sons and grandsons. That king of the earth, celebrating various sacrifices, offered this earth replete with treasures, to the Brahmanas as a gift. At all the sacrifices of king Dilipa, the roads used to be constructed of gold.

4. Regarding him equal to Dharma himself, the very Gods with Indra at their head, used to come to him. The upper and lower rings in his sacrificial stakes were made of gold.

5. Partaking of his Raga-Khandavas, many people at his sacrifices used to lie down, on the high-ways. The following thing seemed exceedingly wonderful and never occurred to any other king, viz.,

6—7. That when Dilipa fought on waters, his car-wheels never sank below the surface. Those who saw king Dilipa, that steady bowmen, always truthful and giving away profuse gifts at his sacrifices, succeeded in attaining paradise. In the mansion of Dilipa otherwise called Khattwanga, the following five sorts of sounds were always to be heard, namely,

8. The sound of the recital of the Vedas, the twang of the bow, and the sound produced by utterance of the words, Drink, Enjoy, and Eat. When even such a king, O Srinjaya, died, who was superior to you in respect of the four cardinal virtues,

9. And consequently far superior to your son, you should not lament for your son saying—'O Swaitya'—who did perform no sacrifice and make no sacrificial presents.

Thus ends the sixty-first chapter, the story of king Dilipa, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXII.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Narada said :—

1. O Srinjaya, we also heard that Yuvanaswa's son, king Mandhata, who vanquished the celestials, the Asuras, and the gods and the worlds, had to undergo death.

2. The twin Aswins, (the celestial physicians) drew him out of his fathers womb. Once on a time when out hunting, king Yuvanaswa became thirsty and his steed became exhausted.

3. Seeing at a distance, a curl of smoke, the monarch (guided by it) reached a sacrificial compound, and he drank the sacrificial butter that lay scattered there. (Thereupon the monarch conceived). Then seeing the king quick with child,

4. The two foremost of celestial physicians, the twin Aswins drew out the child from the kings womb. Then beholding the new-born babe of divine radiance lie on the lap of his father,

5. The gods spoke to one another saying :—'Whom shall this child suck.' Then Vasava said—'Let this child suck, my finger first.'

6. Thereupon from the fingers of Indra nectareous milk flowed out. Because Indra had, out of compassion for the child, said 'Let him suck me,'

7—8. Therefore the celestials designated him as Mandhatri. Then streams of milk and clarified butter flowed into the mouth of Yuvanaswa's son from the finger of the high-souled Indra. He then drank the nectar flowing from Indra's hand and thus went on growing.

9. In twelve days he became twelve cubits in stature and was also endued with great prowess. And he conquered this extensive Earth in the course of a single day.

10. Of rightous soul, endued with great intelligence and heroic and devoted to truth and of controlled passions, Mandhatri conquered, through the force of his bow, Janamenjaya, Sudhanwa, Jaya, Suna, Vrihadratha, Asita and king Nigra. The hill where the sun rises, and the hill where it sets,

12. All the land lying between these two hills, is called the dominion of the king Mandhatri, the son of Yuvanaswa. Having accomplished a hundred horse-sacrifices and a hundred Rajasuya sacrifices also,

13 He gave away to the Brahmanas, O ruler of men, some Rohita fish made of gold that were ten Yojanas in length and one Yojana in breadth.

14. Piles of delicate and tasteful foods and edibles, after the Brahmanas had been entertained, were partaken of by other people, and greatly enhanced their joy.

15. Enormous quantities of food, viands edibles and drinks and potion and piles of cooked rice were there and shone beautiful. Many rivers, having lakes of clarified butter, with various kinds of soup for their mud, curds for their froth, and honey for their water, looking charming and flowing in currents of milk and honey, wended round the mountains of solid edibles. Gods, Asuras, men, Jakshas, Gandharvas, snakes, birds,

17. And many Vipras, learned in the Vedas and their auxuliaries, came at his sacrifices. Among the Brahmanas and the sages who came there, there was none who was not learned.

18. King Mandhatri having given away as gift the earth bounded by the ocean and replete with all sorts of wealth, to the Brahmanas, at last set like the sun itself.

19. Then having filled the quarters with his fame,he repaired to the regions of righteous. Even when such a king, O Srinjaya, died, who was superior to you in all the four cardinal qualities,

20. And consequently much more superior to your son—you should not lament for your son saying—'Oh Swaitya'—who performed no sacrifice and made no sacrificial gifts.

Thus ends the sixty-second chapter, the story of Mandhatri, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXIII.

Narada said :—

1. O Srinjaya, we heard also that Yayati, the son of Nahusa, was carried away by Death. Having celebrated a hundred Rajasuya sacrifices, a hundred Horse-sacrifices,

2. A thousand Pundarikas, a hundred Vajapeya sacrifices, a thousand Atiratra sacrifices, numerous Chaturmasya sacrifices,

3—4. Many Agnistomas and diverse other kind of sacrifices, all attended with the giving away of profuse Dakshinas, he gave unto the Brahmanas all the wealth on the face of Earth, belonging to the non-Brahmana sect, having at first taken an account of them all. He assisted the celestials when they and the Asuras stood ready for fight arraying themselves in battle order.

5. He divided the Earth in four parts and gave her away to four persons. Having celebrated diverse sacrifices, and virtuously begotten excellent progeny on his wives, viz.,

6. Devayani, the daughter of Usanas, and Sarmistha, that god-like Yayati roamed in the woods of the celestials,

7. At his own unrestrained pleasure, like a second Vasava (or Indra). Versed in all the Vedas, when he found that he was not satiated with the indulgence of his desires,

8. He repaired to the forest with his wives, having uttered this saying, "Whatever of paddy, wheat, gold, animals and women there are on the face of the Earth

9. Are not sufficient for even one single man. Knowing such to be the fact, one should betake to contentment." Thus having renounced all his desires, and cultivating contentment,

10. The Lord Yayati retired into the woods, having installed his son Puru on the throne. O Srinjaya, when even such a king had to suffer death, who was superior to you in respect of the four cardinal virtues,

11. And was consequently much more superior to your son, you should not lament for your son—crying—'O Swaitya'—who did not perform any sacrifice or offer any sacrificial presents.

Thus ends the sixty-third chapter, the story of Yayati, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXIV.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Narada said :—

1. O Srinjaya, we heard that Nabhaga's son Amvarisha, who, single-handed, fought a thousand times against thousand kings, was also carried away by Death.

2. He simultaneously attacked his enemies who desired to obtain victory over him, who were accomplished in fighting with weapons and who had assaulted him with fierce yells.

3. Subduing them with his prowess and by the strength of his weapons, he cut off their umbrellas, weapons, standards and chariots, and deprived them of their lives. Thus he relieved himself of all his anxieties.

4. Then desirous of saving their lives, those defeated kings, putting off their coats of mail implored the mercy of that compassionate monarch and sought his protection saying, "We surrender ourselves."

5. Thus having brought them under his control, and having conquered this world, he celebrated a hundred desirable sacrifices, in accordance with the ordinances of the Shastras, O sinless one.

6. At those sacrifices of his, people partook of edibles possessed of all delicate qualities. Therefore most of the Brahmanas were greatly gratified and were most excellently worshipped.

7. Sweetmeats, Purikas, Pupas, Saskulis of excellent taste and large size, Karambhas, Prithumridikos, and various kinds of well-prepared edibles,

8. Various sorts of Supas, Maireyas, Pupas, Ragakhandavas, and diverse king of confectionery, well-dressed, delicate, and savoury,

9. And clarified butter, and honey, and milk and water and tasteful curds, and fruits and esculent roots—these things were there eaten by the regenerate castes.

10. And men who were addicted to drink wines, drank, in proper time, various kinds of intoxicating drinks, for the sake of the pleasures they produced and then sang and played upon their musical instruments.

11. Some perfectly toxicated sang songs, and were greatly delighted; and some reeled on the ground; some applauded the son of Nabhaga in panegyrics, and some danced in thousands.

12. In those sacrifices, Amvarisha gave as gifts the kingdoms of hundreds and thousands of kings to the ten million priests engaged in his sacrifice.

13—15. Having celebrated diverse sacrifices the king gave unto the Brahmanas as sacrificial presents numerous princes and kings whose coronal locks had been purified by the sacred bath, all furnished with golden armours, all having white umbrellas held over their heads, all mounted on golden chariots, vested in superb garments and having large retinues and all bearing their sceptres and possessing their treasuries. 'None amongst the men of olden times did, nor those to come will do,

16. What king Amvarisha, profuse in his sacrificial presents, has done.' Even thus did the mighty sages, gratified with him, applauded him.

17. O Srinjaya, when even such a king who was superior in respect of the four cordinal virtues to you and consequently to your son, had to undergo death, you should not lament for your son who performed no sacrifices and made no sacrificial gifts, saying, 'O Swaitya.'

Thus ends the sixty-fourth chapter, the story of Amvarisha, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXV.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Narada Said:—

1. We also heard, O Srinjaya, that king Sasavindu, who was of great personal beauty and of prowess incapable of being repulsed, and who performed numerous and diverse sacrifices, had to undergo death.

2. That one of illustrious soul had a hundred thousand wives; and each of these wives was blessed with a thousand sons.

3. All those princes were endowed with prowess; all of them performed ten millions of sacrifices each. Learned in the sacred scriptures, those royal heroes accomplished many excellent sacrifices.

4. All of them, (on occasions of battle) used to don golden coats of mail; and all were excellent bowmen. All those sons of Sasavindu accomplished the Horse-sacrifice.

5. That foremost of kings, their father gave them away to the Brahmanas as sacrificial pesents, at his own sacrifice. Each of those princes was followed by hundreds upon hundreds of car-warriors and elephants,

6. And beautiful damsels adorned with ornaments of gold. With each damsel were a hundred elephants and with each elephant a hundred chariots.

7. With each car were a hundred horses adorned with chains of gold. And with each horse a thousand cows. With each cow were fifty goats.

8. In that great Horse-sacrifice of his, he gave away unlimited wealth. And in other sacrifices also he gave away equal amount of gold &c.

9. There were piles of edibles, foods and confectionery of the height of two full miles. And when the Horse-sacrifice of the king was over, thirteen such piles remained (unused).

10. Having ruled for many years over his kingdom, where the people were well-fed, satisfied, and free from diseases, and where all kinds of evils were rooted out, king Sasavindu ascended to Heaven.

11. O Srinjaya, when even such a sovereign, who was superior in respect of the four cardinal virtues to you and consequently to your son, had to suffer death you should not lament for your son who performed no sacrifices and made no sacrificial gifts,—saying 'O Swaitya'.

Thus ends the sixty-fifth chapter, the story of Sasavindu, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXVI.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Narada said:—

1. O Srinjaya, we also heard of the death of king Gaya, the son of Amurtarajas, who for hundred years lived only upon remnants of the libations offered on fire.

2—3. Thereat Agni offered to bestow a boon on him; and thereupon Gaya asked for this boon saying,—"I desire to acquaint myself with the contents of the Vedas, through ascetic penances, observance of Brahmacharyya rites, vows and rules, and also through the grace of my preceptors. I also desire to acquire inexhaustible wealth without trangressing the duties of the order which I belong to, and without any injury to any one else.

4. I desire also the boon, that every day I may give away devoutly my wealth to the Brahmanas. I wish also to beget sons upon females of my own order and not upon others.

5. Let devotion be the ruling feeling of my heart when I shall give away edibles; let also my mind delight in the fountain of righteousness. Let, O Agni, no difficulty overtake me when I engage myself in the performance of pious deeds."

9. "It shall be so"—saying this, the God of Fire, disappeared even there. Then Gaya realising all those boons sought, began to obtain righteous victories over all his enemies.

7. Then king Gaya celebrated for a full hundred years, various kinds of sacrifices with profuse Dakshinas, as also many other vows as Chaturmasya &c.

8. Every year, in a century, the king gave unto the Brahmanas, with due devotion, hundred thousand kine, ten thousand horses.

9. And for several successive centuries he gave to the Brahmanas hundred thousand Nikshas and sixty-thousand kine, at the time of his rising.

10. Under every (auspicious) conjunction of the constellations, he gave away presents specified for those occasions. Verily the monarch performed various sacrifices like another Soma or another Angirash.

11. Making the earth covered with gold and with pebbles constituted by gems, he gave her away as a present to the Brahmanas during the celebration of his great Horse-sacrifice.

12. In the sacrifices of Gaya, the stakes were made of gold; and embossed with jewels, and precious, they delighted the hearts of all.

13. Then Gaya gave to the delighted Brahmanas and other creatures, those stakes and many other precious objects of desire.

14. The various species of creatures inhabiting the oceans, the islands, the rivers male and female, the woods, forests, towns, kingdoms, the paradise and the sky,

15. And diverse other beings were gratified with the wealth and riches distributed at Gaya's sacrifice. They then said:—"There was no sacrifice like that celebrated by Gaya."

16—17. The sacrificial altar of Gaya was thirty yojanas long, twenty-six yojanas high; and it was covered with gold and strewn over with pearls and gems. He gave away this altar and many garments and ornaments to the Brahmanas.

18. That liberal-handed monarch gave unto the Brahmanas other presents specified in the scriptures. When the sacrifice was completed, their remained twenty-five mountains of edibles and foods, (untouched.)

19. And there also remained many lakes of potions and several streams of juicy drinks flowing charmingly, and many garments and ornaments, perfumes and and many princes (who were intended to be given away as presents)

20. Through that great sacrifice of his, Gaya became well-known in the three worlds; and the eternal Banian tree and the holy Brahma-lake, owe their origin to that sacrifice.

21. O Srinjaya, when even such a king, who was far superior in respect of the four cardinal virtues to you and consequently to your son, had to undergo death, you should not lament for your son who performed no sacrifice and made no sacrificial gifts—saying 'O Swaitya.'

Thus ends the sixty-sixth chapter, the story of Gaya, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXVII.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Narada said:—

1. O Srinjaya, we heard also that Saukriti's son Ratindeva, who had two hundred-thousand cooks of high-soul, had to undergo death.

2. These cooks of his, used to distribute raw and cooked food and vast amount of wealth, day and night, to the Brahmanas that repaired to Ratindeva's mansion as guests.

3. He gave away unto the Brahmanas his wealth acquired through fair means. Having studied the Vedas he subdued his foes in fair combats.

4. Many were the animals that out of their own accord came, desirous of ascending to Heaven, to that one of regulated vows, who performed sacrifices in accordance with the ordinances of the Shastras.

5. A veritable river of secretions flowed from the piles of skins deposited in his kitchen,—skins that were taken off the bodies of the animals sacrificed at his Agnihotra sacrifices. And the river thus caused came to be called Charmanwati.

6. He always gave away golden Nikshas to the Brahmanas saying "I give you Nikshas, I give you Nikshas."

7. "To you, to you", saying these words he gave thousands of Nikshas away to the Brahmanas. Then again, comforting them, he gave them Nikshas.

8. Having given away in the course of a single day, a Koti of Nikshas, he used to say, "I have this day given away a very small number of coins", thus thinking, he would again give away Nikshas. What other person can give away such enormous quantity of wealth?

9. That king used to give away wealth, thinking—"If I do not give wealth into the hands of the Brahmanas, great and everlasting sorrow will surely fall in my share."

10. For a hundred years, twice a month, he gave away unto thousands of Brahmanas a golden bull each followed by a herd of hundred cows and eight hundred pieces of Nikshas. All the articles necessary for his Agnihotra sacrifice and for his other sacrifices,

12. He gave away to the sages,—including Karakas, and jars for water, and plates and dishes, and beds, carpets, conveyances, palaces and dwelling houses,

13. And various sorts of trees, and diverse kinds of edibles and viands. All the utensils and articles of the intelligent Ratindeva were made of gold.

14. Seeing then the super-human prosperity of king Ratindeva, those that were conversant with the history of past ages sang this song :—

15. "We have not seen such vast treasures even in the mansion of Kuvera (the Plutus of Hindu mythology), what to speak of the treasuries of men?

16. People then wonderingly used to say:—"It is evident that the kingdom of Ratindeva, the son of Sankrita, is made of gold. On such nights when guests used to assemble in the mansion of Ratindeva,

17. Twenty-one thousand cows used to be sacrificed (for feeding them). And the cooks of the king, adorned with jewelled ear-rings used to cry out (to the guests) saying:—

18. "Drink as much soup as you can, for there is not so much meat to-day as there was the other day." Whatever of gold Ratindeva possessed, then,

19. Was given away to the Brahmanas in the course of one of his sacrifices. The gods in person used to accept the libations of butter poured on the fire for them,

20. And the ancestral manes used similarly to accept food that was offered to them in proper time. The Brahmanas, the best of their sects, used to obtain from him all the objects of their desire. When, O Srinjaya, even such a king had to undergo Death, who was superior to you in respect of the four cardinal virtues,

21. And consequently was superior to your son, you should not lament for your son who performed no sacrifice and made no sacrificial gifts, saying—'O Swaitya, O Swaitya'

Thus ends the sixty-seventh chapter, the story of Ratindeva, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Narada said :—

1. O Srinjaya, we heard that Dushmanta's son Bharata, who, when a child, performed in the woods many feats difficult of being performed by others, had also to suffer death.

2. Possessed of great prowess, he used quickly to deprive the very lions armed with teeth and claws, of all their ferocity, and dragged them and bound them at his own pleasure.

3—4. He used to tame down the very tigers, more ferocious and more ruthless than the lions. Seizing various beasts of prey and even prodigious elephants dyed with red chalk-solution, and bespattered with other liquid minerals, by their teeth and tusks, that highly powerful one used to bring them to his subjection causing their throats to become parched up and compelling them to fly away.

5. Endued with great strength he used to drag down the mightiest of buffaloes. Through his prowess, he tamed hundreds of ferocious lions,

6. And powerful tigers, and horned rhinoceroses and other animals. Binding them by their necks and twisting the ropes (around their necks) to an inch of their lives, he used to release them.

7. For those feats of his, the regenerate sages residing there used to call him Sarvadamana (or the subduer of all). But at last his mother forbade him do so, saying--'Do not torture animals thus.'

8. Possessed of great energy, he celebrated a hundred Horse-sacrifices on the banks of the river Yamuna, three hundred such sacrifices on the banks of the Saraswati and four hundred such on the banks of the Ganges.

9. Having accomplished all those sacrifices he once more performed a thousand great Horse-sacrifices and a hundred such Rajasuya, in which he made profuse gifts to the Brahmanas.

10. He performed also such other sacrifices, as the Agnisthoma, the Atiratra, the Vektha, the Viswajit and thousands of Vajapeyas.

11.—16. Then the royal son of Sakuntala gratified the Brahmanas with the present of riches; then Bharata of illustrious fame gave ten thousand billions of coins made of the purest gold to Kanwa (who had reared his mother). The gods with Indra at their head, accompannied by the twice-born ones, coming to this sacrifices, set up his sacrificial stake made wholly of gold, and measuring hundred Vyamas in width. The royal Bharata of magnanimous soul, that conqueror of his foes, that sovereign ever unsubdued by his enemies gave away unto the Brahmanas, charming steeds, elephants, and chariots, adorned with gold, and embcssed with gems of the first water of all sorts, and camels and goats and sheep and male and female servants, wealth, grain, milch-cows with calves, and villages, houses and fields, and garments of various kinds, countless in number. When, O Srinjaya, even such a king had to suffer death who was superior to you in respect to the four cardinal virtues,

17. And consequently to your son, you should not lament for your son who performed no sacrifice and made no sacrificial gifts saying,—'O Swaitya'.

Thus ends the sixty-eighth chapter, the story of Bharata, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXIX.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Narada said :—

1. We heard also, O Srinjaya, that Vena's son Prithu, who was installed as the emperor of the world by the mighty sages on the celebration of his Rajasuya-sacrifice, had also to suffer death.

2. Having vanquished all his foes with great efforts, he consolidated his empire, for which he came to be called Prithu (or the celebrated). He became a true Kshatriya, owing to his protecting his subjects from wounds and injuries.

3. Beholding Vena's son Prithu, his subjects said—'We are delighted' and in consequence of the affection of his subjects which he enjoyed, he came to be called Raja.

4. The Earth yielded corn without being cultivated, and for Vena's son Prithu she fulfilled all his desires. The cows also yielded milk whenever desired, and every lotus-bud was filled with honey.

5. The sacred Kusa grass were all made of gold and were delicate to the touch and otherwise delightful. The people used to wear cloths made of this grass and they used to lie down on beds composed of them.

6. Fruits, nectareous, tasteful and delicate, then became their chief edible; and none went without food.

7. In his kingdom men lived free from all diseases, their desires were all crowned with fruition, they entertained no fear. They lived on trees and in caves, as it pleased them.

8. His dominions and his cities were not divided into smaller sections and countries. There his subjects lived delightedly, as it suited their desire or convenience.

9. When king Prithu repaired to the sea, its waves become solidified. The very mountains opened a way for him, and his standard never broke (being obstructed by any thing).

10. Him seated at his ease, the mighty trees of the forest, the gods of the mountains, the celestials, the Asuras, the men and the reptiles, the seven sages, the holy ascetics, the Gandharvas, the Apsaras, and

11. The ancestral manes, approaching said these words :—" You are our Emperor, you protect us from injuries, you are ever our delighter, saviour and father.

12, Give us, O mighty monarch, O Master, the boons we desire to have—boons through whose virtue we may live in happiness and plenty, for eternal years.

13. Then saying 'yea' to all their prayers, Vena's son Prithu took up his Ajagava bow and several dreadful arrows, whose equals existed not; then thinking for a while, he addressed the Earth saying :—

14. "Come, come, O Earth, quickly give these my subjects the milk they desire. Good betide you; from the milk you shall shed, I desire to give my subjects the edibles they wish to have.

The Earth said :—

15. "O Hero, it behoves you to look upon me as your own daughter."

Narada said :—

Saying, "So be it," the self-controlled Prithu, then arranged for (milking the Earth).

16. Then the whole assemblage of creatures began to milk the Earth (successively). The mighty trees of the forest then first approached her, desirous of milking her.

17. There then stood the highly affectionate Earth (as a cow), looking for a calf, a milker and a pot wherein to keep the milk. Then the flowering Sala tree became the calf, and the Plaksha became the milker,

18. Torn buds become the milk and the auspicious fig tree became the milk-pot. (Next the mountains appeared to milk her) The Eastern hill then became the calf, and the mighty Meru-mountain became the milkman.

19. Jewels and precious stones and the Osadhies became the milk and the stones became the milk-jar. Next the celestials became the milkers, and everything capable of imparting energy became the milk.

20. Next the Asuras milked urine from the Earth, in unbaked earthen jars. Deemurdha (the two-headed) then became the milker and Virochana became the calf.

21. Next the men milked her when products of cultivation and crops became the milk; the self-create Muni became the calf and Prithu the milker, on this occasion.

22. Next the snakes milked her, and they received poison for milk in gourds. Dhritarastra became the milker and Takshaka became the calf.

23. The seven sages untiring in work, next milked her and obtained the knowledge of the Supreme Brahma for the milk. Then Vrihaspati became the milker the Vedas became the milk-pot, and the Somarat became the calf.

24. The Rakshasas milking her, in a jar of unbaked Earth, obtained the power of disappearing at will. Their milker was Vaisravana, and Vrisadhwaja was their calf.

25. The Apsaras and the Gandharvas milked her of holy fragrance and received it in lotus-petals. Chaitraratha became their calf and the lord Viswaruchi became their milker.

26. The ancestral manes milked her of Swadhas in pots of silver. Vaivaswata became their calf and the Destroyer (Yama) himself became their milker.

27. Thus was the Earth milked by that entire host of creatures, who obtained for milk all objects of their respective desire. The very calves and the pots, with whose help they milked could be seen even today.

28. Then Vena's son, Prithu, possessed of prowess, celebrated various sacrifices, and he gratified the hearts of creatures with objects desired by them.

29. The king caused all objects obtaining of the face of the Earth to be made of gold and on the occasion of his great Horse-sacrifice, he gave them away to the Brahmanas.

30. The king caused sixty-six thousands images of elephants to be made of gold, and he gave them away to the Brahmanas.

31. The entire Earth adorned with jewels and gems, the king caused to be covered over with gold and he then gave her away to the Brahmanas.

32. When, O Srinjaya, even such a king, who was superior to you in respect of the four virtues and consequently much more superior to your son, you should not lament for your son who performed no sacrifice and made no sacrificial gifts—saying, 'O Swaitya'.

Thus ends the sixty-ninth chapter, the story of Prithu, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXX.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Narada said :—

1. Even the heroic Rama that illustrious ascetic adored by the heroes of the world, that son of Jamadagni, of great renown, died with his desires unsatiated.

2. Making this Earth abound in all kinds of happiness, he caused the primaeval Yuga to set in. He was not perverted, having obtained excellent affluence.

3. When a calf belonging to him was stolen and when his father was slain by the Kshatriyas, he took a vow saying that he would relieve the Earth of her burden of Kshatriyas: Thereafter he slew Kartaviryya who was never before defeated in battle by his foes.

4. Single-handed and with a single bow, he vanquished and despatched to the abode of Death, four and sixty times ten thousand Kshatriyas.

5. In that slaughter were included fourteen thousand Kshatriyas all contemners of the Brahmanas. Then again he slew many Kshatriyas of the Dantakrula country.

6. He slew a thousand Kshatriyas with his bludgeon, a thousand with his sword and a thousand of the Haihayas also by hanging them.

7. Heroes with their chariots, steeds and elephants, lay slain on the field of battle, by the intelligent son of Jamadagni, who had been exasperated by the death of his father.

8. Then Rama slew with his axe ten thousand Kshatriyas. He then could not bear the hot words uttered by his enraged adversaries.

9—11. When the twice-born sects exclaimed saying 'O Rama, the descendant of Bhrigu's race,' then the puissant son of Jamadgni proceeding against the Kashmiras, the Daradas, the Kuntis, the Kshudrakas, the Malavas, the Angas, the Vangas, the Kalingas, the Videhas, the Tamraliptakas, the Rakshovashas, the Vitahotras, the Trigarttas and the Martikavartas the Sivis and other kingly races, thousands in number, inhabiting various countries, slew them all with his arrows of exceeding sharpness.

12—13. Going from country to country, he slew thousands and crores of Kshatriyas creating a deluge of blood and filling many lakes with it, which was as red as Indra Gopakas or the wild fruit known as Vandhujiva,—and also bringing under his sway all the eighteen division of the earth, that descendant of Bhrigu's race,

14. Celebrated a hundred holy sacred sacrifices in which he gave away profuse sacrificial presents. The sacrificial altar, full eighteen Nalas high and made entirely of gold and erected duly,

15. And filled with diverse kinds of gems and jewels, and adorned with hundreds of penons, as also this earth abounding in domestic and wild animals,

16. Were accepted by Kasyapa as sacrificial presents offered to him by R..., the son of Jamadagni. Rama also gave him many thousands of huge elephants adorned with golden ornaments.

17. Freeing the earth from the robbers that infested her and making her full of innocent and amiable people, Rama gave her away to Kasyapa at his great Horse-sacrifice.

18. That lord, that hero having relieved the earth, for twenty-one times, of her burdens of the Kshatriya population and having celebrated a hundred sacrifices, gave her away to the Brahmanas.

19. The earth with her seven grand divisions were bestowed by him upon the twice-born son of Maricha (Kasyapa). Then the latter addressed Rama saying:—"Go you out of this Earth, at my command"

20. At the words of Kasyapa, that best of warriors obedient to the Brahmanas' command, caused, by the fall of his arrows, the very ocean to roll back;

21. Then going to the foremost of mountains, namely, the Mahendra mountain, he continued to live there. Even that enhancer of the glory of the Bhrigu race that one endowed with desirable qualities,

22. That son of Jamadagni, of illustrious renown, and great effulgence, had to die. Superior to you in respect to the four virtues and also to your son, even that one did die.

23. Therefore you should not weep for your son, who performed no sacrifice and made no sacrificial gifts. These foremost and best of men, all superior to you in respect of the four virtues and in respect of many other meritorious qualities, had to suffer death, O Srinjaya.

Thus ends the seventieth chapter, the story of Jamadagni's son, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXXI.

(ABHIMANYU-BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vyasa said:—

1. Having heard these holy stories of the sixteen kings, capable of enhancing the duration of the listener's life, king Srinjaya said nothing and remained silent for a while.

2. Then to him thus sitting silent, the almighty sage Narada said:—"O you of [illegible]t effulgence you have heard the stories [illegible]w related by me, and have comprehended their signification,

3. Or are all these lost on you, like a Sradha performed by a twice-born one having a female of the Sudra caste for his wife." Thus spoken to, Srinjaya replied to him with folded palms, saying :—

4. "O you rich in the wealth of asceticism, having heard these best and laudable stories of ancient royal sages, all of whom celebrated great sacrifices with profuse presents unto the Brahmanas,

5. All my sorrow have been driven away by wonder, like darkness being dispelled by the radiance of the sun. I have now been purged of all my sins; and I do not feel any pain now. Tell me what shall I do.

Narada said :—

6. It is through good luck that your sorrow has been dispelled. Ask you the boon that your heart craves for; you will get whatever you may seek to have. We never speak falsehood.

Srinjaya said:—

7. I am contented even with this, viz., that you, O holy sage, are pleased with me. That person with whom you are pleased, O you holy one, has nothing inaccessible to him.

Narada said :—

8. I will once again give you back your son, who was to no purpose slain by the robbers, like an animal immolated in a sacrifice. I shall take him out of the terrible hell.

Vyasa said :—

9. Then the son of Srinjaya of wonderful splendour, resembling the son of Kuvera, appeared there, bestowed on his bereaved father, by the qualified sage.

10. Then king Srinjaya once more obtaining the sight of his son became highly delighted. He then gave away numerous merit-giving sacrificial gifts upon their accomplishment of his yajnas.

11. The life-mission of Srinjaya's son was not fulfilled. He had performed no sacrifices and had begotten no progeny. Destitute of bravery, he perished miserably, and not in battle. For this reason he could be brought back into life.

12. As regards Abhimanyu, he was courageous and brave. He has fulfilled the mission of his life; for, the brave son of Subhadra having scorched his enemies by thousands, had passed away, falling on the field of battle.

13. Those eternal regions that are attained through the performance of Brahmacharyya vows, through knowledge, and acquaintance with the scriptures, through foremost of sacrifices,—even those regions have been obtained by your son.

14. Men possessed of knowledge always desire to attain to heaven by their performance of deeds of piety. They who live in heaven do not like this world.

15. Therefore it is not easy to find out any desirable thing that might have been unattained by him, that might bring back into this world Arjuna's son slain in battle, and now dwelling in heaven,

16. Your son has ascended to those regions, the eternal goal of Yogins who contemplate with their eyes shut, or by performers of illustrious sacrifices or by people possessed of great ascetic merit.

17. Having attained a new figure after death, that hero is shining like a monarch in his own immortal radiance. Verily Abhimanyu has once more assumed his own body composed of the essence of the moon that is desired by all twice-born ones. Therefore you should not weep for him.

18. Acquainted with these facts, compose yourself and slay your enemies. Muster courage, O you sinless one, it is the living beings who want us to grieve for them and not they who have ascended to heaven.

19. O king, his sins go on increasing, for whom the living mourn. For this reason, the wise, renouncing grief, exert themselves for the benefit of the dead (i.e., their souls.)

20. The living man should think of the joy, the glory and the happiness of the dead. Acquainted with truth, the wise never harbour grief, for grief is nothing more or less than grief.

21. Know this as truth; rise up, gird up your loins; do not lament, you have heard of the origin of the Death, and of her unequalled penances,

22. As also of her equality of conduct towards all creatures. You have heard that prosperity is unsteady; you have also heard as how the dead son of Srinjaya was brought back to life.

23. O foremost of learned monarchs, do not lament. May you enjoy peace, I depart."

Sanjaya said :—

Having thus spoken, the sacred Rishi Vyasa disappeared even there.

24. Upon the disappearance of that eloquent speaker, that foremost of all intelligent beings, viz., the holy Vyasa whose colour was like that of the sky overspread with clouds, Yudhisthira having obtained consolation,

25. In consequence of what he had heard about the sacrificial merit and prosperity, of those great monarchs of ancient times endued with energy equal to that of the great Indra himself, and all of whom had acquired wealth by virtuous means,

26. Applauded them in his mind, and then became relieved of his sorrows. But once more, with a sorrowful heart he asked himself saying—' What shall I say to Dhananjaya ?'

Thus ends the seventy-first chapter, the conclusion of the story of the sixteen sovereigns, in the Abhimanyu-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXXII.

PRATJINA PARVA.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When that dreadful day so fraught with the slaughter of creatures had passed away, and when the sun set, the auspicious shade of twilight began to spread itself.

2—3. Then,O foremost of the Bharatas, when the troops of both the hosts had retired to their respective quarters, the ape-bannered Jishnu having slain the Samsaptaka hosts with his celestial weapons, proceeded towards his pavilion mounted on that victorious chariot of his. As he went on, he asked Govinda, in a voice choked with tears.

4. "Why, O Kesava, does my mind misgive and why does my speech falter ? Evil portents reveal themselves to me and my limbs are becoming weak.

5. Thoughts, such as a calamity has befallen me, occupying my heart, does not leave it ; on earth, in all the directions, various dreadful portents affright me.

6. Various kinds of omens are being seen by me and they harbinger the happening of a calamity, May all things fare well with the king, my venerable superior, and with his followers."

The son of Vasudeva said :—

7. It is evident that everything fares well with your brothers and his ministers. Do not give way to evil thoughts ; it is probable, that some trivial calamity has taken place.

Sanjaya said :—

8. Then those two heroes, having adored the evening twilight, proceeded on their car talking of the incidents of that day's battle so destructive of heroes.

9. Thereafter having achieved feats difficult of being achieved, Arjuna and Vasudeva reached the Pandava encampments, joyless and melancholy.

10. Then that slayer of foes, Vibhatsu, beholding the camp in confusion, said to Krishna with a sorrowful heart :—

Arjuna said :—

11. O Jararddana, the auspicious drums are not beat to-day and their sound does not add to the din created by the trumpet-blasts and conch-blares.

12—13. The melodious Venu is not played upon accompanied by claps ; auspicious songs, fraught with praises and delightful, are not sung in my troops to-day, by the ministrels and the bards. All warriors also, beholding me, are turning away with their faces cast down.

14. Duly performing the ceremonies one after another, they do not come forward to salute me. O Madhava, is every thing well with all my brothers ?

15. Seeing my own people distressed with sorrow, my mind does not obtain peace. Does everything fare well, O bestower of honour, with the Panchala king or the ruler of the Viratas,

19. Or with all of our warriors, O you of undeteriorating glory ? Alas, to-day Subhadra's son accompanied by his brothers, does not come out, smiling and joyful to receive me returning from battle.

Sanjaya said :—

17. Thus talking to one another, they both entered into their encampments, and they beheld the Pandavas sit cheerless and with hearts distracted (with grief).

18. Then that hero bearing the ape as a device on his banner, seeing his brother and sons (thus depressed), himself became melancholy. Then not finding Subhadra's son he spoke these words :—

Arjuna said :—

19. I see that the colour of your countenances has truned pale. I do not also see Abhimanyu here, nor do you welcome me.

20 I have also heard that Drona to-day arrayed his troops in the circular order. There is also none among you capable of penetrating into that array, save my boy Abhimanyu.

21. But I did not teach him the means of coming out of that array. Is it that you made the boy enter the array of the enemy?

22. Has that fierce bowman, that slayer of hostile heroes, namely, the son of Subhadra, having penetrated into those numberless divisions of the enemy, been slain in battle?

23. Tell me, Oh, how that hero possessed of mighty arms and red eyes, who was born in our race, like a lion on the mountain breast, and who resembled Upendra himself, has been slain in battle?

24. What warriors, urged on by their evil Destiny, ventured to slay that dear-loved son of Subhadra, that favourite of Droupadi and Kesava, who was always fondly loved by my own mother (Kunti)?

25. How has that hero resembling the high-souled Vrishni hero Kesava himself in prowess, genorosity and acquaintance with the Shastras, been slain in battle?

26. If to-day I do not see that hero dearly loved by that daughter of Vrishni race (Subhadra), and fondly brought up by myself, I shall be a guest of Death's abode.

27. Possessed of soft and curling hair-ends, of tender years, of eyes like those of a young gazelle graced with the tread of an infuriate elephant, resembling an offshoot of a Sala tree,

28. Of sweet speeches attended with smiles, modest, ever ready to carry out the behests of his venerables, achieving in tender years, feats worthy of mature age, sweet-spoken, free from animosity,

29. Of mighty energy and prowess, of eyes resembling large lotus-petals, ever merciful towards his followers, self-possessed, never pursuing mean objects and men,

30. Ever grateful, endued with the knowledge of all things, unretreating and accomplished in the use of all kinds of weapons, ever delighting in battle, and ever enhancing the terror of his adversaries,

31. Always intent on bringing about the welfare of his own party, ever desirous of seeing victory secured by his own sires, never striking first in battle, never daunted in fight,

32. Oh! if, I do not see such a son of mine, I shall carry me to the abode of Death. In the tale of car-warriors, always counted with the mighty car-warriors,

33. Possessed of mighty arms, of tender years, one and a half times superior to me in battle, always a favorite of myself, Pradyumna and Kesava,

34. Oh, if I do not see that son of mine, I shall go to the regions of Death. Graced with a beautiful nose and fore-head and eyes and eyebrows, and teeth and lips,

35. Oh, without seeing that countenance of his, I shall enjoy no peace of mind. Delightful like the warbling of a lyre, charming and melodious like the voice of a cuckoo,

36. Oh, without hearing that voice of his what peace can my heart enjoy? His beauty that was unequalled and scarce even among the heaven-dwelling gods,

37. Oh, without beholding that beauty of his, what peace can my heart enjoy? Skilful in congratulating and welcoming others, obedient to the commands of his sires,

38. If I do not see that son of mine, what peace can my heart enjoy? Brought up in all luxury, always heroic and accustomed to lie on precious beds,

39. He lies to-day on the bare earth like one helpless, though he is foremost of all who have others to look after them. He upon whom, when on his bed, the most beautiful women used to attend,

40. Oh! even he, his bodies mutilated with shafts, has inauspicious jackals prowling over the field to attend upon him to-day! He who formerly used to be awakened from his sleep by songsters, ministrels and panegyrists,

41. Oh! even he shall to-day be roused by the fierce yells of the beasts of prey. That auspicious and charming countenance of his, worthy of being shaded by umbrellas,

42. Shall to-day be soiled with the dust rising from the field of battle. Oh! my dear child, I, who was never satiated with looking at you,

43. Alas! unfortunate that I am I have been forcibly bereft of you by Death. Surely the mansion of Death, that goal of persons of pious deeds,

44—45. That delightful palace, has to-day been illumined by your splendour and so has been made highly charming by you. Surely Yama, Varuna, Indra of hundred sacrifices, and Kuvera, receiving yourself as a welcome guest, are making preparations for worshipping you."

Sanjaya said :—

Thus copiously lamenting like a trader whose ship has been broken,

46. And being possessed by great grief Arjuna thus questioned Yudhisthira :—"O delighter of the Kurus, spreading a terrible, slaughter among the enemy's host,

47. Did my son ascend to heaven having fought with many foremost of men in battle? Surely fighting with many foremost of men exerting carefully in battle, he,

48. Single-handed and needing assistance, repeatedly thought of me! Afflicted by Karna and Drona and Kripa and others, with exceedingly sharp shafts,

49. Of various shape and well-polished tips, my son of small strength must have repeatedly thought—'My father will surely rescue me from this difficulty."

50. I think, when thus thinking of me he was felled to ground by those ruthless warriors; or it may be, that being begotten by myself and being the nephew of Madhava,

51. Being born out of Subhadra's womb, he did not utter such exclamations. Surely my heart is made of the hardest adamant,

52. In as much as, it does not burst open for my not seeing that one of mighty arms and red eyes. How could the fierce bowmen (of the Kourava) hosts, ruthless and cruel, have sped their arrows capable of penetrating to the very vitals, at that boy of tender years, that son of mine and the nephew of Madhava? He of generous soul who everyday used to come out to receive me when I

54. Returned after having slain my foes, will he not see me to-day? Alas, he lies to-day prostrate on the field of battle weltering in his blood,

55—56. And enhancing the beauty of the earth with the splendour of his limbs and looking like the sun dropped from the firmament. I am indeed also destined to grieve for Subhadra who hearing that her unretreating son has been slain in battle, shall be struck with sorrow and shall give up her life? Oh! what will Subhadra say to me when she will not behold Abhimanyu (her son)!

57. Alas, what also shall I tell to Droupadi overwhelmed with great grief? Surely my heart is made of the hardest adamant, in as much as it will not be splintered into

58. Thousand fragments when I shall behold my daughter-in-law (Abhimanyu's wife), bewail, afflicted with the burden of her grief. I heard indeed the war-cries of the Dhartarastras, elated with pride.

59. Krishna also heard Yuyutsu admonishing the heroes in the following terms:—"O mighty car-warriors, not being able to defeat Vibhatsu, and slaying this boy of tender years,

60. What, do you rejoice? O most unrighteous ones, now shall you feel the might of the son of Pandu. Having done an injury to Kesava and Arjuna in battle,

61. Why do you roar like lions in delight? Verily your hour for grief has come. The fruits of your sinful acts will soon overtake you all.

62. You have committed a heinous crime, not long will it delay in bearing the ripe fruit for you!' Having spoken to them (the enemy) thus, the highly intelligent son of a Vaisya,

63. Went away, leaving aside his weapons and leaving the Kouravas with wrath and sorrow. Why, O Krishna, did you not tell me all this in the course of fight? I would then have burnt down all those cruel car-warriors of the enemy's host."

64. Thereafter the son of Vasudeva, consoling Pritha's son (Arjuna) who overwhelmed with sorrow on account of his son, was exceedingly thoughtful, whose eyes were overflowing with tears, and who, indeed, was afflicted by the grief generated by the slaughter of his son,

65. Said to him:—"Do you not give way to grief. This indeed is the inevitable fate of all those heroes who never think of retreating,

66. Specially of the Kshatriyas who live by war. Of unretreating heroes fighting in battle, this,

67. O foremost of intelligent beings, has been specified to be the finale by those who are conversant with the meanings of our sacred scriptures. Death in battle is the inevitable fate of heroes who do not fly away from the field.

68. Undoubtedly Abhimanyu has gone to the regions of those who perform pious deeds; and, O foremost of the Bharatas, even this is coveted by all heroes, viz.,

69. That they may fall in battle facing their enemies. As regards Abhimanyu, he, having slain in battle many heroic and mighty princes,

70—71. Hath reaped that death in battle which is so much desired by the heroes, O foremost of men, do not lament. The ancient sages have specified this to be the enduring merit of the Kshatriyas, viz., their fall in battle. O foremost of the Bharatas, these your brothers are highly distressed,

72. As also these monarchs and these your relatives, beholding you plunged in sorrow; O bestower of honour, do you console them with comforting speech,

13. Everything worthy of being known is known to you. It behoves you not to indulge in grief." Thus consoled by Krishna of wonderful deeds, the son of Pritha (Arjuna),

74. Said to all his brothers these words in a voice choked with grief:—" O lord of Earth, that mighty-armed one, that one possessed of eyes large like lotus petals,

75. Namely Abhimanyu,—how he fought, I desire to know? You will see that, I will consume the enemy with their elephnats, chariots and steeds.

76. I will consume in battle all those opponents of my son together with all their blood relations. You all are accomplished in the use of weapons and are even now armed with weapons;

77—78. How then could Subhadra's son be slain in battle, even if it were the wielder of the thunder bolt whom he might have encountered? Alas, if I had known that the Pandavas and the Panchalas would be incompetent to protect my son in battle, myself would then have protected him. You were all then on your chariots and were shooting your arrows;

79. How could then Abhimanyu be slain by the enemy spreading havoc in your troops? Alas, you possess no manliness! you have no prowess,

80—81. Inasmuch as even before your very sight Abhimanju was felled in battle. It is better I should blame myself, since knowing you all to be cowards, sneaking and irresolute, I went away. Alas! are your armours, weapons, offensive and defensive, mere decorations of your persons?

82. Are your eloquence mere empty words suited to an assembly only? For, you all failed to protect my son." Having spoken these words, Arjuna sat down, armed as he was with his bow and excellent sword.

83. Then none was able to look at Vibhatsu, who then resembled the enraged Destroyer, repeatedly drawing long and heavy sighs.

84. Then his friends could not speak to Arjuna or look at him who was burning with the grief on account of his son's death and whose countenance was then overflooded with tears.

85. Except the son of Vasudeva or the eldest son of Pandu, none then ventured to speak to Arjuna. These two (Yudhisthira and Krishna) were always agreeable to Arjuna.

86. These two were only competent to address him on all occasions, in as muchas they were held in great veneration and dear love. Then the king addressed the following words to that one possessed of eyes like lotus petals, whose heart was then aching with the sorrow caused by the (untimely) demise of his son, and who was excited to the highest pitch of fury.

Thus ends the seventy-second chapter, the wrath of Arjuna, in the Pratijna of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

(PRATIJNA PARVA)—
Continued.

Yudhisthira said :—

1. When, O mighty-armed one, you had gone against the Samsaptaka hosts, the preceptor Drona exerted himself vigourously for capturing me.

2. We then began to resist Drona and his troops arrayed in order on all sides, by dispensing off our troops and car divisions in counter array, and striving hard.

3. Though he was thus resisted by many and though I was well protected, yet he began to smite us with agility, afflicting us with his sharp shafts.

4. My troops then, thus afflicted by Drona, were not even able, in battle, to look at his divisions what to speak of the thought of breaking through them!

5. Then we all, O sire, spoke to Subhadhra's son, who was unequalled in his prowess, saying;—'O lord, do you break through these divisions of the enemy,'

6. That highly puissant hero then thus urged on by ourselves, like a good horse, prepared himself to take that burden upon himself, however unbearable it might have been for him.

7. Then that boy of tender years, endued with energy and possessed of the knowledge of weapons received from you, broke through that array, like Suparna entering into the ocean.

8. Then we followed that hero in battle, that son of a daughter of the Satwata race, desirous of entering the hostile ranks even through the path he then opened for us.

9. Then alas, O sire, the puny ruler of the Sindhus, king Jayadratha resisted us all, through the virtue of a boon received from the god Rudra (Mahadeva).

10. Thereupon Drona, Kripa, Karna, Drona's son, the king of the Kosalas, and Kritavarman—these six car-warriors surrounded the son of Subhadra,

11. Thus surrounded by all those mighty car-warriors in battle, that boy though striking to the best of his abilities, was deprived of the use of his car, by the tremendous odds he was fighting against.

12. Thus when Abhimanyu was deprived of the use of his car by those warriors, Dussasana's son, who himself was involved in great catastrophe, succeeded, as fate would have it, in making Abhimanyu see his end.

13. Having slain thousands of men, steeds, car-warriors and tusked elephants and eight thousands car-warriors and nine hundred elephants,

14. Two thousands princes, and many other unknown heroes, and also having despatched king Vrihadvala to Heaven,

15. That one of highly illustrious soul through Destiny, attained his own end. Thus everything that now burns us with grief, has taken place.

16. That foremost of men has also in this way, ascended to paradise."

Sanjaya said:—

Thus Arjuna hearing the word spoken by the virtuous king Yudhisthira,

17. And saying, O my son ! and sighing like a furnace, fell down on the earth in great distress. Then every one present, with melancholy countenances sat surrounding Dhananjaya;

18. And highly distressed they began to gaze vacantly at one another with winkless eyes. Then regaining his consciousness and burning with rage, the son of Vasava,

19. Shivering as if with fever and repeatedly sighing, and squeezing his hands and drawing deep breaths, and with eyes flooded with tears, and rolling his eyes like one mad, said these words:—

Arjuna said:—

20. I tell you this for sooth that, tomorrow I will slay Jayadrath, provided that, afraid of being slain, he does not forsake the sons of Dhritarashtra,

21. Or seek our refuge or that of Krishna the foremost of all male being or that of yourself, O monarch. I will surely slay Jayadratha to-morrow.

22. Tomorrow will I slay Jayadratha who forgetting his friendship for me, has been doing good to the sons of Dhritarastra and who has become instrumental in bringing about the slaughter of my boy.

23. Desirous of protecting him in battle whosoever shall fight with me, I will cover him, O king, with my arrows, be he Drona himself or Kripa.

24. O foremost of men, O best of heroes, if I do not do to-morrow in battle what I promise to do, then let me not ever attain to the regions which the righteous attain after death.

25. Those regions which are allotted to those who ravish their own mothers, to those who slay their fathers, who violate their preceptor's beds and who are malicious;

26. Those regions which are reserved for those who harbour hatred against the righteous, who speak maliciously of others, who appropriate the wealth entrusted with them, and who betray their trusts;

27. Those regions that are for them who abuse others' wives enjoyed by them before, or for them that slay Brahmanas or for them that slaughter the kine,

28. Or for them that drink Payasas or eat food prepared from barley or herbs, or articles prepared from milk, sessamum and rice and Pupas and other kinds of cakes, or meat, without having first offered them to the gods,—

29—31. Even those regions shall I attain to, if I do not slay Jayadratha. Those regions to which they go who contemn the Brahmanas devoted to the study of the Vedas, or otherwise deserving of veneration, or those that are senior in years, or those that are pious or those that are preceptors,—(even those region shall mine if I do not slay Jayadratha). That end which becomes theirs who touch the Brahmanas and the fire with their feet, that end which becomes theirs, who throw phlegm or excretions on, and discharge urine in water, even that most miserable end shall be mine, if indeed I do not slay Jayadratha tomorrow.

32. That end that overtakes him who bathes naked in water, or him who does not hospitably entertain a guest; that end that overtakes them who accept bribes, speak falsehoods and deceive and cheat men;

33—34. That end that overtakes them who offend against their own souls, or who falsely utter praises, that end that overtakes low wretches who eat sweetmeats before servants, sons and wives and dependents without giving them a share of them,—may that end also overtake me if I do not slay Jayadratha.

35—37. That end which overtakes the cruel-hearted wretch who without maintaining a pious and obedient protege casts him off, or him who without giving a deserving neighbour the offerings in a Sraddha, gives them to one undeserving of them; that end that overtakes them who accept in marriage Vrishalis ; that end which becomes his who indulges in wine, his who contemns those that are worthy of veneration, or his who is ungrateful, or his who speaks evil of his brethren,—that end shall also soon overtake me if I do not slay Jayadratha.

38. The ends of all those wretched persons whom I have not enumerated, as also of those whom I have here mentioned, shall soon overtake me,

39. If, after this night passing away, I do not slay Jayadratha tomorrow. Now listen to another oath of mine.

40. If to-morrow's sun sets before I succeed in slaying this sinful wretch, then even here shall I enter into a blazing fire.

41. Asuras, and the celestials, mortals, winged creatures, reptiles, or anscentral manes, rangers of the night, Brahmanical or celestials sages, the mobile and immobile things and beings, and what other things there may be on the face of the earth,—even all these will not be able to protect that foe of mine.

42. If he enters the nether regions, or ascends to the skies, or repairs to the celestial regions or to the dominion of the Daityas, I will still, with a group of hundred, shafts, cut off the head of Abhimsnyu's enemy, when this night passed away."

Sanjaya said :—

43. Having spoken these words, Arjuna began to twang his bow with both his right and left arms. Rising above the voice of Arjuna, the sound of the twanging bow touched even the very heavens.

44. When Arjuna had thus taken that oath Janarddana blew the conch Panchajannya, and Phalguna also excited with rage blew his conch Devadatta.

45. Then that conch Panchajannya being filled with the breath of the undeteriorating Krishna, emitted a loud sound and that sound then caused the universe, the nether regions, the heavens and the quarters O lord, to tremble, as if the end of a Yuga had come.

46. Then when the high-souled Arjuna had taken that oath, sounds of thousands of musical instruments and fierce war-cries, arose from the encampment of the Pandavas.

Thus ends the seventy-third chapter, the oath of Arjuna, in the Pratijna of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

(PRATIJNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Having heard the loud uproar created by the Pandavas desirous of victory, and having ascertained through spies the cause thereof, Jayadratha then rose up.

2. With a heart confounded with grief, and overwhelmed with affliction, and like one sinking in an extensive and deep sea of sorrow,

3. Then that ruler of the Sindhus,having reflected for a long while, proceeded to the assembly of the kings; there, before that assemblage of monarchs, expressing his grief,

4. And afraid of the father of Abhimanyu, and overwhelmed with shame, he spoke these words:—"He, who was begotten upon the wife of Pandu by the lustful Indra,

5. That one of perverse intellect is desirous of despatching me to the abode of Death. Good be tide you all: I shall now go back to my home out of a desire for saving my life.

6. Or, O foremost of the Kshatriyas, do you all protect me with the power of your weapons; O heroes, the son of Pritha (Arjuna) seeks to slay me; do you give me assurances of safety.

7. Drona, Duryodhana. Kripa, Karna, the rulers of the Madras and the Valhikas and Dussasana and others,—these are competent to save even one who is seized by Death himself.

8. Why then should not all these rulers of earth, united togather, be able to protect me, when I am threatened by Phalguna who seeks to slay me?

9. Having heard the rejoicings of the sons of Pandu, I am struck with fear, and O ruler of men, my limbs are loosing strength, like those of one on the verge of death.

10. Without doubt, the wielder of the bow gandiva has promised to slay me; therefore it is that, the Pandavas are shouting with delight at a time when they should grieve.

11. Even the Gandharvas, the Asuras the reptiles and the Rakshasas, can not dare baffle a vow of Arjuna, what to speak of the rulers of men?

12. Therefore O foremost of men,do you all accord me year permission (to go home) ; may good betide you ; I sнall go concealed and the Pandavas will not be able to detect me."

13. Him thus lamenting with a heart confounded with the burden of fear, king Duryodhana ever devoted to his own personal interests, said these words:—

14. "O foremost among men, you should entertain no fear. What person, O best of men, can seek to slay you, when you stand in the midst of the Kshatriya heroes.

15. Myself, Vikartana's son Karna, Chitrasena, Vivinsati, Vurisravas, Sala, Salya, the invincible Vrishasena,

16. Purumitra, Jaya, Voja, Sudakshina the ruler of the Kamvojas, the mighty armed Satyavrata, Vikarna and Durmukha,

17. Dussasana, Suvahu, the ruler of the Kalingas with arms uplipted, Vindu and Anuvinda of Avanti, Drona and the son of Drona, Suvala's son,

18. These and many other rulers of various countries, attended with all their troops, shall exert themselves in protecting you. Let the fever of fear be driven away from yonr mind.

19. You also, O you of unrivalled effulgence, are the foremost of all heroes; why then, O ruler of the Sindhus, do you entertain fear from the Pandavas.

20. These ten and one Akshouhini of my troops shall strive their best for protecting you. Be not afraid, O ruler of the Sindhus. Let fear be driven away from your heart."

Sanjaya said:—

21. Thus comforted by your son Duryodhana, the ruler of the Sindhus, O king accompanied by the former, went that very night, to the camp of Drona.

22. Then saluting Drona by touching his feet, and having bowed down to him, Jayadratha, O ruler of men, sat down with humility and then asked the following question.

23. "Tell me, O illustrious one, the difference between myself and Phalguna, as regards hitting the aim, hitting it from a distance, lightness of hands and the force of strokes.

24. O preceptor, I want to know exactly the difference, as regards proficiency in arms, between myself and Arjuna. Say it to me truly."

Drona said:—

25. As regards teaching you and Arjuna, O sire, have both received an equal share. But through Yoga, and hrough the effects of hardship he had undergone, he has become superior to yourself.

26. In battle, you should never entertain any fear from Pritha's son Arjuna, I am surely your protector, O sire, from all dangers.

27. Even the very gods cannot obtain victory over him who is protected with the strength of my arms. I will (to-morrow) form such an array which Partha will never be able to reach the end of.

28. Therefore do you fight, and be not affraid in the least and observe (scrupulously) the duties of your order. O foremost of car-warriors, do you follow the path chalked out by your fathers and grandfathers.

29. Having studied the various branches of knowledge, you have burnt due offerings on the fire, you have also celebrated various sacrifices; death therefore should not be an object of apprehension to you.

30. (On the other hand), if you die you shall attain to that good fortune so difficult of being attained by the vile men, viz., you shall ascend to those excellent regions that are acquired by the strength of our arms.

31. The Kurus, the Pandavas, the Vrishnis and other men, and I and my son;—think all these to be mortal and uncertain.

32. One after another, destroyed by the powerful God of Death, we shall go to the regions of the departed, carrying with us the fruits of our respective actions.

33. Those regions to which the ascetics repair through their observance of ascetic austerities, even those regions the heroic Kshatriyas attain, by the observance of their own duties."

34. Thus then was the ruler of the Sindhus comforted by the son of Bharadwaja. He then dismissed (from his heart) all fears of Partha (Arjuna), and set his heart upon battle.

35. Thereupon, O ruler of men, your warriors were filled with delight, and the war-cries they then shouted out, became mingled with the terrible din of the musical instruments.

Thus euds the seventy-fourth chapter the consolation given to Jayadratha, in the Pratijna of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXXV.

(PRATIJNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. After the son of Pritha (Arjuna) had promised to slay the ruler of the Sindhus, the mighty-armed son of Vasudeva addressed him saying :—

2. "Only with the consent of your brothers (and without taking my advice), you have promised to slay the Sindhu king, saying—'I will slay Jayadratha to-morrow.' This has been an act of rashness.

3. Without taking my advice previously, you have drawn down a heavy burden on your shoulders. Alas! how now shall we escape from being the butt of redicule of all men.

4. I had deputed spies in the encampment of the sons of Dhristarastra. Those spies, returning soon, furnished me with this information, viz. :—

5. 'O Lord, when you had vowed the slaughter of the king of the Sindhus, they (the Kouravas) heard the war-cries mingled with din of musical instruments that then arose from our camp.

6. Terrified at that up-roar, the sons of Dhritarastra together with all their relatives and kinsmen, thought—'these shouts are not without due causes' and they then waited (for what would ensue next).

7. Then, O mighty-armed one, a great confused noise was created by the Kouravas and their elephants, steeds, infantry and the rattle of their car-wheels.

8. 'Having been apprised of the slaughter of Abhimanyu, Dhananjaya sorely distressed will surely, in wrath, come out in the night desirous of battle.' Thinking even in the above manner, they stood prepared for battle.

9. Thus when those vow-observing heroes were preparing for the battle, O you of eyes like lotus petals, they heard of the true vow you had taken for the slaughter of the Sindhu king.

10. Thereat the counsellors of Suyodhana all became depressed at heart, and they then resembled weak animals struck with panic. Then king Jayadratha,

11. The ruler of the Shindhus and the Souviras, sorely afflicted with grief, and melancholy, rose up, and with his ministers retired to his tent.

12. Then in that time suitable for consultations, he consulted with them about the best remedial measure (against Arjuna's vow). And then repairing to the assembly of kings he said these words to Suyodhana.

13. "He is the slayer of my son, thinking thus, to-morrow will Dhananjaya assault me. In the very midst of his troops, he has vowed to slay me.

14. Neither the Gods, nor the Gandharvas, nor the Asuras, nor the reptiles nor the Rakshasas would venture to baffle that vow of Savyasachin (Arjuna).

15. Do you all therefore protect me in battle. Let not Dhananjaya, placing his feet on your heads, succeeded in hitting his target. Let suitable arrangements be made.

16. On the other hand, O delighter of the Kurus, if you do not uudertake to protect me in battle, permit me, O king, to go back to my home."

17. Thus spoken to, Suyodhana hang down his head and became depressed at heart. And ascertaining Jayadratha to be greatly terrified, he began to meditate (silently).

18. Then the ruler of the Shindhus seeing Duryodhana sorely afflicted, softly spoke these words, intended to conduce to his own welfare and good.

19. "I do not find any bowman among you who is equal to Arjuna in prowess, and who is capable of baffling the weapons of Arjuna in battle, with those of his own.

20. What person would dare stand before Arjuna who is supported by the son of Vasudeva and who wields the Gandiva bow? Even Indra of hundred sacrifices will not venture to do so!

21. It is said that the son of Pritha (Arjuna), on foot, fought with Almighty Maheswara himself in days gone by, on the Himavat mountains.

22. Being commissioned by the lord of the celestials, he slew on a single chariot thousands of Danavas inhabiting the golden city.

23. That son of Kunti is now united with the intelligent son of Vasudeva. And I think that he is now competent to destroy the triune world, with even the immortals therein!

24. So, may it please you, I desire to have either your permission to go home, or to be protected by the high-souled Drona and his son, both endued with heroism."

25. O Arjuna, thus addressed the king himself entreated the preceptor to undertake to protect Jayadratha. All remedial measures have been adopted; and chariots and steeds have been duly arranged.

26. Karna, Bhurisravas, the son of Drona, the invincible Vrishasena, Kripa, and the ruler of the Madras these six warriors will station themselves in the van of their array,

27. Drona has formed an array, half of which figures a car and half a lotus; inside that array there has been formed a minor array of the shape of an wedge, Jayadratha will stand in the middle of the lotus-like array and by the side of the other array.

28. There will the invincible king of the Sindhus stand, being protected by those heroes. In handling the bow and other weapons, in prowess, in might and in their high extraction,

29. These six warriors, O Partha, are surely exceedingly difficult of being borne down. Without first vanquishing these six car-warriors, you cannot hope to reach Jayadratha.

30. Think of the respective prowess of these six warriors. O foremost of men, when united together, they cannot be easily defeated.

31. Let us once again hold consultation with those versed in the use of weapons and with our own ministers and friends, to settle the course of action that should be adopted for our well-being and for the fruition of our aims.

Thus ends the seventy-fifth chapter, the counsel of Krishna, in the Pratijna of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXXVI.

(PRATIJNA PARVA)—Continued.

Arjuna said:—

1. Those six car-warriors of the Dhartarastra host whom you consider to be superior to me in strength, I think their prowess is not even equal to half that of mine.

2. You will see, O slayer of Madhu, the weapons of all these heroes cut off by those of mine, when, desirous of slaying Jayadratha, I shall encounter them.

3. Before the eyes of Drona and before his bewailing followers, I will fell down on earth the head of the ruler of the Sindhus,

4. Even if the Saddhyas, the Rudras, the Vasus together with the twin Aswins, the Marutas with Indra, the Viswadevas, and the mighty gods,

5. The ancestral manes, and the Gandharvas and Suparna and the Oceans, the mountains, the firmament, Heaven, Earth the quarters and their regents,

6. The domestic and the wild animals and all the mobile and immobile beings united together—even if all these become the protector of the Sindu king, O slayer of Madhu,

7. Still you shall behold him to-morrow slain by my arrows in battle. O Krishna, I swear by my troth and touching my weapons,

8. That, O Kesava, at the very first instance, I shall proceed against that Drona, that fierce bowman who had undertaken to protect the sinful Jayadratha.

9. King Suyodhana considers this battle as a game depending on the dice identified with Drona himself. Therefore, penetrating through the divisions of Drona himself, I shall reach the king of the Sindhus.

10. Tomorrow you shall behold the mighty bowmen (of the enemy's host), rent open by me with Narachas of fieree energy, like the crests of the mountains cleft open by the bolt of Heaven.

11. Blood shall flow out copiously from the bodies of men, elephants and steeds, rent open and fallen on the ground, being struch with my whetted shafts.

12. Arrows shot from the bow Gandiva and resembling in speed the speed of mind or the wind itself, shall, by thousands, deprive men, horses, and elephants of their lives and limbs.

13. In to-morrow's battle, men will see those terrible weapons displayed by me which I have secured from Yama, Kuvera, Varuna, Indra, and Rudra.

14. In to-morrow's fight you will see the weapons of those that will come to protect the king of the Sindhus, repulsed by my one Brahma weapon.

15. To-morrow you shall see the earth covered by me with the head of princes cut off their trunks by the force of my arrows, O Kesava.

16. To-morrow will I afford gratification to the flesh-eaters and will scatter my enemies, and delight my friends and completely destroy the ruler of the Sindhus.

17. A greatly sinful wretch, one who had acted not like a kinsman, born in a sinful country, the king of Sindhus slain by me, will, to-morrow, impart sorrow to his followers.

18. To-morrow you shall see the mean ruler of the Sindus, that one brought up in all luxury and of sinful behaviour, pierced by me in battle with my shafts.

19. O Krishna, at day-break, I will achieve such feats, that Suyodhana will never think that there is any other bowman equal to me.

20. This Gandiva bow is of celestial make; I, O foremost of men, am also a warrior; you also, O Hrishikesha, are my driver; what then can not be conquered by me?

21. Through your grace, O almighty one, what is there unacquirable by me in battle? O Hrishikesha, knowing my prowess to be incapable of being baffled, why do you admonish me?

22. As Lakshmi is ever constant in the moon, as water ever remains in the ocean, so, O Janarddana, know my vow to be ever incapable of being frustrated.

23. Do not hate my weapons. Do not hate my firm and tough bow. Do not despise the prowess of my arms and do not also, O Krishna, despise Dhananjaya.

24. I will proceed to battle in such a manner that I will surely win and not lose. When I have taken the oath, count Jayadradratha already among those slain in battle.

25. Truth is ever constant in the Brahmana; humility is ever constant in the pious; prosperity ever attends sacrifice and victory ever attends Narayana.

Sanjaya said :—

26. Having spoken these words to Hrishikesha and having said so to his own self also, Vasava's son (Arjuna) once more addressed the lord Kesava in a sonorous voice, saying :—

27. "O Krishna, you should so arrange that as soon as the night passes away, my chariot may be ready, well-furnished with the impliments of war, inasmuch as the task at hand is very serious."

Thus ends the seventy-sixth chapter, the words of Arjuna, in the Pratijna of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

(PRATIJNA PARVA.—Continued.)

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then throughout the whole of that night, Vasudeva and Dhananjaya, both afflicted with sorrow and grief, and breathing like two serpents, did not enjoy an wink of sheep.

2. The gods together with Indra himself, understanding Partha and Narayana to be excited with rage, became anxious and they began to think—what will come of it?

3. Dry and dreadful winds, portending calamities, began to blow. A headless trunk and a bludgeon became manifest in the solar disc.

4. Although the sky was cloudless, thunderbolts fell on the earth, accompanied by dreadful rumbling and flashes of lightning; and the Earth with her mountains, hills and forests, began to quake.

5. O mighty monarch, the oceans, the abode of the numerous acquatic creatures, became agitated; and the ocean-going rivers began to flow in directions opposite to their natural courses.

6. The lower and upper lips of car-warriors, horses, men and elephants began to tremble, indicating, as if, a great festivity for the flesh-eaters and an increase of the population of Death's domain.

7. The animals on the field began to discharge excreta and urine and they began to wail aloud. Beholding all those dreadful portents capable of making the hair stand on end,

8. And having heard of the fierce vow of the mighty Savyasachin, all your troops, O foremost of the Bharatas, became preyed-upon by anxious thought.

9. Then the mighty-armed Pakasasani (Arjuna) addressing Krishna said :—"Do you offer consolation to your sister Subhadra and her daughter-in-law.

10. O Madhava, go, assuage the grie of my daughter-in-law and her companions; O lord, console them with your soft words fraught with truth."

11. Thereat the son of Vasudeva with a depressed heart, going to the pavilion of Arjuna, began to comfort his sorrowful sister afflicted with the grief caused by the death of her son.

The son of Vasudeva said :—

12. O daughter of the Vrishni race, do not grieve, with your daughter-in-law, for you son. O timid lady, the self-same end is ordained by the Destroyer for all created beings.

13. This sort of death is worthy of your son, born in an illustrious family, modest, and especially belonging to the Kshatriya order. Do not grieve for him.

14. Indeed it is through good fortune that that mighty car-warrior, modest and equal to his father in prowess, has obtained the goal coveted by the heroes, in consequence of his observance of Kshatriya duties.

15. Vanquishing innumerable foes and despatching them to the abode of Death, he as attained to the posthumous state of the pious, that is enduring and in which all desires become fruitful.

16. Your son of tender years has attained to that end which the pious desire to have through the performance ascetic austerities, and Brahmacharyya, and through knowledge of the Shastras and wisdom.

17. You are the mother of a hero, the wife of a hero, the daughter of a hero, and a kins-woman of the heroes ; O amiable one do not bewail your son who has attained an excellent mode of existence.

18. That wretched and sinfnl ruler of the Sindhus, that murderer of an infant, shall soon reap the fruit of this arrogance, with his relations and kinsmen.

19, O beautiful lady, when the day dawns, that perpitrator of sinful acts, shall not escape the son of Pritha, even if he seeks shelter in Heaven itself.

20. Tomorrow you shall hear that the head of the Sindhu ruler has been severed from his trunk in battle, to roll on the precincts of the Samantapanchaka. Dismiss your grief and do not weep.

21. Keeping in the view duties of the Kshatriya order, that hero has obtained the end of the pious,—end, which we also will meet with, as also many other men who live by their weapons.

22. Of expansive chest and mighty arms, unretreating and slayer of car-warriors,your son, O you of dainty waist, has gone to heaven. Renounce yours fever of grief.

23, Obedient to the behests of his sire and his relations through mother's side, that valiant hero and mighty car-warrior of great prowess, has been slain, after he himself had slain may of his foes.

24. O queen, comfort your daughter-in-law; O daughter of a Kshatriya, do not lament. Dismiss your sorrow, O my beloved sister, as in the morrow you will hear such agreeable news.

25. What the son of Pritha has vowed shall be accomplished, and can not be otherwise. What your husband has set his heart upon, cannot remain undone.

26. Even if the descendants of Manu, and the Pannagas, and Pisachas, and night-rangers, and winged creatures, and Asuras and the celestials come forward to protect in battle the ruler of the Sindhus, yet he, with these, shall cease to exist to-morrow.

Thus ends the seventy-seventh chapter, the consolation of Subhadra,in the Pratijna of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

(PRATIJNA PARVA)—continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Having heard these words of Kesava of high-soul, Subhadra afflicted with grief on account of her son, and sorely distressed, began to lament petiously.

2. "Alas ! son of my unfortunate self, why did you go to the battle? Oh son equal in prowess to your father, how could you perish. ?

3. Oh my dear child, how shall I see your face dark like the blue lotus and graced with beautiful teeth and charming eyes, soiled with the dust of battle-field !

4. Surely, heroic and unretreating as you were, you are now being seen by every body. Of graceful head, well-formed neck and arms, of expensive chest, of low belly,

5. Of limbs decked with ornaments, of charming eyes, and covered with wounds of weapons, surely creatures are now looking at you as if at the rising moon !

6. Alas ! you who used to lie down on beds covered with precious coverlets, alas, how could you, ever used to luxuries, now lie down on the bare earth, being pierced with arrows !

7. That hero of mighty arms who used formerly to be atteneded upon by most beautiful damsels, Oh, how can he, prostrate on the field of battle, pass his time to-day in the company of the jackals !

8. He who formerly used to be eulogised by the joyful bards, ministrels, and singers alas, he, to-day, is greeted by the dreadfu flesh-eaters with their fierce yells !

9. O son ! having the Pandavas, the Vrishni heroes, and the Panchalas for your protector, by whom have yon been slain like one helpless ?

10. O my sinless son ! my desire for looking at you is not yet satiated. Unfortunate that I am, I shall surely to-day go to the regions of Death.

11. When again, O my son, shall I see that face of yours, graced with expansive eyes, covered with beautiful looks, and from which sweet words and fragrant perfume used always to come out ?

12. Fie on the strength of Bhima, fie on the bowmanship of Arjuna, fie on the prowess of the Vrishni heroes, and fie on the might of the Panchalas !

13. Fie on the Kaikayas and on the Chedis and the Matsyas and the Srinjayas, who all, united together, could not protect that hero when he went to battle.

14. To-day do I see the earth vacant and destitute of its beauty, inasmuch as I do not see Abhimanyu, and my eyes are blinded with grief.

15. How shall we see you slain,—you who are the son of the wielder of the Gandiva, the son of Vasudeva's sister, you who are a hero and an Atiratha too !

16. Alas, O hero, you were like a hoard of treasure to me, seen and lost in a dream. Alas ! everything human is as transitory as even a bubble of water !

17. How shall I comfort your young wife overwhelmed by the grief caused by your death, and resembling a cow bereft of its calf !

18. Alas, Oh my son, you have passed away prematurely at a time when you were on the point of bearing fruit, although I yearn to have a sight of you !

19. Surely the ways of the Destroyer are mysterious even to the wise, inasmuch as, you, having Kesava himself for your protector, have been slain in battle like one perfectly helpless.

20—21. May you, O son, attain that end which is theirs that perform sacrifices, theirs that are Brahmanas of purified soul, theirs that observe the vow Bhamacharyya, theirs that have bathed in the sacred waters, theirs that are grateful, theirs that are devoted to the performance of benevolent deeds, theirs that serve their preceptors, and theirs that make profuse sacrificial presents !

22. May that end be yours which they attain who fight and never retreat, or who fall in battle after slaying their numerous foes !

23 That blessed end which they attain who give away a thousand cows, or who perform charitable deeds at a sacrifice, or who give away houses and palaces to the liking of the recepients,

24. Or who give away gems and jewels to worthy Brahmanas, or who mete out just punishments, O son, may that blessed end be yours !

25. O son, may you attain to that end which sages of rigid vows attain to, by the performance of Brahmacharyya, or that end which is attained by the women who marry but once their husbands.

26. That eternal end which is obtained by monarchs through their good conduct, or by those persons who, leading one after nother all the four modes of life and through the observance of duties, have purified themselves,

27. That end which they attain who are kind to the poor and the woe-stricken, or who equally divide objects of enjoyments amongst themselves and their dependents, or who are free from the influence of malice, O son, may that end be yours!

28. That end which is theirs, who observe their vows, theirs that are devoted to righteous practices, theirs that serve their elders and preceptors, theirs that never drive away guests from their doors, O son, may that end be yours !

29. O son, may you attain to that end which they attain who preserve the coolness of their temper even in the most difficult circumstances, however much they may be consumed by the fire of sorrow !

30. May you attain to the end of those who always take care of their father and mother, and who never enjoy the company of women other than their own wives !

31. May you attain, O son, to the end of those who hold sexual intercourse with their own wives during their seasons, of those who restrain themselves from enjoying others' wives !

32. May you attain to the end of those, who, free from malice, look upon every one with an eye of peace or who are forgiving, and never enflict distress on others !

33. O son, may you attain to the end of those who ever hold themselves aloof from money, meat, intoxicating drinks, pride and falsehood, or who never cause pain to any body else !

34. O son, may you attain that end which they attain who are modest, learned in all the Shastras, content in knowledge, and hold their passions under check."

35. While the distressed Subhadra, overwhelmed with grief, had been thus lamenting, Panchali accompanied by Virata's daughter, came to her.

36. Then copiously lamenting and bewailing under the weight of their grief, they fell down, O king, on the earth, senseless, and like so many mad creatures.

37. Then the highly-afflicted Krishna who was there ready with water &c., sprinkled water on the face of them and for comforting them said such salutary words that should be said on such occasions.

38. Then he of eyes resembling lotus-petals said these words to his sister, weeping, insensible, trembling and pierced in her very heart.

39. " O Subhadra, bewail not your son ; O Panchali, console the sister of Uttara. Abhimanyu, that foremost of Kṣhatriyas, has attained to the most excellent (posthumous) state.

40. O you of charming countenance, may all the other people of our race that are yet alive attain to that state which the illustrious Abhimanyu has attained !

41. We, supported by our allies, desire to accomplish that feat in this battle, the like of which, O lady, your son, that mighty car-warrior, achieved single-handed."

42. Thus having consoled his sister and Droupadi and Uttara, that subduer of foes, that mighty-armed one, (viz., Krishna) came back to Partha's side.

43. Then with the permission of his relatives and of the kings and of Arjuna, O monarch, Krishna retired to the inner apartments of the latter's pavilion ; the rest of the kings then retired to their respective quarters.

Thus ends the seventy-eighth chapter, the lamentations of Subhadra, in the Pratijna of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXXIX.

(PRATIJNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Then that Lord of eyes like lotus-petals, having entered into the matchless mansion of Arjuna, touched water, and on the smooth and auspicious floor,

2. Spread an auspicious bed made of Kusa-grass of the hue of lapises. Thereafter, with garlands of flowers, fried paddy and perfumes and other auspicious articles,

3. He decorated that bed and then kept around it many excellent weapons. Then when Partha also had touched water, obedient and humble servants,

4. Performed the usual nightly ceremony of offering victims to the three-eyed Mahadeva. Thereafter with a delighted heart, Pritha's son, with perfumes and garlands,

5. Adorned Madhava, and then offered him the nightly offering. Then Govinda with a smile thus spoke to Phalguna.

6. "O son of Pritha, lay yourself down for sleep; good betide you. I go in search of your welfare." Then placing at the door well-armed sentinels and door-keepers,

7. The auspicious Krishna followed by Daruka, entered his own tent. Then he laid himself down on his milk-white bed and brooded over the diverse measures (to be adopted on the morrow.)

8. Then that illustrious one of eyes resembling lotus-petals, for Partha's sake, began to reflect on various measures that would drive away the latter's grief and sorrow, and increase his energy and effulgence.

9. Then that one of soul engaged in meditation, that foremost lord of all, viz., Vishnu of wide-spread renown, who always performed what was agreeable to Jishnu, had recourse to Yoga-meditation, for benefitting Arjuna.

10. During that night none enjoyed sleep in the camp of the Pandavas. During that night, O ruler of men, wakefulness possessed every body.

11. "The wielder of the Gandiva bow, the high-souled Arjuna, being afflicted sore with grief on acconnt of the death of his son, has rashly vowed the slaughter of the king of the Sindhus.

12. How indeed shall the mighty-armed son of Vasava, that slayer of hostile heroes, fulfil his vow ?" Even thus did they then think.

13. "The vow which the high-souled son of Pandu has made, is a very difficult one. King Jayadratha is endued with great energy. May Arjuna successfully observe his vow !

14. Indeed Arjuna has made a tremendous resolve, being highly afflicted with the grief on account of his son's death. The brothers (of Duryodhana) are very powerful, and his army is nnmerous.

15. The son of Dhritarastra (Duryodhana) has also employed them all in the protection of him (Jayadratha). May Dhananjaya return safe, having slain the ruler of the Sindhus !

16. Let Arjuna fulfil his vow and vanquish his enemies. If to-morrow he fails to slay the Sindhu king, he will enter the blazing fire.

17. Pritha's son Dhananjaya will never venture to falsify his vow. Oh, what will be the condition of king Yudhisthira, the son of Dharma, if Dhananjaya dies !

18. Indeed Pandu's son (Yudhisthira) has grafted all his hopes of victory on Arjuna. If we have acquired any religious merit, if we have ever given away things in charity, if we have burnt offerings on the fire,

19. Then through the fruits of all those acts of ours, let Savyasachin (Arjuna) obtain victory." Thus, when they were talking to one another of the victory of Arjuna on the morrow, O lord,

20. O monarch, that live-long night at last passed away. During that night Janarddana, having awaked,

21. And remembering the vow Pritha's son had made, thus addressed Daruka :—" Afflicted with sorrow for the death of his dear-loved son, Arjuna has vowed,

22. O Daruka, saying Before tomorrow's sun sets, I will slay Jayadratha.—Having heard of this vow, Duryodhana will surely hold counsel with his counsellors,

23. As to how Partha might be prevented from slaying Jayadratha in battle. His several Akshouhinis will also protect the latter ;

24. As also Drona and his son, both accomplished in the use of all sorts of weapons, will protect him. That matchless hero, the thousand-eyed Indra himself, that humiliator of the pride of Daityas and Danavas,

25. Even he will not venture to slay Jayadratha, if he is protected by Drona in battle. I, therefore, will do that in the morrow by which Kunti's son Arjuna,

26. May slay Jayadratha before the sun goes down below the horizon. My wives, my friends, my kinsmen, my relatives,

27. None among these is so dear to me as is Kunti's son Arjuna. O Daruka, bereft of Arjuna, for o e. a moment, this world

28. I will not be able to look at. And therefore, it shall not be so. Vanquishing them all, with their horses and elephants,

29. I will slay them all with Karna and Duryodhana, for the sake of Arjuna. To-morrow the three worlds will behold my prowess in the dreadful battle,

30. When, O Daruka, I shall put forth my prowess for Arjuna's sake. To-morrow thousands of kings and hundreds of princes,

31. With their steeds, cars and elephants, will, O Daruka, turn hastily away from the battle. To-morrow, O Daruka, you shall see the army of kings crushed with my discus,

32. And overthrown by my enraged self, for the sake of Arjuna. To-morrow the celestials, the Gandharvas, the Pisachas, the reptiles and the Rakshasas,

33. Will all know me to be the true friend of Savyasachin. He that injures him (Arjuna) injures me ; and he that follows him follows me also.

34—35. With the help of your intelligence, do you indentify Arjuna to be the half of my ownself. When the day dawns, O Daruka, equipping my best of chariots according to the rules of military science, you must bring it and follow me carefully. My mace Koumodaki of celestial make, my discus and my bow and arrows,

36—41. And many other implements of war—placing all these, O Suta, on my chariot and leaving room thereon for my standard and for the heroic Garuda that adorns my car, and yoking thereto my excellent steeds named Valahaka, Meghapuspa, Saivya, Sugriva, having incased them in caparisons of gold of the effulgence of the solar orb and the fire, and yourself donning your coat of mail, stay on it carefully. Having heard the shrille blast resembling the Rishava note, of my conch Panchajannya, you will quickly come to me. In the course of a single day, O Daruka, I shall drive away the rage and the various woes of my cousin, the son of my paternal aunt. By every means, I shall so exert in battle, so that Vibhatsu in battle,

42. May slay Jayadratha even before the very eyes of the Dhritarastras. All those for whose death Vibhatsu will strive, I tell you truly, will be slain and O charioteer, he will succeed in obtaining victory.

Daruka said :—

43. Victory is sure to him, and whence can defeat come to him, whose charioteer ship you, O foremost men, have accepted.

44. I shall do what you will bid me do. This night will end ushering in a morning, that will bring victory for Vijaya.

Thus ends the seventy-ninth chapter the colloquy between, Krishna and Daruka, in the Pratijna of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXXX.

(PRATIJNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then Dhananjaya the son of Kunti, possessed of inconceivable prowess thinking of how to redeem his vow, recollected the Mantras (obtained from Vyasa) ; and soon was he lost in sleep.

2. Then the highly puissant god having the Garuda as an emblem on his banner, appeared before the ape-bannered Arjuna merged in thought and burning with grief, in his dream.

3. The pious-souled Dhananjaya through the love and veneration he bore for Krishna, never failed under any circumstance, to rise up and advance a few steps for welcoming him.

4. Standing up therefore (in his dream), he welcomed Govinda and offered him a seat. He himself however then did not think of resuming his own seat.

5. Thus seated, Krishna of mighty energy, knowing what resolution Partha had formed, said these words to the son of Kunti, while the latter was standing before him.

6. "O Son of Pritha, let not your heart give way to sorrow. Time is invincible. It is time that compels all creatures to take to the inevitable course.

7. Tell me, O foremost of men, the cause of this your sorrow? O foremost of the learned, sorrow should not be indulged in, inasmuch as it overthrows the ends of life.

8. What should be done should be done (without hesitation). Do your duty with all endeavours, O Dhananjaya, the grief that deprives one of the power of acting, is indeed his greatest enemy.

9. A man giving way to grief delights his enemies and saddens his friends, and himself becomes reduced in (strength). Therefore you should not grieve."

10. Having been thus spoken to by the son of Vasudeva, the invincible and learned Vhibhatsu said these words of (grave) signification to the former:—

11. "I have taken a terrible oath in vowing to slaughter Jayadratha. To-morrow shall I slay, O Kesava that wicked-souled slayer of my son.

12. Surely, O undeteriorating one, in order to frustrate that resolution of mine, the partisans of Dhritarastra will place the ruler of the Sindhus in their furthest rear and have him protected by all their mighty car-warriors.

13. Alas! O Madhava, their invincible army of one and ten Aoukshahin strong, consists of the remanants of their soldiers (slain during the last compaign).

14. Surrounded by all these troops, as also by all their mighty car-warriors, how could that wicked-souled ruler of the Sindhus, O Krishna, be seen (by us)?

15. Meseems, O Kesava, I shall not be able to fulfil my vow. And why should one like myself who could not redeem his promises, bear the burden of his life?

16. O hero, despondency stares me at the face,—me whose only consalotion now is in grief. I also tell you this that (during this period of the year) the sun runs his heavenly course swiftly."

17. Then Krishna that foremost of the twice-born ones, having heard of the source of Partha's sorrow, touched water, and sat there with his face turned towards the East.

18. Thereafter that highly puissant one of eyes likes lotus-petals, said these words, for the welfare of Pandu's son who had resolved upon the slaughter of the Sindhu king.

19. "O Son of Pritha, there is a weapon excellent and eternal, known by the name of Pasupata. By means of this weapon the god Maheswara (in days gone by) slew all the Daityas in battle.

20. "If to-day it be within your recollection, then to-morrow you will be able to slay Jayadratha. If it is unknown to you now, then do you worship in your mind the god having the bull for his emblem.

21. Meditating on that god in your mind, do you hold communion with him. You are his devotee, and in this way, through his grace only, can you expect to obtain that valuable treasure (Pasupata woapon)."

22. Thereupon, having heard Krishna's words and having rinced his month with water, Dhananjaya sat down on the ground; and with a singleness of heart, began to adore Siva (in his mind).

23. Thus rapt up in meditation, Arjuna saw himself and Kesava roving in the skies, just when the hour Brahma of auspicious indication set in.

24—25. Then it seemed that Parth held by his right arm by the lord Kesava, and endued with the fleetness of the wind, reached the root of the sacred Himavat mountain teeming with gems, abounding in luminous objects and inhabitted by Siddhas and Charanas. He was then accompanied by Kesava.

26. It seemed that he saw, as he went, many wonderful sights and objects; that one of righteous soul then saw on the Northern direction the white mountain.

27. He beheld in the pleasure-garden of Kuvera, the delightful lake adorned with lotuses. He also beheld that most excellent of rivers namely Ganga of copious waters.

28-29. Then he saw the regions about the Mandara mountains, regions that abounded in trees bearing blossoms and fruits; that were covered with pebles and transparent crystals, that were infested with lions and tigers; that abounded in many other animals, that contained many sacred hermitages; that were charming; that there frequented by beautiful birds and that ever rang with the melodious songs of the Kinnaras.

30. The mountain itself was graced with gold and silver peaks blazing with various herbs and Oshadhis; and it was beautiful with numerous Mandara trees decked with blossoms.

31. He then arrived at the black mountains that looked like a heap of collyrium, and after that, at the Brahmatunga, at many rivers and at many countries.

32. He then reached the Sutunga and the Satasringa hills and the woods known by the name of Saryyati. Then he went to the holy place called the Aswasiras, and also to the one known by the name of Artharvana.

33. Then he arrived at that foremost of hills known as Vrisha-Dansa and also the hill called the great Mandara, both of which were thickly peopled by the Apsaras and beautified by the Kinnaras.

34—35. Then roaming on that hill in the company of Krishna, Pritha's son beheld a plot of earth abounding in soothing springs, teeming with gold and other minerals, burning with the effulgence of the sun or the moon, and possessing a large number towns and cities. He also beheld various seas and numerous rich mines of wealth.

36. Then wandering through the sky the firmament and the earth, he arrived at Vishnupada; there struck with admiration, and like an arrow shot from the bow, he came down with Krishna.

37. Partha then beheld a mountain blazing as if with the effulgence of the planets, the stars, the moon, the sun and the fire.

38. Having reached that hill he beheld that high-souled Divinity having the bull for his emblem on his banner, seated on its peak and lost in contemplation.

39. He saw the god burning in his own energy like a thousand suns; holding the trident; with matted locks on his head; of milk-white complexion; and wearing barks and tiger skins.

40. He saw the highly puissant god having his body rendered beautiful with a thousand eyes; aud in company with Parvati and numerous other beings of great effulgence.

41. The dependents of the god were engaged in singing, in playing upon musical instruments, in dancing, in laughing, in frolicking about and stricking and clapping their palms &c. The place was also made fragrant with perfumes.

42. Arjuna then beheld that protector of all creatures, that undeteriorating wielder of the bow (Pinaka), eulogised with beautiful penegyrics by the sages and the reciters of the Vedas.

43. Beholding the god, the pious-souled son of Vasudeva, together with the son of Pritha, saluted him by touching the earth with his head; and he uttered then the eternal verses from the Vedas.

44—47. Then Krishna adored with his speech, his mind, his intellect and his acts that origin of the worlds; that creator of the universe; that unborn divinity; that lord paramount; that undeteriorating one; that primary source from which the mind has sprung; that receptacle of the space, the wind and the luminary bodies; that creator of the rain; that primordial essence of the earth; that one worthy of the reverence of the celestials, the Danavas, the Yakshas, and the human beings; that one who is the Highest Brahma realised by the Yogins; that protector of those versed in the Vedas; that creator and destroyer of the mobile and immobile creatures; that God whose anger is destruction; that supreme soul; that one who is equal to Sakra or the sun.

48. Then Krishna and Arjuna sought the protection of that Bhava who is uncreate the unmanifest cause, and whom sages learned in the Vedas worship when they desire to obtain the subtle and spiritual existence.

49. Arjuna also worshipped that Diety over and over again, knowing him to be the origin of all creatures and the cause of the Past, the Present and the Future.

50. Then beholding them two, viz Nara and Narayana come to him, Sarva with a delightful heart said these words, as if smiling the while:—

51. "All hail, O you two foremost of men! Arise and let the fatigue of your journey be shaken off. Tell me soon what things your minds earn after, O you heroes!

52. What business of yours has brought you here? I will perform it. Ask for the boon that will benefit you? I will grant all your desires."

53. Hearing these words of the god, Vasudeva and Arjuna rose up with their palms folded; and they both endued with great intelligence, and of unblameable character, out of reverence, began to eulogise the high-souled Sarva with beautiful penegyrics.

Krishna and Arjuna said:—

54. Salutation unto Bhava, unto Sarva, and unto Rudra the giver of all boons; unto the lord of all animate beings; unto him who is known as Kaparddin; unto the great Divinity, unto Bhima; unto the three-eyed god who is identical with peace;

55. Unto Isha, and unto him who annihilates all pride engendered by the possession of prosperity. Salutation unto the slayer of Andhaka; unto the father of the Kumara (Kartikeya); unto him of blue neck and of great intelligence;

56. Unto the wielder of the Pinaka bow; unto the Havisya; unto him who is ever attended with truth and prosperity; unto him who is red, who is tawny, who is the hunter in disguise; and who is unvanquished;

57. Unto him who possesses blue locks, who wields the trident, who is omniscient; unto him who is the Hotri and the Pitri; unto him of three-eyes, who is disease and whose vital seed is fire itself;

58. Unto him who is inconceivable, who is the lord of the goddess Ambika; who receives homage from all creatures; whose emblem is the bull; whose head is shaved and who wears matted locks and who is again a Brahmacharin;

59. Unto him who performs ascetic austerities in the waters, who is devoteto the study of the Vedas, and who is unvanquished. Unto him who is the soul of the universe, its creator, and remains pervading it.

60. Salutation salutation unto him worthy of the homage of all creatures, and the origin of all creatures; unto the Brahmachakra, the Sarva, the Sankara, and Siva.

61. Salutations be unto him who is the lord of speech and the master of the created beings; salutation unto the lord of the universe and of the great people.

62. Salutations unto him of thousand heads who possesses a thousand arms and who is Death himself. Salutations unto him of thousand eyes and legs, whose deeds are countless.

63. Salutations unto him of the complexion of gold, who is clad in a armour of gold; and unto him who is ever gracious upon his devotees. O lord let our desires be fulfilled.

Sanjaya said :—

64. Thus having eulogised the great god, Arjuna and the son of Vasudeva began to propitiate the former for obtaining the weapon (Pasupata) from him.

Thus ends the eightieth chapter, Arjuna's dream, in the Pratijna of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXI.

(PRATIJNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then the son of Pritha with a delightful soul, and joined palms and eyes expanded in amazement, gazed at the god having the bull for his banner-mark, and the receptacle of all energies.

2. He then beheld by the side of the three-eyed god, the offerings he used to make, every night, to the son of Vasudeva.

3. Thereafter that son of Pandu having worshipped in his mind both Sarva and Krishna, said unto the god Sankara—'I desire to have the celestial weapon (Pasupata)!'

4. Then having heard the words of Pritha's son, that disclosed what boon he wanted, the god (Mahadeva) with a smile, thus replied to Vasudeva's son and Arjuna :—

5. "All hail, O you two foremost of men, I have known the desire of your hearts; I shall grant even that desire of yours which has brought you both here.

6. You slayers of foes, there is a heavenly lake of nectar not far from this place; in days gone by, I laid down my celestial bow and arrows there.

7. With that bow and arrow, I slew in battle all the enemies of the gods. From that lake bring, O Krishnas, that excellent bow and arrow of mine.

8. Thereupon saying 'yea' to the words of Siva, the two heroes with all their followers, went to that celestial lake possessed of hundreds of celestial wonders.

9. Then those two sages Nara and Narayana fearlessly went to that holy lake capable of fulfilling all desires, that had been indicated by the god having the bull for his emblem.

10. Thereafter Arjuna and the undeteriorating Krishna having repaired to that lake of the effulgence of the solar disc, saw in its waters a terrible serpent.

11. They also saw there another foremost of snakes possessing a thousand hoods, of the effulgence of fire; it was then vomitting terrible flames.

12. Then Krishna and Partha, having touched water and having folded their palms and saluted the god having the bull of his emblem, approached those snakes.

13. As they approached the snakes, learned as they were in the Vedas, they recited the hundred slokas in the Veda to the praise of Rudra, saluting all the time with all their heart, Bhava of infinite might.

14. Then through the charm of those adorations offered to Rudra, those two snakes forsook their snake forms and assumed the forms of a bow and arrow capable of slaying the enemy.

15. Then highly delighted, they both took up those effulgent weapons, the bow and the arrow. Then those two high-souled ones, gave that bow and arrow to the illustrious Mahadeva.

16. Thereafter from one of the sides of Siva's body, a Brahmacharin issued forth; his eyes were tawny and he seemed to be the refuge of all asceticism. Having blue throat and red hair, he was possessed of great energy.

17. Then that Brahmacharin taking up that most excelleut bow stood in the proper posture. And placing the arrow on the string, he began to stretch the latter duly.

18. Thereupon, seeing the mode of his grasping the bow, drawing the string, placing his legs, and hearing also the Mantras uttered by Bhava, Pandu's son of infinite prowess duly learnt them all,

19. When the mighty and powerful Brahmacharin, shot that arrow even to the lake whence it had beeu brought; he also threw that bow into the self-same lake.

20. Thereupon Arjuna gifted with an accurate memory knowing that Bhavas was pleased with him, and recollecting the boon the latter had accorded to him in the forest, and the sight of his person he had vouchsafed to reveal to him,

21. Desired in his mind that all this might be true, thinking—' May all this be productive of fruit'. Knowing this to be his desire, Bhava pleased with him, gave him the boon.

22. He also granted him the terrible Pasupata weapon and the fulfilment of his vow. Then having obtained the Pasupata weapon of celestial make, once more, from the Lord,

23. The invincible Arjuna, with the down of his body erect, considered his vow already fulfilled. Then with delighted hearts, they (Krishna and Arjuna) saluted the god Maheswara, by bending their heads low!

24. Even at that moment obtaining the permission of Bhava, the two heroes Arjuna and Krishna, transported with delight came back to their own encampment,

25. Indeed their joy was as great as that which filled Indra and Vishnu when those two deities, desirous of slaying Jambha, had secured the permission of Bhava (to do so), the slayer of mighty Asuras.

Thus ends the eighty-first chapter, the obtaining of the Pasupata weapon, in the Pratijna of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXII.

(PRATIJNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. When Krishna and Daruka were thus talking to one another, O king, the night drew to its close. At day-break, king (Yudhisthira) rose from his bed.

2. The Panisbanikas, the Magadhas, the Madhupavkikas began to read verses in his praise; and Vaitalikas and ministrels began to eulogise that foremost of men (Yudhisthira).

3. The dancers commenced dancing, songsters gifted with melodious voices, began to sing charming songs frought with praises of the Kuru dynasty,

4. Mridangas, Jharjharwas, Verses, Panavas, Anakas' Gomukhas, Adhambhras, conchs, and Dundhuvis of fierce sounds,

5. These and many other such musica instruments, were, O Bharata, played upon by well-trained and expert performers, all of them being transported with joy.

6. The loud din (thus produced) resembling the rumbling of clouds, reached the very heavens themselves; and it awakened that foremost of all rulers of earth viz. king Yudhisthira, from his sleep,

7. Having enjoyed an undisturbed sleep on his precious and excellent bed, king Yudhisthira awoke (in the morning). Then rising up, the king retired to the bath-room, for performing acts that must be performed (Sandhyas &c.)

8. There, a hundred and eight orderlies robed in white garments, all washed and of yothful age, approached the king with many a golden jar filled (with water) to the very brim.

9. Seated at his ease on an auspicious seat and vested in a garment of fine texture, the king bathed in waters fragrant with sandal-wood and sanctified with religious aphorisms.

10. His limbs were shampooed by strong and well-trained servants, with water that had been rendered bitter, with medicinal drugs. He was then washed with holy Adivasa-water fragrant with perfumes.

11. Then being furnished with a piece of cloth that was as white as the plumage of the swan and that had been lying loose there, the king encircled his head with it in order to rub off the water therefrom.

12. Thereaffer that mighty-armed one, having smeared his body with the paste of Hari-sandal, and decorated his person with garlands and flowers and dressed in stainless garments, sat with his palms folded, facing the east.

13. Then, ever following in the wake of the righteous, the son of Kunti reiterated the prayers that should be done so; and then with becoming meekness, he entered the chamber where the blazing fire was kept (for adoration).

14. Then having worshipped the fire with holy and purified faggots and religious aphorisms, the monarch came out of the fire-chamber.

15. Then entering into a second chamber, that foremost of men king Yudhisthira saw a number of venerable old Brahmanas well-versed in the Vedas and all foremost of their order.

16. They were all self-restrained, and had performed ablutions after the accomplishment of sacrifices, vows, and recital of the Vedes. Worshippers of the sun, they counted a thousand in number with eight thousand followers.

17—18. The mighty armed son of Pandu having caused these Brahmanas to pronounce, in clear voices, benedictions on him, by making presents of honey, clarified butter and delicious fruits of the best sort, gave away to every one them a Niksha of gold, a hundred steeds adorned with golden caparisons and precious garments and other presents that were liked by them.

19. Then the son of Pandu, giving unto them milch cow, that yielded milk whenever touched, with calves, and with their horns and hoofs decked with gold and silver respectively, circumambulated them.

20. Auspicious objects capable of increasing good fortune, golden Nundyavartas, garlands of flowers, jars of water, blazing fire,

21. Vessels filled to the brim and containing Askhatas(sun-dried rice) &c, and the yellow pigment prepared from the urine of the cow and also well-decked and beautiful maidens, and curds, and clarified butter and honey and water,

22. And auspicious birds and other things considered to be holy—seeing and touching these things, the son of Kunti proceeded to the outer apartments.

23—24. There, O mighty armed one, the attendants that were in waiting, brought the monarch an excellent throne (to sit upon)—throne that was wholly made of gold and of auspicious marks and adorned with pearls and lapises; this throne was made by the celestial artificer Viswakarman and was over-spread with a precious carpet which again was covered by a stuff of very fine texture.

25. Then when that high-souled one had seated himsalf on that throne, his orderlies brought him all his precious and glittering ornaments.

26. Then, O mighty monarch, the appearance of the illustrious son of Kunti who was adorned with pearls and various ornaments was such as to excite the jealousy of his foes.

27. Then fanned with yak-tails furnished with handles of gold, and of white effulgence out-vying the charming beams of the moon, the monarch shone like a mass of cloud emitting flashes of lightning.

28. That delighter of the Kurus then, was praised by all creatures; the ministrels gratified him with panegyrics; and the Gandharvas then began to sing at his hearing.

29. Thereafter within a moment the voices of the bards swelled to a tremendous sound; and instantly were there heard the clatter of the car-wheels of car-warriors, and the hoof-sounds of the cavalry.

30. With the tinkling of bells tied round the necks of the elephants, with the blasts of conchs and with the sound of the (measured) foot-fall of the infantry, the Earth began to quake.

31—33. Then one of the attendants guarding the doors, cased in armour, youthful, adorned with ear-rings, and having his sword tied to his waist-band, entered the private chamber of the very virtuous king Yudhisthira; then kneeling down before him and doing obeisance to the worshipful and illustrious monarch with his head, he represented that Hrishikesha was waiting to be ushered in. Thereupon that foremost of men (Yudhisthira) welcomed Madhava with enquiries after his health and welfare;

34. He also ordered his attendants saying:—"Give to this one an excellent seat and offer him a Argha." Then when he of the Vrishni race was ushered in, the very virtuous king Yudhisthira caused him to be seated on an excallent seat and worshipped him with proper ceremonies.

Thus ends the eighty-second chapter, the decoration of Yudhisthira, in the Pratijna of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

(PRATIJNA PARVA)—Continued

Sanjaya said:—

1. King Yudhisthira the son of Kunti then welcoming the son of Devaki, that assuager of the grief of men, cheerfully addressed the following words to him:—

2. "Have you, O slayer of Madhu, passed the night in happiness? Are all your sense-organs, O undeteriorating one, as keen as ever?"

3. The son of Vasudeva also put similar questions to Yudhisthira. Then an orderly came there and said that other Kshatriya warriors were waiting to be ushered in.

4. Permitted by the king, the orderly introduced that influx of men, numbering in it, Virata, Bhimasena, Dhristadyumna and Satyaki,

5. And the ruler of the Chedis, Dhristaketu, the mighty car-warrior Drupada, Sikhandin, the twins Nakula and Sahadeva, Chekitana with the prince of the Kekayas,

6. As also Yuyutsu of Kuru race, and Uttamaujas of the Panchala tribe, and Yudhamanyu and Suvahu and the five sons of Droupadi.

7. These and many other Kshatriyas approached that best of Kshatriyas of illustrious fame; and they sat down on auspicious seats.

8. The two mighty heroes, Krishna and Yuyudhana, of illustrious souls and great effulgence, both sat on a single seat.

9. Thereafter king Yudhisthira, at the hearing of those assembled Kshatriyas, said these sweet words addressing that slayer of Madhu, who was graced with eyes resembling lotus petals:—

10. "Like celestials depending on the strength of the thousand-eyed (Indra), we relying on you alone, seek victory in battle, and eternal happiness.

11. You, O Krishna, know all about the despoliation of our kingdom, our exile by the enemy, and also all the miseries we had to suffer.

12. O Lord of everything, O you who are merciful to all devoted to you, upon you rest all our happiness, and even our existence, O slayer of Madhu.

13. O descendant of the Vrishni race, so do you manage that, my heart may always rely on you, and Arjuna's oath may remain inviolate.

14. Help us to cross this veritable ocean of grief and wrath. O Madhava, be you our raft to-day, as we desire to cross this ocean (of troubles).

15. A car-warrior desirous of slaying his adversary can not, in battle, do that (to achieve his purpose) which, O Krishna, his driver can do, if this latter strives with due caution.

16. O mighty-armed Janardana, as you save the Vrishnis from all calamities, so also, it behoves you to save us from this impending ruin.

17. O you the bearer of the conch, the discus and the mace, do you save the sons of Pandu sunk in the deep and boatless Kuru ocean, by becoming even a boat to them.

18. Salutations unto you, the Lord of the foremost of celestials, the eternal one, the supreme destroyer, O Vishnu, O Jishnu, O Hari, O Krishna, O Vaikantha, and O foremost of all male beings,

19. Narada had pronounced you to be that best and most ancient of sages, viz., (Narayana), who accord boons, who wields the Sarnga bow and who are the foremost of all. Make, O Madhava, all these words true."

20. Thus spoken to in the midst of the assembly by the very virtuous king Yudhisthira, that most fluent speaker Kesava replied to the former, in a voice sonorous like the rumbling of clouds charged with rain.

Krishna said:—

21. In all the worlds, including the regions of celestials, there is no such wielder of bow who can equal Dhananjaya the son of Pritha.

22. Endowed with energy, accomplished in the use of weapons, possessed of great prowess and might, ever brave in battle, and wrathful and agile, he is the foremost of all men.

23. Moreover he is youthful, of shoulders strong like those of the bull, of long-arms and mighty prowess; his gait resembles that of the lion itself. That handsome hero will slay all your enemies.

24. On my part, I shall so act as Kunti's son Arjuna may be able to consume the troops of Dhritarastra's son, even like a raging conflagration.

25. Even this very day, with the help of his arrows, Arjuna will compel that one of sinful acts, that mean-minded slayer of Subhadra's son viz., Jayadratha, to travel on a road from which no traveller ever returns.

26. The vultures, the hawks, the fierce jackals, and other carnivorous animals, will to-day hold a feast on the flesh of that one.

27. O Yudhisthira, even if the Gods with Indra at their head to-day become the protectors of Jayadratha, yet, slain in the thick of the fight, he shall undoubtedly be borne to the capital of Death's domain.

28. The victorious Arjuna shall this day come to you, having slain in battle the ruler of the Sindhus. Dismiss the grief of your heart and free yourself of the fever of anxiety, and O king, be you attended with prosperity!

Thus ends the eighty-third chapter, the words of Krishna, in the Pratijna of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

(PRATIJNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When they were thus conversing, Dhananjaya appeared there, desirous of seeing that foremost of the Bharatas, viz., king Yudhisthira, and his relatives.

2. When he had entered that auspicious chamber and was standing before the king, having saluted him duly, that foremost of the Pandavas (king Yudhisthira) rose from his seat and out of affection, embraced Arjuna.

3. Having locked Arjuna in his affectionate embrace, and having smelled the crown of his head and pronouncing best benedictions on him, the king smilingly addressed him saying :—

4. "It is evident, O Arjuna, that in today's fight a great victory is sure to court you, inasmuch as your very appearance indicates it, as also the fact that Janardana is gratified with you."

5. Then Jishnu spoke to him of the wonderful incident (he had seen in his dream) in the following terms :—"May good betide you, O monarch! through the mercy of Kesava, I have seen a marvel."

6. Then, for giving very assurance to his partisans, Dhananjaya related everything he had seen in his dream—his meeting with the three-eyed god.

7. Thereupon all the hearers filled with wonder, touched the earth with their heads; and thus having bowed down to the god having the bull for his emblem, they said Excellent, Excellent.

8. Then permitted by the son of Dharma, all the friends and partisans of the Pandavas, cheerfully set out for the battle with haste and with hearts swelling with rage.

9. Then having saluted the king, Yuyudhana, Arjuna and Krishna of unfading glory, with cheerful hearts, issued out of the chamber of Yudhisthira.

10. Those two indomitable warriors, the heroes Yuyudhana and Janardana, riding on the same car, proceeded towards the abode of Arjuna.

11. Repairing there, Hrishikesha dressed and equipped the car of that foremost of warriors, like a professional charioteer—car that bore the device of the monkey prince on its standard.

12. Thereupon that best of chariots of rattle resembling the rumble of clouds and of effulgence like that of heated gold, thus equipped (by Kesava), shone like the maker of day in the morning.

13. Thereafter that foremost of men, namely the son of Vasudeva, cased in an armour, told Pritha's son who had completed his morning prayers that his chariot had been made ready.

14. Then that foremost of all men of this world, namely, the diadem-decked Arjuna, clad in a golden coat of mail, and holding his bow and arrows in his grasp, circumbulated his vehicle.

15. Then praised, and blessed with benedictions believed to bestow victory in battle, by Brahmanas old in the performance of austerities, in knowledge and in years, ever engaged in the performance of religious rites and sacrifices, and holding all their passions in subjugation, Arjuna mounted upon his mighty chariot,—

16. That excellent vehicle of his which had been previously purified with victory-giving mantras,—like the sun of burning radiance ascending the Eastern mountains.

17. Then that best of car-warriors adorned with golden ornaments, shone, in consequence of those golden ornaments of his, on his chariot, like the sun of burning radiance on the breast of the Meru mountain.

18. After Partha, Yuyudhana and Janardana mounted on that car, like the twin Aswins riding on the best celestial car when they had come to the sacrifice of Swarjyuati.

19. Then Govinda that best of charioteers took up the reins (of Arjuna's steeds), like Matali taking up the reins of Indra's horses, when the latter went to fight in order to slay Vritra.

20. Mounting on that his best of cars, with those two heroes Yuyudhana and Janardana, Pritha's son appeared like the moon dispelling darkness when rising in conjuction with Budha and Sukra.

21. Then that slayer of large bodies of foes (Arjuna), desirous of bringing about the slaughter of the Sindhu ruler, proceeded to battle, like Indra accompanied by Varuna and the sun, proceeding to fight with the Asuras, in the battle caused by the abduction of Taraka.

22. The ministreals and musicians then greeted the heroic Arjuna as he proceeded, with the sounds of musical instruments and eulogies, auspicious and well-worded.

23. The voices of the bards and the ministrels pronounced benedictions of victory; and good-day greetings became pleasing to the heroes, being mingled with the din of musical instruments.

24. An auspicious breeze bearing holy fragrance, began to blow from behind Partha and it gladdened him, but sucked up the energies of his adversaries.

25. In that moment, O king, various auspicious signs appeared to view, indicative of the victory of the Pandavas,

26—27. And, O sire, of the reverses of their enemies. Seeing those signs indicative of victory Arjuna, addressing the mighty bow-man Yuyudhana who was sitting at his right, said these words:—"O Yuyoudhana, in to-day's battle, my victory is undoubted,

28. Inasmuch as, O foremost, of Sini's race, these auspicious signs are appearing to us. I shall now penetrate to the spot where the king of the Sindhus remains,

29. Desirous of seeing a display of my prowess and of going to the domain of Yama. Indeed, as the slaughter of the Sindhu ruler is one of my foremost duties,

30. So also the protection of the very virtuous king Yudhisthira is another imparative duty of mine. Therefore, O mighty-armed one, do you protect the king this day,

31. So that, protected by you he will be as safe as if he were protected by my own self. Moreover, I do not see any one who can vanquish you in battle.

32. In battle you are equal to Vasudeva himself; even the lord of the celestials can not vanquish you. Placing the burden of the king's protection on you or on the mighty car-warrior Pradyumna,

33. I can, O foremost of men, without anxiety, exert myself in slaying the Sindhu king. O descendant of the Stwata race, you need not entertain any misgiving about myself.

34. It shall be your first duty to protect the king, with all your heart and soul. There where the mighty-armed son of Vasudeva stayeth,

35. Or where I myself stay, certainly no calamity can befall there." Thus spoken to by Pritha's son, Satyaki the slayer of hostile heroes, saying 'yea' to the words of the former, returned to that part of the field where Yudhisthira was.

Thus ends the eighty-fourth chapter, the words of Arjuna, in the Pratijna of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXV.

JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. When the day after the one in which Abhimanyu had been slain, came, what did the Pandavas, afflicted with grief and sorrow, do? What warriors of my host fought with them?

2. Aware, as they were, of the feats achieved by Savyasachin (Arjuna), tell me, how could the Kauravas and my warriors, having perpetrated that sinful act, (Abhimanyu's slaughter) remain undaunted?

3. How could they in battle dare look at that foremost of men as he proceeded like the all-destroying Death, burning with fury, and distressed with the grief occasioned by the slaughter of his son.

4. What did my warriors do, beholding that warrior having the king of the monkeys for the emblem on his standard, that hero afflicted with the grief caused by the death of his son, and shaking his huge bow in battle?

5. What, O Sanjaya, has befallen, unto Duryodhana in this day's battle? A great grief stares us in the face. I do not hear any longer, sounds of joy (from our camp).

6. Those mind-captivating sounds, highly pleasing to the sense of hearing that were before heard from the pavilion of the Sindhu king, those sounds are no longer perceived to-day.

7. In the encampment of my sons, the sounds of numerous ministrels and panegyrists singing eulogies, and of dancers, are no longer heard.

8. Formerly all these sounds used to strike my ears incessantly. Alas, merged as they are in grief, I do not any longer here those sounds from their pavilions.

9. Formerly, O Sanjaya, while sitting in the camp of the truth-loving Somadatta, I used to hear all those charming sounds.

10. How poor in religious merit I am to-day, inasmuch as I perceive the pavilion of my sons to-day to be resounding with sounds of sorrow and lamentations, and to be destitute of all sounds of life and energy.

11. I do not now hear those sounds I used to hear formerly in the camps of Vivingsati, Durmukha, Chitrasena, Vikarna, and other sons of mine,

12. That fierce bowman namely the son of Drona, who is the protector of my sons, upon whom Brahmanas, Kshatriyas and Vaisyas and a large number of pupils used to wait,

13. Who delighted in disputations and conversation and in the stirring music of various instruments and in diverse kinds of songs,

14. Who was worshipped by many persons among the Kurus, the Pandavas, and the Stwatas—O you son of Suta, even in the camp of that son of Drona no sound could be heard as before.

15. Numerous songsters and dancers used to dance attendance upon that mighty bowman viz the son of Drona! Now their sounds could no longer be heard in their camp.

16. The loud sound that used to be sent up from the pavilion of Vindu and Anuvindu every evening, alas, that sound could no longer be heard there. In the camp of the Kekayas also,

17. Could no longer be heard the sound that used to be made by the songs and slappings of palms of soldiers engaged in dance and merry-making.

18. Those Yajaka Brahmanas accomplished in conducting Saptatantu sacrifices, who used to wait upon the son of Somadatta versed in the Vedas, the sound made by those Brahmanas could no longer be heard.

19. The twang of bows, the sound of Vedic recitations, the whistle of shafts, the whizz of swords and the rattle of cars,—these sounds were to be heard incessantly in the pavilion of Drona. But I do not hear them now.

20. The melody of songs that used to be sang in the various parts of the field and that used to be mingled with the sound of musical instruments, alas, that sound could not be heard this day,

21. When Janardana of unfading glory out of the compassion he cherished for every creature, came here with a desire for concluding peace,

22. Then, O Suta, I said unto the wicked Duryodhana :—"With the son of Vasudeva as the mediator, O son, do you conclude peace with the Pandavas.

23. Meseems the time for concluding peace has arrived. O Duryodhana, do not violate my command. If you now disregard the son of Vasudeva who now entreats you for peace

24. And advises you for your welfare, victory will never fall in your lot in battle." Duryodhana however neglected him of the Dasarha race, that foremost of all bowmen,

25—26. Who then addressed him for his welfare, and thus he brought danger on his own head. Then that son of mine, whose intellect was perverted, and who was being drawn into the jaws of death, accepted the counsel of Dussasana and Karna and rejected that which I offered him. I was not in favor of the game at dice, nor was Vidura so.

27. Neither also did the ruler of the Sindhus approve of the game at dice, nor did Bhisma approve of it. So also, Salya Bhurisravas, Purumitra and Jaya did not like it.

28. O Sanjaya, Aswathaman, Kripa and Drona, none of these approved of that game. If my unfortunate son had conducted himself according to the counsel of these persons,

29. He with his friends and relatives would then have passed his days in peace and happiness. Of sweet and charming speech, always speaking what is agreeable to their relatives,

30. Of noble extraction, esteemed by all, gifted with knowledge, the sons of Pandu are sure to reap happiness. The man who depends on rightiousness, is sure to reap happiness always and everywhere.

31. After death, he obtains bliss and grace (of god). Relying on their own prowess for the achievement of their purposes, the Pandavas deserve to enjoy one half of the Earth itself.

32. The sea-girt earth is as much an inheritance to them as it is to the Kurus. Obtaining sovereignty they will ever remain in the path of virtue.

33. I have kinsmen, O son, to whose words the Pandavas will ever pay attention, as for instance, Salya, Somadatta, the high-souled Bhisma,

34. Drona, Vikarna, Valhika, Kripa, and numerous other high-solued and venerable (in years) members of the Bharta dynasty.

35. O Sire, if these persons speak for you, the Pandavas will act up to their beneficial words. Who among these do you think would speak otherwise?

36—37. Krishna will never abandon rightiousness; the Pandavas are ever submissive to him. Those heroes will not also disregard the rigteous words that I shall speak to them, for the Pandavas are all of righteous soul." Thus plaintively lamenting, I said these and many other words to my son, O Suta.

38. But that fool did not listen to me! Meseems all this is owing to the evil influence of time. There where remain Vrikodara, and Arjuna and the Vrishni hero Satyaki,

39. And Uttamoujas of the Panchala race, and the indomitable Yudhamanyu, and the invincible Dhristadyumna, and the ever-victorious Sikhandin,

40. And the Asmakas, Kekayas, and Kshatradarman of the Somaka clan, the ruler of the chedis and Chekitana, and Vibhu the son of the Kasi king,

41. The sons of Droupadi and Virata and the mighty car-warrior Drupada, and those foremost of men the twins Nakula and Sahadeva, and the slayer of Madhu as the counsellor,

42. What man in this world desirous of living would venture to fight with these? Who else again will face my enemies when they will display their celestial weapons,

43. Save and except Duryodhana, Karna Sakuni the son of Suvala and Dussana as their fourth; I do not indeed see a fifth man.

44. They who have Visaksena (Vishnu), clad in armour and reins in hand, on their chariot, they who have Arjuna for their warrior, they can never suffer defeat.

45. Does Duryodhana now remember all those lamentations of mine? You say that Bhisma and Drona, those two foremost of men, have been killed.

46. I think my foolish sons are now overwhelmed with grief, seeing now the words of the far-sighted Vidura to be true and fruitful.

47. I think my foolish sons are now indulging in lamentations seeing the army sorely distressed by Arjuna and the grand son of Sini, and seeing also the terraces of their cars empty.

48. Surely Dhananjaya is consuming my sroops like fire assisted by the wind, burning down a heap of straw dried by the heat of the sun that rises at the expiration of the winter season.

49. O Sanjaya, expert as you are in story-telling, relate to me everything that happened, after that wrong had been inflicted on Arjuna in the evening.

50. What was the state of your mind, O son, when Abhimanyu was slain? Surely the feats of valour of the weilder of the Gaudiva bow,

51. My warriors were unable to bear, guilty, as they were, of injuring Arjuna (by slaying his son). What measures Duryodhana or Karna direct to be adopted?

52—53. What also Dussasana or the son of Suvala thought fit to do, when they were in volved in this predicament. O sire, everything that befell my assembled sons was, O Sanjaya, certainly owing to the misdeeds of my wicked son Duryodhana, who follows in the path of covetousness, whose understanding has been perverted by wrath, whose soul is vitiated,

54. Who longs to have sovereignty who is stupid and whose reason is clouded by anger. O Sanjaya, tell me whether the measure adopted by him was agreeable to policy or against it?

Thus ends the eighty-fifth chapter, the repentance rf Dhritarastra, and the Jayadratha-badha of the Droua Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)
—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Alas, as I have seen everything with my own eyes, I shall tell you all. Hear me patiently. Great indeed is your fault.

2. O king, these lamentations of yours are as useless as the construction of embankments when the waters have receeded from a flooded field. O foremost of the Bharatas, do not indulge in grief.

3. The decrees of Destiny are wonderful and enevitable. O foremost of the Bharatas, do not give way to grief, for these things are not unique.

4. If in days gone by, you had prevented Kunti's son Yudhisthira or your own sons, from the tournament at dice, then this calamity would not have overtaken you.

5. If, again, on the eve of the battle, you had prevented the enraged parties from joining in the battle, then this calamity would not have overtaken you.

6. If, again, formerly you had incited the other Kurus to put an end to the existence of the refractory Duryodhana, then this calamity would never have overtaken you.

7. If, indeed, you had done one of these alternatives, then the Pandavas, the Panchalas, the Vrishnis, and the other rulers of Earth have never had the reason for blaming you for your pervert understanding.

8. If, again, doing the duty of a father, you had (by directing Duryodhana on the path of virtue) compelled him to follow in the same path, then this calamity would never have befallen you.

9. You are the wisest man on the face of the Earth. But inspite of your being so, you accepted the counsel of Karna, Duryodhana and Sakuni, abondoning the ways of eternal virtue.

10. Therefore, O king, all these lamentations of yours that I have heard,—you who are absorbed in the enjoyment of worldly objects—appear to me to be like honey-mixed with poison.

11. In days gone by, Krishna did not hold king Yudhisthira the son of Pandu, or Bhisma, or Drona, in so high an estimation as he did hold you, O king.

12. But when he came to know you fallen from the duties of royalty, that time forward, he did not respect you as before.

13. When your sons applied harsh epithcts to the sons of Pritha, you assumed an indifferent attitude. The result of that indifference of yours has now overtaken you—you who long to see your sons installed on the throne.

14. O sinless one, the royalty you inherited from your fore-fathers, is now going to slip off your hands; or on the other hand you will have it, obtaining it from the sons of Pritha (who would certainly snatch it away from your sons after slaying them).

15. The dominions of the Kurus and their fame, had been acquired by Pandu, and the right-behaving sons of Pandu have again added to that fame and those dominions.

16. All those endeavours of theirs became fruitless when indeed their interests clashed with yours, in as much as they were despoiled of their ancestral sovereignty by your very avaricious self.

17. So, O king, the fact of your attributing blame to your sons at the time of the actual warfare, and the fact of your expatiating on their faults, indeed, seem very unbecoming.

18. The monarchs, when engaged in battle, do not pay the least regard to their lives. Those foremost of the Kshatriyas fight (to the best of their abilities, having penetrated into the heart of the array of troops belonging to the sons of Pritha.

19. The army which Krishna and Arjuna and Satyaki and Vrikodara protect, what persons except the Kouravas would hazard a battle with that army ?

20. They whose warrior is Gudakesha (Arjuna), they whose counsellor is Krishna, they whose protectors are Vrikodara and Satyaki,

21. What human wielder of bow would venture to fight them, save and except the Kouravas and those who follow their lead.

22. Everything that can possibly be done by devoted (tributary) kings endued with heroism and observant of the duties of the Kshatriyas, all that is being done for the Kouravas by their partisans.

23. Hear now from me everything that transpired in that dreadful battle between those foremost of men, viz, the Kouravas and the Prndavas.

Thus ends the eighty-sixth chapter the words of Sanjaya, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. After the night had passed away, that foremost of all weilders of weapons, viz Drona began to dispose of his divisions in battle array.

2. Then there were heard the diverse words of challenge uttered by shouting heroes, inflamed with rage and desirous of slaying one another.

3. Stretching their bows and drawing back the strings of their bow with their hands and breathing (hot), they began to exclaim, 'where now is that Dhananjaya.'

4. Some began to toss their swords in air,—swords that were naked, non-pliant, well-tempered, of the hue of the sky, possessed of great sharpness and decorated with ornamental hilts.

5. Thousands of heroic warriors longing for battle, were seen to perform various evolutions of swordsmen and bowmen, with dexterity acquired through discipline.

6. Others again whirling in the air their maces tied with belts, decorated with sandal paste, and adorned with gold and diamond, began to enquire after the] son of Pandu (Arjuna).

7. Other warriors, maddened with the pride of their prowess and endued with strong arms, obstructed the sky with their spiked bludgeons that looked like bannered poles raised in honor of Indra.

8. Other brave warriors again decorated with charming floral garlands, and armed with various kinds of weapons, stationed thenselves on different parts of the field, burning with a desire for battle.

9. 'Where is Arjuna? Where is Govinda? Where is the proud Vrikodora? Where are all their followers and friends? Even thus did they then challenge the Pandavas to battle.

10. Then blowing his conch and urging his steeds to full speed, Drona began to move hither and thither with great celerity, arranging his troops in order.

11. When those divisions that ever delighted in fight, were disposed of in order, O mighty monarch, the son of Bharadwaja addressing Jayadratha said these words.

12. "Yourself, the son of Somadatta, the mighty car-warrior Karna, Aswathaman, Salya, Vrishsena, and Kripa,

13. Supported with a hundred thousand horses, sixty thousand chariots, fourteen thousand elephants with rent temples,

14. Twenty-one thousand foot-soldiers cased in armour, take up your stand behind me at a distance of twelve miles.

15. There even the very gods led by Vasava himself will not be able to assault you what to speak of the sons of Pandu? Take heart, O ruler of the Sindhus."

16. Thus spoken to, Jayadratha the ruler of the Sindhus became comforted. He then set out for the spot indicated by Drona, followed by many Gandhara heroes and surrounded by those great car-warriors,

17. And accompanied by many foot soldiers cased in armours, armed with nooses and prepared to fight to the best of their abilities. Decked with Chamaras and adorned with golden caparisons,

18. The horses of Jayadratha, O mighty king, were all very good carriers; seven thousand such steeds and three thousands other steeds of the Shindhu breed, were also with him.

19—20. Your son Durmarsana, desirous of doing battle, was stationed in the van of the rest of the troops being supported by one thousand and five hundred maddened elephants of prodigious size, covered with mail and of dreadful deeds, all mounted by skilful elephant-riders.

21. Your other two sons, Dussasana and Vikarna, stationed themselves amidst the advance divisions of the army, for securing success to the king of the Sindhus.

22. The array that the son of Bharadwaja then formed, partly figuring a sakata and partly a circle, was full forty-eight miles in length, and its back portion, in width, measured full twenty miles.

23. Drona himself formed this array in which were stationed numerous brave kings and innumerable cars, elephants, horses and foot soldiers.

24. In the back portion of that array was formed another impenetrable array figuring a lotus. Within this latter again was constructed another closely formed array, that was designated the needle.

25. Thus having formed this mighty array Drona waited for the encounter. In the rear of the needle array was placed Kritavarman the fierce bowman.

26. After him were stationed the Kamvoja Princes and also Jalasandha, O sire. Behind them stood Duryodhana and Karna, in that Sakata.

27. Next to them were placed hundreds and thousands of unretreating warriors, for protecting the head of that array.

28. Behind their back, was stationed king Jayadratha by the side of the needle array, and surrounded by a mighty division of troops.

29. The son of Bharadwaja, himself stood at the mouth of the Sakata. Next to him stood the ruler of the Bhojas, who protected the former.

30. Cased in a white coat of mail, graced with a beautiful turban, of broad chest, and of mighty arms, Drona there stood stretching his bow, like the enraged God of Death.

31. The Kurus then were filled with delight by beholding the chariot of Drona, graced with a banner, having crimson steeds yoked to it, and standard that bore the device of the sacrificial altar and a black deer.

32. Beholding that array formed by Drona that resembled the ocean agitated (by the tempest), the Sidhas and the charanas were filled with great wonder.

33. The creatures then thought that that array would devour the whole Earth with her mountains, oceans, forests and the various rivers flowin g on its surface.

34. King Duryodhana then beholding that great array figuring a Sakata, teeming with chariots, men, steeds, and elephants and roaring fearfully, of wonderful appearance and capable of afflicting the hearts of the enemy, became filled with delight.

Thus ends the eighty-seventh chapter, the arraying of the Kourava troops, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

(JAYADRYTHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Thus when the troops had been excellently disposed of in that array, O sire, and when the Bheris were sounded and Mridangas struck up,

2. When the soldiers uttered loud war-cries, and musical instruments emitted tremendous din, when conchs were blown, and horripilating roars were heard,

3. When the field slowly became overspread with Bharata heroes desirous of battle, and when the hour known as Roudra arrived, Savyasachin (Arjuna) made his appearance on the field of battle.

4. Then, O Bharata, many thousands of ravens and crows flew sportively in front of Arjuna's car.

5. Various animals of fearful yells, and jackals of dreadful appearance, began to how in our right as we proceeded to battle.

6. Thousands of meteors, with harsh sounds and blazing tails, began to drop down; on that dreadful occasion, the whole Eearth began to quake and tremble.

7. Dry winds accompanied by deep sounds and driving pebbles and gravel, began to blow when Kunti's son made his appearance before the commencement of the battle.

8. Then Satarika the son of Nakula and Dhristadyumna the son of Prishata, these two warriors endued with great wisdom began to array in order the numerous divisions of the Pandavas.

9. Supported by a thousand cars, a hundred elephants, three thousand horses, and ten thousand foot-soldiers,

10. And covering a part of the field measuring fifteen hundred bows, your son Durmarshana stationed himself in the very van of the troops, and thus spoke:—

11. "Like the banks resisting the waves of the swelling main, even I myself will this this day hold in check the wielder of the Gandiva bow, that slayer of foes, that hero who is irrepressible in battle.

12. To-day let people see the irate and indomitable Dhananjaya collide with me, even like a mass of stone against another stony mass.

13. Stay, O you car-warriors that long to join in the fray! Single-handed, will I fight with the assembled Pandavas, for enhancing my glory and my fame."

14. Having thus spoken, O mighty monarch, that illustrious one of generous intellect, that fierce bowmen stood, O king, being surrounded by many excellent car-warriors.

15. Then like the enraged Destroyer or like Vasava armed with the thunderbolt, or like the unbearable god of Death wielding his bludgeon and let loose by Time,

16. Or like Siva with trident, and unruffled, or like Varuna armed with the noose, or like the blazing fire appearing at the end of a Yuga for consuming the creation,

17. That slayer of the Nivata Kavachas, inflamed with rage and swelling with his energies, the ever victorious Jaya attached to truth and intent on accomplishing his great vow,

18. Cased in mail, and armed with a sword, graced with a golden diadem, decorated with garlands of white flowers and attired in white garments, his arms decked with charming Angadas and ears with resplendent ear-rings,

19. Riding on his own best of chariots, the embodied Nara accompanied by Narayana, shaking his Gandiva bow in battle appeared shining and dazzling like the risen sun.

20. Then Dhananjaya endued with great might, O king, stopping his chariot before the van of his troops where the thickest downpour of arrows was expected blew his conch.

21. Thereupon the undaunted Krishna also, O sire, with Pritha's son, blew with force that most excellent conch of his, known as the Panchajannya.

22. Then at that blare of the conchs, O ruler of men, the soldiers of your army had the hair of their body erect, and they trembled and were confounded.

23. At the blare of their conchs, your troops took fright even as creatures become frightened at the rumbling of the thunder.

24. All the beasts discharged urine and excreta. Your whole army with its animals became seized with anxiety.

25. O sire, O monarch, in consequence of the blare of those two conchs, all men were deprived of their strength. And some of our array then were filled with fear, and some lost their consciousness.

26. Then frightening your soldiers, the ape on Arjuna's banner with other creatures thereon, opening its mouth, uttered a terrible roar.

27. Then conchs, horns, cymbals, and Anakas, were sounded and blown for inspiring energy into your troops.

28. The din thus produced, became mixed up with the din produced by various musical instrumeuts, by the shouts of warriors, and by the slappings of their armpits, by the war-cries of the great car-warriors, as they challenged one another.

29. Thus when that tremendous din arose there—din that enhanced the fear of the cowards—the son of Pakasasani became filled with joy; and addressing the descendant of the Dasarha race, he then thus spoke.

Thus euds the eighty-eightieth chapter, the appearance of Arjuna on the field of battle, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drana Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXIX.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Arjuna said:—

1. Drive, O Hrishikesha, the horses to the spot where Durmarsana stands. Penetrating through this division of elephants, I shall enter into the heart of the hostile army.

Sanjaya said:—

2. Thus spoken to by Savyasachin, the mighty-armed Kesava drove the steeds to the spot where Durmarsana was standing.

3. Thereupon, there ensued a fearful and terrible encounter between the many and the one,—encounter that was destructive of many cars, elephants, and men.

4. Then, like masses of clouds surcharged with rain drenching the mountain-breast with their contents, Pritha's son covered his enemies with his arrowy down-pour.

5. The warriors of your army then with great lightness of hands, hastily covered Arjuna and Krishna with a net-work of arrows.

6. Then excited to the highest pitch of anger by his enemies, the mighty-armed Partha endued with great prowess, began to rob, with his arrows, the heads of car-warriors, from their trunks.

7. The Earth became overspread with handsome heads graced with ear-rings and head-gears, the lower lips bit by the upper ones, and the faces adorned with eyes inflamed with rage.

8. The countenance of the warriors scattered here and there, looked charming like an assemblage of plucked off lotuses lying crushed and strewn about the field.

9. Armours of gold bespattered with blood and lying thick over the field, appeared like masses of clouds fringed with flashes of lightning.

10. The sound then created by the falling of heads on the earth, resembled that produced by the falling of ripe palm fruit.

11. Some headless trunks were seen standing there, with their bows in grasp. Some again stood, with their drawn swords raised on air (for striking).

12. The (surviving) foremost of warriors, all resenting those feats of Arjuna, the son of Kunti, and desirous of conquering him in battle, did not pay any regard to the fallen heads (of their brother warriors.)

13. The Earth became strewn over with the heads of horses, the trunks of elephants and the heads and arms of heroic warriors.

14. 'This is Arjuna' 'Where is Partha' 'Here is Pritha's son'—O master, even thus were the troops of your army then filled with the thought of Partha.

15. They then began to strike one another and some of them again struck their ownselves. Confounded by Time, they then beheld the world to be full of Partha only.

16. Uttering cries of agony, steeped in blood, deprived of consciousness, suffering excruciating pain, many heroes prostrate on the field of battle, began to summon their friends and relatives, for succour.]

17. Holding Vindipalas or lances or darts or swords, or battle-axes, or piked stakes, or scimitars, or bows or Tomaras,

18—19. Or shafts or maces, and covered with mail and adorned with Angadas and other ornaments, and looking like huge snakes and resembling large bludgeons,—hands cut off with mighty weapons from the trunks, were seen to leap, jump and jerk about with great force, as if in rage.

20. Whoever then ventured to advance in rage against Partha, had a fatal shaft discharged by that hero, stuck deep on his body.

21. Not the slightest flaw was then detected in Pritha's son, as he danced in the terrace of his chariot and stretched his mighty bow.

22. The troops belonging to the party hostile to him, were then amazed by beholding the lightness of hands with which he took out his shafts, placed them on the bow-string and discharged them.

23. Then Phalguna with his arrows penetrated elephants and their drivers, horses and their riders, and car-warriors with their car-drivers.

24. There was none among the hostile troop, whether standing in front of him, or exerting in battle, or moving about or urged on, whom the arrows discharged by Arjuna did not pierce through.

25. Just as the sun rising in the heavens destroys deep darkness (of night), so did Arjuna destroy elephants with his arrows furnished with wings of Kanka-feathers.

26. That part of the field occupied by your troops looked like the Earth at the hour of dessolution, covered with hillocks, in consequence of its being strewn over with fallen and mangled elephants.

27. Just as the sun shining in the meredian is incapable of beings looked at by beings, so then in that battle, Dhananjaya inflamed with rage, was incapable of being looked at by his enemies.

28. Then O scorcher of foes, the troops of your son afflidted with the arrows of Arjuna, deserted their ranks and fled from the field.

29. Like the tempest scattering and tearing a mass of cloud, Arjuna then routed your army; when he was thus afflicting the army, none could turn his eyes towards him.

30—31. Afflicted by Arjuna, your troops viz., the cavalry, the infantry and the car-warriors, fled in all haste from the field of battle, urging their horses to the top of their speed by goad-strokes, by stroke of the horns of their bows, by growls, by encouraging commands, by wh's, by (dagger) cuts on their flanks and also by threatening speeches.

32. Others (riding on elephants) fled urging their huge carriers by pressing their sides with toes or with the stroke of the hooks; others again confounded by Parthas arrows, even fled to the direction of Partha himself. Thus then all your warriors were deprived of sense and their minds also became distracted.

Thus ends the eighty-ninth chapter, the fight of Arjuna in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XC.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)
—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. When the vanguard of my troops were thus slaughtered and routed by the diadem-decked Arjuna, what heroes of my army then proceeded to fight with Dhananjaya?

2. Or did all of them, forgetting their determination, enter into the Sakata array and stood behind the fearless Drona resembling a solid wall?

Sanjaya said :—

3—4. When, O sinless one, Arjuna the son of Pakasasani (Indra) had broken and slain with his excellent arrows our own troops, many were the heroes that were slain, or fled with depressed hearts. None indeed was able to look upon him.

5. Then O king your son Dussasana, seeing your troops in that wretched plight became inflamed with rage and advanced towards Arjuna for fighting with the latter.

6. That hero of fierce energy was cased in a coat of mail worked exquisitely with gold, and he wore also a helmet of pure gold.

7. O mighty monarch, Dussasana then surrounded Savyasachin with a mighty division of elephants that seemed to devour the whole earth.

8. With the booming of the bells tied to the necks of elephants, with the blasts of the conchs, with the twang of bows, with war cries with the roars of tusked elephants,

9. The Earth, the points of the compass and the welkin, became completely filled. The hour appeared to be awful and solemn.

10. Beholding those infuriate and huge elephants with extended trunks and urged with hooks make towards himself like so many winged mountains,

11. That foremost of men, Dhananjaya sending up a fierce war-cry, fell to agitate that elephant division of his enemy, with his shafts.

12. Then like a Makara entering into the waters of the mighty main lashed into fury by the tempest the diadem-decked Arjuna penetrated into that elephant division.

13. Indeed then Partha that conqueror of hostile fortresses, was seen by every body on every side to resemble the burning sun that rises on the day of dissolution, in contravention of all rules about direction and hour.

14. In consequence of the clatter of horse hoofs, the rattle of car-wheels, the cries of combatants, the twang of bowstrings,

15. The sounds of various musical instruments, the blasts of Panchajannya and Devadatta (the conchs of Arjuna and Krishna), and the crakling of the bow Gandiva,

16. The troops of your army and the elephants therein, lost all activity and became cheerless. They were pierced by Savyasachin with his arrows whose touch resembled that of snakes of virulent venom.

17. The elephants were pierced on every part of their bodies with the arrows of keen points shot by hundreds and thousands from the bow Gandiva.

18. Uttering fierce roars when they were being slaughtered by the diadem-decked Arjuna, they began to fall incessantly on the ground like mountains having their wings cut off.

19. Other elephants pierced with long shafts in the jaw or frontal globes, or temples, began to utter yelling cries resembling the screach of the cranes.

20. The diadem-decked Arjuna then cut off with vallas of close knots, the heads of hostile warriors that rode on the neck of these elephants.

21. Those heads graced with ear-rings falling incessantly on the Earth, looked like so many lotuses that Pritha's son was culling, for an offering to the Gods.

22. Entangled with the trappings, divested of their armours, lacerared with wounds and smeared with blood, men were then seen hanging from the necks of elephants, as these latter careered over the field.

23. Sometimes two or three warriors penetrated by a single arrow decked with beautiful feathers and heedfully shot from the Gandiva, fell down on the Earth.

24. Deeply pierced with Narachas and vomitting blood through the mouth, elephants with their riders, began to fall down on the ground like so many mountains covered with trees.

25. With his vallas of straight knots Arjuna then began to sever the bowstrings, the standards, the bows, the yokes and the shafts of many car-warriors.

26. Nobody was able then to detect when Arjuna took out his arrows or fix them on the string of his bows or drew the string back or discharged them. But Partha was then seen only to dance on the terrace of his chariot with his bow drawn to a circle.

27. Other elephants again pierced deep with Narachas and vomitting blood in consequence, fell down on the ground as soon as they were struck.

28. In that dreadful carnage, O mighty monarch, innumerable headless trunks were seen to stand up on all sides.

29. Numerous arms, holding bows, with fingers cased in leathern gloves, with swords in grasp, adorned with Angadas and golden ornaments, were seen scattered about, severed from the trunks.

30. With innumerable Upasakas, Adisthanas, shafts, crowns, broken car-wheels shattered Akshas and yokes,

31. With warriors armed with shields and bows, with garlands of flowers, with ornaments, garments, and fallen standards scattered here and there,

32. With slain elephants and horses and fallen Kshatriyas, the field of battle appeared exceedingly awful.

33. Thus, O mighty monarch, the army of Dussasana with its leader, deeply afflicted and extensively slaughtered by the diadem-decked Arjuna, began to fiy away.

34. Then Dussasana afraid and afflicted with shafts, with his whole division, fell back upon the Sakata array and looked upon Drona as his only protector.

Thus ends the ninetieth chapter, the defeat of Dussasana's division, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XCI.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Having slaughtered the division of Dussasana, the mighty-armed Savysachin desirous of getting at the king of the Sindhus, fell upon Drona's division.

2. Approaching Drona who was standing in the mouth of his array, Arjuna, with Krishna's permission, folding his palms thus spoke to Drona.

Arjuna said :—

3. Wish me well, O Brahmana, and bless me saying Swasti. Through your grace I desire to penetrate through this impenetrable array.

4. You are to me even as my own father, or the very virtuous king Yudhisthira or as Krishna himself. This I tell you in sooth.

5. O sire, O sinless one, even as Aswathaman deserves to be protected by you, so also, O foremost of the regenerate ones, I deserve to be protected by you.

6. Through your grace, I desire to slay the ruler of the Sindhus in battle, O you foremost of men. O lord, see that my vow may be fulfilled."

Sanjaya said :—

7. Thus spoken to, the preceptors then similingly replied unto Arjuna thus:—"O Vibhatsu you shall not conquer Jayadratha without in the fiist instance conquering my own self."

8. Speaking these words only, Drona, with myriads of sharp arrows, covered Arjuna, his chariot, steeds, standard and charioteer, similing all the while.

9. Thereat Arjuna repulsing the arrowy showers of Drona with those of his own, proceeded against Drona, discharging mightier and more dreadful shafts.

10. Then, O ruler of men, showing due respect to Drona and observing the duties of the Kshatriya order, Arjuna sped at him nine shafts.

11. Then cutting those arrows of Arjuna with those of his own, Drona pierced both Krishna and the son of Pandu with shafts that resembled poison or the blazing tougues of fire.

12. The son of Pandu desired to sever the bow string of Drona with his arrows. Even when the illustrious Phalguna as thus thinking of cutting his bow string,

13. The undaunted Drona endued with prowess, cut off with his arrows the formers string; he also pierced his horses, standards and charioteer.

14. And smilingly did then Drona cover Arjuna himself with many arrows. Meanwhile having strung his mighty bow, Pritha's son,

15. That foremost of all men versed in the use of weapons getting the better of his preceptor, quickly discharged six hundred arrows; that looked as if he had taken out and shot only a single arrow.

16. Once more he shot seven hundred other arrows and again a thousand irresistible arrows and ten thousand other arrows. All these despatched many warriors of Drona's division.

17. Pierced deep by those shafts shot by the mighty and accomplished Parthat versed in all modes of warfare, many men and horses and elephants began to fall down dead.

18. Afflicted with those arrows, car-warriors dropped drown from their excellent chariots, deprived of horses and standards and weapons and life;

19. Like mountain-peaks or masses of clouds, or mansions crushed, driven or dismantled by the thunder, the tempest or the fire, elephants began to fall down (being pierced with the shafts of Arjuna).

20. Thousands of horses began to fall down being struck by the arrows of Arjuna, like so many swans falling upon the Himas vat mountain, being driven down by shower-of rain.

21. Like the sun that rises at the end of a Yuga, sucking up with its rays large expanses of water, the son of Pandu, by his showers of weapons and shafts, slew large bodies of car-warriors, horses elephants and foot soldiers.

22. Then like the clouds covering the sun, the Drona-cloud with its down-pour of arrows, covered the Arjuna-sun whose rays in the form of thick shower of arrows, were burning down the foremost ones among the Kurus, in battle.

23. Then the preceptor pierced Dhananjayaon the breast with a Naracha discharged with great force and capable of sucking out the life of every foe.

24. Thereupon the latter trembled in all his limbs like a mountain during an earth quake. But (in a while) regaining his composure, he began to pierce Drona with winged arrows.

25. Then Drona with five arrows afflicted the son of Vasudeva, and he struck Vibhatsu with seventy-three shafts, and his standard with three.

26. Thus, O monarch, the puissant Drona, worsting his disciple within a moment, caused Arjuna to disapper from the view, with his arrowy showers.

27. We then beheld the arrows shot by Bharadwaja's son fall in unbroken lines, and his bow present the wonderful appearance of always being drawn to a circle.

28. Those numerous arrows furnished with wings of Kanka feather and discharged by Drona in that battle, incessantly fell, O monarch, on Dhananjaya and the son of Vasudeva.

29. Then beholding that battle between Drona and the son of Pandu, the highly intelligent son of Vasudeva began to think about the accomplishment of the (more important) task (viz., the slaughter of Jayadratha).

30. Thereafter Vasudeva's son thus spoke addressing Dhananjaya :—"O Partha O Partha, O mighty-armed one, we should not waste time.

31. Let us proceed leaving Drona alone: the more important task must be accomplished." Then the son of Pritha replied to Krishna saying:—"As it lists you, O Kesava."

32. Thereupon leaving the mighty-armed Drona to their right they proceeded onwards; turning his face away, Vibhatsu advanced shooting his shafts.

33. Thereupon Drona addressing Arjuna said:—"Where are you going, O son of Pandu? Is it not the fact that you never turn back without defeating your adversary?"

Arjuna said :—

34. You are my preceptor and not my foe; I am your pupil and like your son. Also there exists not the man in the worlds who can vanquish you in battle.

Sanjaya said :—

35. Having thus spoken, the mighty-armed Vibhatsu, intent on slaying Jayadratha, quickly rushed against the hostile troops.

36. And when he penetrated into your army, the two illustrious Panchala princes, Yudhamanyu and Uttamoujas, followed him, protecting his car-wheel.

37. Thereupon, O mighty monarch, Jaya, Kritavarman of tne Satwa race, and the Kamvoja king and Srutavusha—these put themselves on the way of Dhananjaya.

38. Ten thousand car-warriors followed these warriors. The Avisakas, the Surasenas, the Sivis, the Vasatis,

39. The Mavellakas, the Lalithyuas, the the Kaikayas, the Madras, the Narayanas, the Gopalas, and the Kamvoja clans,

40. Who had before been defeated by Karna and who were regarded as heroes,—all these warriors placing the son of Bharadwaja at their head, and disregardful of their lives, rushed against Arjuna,

41. For opposing that wrathful hero burning with sorrow an account of the death of his son',that warrior resembling the all-destroying Death himself, cased in armour, versed in all modes of warfare, prepared to sacrifice his life in the very thick of the fight,

42. That foremost of men, fierce bowman, endued with prowess, who resembled the infurrite leader of an elephant and who seemed to plunge into the ranks of your troops.

43. Then the battle that raged between all those warriors on one side and Arjuna on the other, became exceeding fierce and hair-stirring, inasmuch as each desired to meet the other.

44. Then like medicines checking a raging malady, the Kourava warriors firmly united together began to check that foremost of men proceeding onwards for the slaughter of Jayadratha.

Thus ends the ninety-first chapter, Arjuna's passing through Drona's division, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XCII.

(JAYADRATHA BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Then that mighty car-warrior viz Pritha's son, endued with great might and prowess, was opposed in the front by those warriors and quickly pursued from behind by Drona himself.

2. Then scattering his sharp shafts like the lustrous orb of the day scattering his rays, he afflicted that host of the Kurus like maladies afflicting the body.

3. On that occasion, horses were pierced, cars broken, elephants felled with their riders, umbrellas torn, and chariots deprived of their wheels.

4. Afflicted with arrows, troops began to fly in all directions. Thus raged that terrible encounter between Arjuna on the one hand and the Kurus on the other. Nothing could then be distinguished.

5. Thus when they fought on, piercing one another in battle with straight coursing arrows, Arjuna, O king, made the hostile army tremble before him.

6. Ever firmly devoted to truth, Arjuna of white steeds, desirous of accomplishing his vow rushed furiously against that best of car-warriors viz Drona owning crimson steeds.

7. The preceptor Drona then pierced his disciple, that great bowman Arjuna, with twenty-five straight-flying arrows that penetrated to the very vitals of the latter.

8. Thereat that foremost of all wielders of weapons viz Vibhatsu quickly rushed against Drona shooting at the sametime arrows capable of checking the career of those shot by the latter.

9. Then Arjuna of generous soul discharging the Brahma weapon and with his Vallas of close knots, repulsed the Vallas so quickly shot at him by Drona.

10. Then we beheld the wonderful skill of the preceptor Drona in the art of fighting, in as much as Arjuna, though youthful in years and exerting his best, could not pierce him in retutn.

11. Then like a mighty mass of clouds pouring down incessant showers of rain, the Drona-cloud covered the Arjuna-mountain with his shower of arrows.

12. Invoking into existence the Brahma weapon, the puissant Arjuna, O Sire, received that shower of arrows, cutting of the arrows shot by his adversary with those of his own.

13. Then Drona afflicted him of the white steeds with five and twenty shafts; and with seventy swift-coursing shafts he pierced Vasudeva's son on the arms and on the chest.

14. The highly intelligent son of Pritha then smiling the while, checked the preceptor in battle who incessantly shooting sharp arrows, was looking like a sea having shafts or its waves.

15. Thus afflicted by Drona, those two foremost of car-warriors (Krishna and Arjuna) shunned him who then resembled the irresistibly raging conflagration that appears at the end of every Yuga.

16. Then avoiding the aim of the whetted shafts shot from Drona's bow, the diadem-decked son of Kunti fell to slaughter the division of the Vojas.

17. Shunning Drona who stood immovable like the Mainaka mountain, Arjuna then took his stand between Kritavarman and Sudakshina, the ruler of the Kamvojas.

18. Then that foremost of men, the undaunted ruler of the Bhojas quickly pierced the invincible hero, the formost of the descendants of Kuru (Arjuna), with ten arrows winged with Kanka feathers.

19. O king, Arjuna pierced him in battle with sharp shafts again with another three arrows he confounded the descendant of the Satwata race (Kritavarman).

20. Thereupon the king of the Bhojas smilingly pierced Pritha's son and Vasudeva of Madhus race, each with a group of twenty-five arrows.

21. Bursting open his bow, Arjuna pierced him with twenty-one arrows resembling tongues of blazing fire, or infuriate snakes of virulent poison.

22. Thereat, O Bharata, the mighty car-warrior Kritavarman taking up another bow quickly pierced Arjuna on the chest with five arrows.

23. Then again with another five whetted arrows the pierced Pritha's son deeply. Then Partha also with nine arrows struck him between the breasts.

24. Beholding the son of Kunti engaged with the mighty-warrior Kritavarman, the descendant of the Vrishni race (Krishna) thought that there was no time to waste.

25. Thereafter Krishna addressing Prithas's son said :—" Do not show any mercy to your kinsmen ; setting at naught you relationship with him, do you slay and crush him down."

26. Thereat Arjuna stupefying Kritavarman with his arrows, plunged into the ranks of the Khamvoja division, being borne by fleet steeds.

27. Beholding Arjuna owning white steeds enter into the Kamvoja division, the son of Hridika was inflamed with rage. Then stretching his bow with arrows fixed on the string, he came up on the two Panahala princes.

28. Then with his arrows, Kritavarman opposed the two Panchala princes who were following in the wake of Arjuna, for protecting the wheels of his car.

29. The ruler of the Bhojas Kritavarman then pierced them both with sharp arrows, striking Yudhamanyu with three and Uttamoujas with four.

30. They both in return pierced him each with ten shafts. Then again Yudhamanyu with three and Uttamoujas with another three arrows,

31. Cut off Kritavarman's bow and standard. Thereat furious with rage and taking up onother bow, the son of Hridika,

32. Deprived both those warriors of the use of their bow and shrouded them in a net-work of arrows. They both in a moment having strung another pair of bows, began to strike the king of the Bhojas.

33. Meanwhile Arjuna had gone into the array of the hostile troops. But his two wheel-protectors held in check by Kritavarman, obtained no admission

34. Into the divisions of the Dhartarastra army though those two foremost of men exerted to the best of their abilities. Meanwhile that one of white steeds began to afflict in that battle the army opposed to him, with great agility.

35. That slayer of foes then did not slay Kritavarman though he had an opportunity for doing so. Then beholding him thus advance, the valourous king Srutayusha,

36. Burning with rage and twanging his great bow, rushed furiously on him. He then pierced Partha with three, and Janarddana with seventy shafts,

37. And again with a sharp razor-headed arrow, he struck the standard of Pritha's son. Then with a group of ninety shafts of depressed knots Arjuna,

38. Inflamed with rage, pierced him like a Mahuta piercing a huge elephant with the hook. But, O king, he (Srutayudha), did not tolerate that display of prowers by the son of Pandu.

39. And with a group of seven and seventy Nacharas he struck his adversary. Thereat cuttiug of Sutrayusha's bow and shafts Arjuna,

40. Inflamed with rage, struck him on the breast with seven arrows of depressed knots. Thereupon that king overwhelmed with rage and taking up another bow,

41—42. Pierced the son of Vasava on the arms and the breast with nine long arrows. Then O Bharata, that subdrue of foes viz. Arjuna afflicted Srutayusha with many thousand, of arrows, smiling all the while; and that mighty car-warrior soon killed the latter's horses and charioteer;

43. And that highly puissant hero also pierced him with seventy Narachas. There upon leaving his chariot of which the steeds were slain, king Srutayusha,

44. Endued with great energy rushed against Prithas's son, heaving his huge mace over his head. The heroic king Srutayusha was the son of Varuna,

45. Having for his mother the mighty river of cool waters called Parnasa. O king, her mother, for the benefit of her son, had thus spoken to Varuna saying :—

46. " Let this son of mine be unslayable in battle by his enemies on earth." Then Varuna gratified with her, had said— " I accord him the boon that will be highly beneficial to him,

47. I give to your son a celestial weapon by virtue of which he will be unslayable. Men could never obtain immortality on earth.

48. O foremost of rivers, every one who has taken his birth on the face of the earth must inevitably fall a prey to death. This son of yours, however, will ever be invincible by his foes in battle,

49. By virtue of this weapon ; so let the fever corroding your heart be dismissed." Having thus spoken, Varuna gave him a mace with all necessary aphorisms,

50. Obtaining which Srutayusha became invincible in all the worlds. The illustrious lord of waters however again addresed him saying :—

51. This mace, O son, should not be directed against one who is not fighting, in which case it will fall back upon yourself ; on such occasion, coursing in an opposite direction it will kill him who has hurled it.'.

52. But when the time for using it came, Srutayusha did not pay any heed to that injuction of Varuna, and with that mace capable of crushing heroes, he began to strike Janarddana.

53. The highly puissant Krishna received those strokes on his broad and well-developed shoulders ; and that mace could not cause Souri to tremble even as a tempest can not shake a mountain.

54. Like some ill-accomplished feat of conjuration injuring the conjurer the mace turning to Srutayusha, smote that heroic and enraged monarch stationed in his car.

55. And slaying that brave warrior it fell down on the ground. Struyusha being slain,

56. The troops began to utter loud wails of woe, for indeed they had seen that subduer of foes Srutayusha slain by his own weapon.

57. As Srutayusha O ruler of men had hurled the mace at Krishna who was not engaged in the battle, it slew him who had hurled it.

58. So Srutayusha fell on the field even in the manner indicated by the words of Varuna, and he fell down deprived of life before the eyes of all the bowmen present.

59. When falling, that dear-loved son of Parnasa appeared beautiful like a mighty tree of many branches uprooted by the tempest.

60. Then beholding that subduer of foes slain all the troops and their leading warriors began to fly away in all directions.

61. Thereafter the heroic Sudakshina the son of the Kamvoja king rushed against that slayer of foes viz., Phalguna, being borne by fleet steeds.

62. At him, O Bharata, Pritha's son shot seven arrows, which penetrating through that hero, entred the surface of the earth.

63. Pierced deep by those sharp arrows shot from the Gandiva bow, he in return pierced Arjuna in battle with ten shafts furnished with the feathers of the Kanka bird.

64. He once more pierced Vesudeva's son with three and Partha with five arrows, then O Sire, Pritha's son bursting open his bow, cut down his stan,'ard ;

65. And the son of Pandu pierced him with a couple of vallas of exceeding sharpness. He also having pressed Pritha's son with three such arrows uttered a fierce yell.

66. Thereafter the brave Sudakshina inflamed with rage hurled at the wielder of the Gandiva bow, a lance, dreadful, tied with bells and made wholly of iron.

67. Having reached that mighty car-warrior Arjuna, that lance blazing like a mighty meteor and emitting scintillations of fire, penetrated through him and then fell down on the ground.

68. Pierced deep with that lance, Arjuna was overwhelmed with a swoon. Then in an instant, that highly puissant hero recovering soon enough began to lick the corners of his mouth.

69. Then Partha of inconcievable prowess pierced Sudkshina and his steeds standards, bow and charioteer with ten narachas furnished with the feathers of the Kanka bird.

70—71. And with innumerable other arrows he rendered the latter's chariot useless and cut it to peices. The son of Pandu then with an arrow of exceeding sharpness pierced on the chest Sudakshina the Kamvoja ruler whose purpose and prowess had both even baffled. Then with his armour shattered, trembling in all his limbs, with his crown and Angadas falling off, 72—73. That hero fell with head downwards like a flagstaff loosened from the socket. Like a charming Karnikara tree in the spring growing gracefully on the top of a hill, with beautiful branches, lying on the groved when uprooted by the tempest, the prince of the Kamvojas lay on the bare ground deprived of life, though accustomed to sleep on the most precious bed.

74—75. Adorned with precious ornaments, graceful, possessing eyes of coppery hue, wearing round the head a tiara of gold radiant like the flames of fire, the mighty armed Sudakshina, the prince of the Kamvojas, felled by Partha with his arrows, and lying dead on the ground, appeared beautiful like a charming hill with a flat summit. Then beholding Srutayusha and the prince of the Kamvojas slain in battle, all the soldiers of your son's army began to fly in all directions.

Thus ends the ninety-second chapter, the slaughter of Srutayusha and Sudakshina in the Jayadhatha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XCIII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When king Sudakshina and the heroic Srutayusha had been slain, your warriors inflamed with wrath, furiously rushed against the son of Pritha.

2. The Abhisahas, the Surasenas, the Sinis, and the Vasatis, O king, then began to pour upon Dhananjaya a veritable shower of arrows.

3. The son of Pandu consumed sixty thousands of these and other warriors, with his arrows; and then the rest greatly frightened, began to fly away like smaller animals flying away from the tiger.

4. But soon turning back, they surrounded Partha on all sides, who was slaying his foes in battle, and trying to obtain victory over them.

5. Then as they made quickly towards himself, Dhananjaya, with arrows shot from his Gandiva bow, began to cut down their heads and arms.

6. The field of battle was thickly strewn over with felled heads; and flights of vultures and crows and ravens formed its cloudy canopy.

7. Beholding their troops thus extirpated by Arjuna, Srutayush and Achyutayush, excited with rage and fury, began to fight vigorously with the former.

8. Those two heroes endued with prowess, pride and strength of arms, and both born in noble families, began to scatter their arrows right and left,

9. With great agility, O mighty monarch, desirous of winning great fame and slaying Arjuna and doing good to your son.

10. Inflamed with rage, they covered Arjuna with a thousand winged shafts of depressed knots, like clouds filling a lake with torrents of rain.

11. Thereafter that foremost of car-warriors Srutayush excited with wrath, struck Dhananjaya with a well-tempered and well-sharpened lance.

12. Thus sorely wounded by his powerful adversary, that subduer of his foes viz., Arjuna was overwhelmed with a swoon, confounding thereby Kesava himself.

13. At this crisis that mighty car-warrior Achyutayush struck the son of Pandu with a trident of exceeding sharpness.

14. Thus he seemed to pour acid upon the wounds of the illustrious son of Pandu; thus deeply pierced, Pritha's son caught hold of his flag-staff for supporting himself.

15. Thereupon, O ruler of men, a loud and deafening roar was uttered by all your troops, for they considered Dhananjaya to be slain.

16. Then seeing Partha losing consciousness, Krishna was very much distressed; and then he began to comfort Dhananjaya with words soothing and agreeable.

17—18. Then those foremost of car-warriors, Srutayush and Achyutayush of true aim, scattering their showers of arrows on all sides in that battle, made Dhananjaya and the son Vasudeva of the Vrishni race and their car, car-wheels, Kuvaras, steeds, flag-staff and banner, disappear from the view. All this indeed seemed wonderful.

19. Then, O Bharata, recovering slowly, like one coming back from a visit to the regions of Death, Vibhatsu,

20. Saw his chariot and Kesava shrouded with a net-work of arrows; then beholding his two opponents standing before him like two blazing fires,

21. The mighty car-warrior Partha invoked into existence the terrible Sakra-weapon. From that weapon issued out thousands of arrows.

22. Those arrows then struck those two fierce bowmen Srutayush and Achyutayush; and the arrows shot by these latter, being cut off by those of Partha, began to drop down through the sky.

23. Then Pandu's son checking the force of all arrows directed towards him with that of his own shafts, began to run hither and thither over the field encountering mighty car-warriors.

24. Then those two heroes deprived of their arms and heads, by the arrows of Arjuna, fell down on the earth like mighty trees broken down by the wind.

25. The slaughter of Srutayush and Achyutayush caused a surprise like to what men would feel if the ocean be dried up.

26. Then, having slain fifty car-warriors, the followers of those two princes, Pritha's son plunged into the army of the Bharatas, crushing down numerous elephants and warriors (at each step).

27. Beholding Srutayush slain, O Bharata, the enraged Niyutayush and Dirghayush,

28. The sons of the former two heroes both foremost of men, assaulted the son of Kunti, afflicted with calamity that had befallen their sires, they proceeded, scattering arrows of diverse description.

29. But Arjuna now excited to the highest pitch of fury, with his arrows of depressed knots, sent them instantly to the abode of Death.

30. Then the foremost Kshatriyas of your army were not able to oppose Pritha's son who had been agitating the troops like an elephant agitating a lake over-grown with lotuses.

31. Then thousands of well-trained elephant riders belonging to the divisons of the Angas, excited with rage, O king, surrounded the son of Pandu, with their elephant forces.

32. Commanded by Duryodhana, the Easterners, the Southerners and other kings hearded by the ruler of the Kalingas, surrounded Arjuna with their elephants huge as hills.

33. But with the arrows shot from his Gandiva bow, Arjuna quickly cut off their heads and arms decked with ornaments, as they were rushing against him.

34. Strewn over with their heads, and arms decked with Angadas, the Earth appeard as if covered with golden stones and numerous snakes.

35. Arms severed by means of arrows and heads lying crushed, appeared like birds shot down from the top trees.

36. Pierced with thousands of shafts and covered with profuse blood, elephants looked like mountains during the rainy season, with red-chalk solution streaming down their sides.

37. Others slain by the whetted arrows of Vibhatsu, lay prostrate on the field of battle. Numerous Mlechas, riding on the backs of elephants, of ugly appearnces,

38. Attired in various kinds of garments and, O king, armed with numerous weapons and weltering in blood, appeared beautiful, as they lay on the ground deprived of life by means of various kinds of shafts.

39. Thousands of elephants with their bodies mangled, and their riders and those who followed them, having been struck with the arrows of Pritha's son, vomitted blood,

40. Or uttered yells of agony, or fell down, or careered wildly in all directions. Nnmerous other elephants greatly frightened, crushed their own ranks.

41—43. Many other elephants armed with weapons and fierce like snakes of virulent poison, also did the same. Numerous furious Yavanas, Paradas, Sakas Valhikas and Mlechas born of the cow (of Vasistha), possessed of fearful eyes, accomplished in smitting, looking like emissaries of Death, all versed in the use of illusive powers of the Asuras, and many other Dravatisaras, Daradas, Pundras, thousands in number, in bands of hundreds and thousands and together forming a force that was innumerable,

44. Began to pour on the son of Pandu their sharp arrows. Those Mlechas also versed in all modes of war, began to shower on Arjuna their countless shafts.

45. Dhananjaya also poured his arrows on them in quick succession; and the arrows discharged from the Gandiva bow appeared like flights of locusts, as they flew through the air.

46—47. Having with his arrows created shade of over the troops like to that of the clouds, Dhananjaya slew, by the dint of his weapons, all the Mlechas having heads completely shaved or partially shaved or covered with matted hair,. filthy in their mode of living, and of malicious countenances. Pierced with hundreds of shafts, those rangers of the mountains,

48—50. Those dwellers of caves, began to fly away from the field of battle out of sheer fear. Ravens Kankas, birds and wolves, with great delight, then began to drink the blood of the elephants, horses and their Mlecha riders, as they lay postrate on the field being cut down by the sharp arrows of Pritha's son. Arjuna then caused a river to flow on the field of battle, of which (slain) foot-soldiers, car-warriors, horses and elephants formed the embankments; shower of shafts formed the rafts (wherewith to cross it); hair of (slain) combatants formed the moss and the weed floating on the surface; and blood formed its surging billows; and that river was dreadful and fierce to look at.

51. The fingers cut off from the arms of warriors constituted its smaller fishes; it was as dreadful as the Destroyer himself at the end of a Yuga; the bodies of (slain) elephants chocked its flow, and that river of blood proceeded towards the kingdom of Yama.

52. The Earth was deluged with the blood flowing from the bodies of slain princes, elephants, horses, car-warriors and horsemen, and its uplands and lowlands could not be distinguished, as if Vasava had poured a torrent of rain over it. Six thousand brave warriors,

53—54. And many other Kshatriyas were despatched by that foremost of Kshatriyas to the abode of Death. Thousands of elephants equipped according to rule, being pierced with numerous arrows,

55. Lay prostrate on the field like so many mountains struck down by the thunder bolt. Then Arjuna careered over the field slaying horses, car-warriors and elephants,

56—58. Like an elephant in rut crushing a forest of reeds. Just as fire helped forwarded by the wind, burns down a forest abounding in trees, creepers, brush-woods, dry fuels, and grass, so, that fire viz, the enraged Dhananjaya, the son of Pandu, having arrows for his flames, and helped forward by the Krishna-wind, consumed the forest constituted by your troops. Emptying the terraces of the cars, Arjuna over-spread the Earth with the corpses of men.

59. In that confused encounter Dhananjaya seemed to dance weilding his bow in his hand. Deluging the ground with blood drawn by means of shafts resembling the thunder bolt itself,

60. Dhananjaya, inflamed with wrath, plunged deep into the ranks of the Bharata troops. When he was thus advancing, Srutayudha the ruler of the Amvastha's then opposed him.

61. Thereupon, O sire, when he was thus exerting himself against Arjuna, the latter with sharp arrows furnished with wings made of kanka feathers, speedily cut down his horses.

62. Then with other arrows cutting off his bow, Arjuna began to career over the field. Thereat the ruler of the Amvasthas, with eyes rolling in rage, took up his mace,

63. And assaulted in that battle Pritha's son and also the mighty car-warrior Kesava. Then O Bharata that hero, uplifting and striking with his mace.

64. Checked the progress of Arjuna's car, and with it began to strike Kesava ; beholding Kesava struck with the mace, that slayer of hostile heroes,

65—67. Arjuna, O Bharata, excited to the highest pitch of anger, showered over that foremost of car-warriors viz the ruler of the Amvasthas wielding the mace, numerous shafts furnished with golden wings, like the mass of clouds enshrouding the risen sun. Thereafter with other arrows, Pritha's son splintered into pieces the mace of that illustrious warrior ; indeed this feat appeared to be marvellous. Then beholding that mace of his cut down, and taking up another heavy one,

68—69. The ruler of the Amvasthas began to strike Vasudeva's son and Arjuna, incessantly. Thereat Arjuna with a couple of razor-headed arrows cut off his upraised arms wielding the mace, that resembled the pole of Indra ; and then with another winged shaft he cut off his head. Then that king, O monarch, fell down on the Earth creating a loud noise,

70. Like a standard raised in honor of Indra falling down, when the ropes tying it to the engine (on which it is posted) are cut off. Then plunging deep into the division of cars, and surrounded by hundreds upon hundreds of elephants and steeds, the son of Pritha looked like the sun covered with thick masses of clouds.

Thus ends the ninety-third Chapter, the slaughter of the Amvastha king and others, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XCIV.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA) —Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When the son of Kunti, out of a desire for slaying the king of the Sindhus, had penetrated into the Bharata army, after having pierced through the invincible division of Drona and the Bhoja king,

2. When also, O king, the heir of the king of the Kambhojas, namely prince Sudakshina, also the powerful Srutayudha, had been slain by Savyasachin,

3. When the divisions of your army had been broken and routed in all directions, your son seeing his troops shattered, speedily proceeded towards Drona.

4. Hastily riding on a single car, he repaired to Drona and addressing him said :—"That foremost of men Arjuna has already passed through this mighty army, having crushed it completely ;

5. Now decide with the help of your understanding, what should be done next, for bringing about the slaughter of Arjuna, taking into consideration this fearful carnage.

6. Do you so arrange that, that foremost of men may not slay Jayadratha. May good betide you. You are our sole protector.

7. Like a raging fire consuming a heap of dry grass and fuel, this Dhananjaya-fire urged on by the wind of his anger, is consuming the grass and fuel formed by my troops.

8. O afflicter of your foes, being informed that the son of Kunti had passed through this division having pierced through it, the warriors entrusted with the protection of Jayadratha, are being preyed upon by anxiety.

9. O you foremost of those conversant with the Brahma, it was a firm conviction with the kings that Dhananjaya would never be able to secape Drona alive.

10. O you of burning splendour, when Pritha's son has succeeded in penetrating through your division before your very eyes, I consider all my troops to be involved in a great catastrophy. Indeed, I think I have no troops.

11. I know you, O illustrious one, to be attached to the interests of the Pandavas ; therefore, O Brahmana, I am losing my sense in the thought what should be done by me next.

12. To the best of my prowess, O Brahmana, I try to behave well with you. I also, exert to the best of my capabilities for satisfying you ; still you do not seem to attach any value to all these.

13. O you of prowess infinite, although we are ever devoted to you, you do not wish us well ; but you are ever satisfied with the Pandavas who are intent on injuring ourselves.

14. Though you live upon our bread, yet you are instrumental in injuring us. I knew not before that, you are but a razor soaked in honey.

15. If you had not given me assurances of vanquishing the Pandavas, I would never have prevented the ruler of the Sindhus from returning to his own dominions.

16. Fool that I am, hoping to obtain protection from you, I gave assurances of safety to the king of the Sindhus ; now I see that I have virtually offered him as a victim to Death.

17. It is possible for a man to escape even when he goes inside the jaws of Death, but there is not the slightest chance of escape for Jayadratha, when he once comes within the reach of Partha in battle.

18. O you owning crimson steeds, do you so manage that the ruler of the Sindhus may yet be saved. Be not angry with me for all these raving of mine afflicted as I am with grief. Oh ! save, save the ruler of the Sindhus !

Drona said :—

19. I do not take your words in ill-part ; you are to me like Ashwathaman himself, I tell you this for sooth. O ruler of men, do you now act up to my advices.

20. Krishna is the best of all drivers of chariots, and his horses are the fleetest and the best of the species. Creating a small breach only, Dhananjaya can pass very quickly through it.

21. Can you not see the innumerable arrows shot by the diadem-decked Arjuna with his Gandiva bow, are falling full two miles behind his car as he is advancing ?

22. Grown up in years, I can not indeed proceed so hastily. Moreover, there ! do you see the whole army of the Parthas assailing our van.

23. Yudhisthira also should be captured by myself, before the eyes of all bowmen. Even this, O mighty armed one, has been the vow undertaken by me amidst all Kshatriya warriors.

24. Abandoned by Dhananjaya, O king he now stands at the head of his divisions. For these reasons I shall not fight ...n Phalguna, leaving the van of our array uncared for.

25. Duly supported, do you go yourself and fight with your unsupported foe who is equal to you in nobility of birth and in the achievement of feats. Be not afraid ! You are the lord of this world.

26. You are a sovereign, a hero, possessed of fame, and skilful in defeating (your opponents). O valorous subjugator of hostile fortresses, hie yourself, therefore to that part of the field where Dhananjaya is.

Duryodhana said :—

27. O preceptor, how is it possible for me to hold in check that Dhananjaya who has passed even yourself, the foremost of all wielders of weapons ?

28. It may be possible for me to conquer in battle Purandara armed with his thunder-bolt, but it is not possible for me to conquer Arjuna that subjugater of hostile towns.

29. He by whom the son of Hridika, the ruler of the Bhojas and yourself equal to a god, have all been vanquished with the showers of his weapons, he by whom Srutayush has been slain,

30. He by whom Sudakshina and king Srutayudha have been slain, as also Srutayush and Achyutayush and myriads of Mlechas also have been slain,

31. How can I encounter that invincible son of Pandu, accomplished in the use of all kinds of weapons and resembling the all-destroying fire itself ;

32. How it is that you to-day think me competent to fight with him ? I am entirely dependent on you and am your slave ; Oh ! save my honor !

Drona said :—

33. O foremost descendant of the Kuru race, you speak all that is true. Really Dhananjaya is incapable of suffering defeat. But I myself will so act by which you will be able to bear him.

34. Let all wielders of bow inhabiting this world, behold to-day the marvellous fact, of the son of Kunti being held in check by you, even before Vasudeva himself.

35. This golden coat of mail of yours, O king, I shall so tie on you that all weapons discharged by human hands will not be able to pierce you in battle.

36. Even if the three worlds, with the Asuras, the celestials, the Yakshas, the Rep-ties, and the Rakshasas, together with all human beings, fight with you to-day, still you need entertain no fear.

37. Neither Krishna, nor the son of Kunti, nor any other wielder of weapons, will be able to pierce your armour in battle with his arrows.

38. So, cased in this golden armour, do you hastily advance upon the wrathful Arjuna, yourself; he shall not be able to bea you in battle to-day.

Sanjaya said :—

39. Having thus spoken, Drona quickly rinced his mouth with water and then bound that lustrous armour on Duryodhana, having duly reiterated most marvellous incantations.

40. In that dreadful battle, that foremost of persons conversant with the knowledge of the Vedas, was desirous of bestowing victory on your son and of exciting the wonder of the worlds with his excellent learning.

Drona said :—

41. May all the Vedas, the Brahmanas and Brahman himself, and the Reptiles and other beings of superior order bless you, O Bharata !

42. May Yayati, Nahusa, Dhundhumara and Bhagiratha and other royal sages bless you in all acts !

43. May you obtain blessings from creatures having one leg only and creatures having many also ! May you also get blessings from those who have no legs at all !

44. May Swaha, and Swadha and Sachi all bless you always ! O sinless one, may Lakshmi and Arundhati also pronounce benedictions on you !

45. May Asita, Devala, Vishwamitra, Angiras, Vasistha, and Kasyapa, O monarch, bless you !

46. May Dhatri, and Vidhatri, the quarters of heaven and their regents and the six-headed Kartikeya do all that is beneficial to you !

47. May the illustrious Vivaswat bless you to-day ! May the four elephants guarding the cardinal points, the earth, the firmanent, the planets,

48. And he who is underneath this earth, and O king, who ever upholds her, viz., Sesha, that foremost of snakes—may all these do what is beneficial to you !

49. O Son of Gandhari, in days gone by, the Asura named Vritra, exerting his might in battle, had defeated the foremost of celestials in battle.

50. All those dwellers of heaven then with Indra at their head, destitute of their energy and prowess, sought refuge with Brahman being highly afraid of the mighty Asura Vritra.

The celestials said :—

51. "O foremost of the celestials, O best of the gods, be you the protector of the gods now, crushed as they are by the Asura Vritra. Save us from this our great fear."

Drona continued :—

52. Thereupon Brahman addressing Vishnu standing by his side, as also the other foremost of celestials headed by Indra, spoke to them that were are depressed, these words, all perfectly true.

53. "The celestials with Indra at their head, as also the regenerate order are ever deserving of my protection. But the energy of Tashtri from which Vritra has been created is indeed irrepressible.

54. In days gon by, observing ascetic austerities for millions of years, Tashtri created, O Gods, Vritra, having obtained permission therto from Mahadeva.

55. Hence that mighty energy of ours has succeeded in vanquishing you through the grace of that god. Without repairing to the place where Sankara stays, you can not expect to obtain a sight of him.

56. After you have seen that god, you will be able to conquer Vritra. Therefore, his yoursleves to the Mandara mountain; there dwells that origin of ascetic austerities, that destroyer of Daksha's sacrifice,

57. That wielder of the Pinaka, that lord of all creatures, that slayer of the Asura that Bhaganetra. Thereuqon all those celestials accompanied by Brahma, proceeded to the Mandara mountain,

58. And there, beheld that heap of energy, who resembled in radiance a million of suns. (Seeing the gods come) Mahadeva said :—'All hail O god ! Speak what am I to do for you !

59. A sight of my self cannot be barren. So let the fruition of your desires proceed from this !" Thus spoken to, all those denizens of heaven replied to him saying :—

60. "All our energy has been robbed by Vritra. Be you the protector of us the dwellers of heaven. O God, look upon our bodies mangled and mutilated with the wounds inflicted by the Asura. We seek protection from you; O God of gods, be you our refuge."

Sarva said :—

61. "O Gods, it is well-known to all of you, how this Asura, surcharged with strength, dreadful, and incapable of being held in check by persons devoid of ascetic merit, came into being, created by the energy of Tashtri.

62. Surely it is my duty to protect the denizens of heaven. O Sakra, take this radiant coat of mail off my body; and O lord of the gods, don it, reiterating these Mantras.

Drona continued:—

63. Having thus spoken, that giver of boons, gave that armour and the necessary Mantras to Indra. Clad in that coat of mail Indra then assaulted the army of Vritra.

64. Although then in that dreadful battle myriads of weapons of diverse description were hurled at him, yet they could not slacken or pierce through the joints, of that armour.

65. Then the Lord of the celestials slew Vritra in battle and gave afterwards that armour of which the joints were composed of Mantras, unto Angiras.

66. Angiras again gave those Mantras to Vrihaspati his son conversant with all Mantras. Vrihaspati next imparted them to the intelligent Agnivesya.

67. Agnivesya gave them to me; and now with the help of those Mantras I have bound up this armour on you, O foremost of the kings, in order to guard your body from all weapon-wounds.

Sanjaya said:—

68. Having thus spoken, Drona that foremost of all preceptors, once more addressed your son endued with great effulgence, thus:—

69. "O ruler of men, I don this armour on your body joining its parts by means of Brahma-threads. Even thus did Brahman springing from the golden lotus, put it on Vishnu.

70. I don it on you, even in the same manner in which Brahman himself had put this armour of celestial make on Indra, during the battle caused by the abduction of Taraka."

71. Thus having tied that armour on Duryodhana with due Mantras, the regenerate Drona despatched the king to the mighty encounter.

72. Then the mighty-armed king, accoutered by the illustrious preceptor, supported by a thousand car-warriors of the Trigartta country, all accomplished in smiting down,

73. As also by a thousand infuriate elephants endued with great might and a hundred thousand horses and numerous other mighty--carwarrior,

74. Advanced against the chariot of Arjuna. He then proceeded accompanied by the sounds of various kinds of musical instruments, even like the son of Virochana (in the days of yore).

75. Thereupon O Bharata, a loud uproar was created by your troops as they beheld the illustrious Kuru king advance like the fathomless deep itself.

Thus ends the ninety-fourth Chapter, the donning of the armour on Duryodhana by Drona, in the Jayadratha-bodha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XCV.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said:

1. When that foremost of men viz king Duryodhana had started from behind, following Pritha's son and him of the Vrishni-race, both of whom, O monarch, had penetrated into the Kourava ranks,

2. The Pandavas supported by the Somakas furiously assaulted Drona, creating a loud din. Thereupon a fearful battle commenced between them and Drona's troops.

3. The battle then that commenced between the Kurus and the Pandavas at the van of their array was terrible, awful, and capable of making the hair to stand erect; and it was wonderful to the extreme.

4. O king, that battle that raged when the sun shone on the meridian, was such that we had neither seen nor heard of its like, ever before.

5. The troops of the sons of Pritha commanded by Dhristadyumna, all accomplished in smiting and arranged in proper order, covered the division of Drona with arrowy showers.

6. We also placing that foremost of all wielders of bow namely Drona, at our head, began to pour our showers of arrows on the Parthas headed by the son of Prisata.

7. The vanguards of the two hosts, teeming with cars and appearing charming, then looked like two masses of clounds in the summer sky, rushing towards each other, being driven by opposite winds.

8. Clashing against each other, the two armies put forth their exertions, like the rivers Ganga and Yamuna swelling with water during the rainy season.

9. Having various kinds of weapons for the wind that preceeded them, abounding in elephants, horses and chariots, sur charged with the lightning formed by the flashing of maces wielded by warriors, the fierce and thick mass of cloud constituted by the army of the Kurus,

10. Driven forward by the tempest constituted by Drona, and incessantly pouring its arrowy showers, tried to extinguish the raging fire constituted by the Pandavas.

11. Then that foremost of regenerate heroes, namely Drona,agitated the Pandava hosts like a raging tempest in the summer, agitating the mighty main.

12. They also, putting forth all their endeavours, awaited Drona himself, like a strong current of water striking against an embankment with a view of carry it away.

13. Then like unto a mountain checking the progress of torrents of water, in that battle, Drona held in check the enraged Pandavas, Panchalas and Kekayas.

14. Other kings also endued with great might and heroism began to oppose the Panchalas, having surrounded them on all sides.

15. Thereafter in that battle, that foremost of men, viz., Prisata's son, supported by the Pandavas, repeatedly assailed Drona desirous of breaking through his division.

16. Indeed, as Drona poured his arrowy showers on the son of Prisata, so also, did this latter pour his own on the son of Bharadwaja.

17. Then the Dhristadyumna-cloud having rapiers and swords for the winds that preceeded it, well-furnished with darts, lances and scimitar,having the bowstring for its flashes of lightning, and the twang of the bow for its rumbling,

18. Poured, on all directions, torrents of weapons, for its showers of stones, slaying large bodies of car-warriors, best steeds &c.; he seemed to deluge the earth with currents of blood, created by means of his weapon.

19. Then with his arrows Prisata's son turned Drona away from all those breaches in the ranks of the car-warriors of the Pandavas, through which the latter tried to pass, striking the men there with his arrows.

20. Then O Bharata, the division of Drona, although he exerted to the best of his might, became divided in three parts, having encountered Dhrishtadyumna in battle.

21. One of these divisions retraced their steps towards Kritavarman the ruler of the Bhojas, the other towards Jalasandha, and the other slaughtered by the Pandavas fell back upon Drona himself.

22. Then, as many times did that foremost of car-warriors, Drona rally his troops, so many times did that mighty car-warrior Dhrishtadyumna break and route them.

23. Then like herds of cattle distitute of herdsmen slain by the beasts of prey, the troops of the Kurus divided in three divisions, began to be slaughtered by the Pandavas and the Srinjayas.

24. People then thought that in that terrible battle Death himself devoured up warriors stupefied by the mighty Dhrishtadyumna.

25. Just as the dominions of a wicked monarch are devasted by famine, pestilence and marauders, so were your own troops slaughtered and destroyed by the Pandavas.

26. Our eyes were then dazzled and blinded by the weapons and armours on which the sun's rays were reflected, as also by the dust raised by the troops.

27. Then when his troops had been devided in three bodies and when they were being slaughtered by the Pandavas, Drona inflamed with fury, began to consume the Panchalas with his arrows.

28. Then as Drona, crushed and slew the hostile host with his arrows, his appearance looked like that of the blazing fire that appears at the time of the universal Dissolution.

29. That mighty car-warrior, O king, then in that battle, began to pierce car-warriors, elephants, and steeds and foot-soldiers each with a single arrow only.

30. There was none, O Bharata, in the host of the Pandavas who could bear the arrows in that battle, shot, O lord, from the bow of Drona.

31. Scorched by the rays of the sun and felled by the arrows of Drona, the army of the Pandavas, O Bharata, began to reel about on the field.

32. So also your troops afflicted by the arrows of Parsata, appeared to blaze up at every place, like a dry forest on fire.

33. When the troops were thus being slaughtered by the arrows of Drona and Prisata's son, all warriors, heedless of their lives, fought on putting forth all their best energies.

34. O foremost of the Bharatas, then there was none among your or the enemy's host, who, O mighty monarch, forsook the fight out of fear.

35. His brothers, Vivinsati Chitrasena and the mighty car-warrior Vikarna, opposed Kunti's son Bhimasena in the battle.

36. The two princes from Avanti, viz., Vinda and Anuvinda and the highly puissant Kshemadhurti were the followers of your three sons.

37. That mighty car-warrior, the king of the Valhikas, endued with strength and nobility of birth, assisted by his troops and ministers, began to hold in check the sons of Droupadi.

38. Saivya, the king of the Govasanas supported by a thousand excellent warriors, faced the son of the Kasi king and began to oppose that valourous prince).

39. King Salya the ruler of the Madras began to resist king Aja'satru Yudhisthira that son of Kunti, who resembled a blazing fire.

40. The vindictive Dussasana inflamed with rage and inspired with courage and heading his own troops, advanced upon that foremost of car-warriors viz Satyaki.

41. Myself cased in mail, furnished with arms and supported by my troops, numbering four hundred picked bowmen strong, resisted Chekitana himself.

42. Sakuni accompanied by seven hundred Gandhara warriors armed with lances darts and bows, began to oppose the son of Madri.

43. The two princes Vinda and Anuvinda, both fierce bowmen, for the sake of their friend Duryodhana, rushed upon Virata the rulers of the Matsyas, heedless of their lives and holding their weapons over head.

44. Exerting his best, Valhika resisted the invincible and puissant Sikhandin the son of Yajnasena, capable resisting all foes.

45. The prince of Abanti supported by the Souviras and the ruthless Pravadrakas opposed Dhristadyumna the panchala prince whose very appearance reflected wrath.

46. Alayudha quickly rushed upon that valorous Rakshasa Ghototkacha of fierce deeds who was proceeding to battle with fury.

47. The mighty car-warrior Kuntibhoja, supported by large ~~division~~ of troops resisted that wrathful Alamvusha that best of the Rakshasas.

48. Thus in that battle thousands of single combats were fought, O Bharata; and then the ruler of the Sindus was stationed behind all the troops, and he was there protected by Kripa and other such car-warriors and bowmen.

49. O King, then the son of Drona on the right and the son of Suta on the left, these, two great warriors were engaged in protecting the car-wheels of the ruler of the Sindhus.

50. A number of other warriors headed by Somadattas' son, viz., Kripa, Vrishasena, Sala and the invincible Salya were engaged in protecting his rear.

51. Thus many warriors accomplished in the art of fighting and conversant with the rules of policy, having arranged for the saety of the Sindhu king, went on fighting with the Pandavas.

Thus ends the ninety-fifth chapter, the fierce fight, in the Jayadratha badha of the Drona Purva.

CHAPTER XCVI.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)
—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Hear from me, O king, as I relate to you, the description of the wonderful fight that then took place between the Kurus and the Pandavas,

2. Then the Parthas desirous of breaking through the Kuru array fought vigorously with Bharadwaja's son Drona, having encountered him at the head of his array.

3. Drona also, desirous of wrining great fame, fought on with the Parthas, protecting his array and helped, in the encounter, by his own troops.

4. Then the two Avanti princes Vinda and Anuvinda, those well-wishers of your son, inflamed with rage, pierced Virata with ten sharp arrows,

5. Virata also, O mighty monarch, encountering in battle these two puissant heroes together with their followers, fought on cheerfully.

6. A cruel and sanguinary combat raged between them, like that between a lion and a pair of elephants in rut, in a forest.

7. The highly powerful son of Yajnasena pierced with force, Valhika, with dreadful and sharp arrows capable of penetrating to the very vitals and the bones.

8. Thereupon Valhika also inflamed with rage, deeply struck Yajnasena's son with nine shafts of depressed knot, whetted on stone and furnished with golden wings.

9. Then that battle raged furiously in which arrows, lances and darts were freely used and that inspired terror into the hearts of the cowards and delight into those of the heroes.

10. Then with the arrows discharged by them, the welkin and the quarters became completely shrouded, and nothing could be distinguished.

11. Saivya the ruler of the Govasanas, with his troops, fought with that mighty car-warrior the son of Kasyapa, even as an elephant fights with its rival.

12. Then the king of the Valhikas excited with wrath, fought with the mighty car-warriors, the sons of Droupadi; and then he shone like the soul fighting with five senses.

13. Those five princes, O foremost of embodied beings, fought with him discharging their numerous arrows, like the sense-objects ever fighting with the body.

14. Your son Dussasana struck in that battle Satyaki of the Vrishni race with nine sharp shafts of depressed knots;

15. Thereupon Satyaki of invincible prowess, being thus deeply pierced by that mighty and fierce bowman, was soon partially deprived of his senses.

16. Then regaining his composure, he of the Vrishni race, pierced that mighty car-warrior viz your son, with ten shafts furnished with wings of the Kanka feather.

17. Then those heroes piercing each other deeply, and each afflicted with the shafts of the other, shone, O king, like two blossoming Kinsuka trees.

18. Afflicted with the arrows of Kuntivoja, Alamvusha inflamed with wrath, appeared beautiful like a Kinsuka tree rich with the wealth of its flowers.

19. Then that Rakshasa, having pierced Kuntivoja with numerous swift, coursing arrows, uttered a terrible war-cry, standing in the van of your troops.

20. Then all the troops beheld these heroes each fighting with the other, appear like Sakra and Jamva fighting in the days of yore.

21. The twin sons of Madri, Nakula and Sahadeva, inflamed with rage, O Bhrata mangled Sakuni with their shafts,in as much as the latter was their implacable enemy.

22. O mighty monarch, the carnage that then spread there was dreadful. Kindled by you, fanned into flames by Karna,

23. And kept up by your sons, the fire of wrath of the Pandavas, O king, was then in full blaze in order to consume the whole world.

24. Sakuni was then compelled to turn his face away from the field, by the arrows shot by the sons of Pandu; and unable to fight any longer, he knew not what to do.

25. Seeing him turn away from the field, those two mighty car-warriors, the sons of Madri, again poured on him their arrowy showers, like two clouds drenching a mighty hill with showers of rain.

26. The son of Suvala, struck with numerous arrows of close knots, flew towards the division of Drona, being borne away by fleetest steeds.

27. Then with medium impetuousity that hero, Ghatotkacha rushed upon the Rakshasa Alayudha, in that battle.

28. The battle between them was very wonderful, like that which took place between Rama and Ravana in the days of yore.

29. King Yudhisthira having at first pierced the king of the Madras with five hundred arrows, again pierced him with seven.

30. O king, the battle that was then fought between them, was indeed marvellous, and it resembled that fought between Samvara and the chief of the immortals in the days of yore.

31. Your son Vikarna, Vivinsati and Chitrasena, surrounded by their divisions, fought on with Bhimasena.

Thus ends the ninety-sixth chapter, the fierce fight in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XCVII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Thus when that horripilating battle was progressing on, the Pandavas rushed against the Kauravas divided into three bodies.

2. Bhimasena rushed against the mighty armed Jalasandha, and king Yudhisthira supported by his divisions assailed Kritavarman in battle.

3. Appearing beautiful like the sun and scattering showers of arrows, Dhrishtadyumna, O mighty monarch, rushed upon Drona in that battle.

4. Then raged the encounter between all the enraged bowmen of the Kurus and the Pandavas, all eager for encountering each other in fight.

5. During the progress of that dreadful carnage when the warriors were undauntedly fighting with one another in single combats,

6. The mighty Drona fought on with the powerful prince of the Panchalas, and the myriads of shafts that he then discharged filled everybody with great wonder.

7. Like a forest of lotuses lying torn hither and hither, the heads of princes were being scattered all over the field by Drona and the prince of the Panchalas.

8. In every division of heroic warriors, garments, ornaments standards, armours and weapons were seen scattered in all directions.

9. Golden armours bespattered with blood,looked like masses of clouds illumined with flashes of lightning.

10. Other mighty car-warriors stretching their bows full six cubits long,felled with their winged shafts numerous elephants, steeds, and men.

11. In that battle between illustrious combatants, many swords, bucklers, bows, heads and armours of heroes, were seen lying scattered all over the field.

12. In that extremely terrible encounter, O mighty monarch, thousands of headless trunks were seen to rise up from the ground.

13. Vultures and Kankas and crows and jackals and numerous other flesh-eating animals, were seen there, O sire,

14. Eating flesh, drinking blood, dragging the hair, and pecking the marrow,

15. And dragging out the bodies and limbs and heads, O king, of slain men, steeds, elephants &c.

16. Accomplished in the use of weapons, skilled in fighting, and firmly resolved to fight, warriors exerted themselves vigourously in the battle, desirous of winning fame only.

17. The soldiers then roamed over the field, performing various evolutionary movements performed by swords-men. With darts, lances, javelins, tridents, Tomaras and battle axes,

18. With maces, bludgeons and many other kinds of weapons as also with their bare arms, men who careered in that arena, inflamed with rage, fell to slay one another.

19. Car-warriors became engaged with car-warriors, cavalry soldiers with cavalry-soldiers, elephants with other excellent elephants and infantry with infantry.

20. Many infuriate elephants as if perfectly mad, uttered loud shrieks, and killed one another, after the manner they do so in arenas of sport.

21. O ruler of men, as that battle, in which none paid any regard to any one, raged, Dhrishtadyumna caused his own horses to be entangled with those of Drona.

22. Those pegion-white and crimson steeds, endued with the fleetness of the wind, appeared extremely beautiful, being mingled together in that battle.

23. The horses. O king, then shone like clouds surcharged with lightning. Then Dhrishtadyumna beholding Drona approach him,

24. Grasped his sword and mace, and that hero, O Bharata, left aside his bow. Then that slayer of hostile heroes viz., Prisatas son, desirous of achieving a difficult feat,

25. Leapt over the shafts of Drona's car, and entered into it. He then stood sometimes on the yoke and sometimes on its joints,

26. And sometimes beside the horses. His troops then applauded him highly. When he, armed with the sword, was thus moving quickly on the backs of those crimson steeds,

27. Drona could find no opportunity for striking him; that indeed seemed extremely marvellous. Indeed like the swoop of a hawk on a piece of meat in a forest,

28—29. Looked that sally of Dhristadumnya from his own chariot, upon Drona, for his slaughter. Thereafter with a hundred shafts Drona cut off the shield of Drupada's son, decked with hundred moons, and then with another ten he cut off his sword. Thereafter that mighty warrior slew the latter's steeds with sixty-four shafts.

30—31. Then with a couple of broad-head shafts, he cut off his enemy's standard and umbrella and his two Parshni charioteers. Then again with great lightness of hands, he sped at Dhrishtadyumna an arrow capable of destroying his life, having at first drawn the bow-string back to the very ears, like Indra hurling the thunder-bolt. But soon Satyaki, with fourteen arrows of great sharpness, cut off that fatal shaft shot by Drona.

32. Thus, O sire, Satyaki rescued Dhrishtadyumna, who had been seized by that foremost of the preceptor, that best of men, like a deer seized by a lion.

33. That foremost descendant of Sini then rescued the prince of the Panchalas from Drona. Beholding Satyaki save the Panchala prince in that battle, 34—35. Drona quickly sped at him twenty-six arrows. Thereupon the grandson of Sini, pierced, with twenty-six arrows of great sharpness, Drona who seemed to swallow up the Srinjayas, on the centre of his breast. Then, upon the Satwata hero Satyaki advancing upon Drona, all the Panchala car-warriors, desirous of victory, extricated Dhrishtadyumna from that encounter.

Thus ends the ninety-seventh chapter, the fierce fight, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drana Parva.

CHAPTER XCVIII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)
—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. After that arrow shot by Drona had been severed and Dhristadyumna rescued by Yuyudhana that foremost of the Vrishnis, O Sanjaya,

2. What did the fierce bowman Drona, that foremost of all wielders of weapons, inflamed with wrath, do to the grandson of Sini that foremost of men?

Sanjaya said :—

3—5. Then Drona, like a huge snake having wrath for his poison, the stretched bow for his wide open mouth, sharp Narachas for his teeth, whetted arrows for his fangs, with eyes coppery in rage, and breathing like a furnace—that undaunted warrior,—borne by his fleet steeds of crimson hue that appeared to soar high into the heavens or get at the summit of the highest of mountains, advanced against Yuyudhana, scattering right and left his arrows furnished with golden wings.

6—7. Beholding the irresistible Drona-cloud having showers of arrows for its watery downpour, the rattle of chariot-wheels for its rumbling noise, the stretched bow for its volume, numerous Narachas for its flashes of lightning, darts and scimitars for its thunder, wrath for the violent wind going before it and steeds for the hurricane driving it forward,

8. Make towards himself, that subjugator of hostile towns, the invincible and heroic grandson of Sini, smilingly addressing his charioteer said :—

9. "Against this heroic Brahmana fallen off from all his duties, who is the refuge of the Dhritarashtras and the despeller of the sorrow and anxiety of their king,

10. Who is also the preceptor of all the princes, and is ever boastful of his prowess, do rush cheerfully and quickly, being borne by steeds urged to the top of their speed ?"

11. Thereupon those best of steeds of argentine hue and of the fleetness of the wind, belonging to that descendant of Madhus race, flew in all haste, towards Drona in that battle.

12. Then those two afflicters of foes Drona and Yuyudhana began to fight with each other, striking each other with many a thousand shafts.

13. Those two foremost of men enshrouded the welkin in a net-work of arrows, and those two heroes filled the ten points of the compass with their arrowy discharges.

14. Like two clouds at the expiration of summer pouring their contents on the Earth, they poured their showers of arrows on each other; the sun did not shine then, nor did the wind blow.

15. In consequence of these showers of arrows filling the firmament, an impenetrable and deep gloom was created there that became unbearable to the other warriors.

16. When the arrows of those two foremost of those accomplished in the use of weapons, viz. Drona and Sini's grandson, had covered the world with that gloom,

17. None could find any interval in the shooting of arrows by those two best of warriors. The sound produced by the clashing of the showers of arrows shot by them,

18. Was heard there to resemble the rumble of the thunderbolt hurled by Indra himself. The appearances of heroic warriors pierced with Narachas,

19. Looked, O Bharata, like those of snakes of virulent poison, bit by other snakes.

The sound produced by the palm-strokes and twanging bows of those two accomplished warriors, was heard there

20. To resemble the sound that is produced by the incessant striking of the bolt of heaven on mountain summits. The chariots of both those heroes, O king, and their horses and charioteers,

21. Being pierced with shafts of golden wings, became beautiful to look at. O ruler of men, of effulgent and straight-going Narachas,

22. The down-pour was terrible, and it resembled a shower of snakes of virulent poison, that have just cast off their slough. The umbrellas of both those warriors were felled and their standards were also cut down.

23. Both of them were bespattered with blood and both were desirous of obtaining victory. With bodies steeped in blood and looking like two elephants in rut,

24. They began to pierce each other with arrows capable of destroying life. The din of battle caused by war-cries, shouts, roars and the sound of drums and the blare of conchs

25. Ceased, O mighty monarch, for none then uttered anything; the troops became silent and warriors withdrew from the fight.

26. Filled with curiosity, men began to behold that single combat between those two heroes; car-warriors, elephant-drivers, horsemen and foot-soldiers,

27. Surrounding those two foremost of of men, began to witness that combat with fixed oyes. The elephant-division as also the horse division stood still;

28. So also the car-divisions stood still, arranging themselves in battle array. Adorned with diverse kinds of pearls, and corals, decked with jewels and gold,

29. Adorned with standards and ornaments, with armour made of gold, with flags and pennons, with the precious caparisons of elephants, with fine blankets,

30. With effulgent and whetted weapons, with Chamaras decked with gold and silver, with warriors on the backs and necks of horses and elephants,

31—32. With garlands round the frontal globes of elephants, and with circlets round their tusks, O Bharata, the Kuru and the Pandava troops then looked like masses of clouds at the close of the summer season, decked with rows of cranes and numerous fireflies underneath them and beautified with rainbows and flashes of lightning. Our troops, as also those belonging to Yudhisthira, beheld

33. That combat between Yuyudhana and the illustrious Drona. Coming there on their sky-ranging cars, the gods headed by Brahma and Soma,

34. And hosts of Sidhas and Charanas, and Vidyadharas and mighty Reptiles, all saw that combat. The backward and forward movements and the modes of fighting, O king,

35. Of those two foremost of heroes, filled all of them with wonder; displaying great lightness of hands, those two mighty heroes,

36. Namely Drona and Satyaki, pierced each other with each other's arrows. Thereafter in that battle he of the Darsarha race cut off the arrows shot by Drona, 37—38. With his strong and winged shafts; as also the bow of that highly effulgent warrior. But in a wink's time, the son of Bharadwaja fixed the string on another bow; but that also Sayaki cut off quickly. But again Drona stood ready with a bow in hand.

39. As often however Drona strung his bow so often did Satyaki cut it off, and this he did for full sixty-three times. Thereupon in that battle, Drona beholding that superhuman feat

40—41. Achieved by Yuyudhana, thought in his mind thus, O king:—'This force of weapon that I see in this foremost of the Satwata race is possible only in Rama, in Kartwaviryya, in Dhananjaya and in Bhisma'. So, Drona praised the prowess of that hero in his mind.

42. Then that foremost of the regenerate ones, that best of all wielders of weapons, namely Drona, as also the celestials with Indra himself at their head, were highly gratified at seeing the lightness of hands displayed by Satyaki, which resembled that of Vasava himself.

43. O ruler of men neither the gods nor the Gandharvas ever before beheld the like of that lightness of hands now displayed by the swiftly-moving Yuyudhana,

44. Although they, the Siddhas and the Charanas, were cognisant of the feats of which Drona was capable. Then taking up another bow, Drona that crusher of Kshatriyas,

45. That foremost of those acquainted with the use of weapons, O Bharata, placed some weapons on its string. But repulsing Drona's weapons with the illusion of his own weapons, Satyaki,

46. Pierced Drona with exceedingly sharp arrows; that indeed appeared marvellous. Beholding that superhuman feat achieved by him in battle—feat which was incapable of beihg achieved by others,

47. And which displayed great tact, those amongst your warriors who were judges of skill, highly praised it. Whatsoever weapn Drona discharged, Satyaki also discharged the same.

48. Beholding this, that scorcher of foes' namely the preceptor fought with Satyaki diffidently. Thereupon, O mighty monarch, that one who had reached the end of all military sciences, being inflamed with wrath,

49. Invoked into existence a celestial weapon for slaughtering Yuyudhana. Beholding that dreadful and fiery dart capable of slaying the foe,

50. And of celestial make, that fierce bowman Satyaki invoked into existence the Varuna weapon. Beholding them both using celestial weapons, the troops uttered loud cries of Alas and Oh ;

51. Then the denizens of the air ceased to range through the sky. When the Varuna and Agneya weapons were placed on their bow strings,

52. Just at that moment, the lustrous orb of day went below the horizon. Thereupon, king Yudhiathira and Vasudeva and the son of Pandu, (Arjana)

53. And Nakula and Sahadeva, rushed to the rescue of Satyaki. Other warriors headed by Dhristadyumna and accompanied by Virata and his divisions,

54. So also the Matsyas and Salwayas quickly advanced upon Drona. Thousands of princes, on the other hand, headed by Dussasana,

55. Proceeded to help Drona who had been thoroughly encompassed by the foe. Thereat, O king, the fight between your warriors and those of the Pandava, commenced anew.

56. Then the earth became enveloped in a cloud of dust and in a net-work of arrows. Everything being covered, nothing could any longer be distinguished. Thus when the troops were overwhelmed with dust, the battle raged in utter disregard of all rules of combat.

Thus ends the ninety-eighth chapter, the battle between Drona and Satyaki, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XCIX.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When the sun had turned in its downward course towards the summit of the Western hills, when the earth was scattered over the dust, and when the effulgence of the solar disc had become lessened,

2. And when some of the soldiers were standing aloof, some fighting on, some returning to the charge, and some winning victory, the day gradually began to wane.

3. Thus when the troops inflamed with the hopes of victory were fighting together, Arjuna and Vasudeva proceeded towards the spot where the ruler of the Sindhus were.

4. Vibhatsu the son of Kunti, with his sharp shafts went on creating breaches wide enough for his chariot to pass through ; and through these breaches, the son of Vasudeva guided the chariot.

5. Werever the car of the illustrious son of Pandu proceeded, thither O ruler of men, your troops began to give way.

6. Then he of the Dasaraha race endued with great might, displayed his superior skill in driving the car, in as much as he performed, with the car, numerous kinds of circular motions.

7. Then, arrows having their names engraved on them, well-tempered, of the effulgence of the fire of dessolution, tied round with cat-guts, of polished joints, thick, far-reaching,

8. Made either of stiff bamboom or of iron, capable of taking the life out of the enemies, drank in that battle the life-blood of numerous warriors, together with the birds of prey assembled on the field.

9. The arrows which Arjuna discharged standing on his car, fell two miles ahead, and pierced and mangled the foe, just when that car came up to the spot.

10. Borne by those yoke-bearing steeds endued with the fleetness of Garuda or the wind, Hrishikeshas, advanced with such quickness that caused the whole universe to be filled with amazement.

11. O ruler of men, even the chariot of the sun himself or of Indra or of Rudra, or of Vaisravana, can never proceed so quickly.

12. Indeed, no one else's chariot had before moved with such quickness in battle as Arjuna's charriot then moving with the fleetness of a glance of the mind.

13. Then having taken the charriot to the thick of the fight, that salyer of hostile heroes, Kesava, O Bharata, quickly drove the steeds of it into the ranks of the soldiers.

14. Having penetrated into to the rear of the car-division, these excellent steeds drew the car of Arjuna with great difficulty, suffering as they did from hunger, thirst and fatigue.

15. They were also mangled with numerous weapons by many foremost of combatants. Then they began to move in various wonderful circular motions,

16. Passing over many slain steeds elephants, and many men and also over broken cars, like a group of locusts.

17. During this opportunity, O king, the two heroic brothers, the princes of Avanti supported by their troops, rushed upon the son of Pandu whose steeds were fatigued and tired.

18. Filled with delight they pierced Arjuna with sixty-four, Janardana with seventy and the horses with a hundred shafts.

19. Then the enraged Arjuna knowing the vital parts of the body, pierced them both, O king, with nine arrows of depressed knots, all capable of penetrating to the very vitals.

20. Thereat inflamed with rage, those two warriors covered Vibhatsu and Kesava with their arrowy downpour, and uttered loud war-cries.

21. Then that hero of white steeds with a pair of broad-headed shafts, quickly cut off in that battle the two wonderful bows of those princes, as also their standards of golden effulgence.

22. Thereupon, O king, taking another two bows and excited to the highest pitch of fury, they began to afflict sorely the son of Pandu, with their arrows.

23. Then again, that son of Pandu Dhananjaya, inflamed with rage, quickly cut off their bows with another pair of arrows.

24. Then with other shafts, furnished with golden wings and whetted on stone, he quickly slew their steeds, charioteers, Parshni-drivers, and followers.

25. Thereafter with a razor-headed arrow, he cut the head of the elder of the two brothers, off his trunk; thus slain, the latter fell down on the Earth like a tree broken down by the wind.

26. The highly puissant Anuvinda, beholding Vinda thus slain, left the car of which the steeds were slain; and that mighty hero, taking up a mace,

27. Rushed towards Arjuna's car for avenging the death of his brother. Then that mighty car-warrior, that foremost of all car-warriors armed with his mace, appeared to dance on the field.

28. Inflamed with rage then Anuvinda struck with that mace of his, the slayer of Madhu on the forehead. But he could not make him tremble who remained immovable like the Mainaka mountain.

29. Of him, with six shafts, Arjuna cut off the neck, the two legs, his arms and his head; and thus cut to pieces, he fell down like fragments of rocks.

30. Then, O king, beholding those two heroes slain, their followers inflamed with rage, rushed against Arjuna, discharging arrows by thousands.

31. Quickly despatching them with his arrows, O foremost of the Bharatas, Arjuna, then appeared beautiful like the fire consuming the forest at the expiration of winter.

32. Then Dhananjaya, having passed with difficulty, through their (Vinda and Anuvinda's) divisions, appeared beautiful like the lustrous orb of the day emerging out of a cluster of clouds.

33. At first beholding him the Kurus were struck with panic! But in the next moment they were filled with delight; and then, O foremost of the Bharatas, they rushed upon Pritha's son from all sides.

34. Beholding him fatigued, and knowing the ruler of the Sindhus to be stationed afar, they surrounded Arjuna with a loud roar.

35. Beholding them highly excited, that foremost of men Arjuna smilingly addressed these words to that descendant of the Dasarha race viz., Kesava :—

36. "Our steeds are afflicted with arrow-wounds; they are exhausted; the ruler of the Sindhus is still far off. What in your opinion is the best course to be adopted now?

37. Speak, O Krishna, truly on this point? You are ever the foremost of the wise. The sons of Pandu, having yourself only for their eyes, can hope to vanquish their enemies in battle.

38. Hear what seems to me to be our duty next. Unyoking the steeds, leave them to their ease, and O Madhava, draw out the arrows from their body."

39. Thus spoken to by Pritha's son, Kesava replied to him saying ;—"O Partha, I am also of the same opinion that you have expressed."

Arjuna said :—

40. O Kesava, I shall hold the whole army in check. Do you duly perform whatever should be done now.

Sanjaya said :—

41. Thereupon descending from the terrace of his car, Dhananjaya, with the Gandiva bow in his grasp, stood on the field of battle like an immovable hill.

42. Beholding Dhananjaya on the ground, and taking this to be a meet opportunity, the Kshatriyas, desirous of obtaining victory and uttering load roars, rnshed upon the former.

43. Then with a mighty host of cars, they surrounded that single-handed hero, stretching their bows and discharging their arrows right and left.

44. Inflamed with rage, they then displayed numerous wonderful weapons; and like the clouds covering the solar disc, they covered Pritha's son with their arrows.

45. Then those Kshatriyas, illustrious car-warriors all, rushed with impetuously upon that foremost of Kshatriyas and that best of men, Arjuna, like infuriate elephant rushing upon a lion.

46. Then we beheld the wonderful might of Partha's arms inasmuch as inflamed with wrath, he held in check, the numerous army of the Kouravas.

47. Resisting with his own weapons those hurled by the foe, that highly puissant hero quickly covered all his adversaries with his myriad shafts.

48, Then, O ruler of men, generated by the clash of those thick showers of arrows, a mighty fire of blazing flames, burnt on that part of the welkin.

49—50. There, in consequence of count less heroes, all inflamed with wrath, and united together for a common cause, seeking to obtain victory in battle, supported by steeds bespattered with blood and breathing heavily, and by maddened and foe-crushing elephants emitting fierce yells, the weather became excessively hot.

51—53. Then with his arrows Pritha's son held in check that uncrossable, wide, fathomless ocean of cars—incapable of being agitated, having arrows for its waves, flags for its whirl-pools, elephants for its sharks foot-soldiers for its countless fishes, the blare of conchs, and the sound of drums for its roar, chariots for its swelling current, turbans of warriors for its tortoises, umbrellas and banners for its foam, and the carcasses of elephants for its sub-marine rocks—which then was appearing like a vast continent.

54. Then as the battle progressed, the mighty armed and dauntless Janardana addressing his dear friend, that foremost of men (Arjuna), thus spoke :—

55. "O Arjuna, there is no water here on the field of battle for the horses to drink from. They want water for drinking, and not for a bath."

56. Thereupon saying "Here is it" Arjuna fearlessly struck the Earth with a weapon and thus created a beautiful lake there from which the steeds could quench their thirsts.

57. That watery expanse abounded in swans and ducks and was beautified with hosts of Chakravakas. Its water was translucent and abounded with full-blown lotuses of the best order.

58. It swarmed with tortoises and fishes, and was fathomless, and frequented by numerous sages. Then, there came the sage Narada to have a look at that lake created there in a moment's time.

59. Then Partha that performer of wonderful works like Krishna himself, created there an arrowy hall having arrows for its beams and rafts, arrows for its pillars, and arrows for its roof.

60. Thereupon Govinda, seeing the illustrious son of Pritha construct that hal there, langhing applauded him saying—"Well-done, well-done."

Thus ends the ninety-ninth chapter, the slaughter of Vinda and Anuvinda, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva

---

CHAPTER C.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.—

Sanjaya said :—

1. When the illustrious son of Kunti had created that water there, and had held in check the troops of the enemies, and when he had constructed that arrowy hall,

2. The highly effulgent son of Vasudeva descending down quickly from the chariot unharnessed the horses lacerated with arrows furnished with wings of the Kanka feathers.

3. The Siddhas, the Charanas, and the troops present there, beholding that sight unseen before, uttered loud exclamations in praise of Arjuna.

4. That all the mighty car-warriors of your army were unable to resist that son of Kunti who then was fighting standing on his legs, was indeed wonderful.

5. Though myriads of chariots and thousands upon thousands of elelephants and steeds assailed him, yet Partha experienced no fear; but every moment obtained advantages over his enemies.

6. Showers of arrows were poured upon that son of Pandu by the hostile kings; but that slayer of foes, the illustrious son of Vasava felt no pain.

7. Then the highly puissant son of Pritha received those showers of arrows, lances, and maces, like the ocean receiving the numerous rivers flowing into it.

8. With the tremendous force of his arms, Pritha's son began to swallow up, as it were, all the excellent arrows shot at him by hostile kings,

9. Then like the one fault covetousness destroying numerous accomplishments, Pritha's son, single-handed, and on foot, began to resist all the hostile kings riding on their respective cars.

10. During that fight, O mighty king, even the Kurus themselves applauded the prowess displayed by Arjuna and the son of Vasudeva, saying:—

11. "What incident, more wonderful has ever taken place or will ever take place in this world, than this, viz., that Pritha's son and Govinda in course of the fight, have unharnessed their steeds?

12. Those two foremost of men, displaying fierce energy in battle, and confident of their prowess, have filled our hearts with terror."

13—14. Thereafter Hrishikesa of eyes resembling lotus petals, smiling with the greatest assurance, as if he were in the midst of women, led the steeds in the arrowy hall ceated on the field of battle by Arjuna, before the very eyes of all your troops, O king.

15. Then Krishna well-skilled in the art of grooming, removed their fatigue, pain, trembling and lacerations.

16. Drawing the arrows out or their bodies, and shampooing them with his two hands, and walking them duly, he made them drink water.

17. Having then washed them, and made them drink and removing their fatigue and pain, he once more harnessed them to that foremost of chariots, with a joyful heart.

18. Thereafter that foremost of all wielders of weapons, that one endued with fierce energy viz., Souri (Krishna), accompanied by Arjuna, mounted on the car, and once more drove on quickly.

19. Beholding then that car belonging to that foremost of car-warrior, to which were yoked steeds whose thirst had been quenched, the foremost of the Kuru warriors once more became depressed at heart.

20. O king, beathing like snakes whose fangs have been broken,they exclaimed, 'Fie fie on us; Oh, Parth and Krishna, have gone,

21. Riding on a single car and clad in mail, slaughtering our troops with as much as ease as boys playing with a toy, even before the very eyes of all the Kshatriyas.

22. In spite of all our efforts and endeavours, those two scorchers of foes, have gone away, disregarding all other kings and displaying their superior prowess."

23. Beholding them gone away, othes soldiers said:—"O Kurus,prepare yourselver in all haste for slaughtering Krishna and the diadem-decked Arjuna.

24. Yoking the steeds to the car, he os the Dasarha race is proceeding towarde Jayadratha, crushing us in battle before tht very eyes of all our bow-men."

25. Other rulers of earth, seeing tha highly wonderful incident, never seen before, O king, said amongst themselves:—

26. "These troops, the king Dhritarastra himself, the Kshatriyas and the earth herself, are all now involved in a great calamity, through the fault of king Duryodhana.

27. All these are being destroyed; but the king (Duryodhana) heeds it not." Even thus did the Kshatriyas speak there. Others O Bharata, said:—

28. "Let the son of Dhritarastra, of erring sight, and meagre knowledge of measures, now perform those rites that are done for the departed, for, the ruler of the Sindhus may already be taken to be despatched to the abode of Yama."

29. Then as the sun parambulated through the concavity of heaven, that son of Pandu proceeded with increased speed towards the ruler of the Sindhus, being borne by refreshed steeds whose thirst had been quenched.

30. Then your warriors were unable to check that mighty-armed hero, that foremost of all wielders of weapons, viz., Arjuna, who had been proceeding like the enraged Destroyer himself.

31. Then for getting at the ruler of the Sindhus, that son of Pandu, that afflicter of foes, routing your army, began to agitate it like a lion agitating a herd of deer.

32. Plunging into the ranks of your soldiers, he of the Dasarha race, urged the steeds of to the top their speed and blew his conch Panchjanya of the hue of clouds.

33. The arrows discharged by the son of Kunti began to fall behind him, so quickly did those steeds, endowed with the fleetness of the wind, bear that chariot of his.

34. Thereafter, inflamed with rage, numerous hostile kings and various other Kshatriyas, surrounded Dhananjaya who was eager for bringing about the slaughter of Jayadratha.

35. When the Kuru-combatants thus rushed upon that foremost of men who had stopped for a moment only, Duryodhona, advancing quickly, followed Partha from behind, in that fierce encounter.

36. Many warriors became greatly depressed, beholding that chariot, of which the banner fluttered in the air, the rattle of which resembled the rumble of clouds, and which was mounted with that fearful standard having the ape for its device.

37. Thus when the orb of the day had been enshrouded in a cloud of dust, and when the warriors had been afflicted sore with arrows, they could not look at the two Krishnas engaged in that battle.

Thus ends the one-hundredth chapter, the surprise of the troops, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CI.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Beholding, O king, Vasudeva and Dhananjaya penetrate into their ranks, having already pierced through many divisions, the kings of your army fled in fear.

2. After a while, however, those illustrious warriors, overwhelmed with wrath and shame, and urged on by their prowess, gathered courage, and rushed upon Dhananjaya.

3. But, O king, those who proceeded to fight against the son of Pandu, being filled with wrath and vindictiveness, returned not, even as rivers falling into the sea, never return.

4. Like atheists turning away from the Vedas, many ignoble warriors turned away from the fight, and thus incurred sin and hell.

5. Then those two foremost of men, passing beyond that cluster of cars, appeared like the two effulgent orbs (the sun and the moon) freed from the jaws of Rahu.

6. They then with their fatigue completely dispelled, and passing beyond that network of soldiers, looked like two fishes that had torn away from a strong net.

7. Having passed through that impenetrable array of Drona impassable in consequence of showers of weapons, those two illustrious heroes looked like two suns risen at the period of Dissolution.

8. Penetrating through those showers of weapons and freed from the imminent danger to their lives, those illustrious warriors, themselves obstructing the sky with their weapons,

9. Appeared like two persons escaped from a raging fire, or like two fish from the jaws of a Makara. They then agitated the Kuru ocean like two Makaras agitating the mighty deep.

10. While Arjuna and Krishna were within Drona's division, your warriors and your sons, had thought that the two heroes would never be able to pass through it.

11. But beholding those two highly effulgent warriors now beyond the division of Drona, they became doubtful about the life of the ruler of the Sindhus.

12. Up till then, they cherished strong hopes of Jayadratha's life, for they had thought, O monarch, that the two Krishnas would never be able to escape from Drona and Hridika's son.

13. Falsifying that hope of theirs, those two scorchers of foes, succeeded in crossing over the uncrossable division of Drona and the Bhojas, O king.

14. Beholding them beyond those divisions and look like two blazing fires, your troops became despondent, and they gave up all hopes for the life of the ruler of the Sindhus.

15. Then those two dauntless heroes, those enhancers of the fears of their foes, namely Krishna and Dhananjaya, thus began to talk among themselves, regarding the slaughter of Jayadratha.

16. "This ruler of the Sindhus has been placed in their midst by six of the foremost car-warriors of Dhritarashtra's army. Still he shall not escape, if we can only have a look of him.

17. Even if Indra himself with all the celestials, were to become his protector in battle, yet we shall slay him."

Sanjaya said :—

Thus did the two Krishna's talk to themselves.

18. Even so, O migty-armed one. did the two Krishna's speak amongst themselves while looking for the ruler of the Sindhus. (Hearing what they said) your sons set up a loud wail.

19. Those two subduers of foes then appeared like a pair of elephants of great quickness, whose thirst had been slaked and who had been refreshed with drinking water, after they had passed through a desert.

20. Beyond death and above the reach of decay, they then appeared like two tradesmen that have passed over a hilly district infested with tigers, lions and elephants.

21. Indeed then your troops considered the hue of their countenances to be incapable of of being faded; and beholding them freed, they began to wail aloud.

22. Escaping from Drona who resembled a snake of virulent poison or a blazing fire, as also from the other rulers of Earth, Partha and Krishna looked like two burning suns.

23. Those two subduers of foes, escaping from Drona's division which resembled the very ocean, seemed to be filled with delight, like persons that have safely crossed the mighty main.

24. Escaping from those thick downpours of arrows, from those divisions protected by Drona and Hridika's son, Keshava and Arjuna appeared like Indra and Agni of burning radiance.

25. Pierced with the whetted shafts of Bharadwaja's son, and profusely shedding blood, the two Krishnas appeared beautiful, like two mountains adorned with flowering Karnikara trees.

26. Having passed through that expansive lake, of which Drona formed the shark, darts the fierce snakes, shafts the Makaras, and Kshatriyas the fathomless waters,

27. Having emerged out of that cloud formed by Drona's weapons, of which the thunders were the twang of bows and the sound of palm-strokes, and the lightning the flashing maces and swords—Partha and Krishna appeared like the sun and the moon emerging out of darkness.

28. In consequence of their crossing the regions obstructed with the weapons of Drona, all creatures regarded those fierce and renowned bowmen viz Kesava and Dhananjaya to be like two persons who have forded, with the strength of their arms, the five rivers having the ocean for their sixth when full of waters during the rainy season and abounding in numerous sharks and alligators,

30. From a desire for slaughtering Jayadratha stationed very near to them, looking at him, the two warriors appeared like two tigers waiting to fall upon a Ruru deer.

31. The color of their faces was such that your warriors, O mighty monarch, considered Jayadratha already to be one among the slain.

32. O mighty-armed one, with red eyes and staying together, the son of Pandu and Krishna then beholding the ruler of the Sindhus, became filled with delight, and incessantly uttered loud war-cries.

33. The radiance of Souri holding the reins and Partha wielding the bow, O king, was like that of the fire and the sun.

34. Escaping from the division of Drona and beholding the ruler of the Sindhus within reach, they were filled with delight, even as a hawk is filled with delight at the sight of a piece of meat.

35. Beholding the ruler of the Sindhus stay near them, and burning with rage, they pounced down upon him, like a pair of hawks pouncing down upon a piece of meat.

36. Then beholding Hrishikesha and Dhananjaya penetrate through the division of Drona, your highly powerful son, king Duryodhana, having his armour donned by Drona, and knowing how to guide and groom horses, proceeded on a single car against those two warriors, in order to rescue the ruler of the Sindhus.

38. Leaving behind him the two mighty car-warriors Krishna and Partha, your son proceeded ahead and then turned back, O king, facing Kesava of lotus-like eyes.

39. Then when your son had outrun Dhananjaya, numerous musical instruments were joyfully sounded by all your troops.

40. Then beholding Duryodhana stay, facing the two Krishna's, your troops uttered war-cries resembling leonine roars that became mingled with the blare of conchs.

41. Beholdidg your son rush to fight, they also of blazing effulgenee who were engaged in protecting Jayadratha, became filled with joy.

42. Then seeing Duryodhana and his followers outrun Dhananjaya, Krishna, O king, addressing Arjuna, said these words suited to the occasion.

Thus ends the one hundred and first chapter, the arrival of Duryodhana, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CII,

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Vasudeva said :—

1. O Dhananjava, behold, Suyodhana has outrun us. Meseems this to be highly wonderful. There is indeed no car-warrior equal to him.

2. He is capable of shooting his arrows to a great distance; he is a fierce bowman, accomplished in the use of all weapon, and formidable in battle. This son of Dhritarastra is endued with great prowess, and strikes hard, and is versed in all modes of warfare.

3. Reared in all luxury, he is highly esteemed by all the mighty car-warriors. O Partha, he is accomplished and the constant hater of the Pandavas.

4. O sinless one, for these reasons I think that the time has how arrived, when you shall fight with him. Upon him rests, as upon a stake at dice, victory or the reverse.

5. On him vomit the venom of your wrath that you have cherished so long, O Partha. This mighty car-warrior is the root of all wrongs inflicted on the Pandavas.

6. He is now within your arrow-shot. Be mindful of your suecess. Why has king Duryodhona, desirous as he is of enjoying the kingdom come to fight with you?

7. By good fortune it is that he has now come within the reach of your arrows. O Dhananjaya, do you so strive now, that this one may lose his very life in battle.

8. Elated with the pride engendered by his prosperity, he has never experienced pain. O foremost of men, he knows your prowess in battle.

9. O Partha, the three worlds and the celestials, the Asuras and the men, cannot bear you in battle, what to speak of this single-handed Suyodhana?

10. By good luck, has he now come near your chariot; O Partha, slay him, O mighty-armed hero, even as Purandara (Indra) slew Vritra (in days gone by).

11. O sinless one, this Duryodhana ever tried to bring down distress on you. Through deceitful measures, he defeated the very virtuous king Yudhisthira at the game of dice.

12. O bestower of honor, sinless though you all are, this one of sinful understanding had always injured you with many cruel wrongs.

13. Nobly resolving to fight, O you son of Pritha, slay without any hesitation, this perverse wretch who is ever vindictive and cruel, and who is avarice incarnate.

14. O son of Pandu, put forth all your prowess, recollecting the despoliation of your kingdom through deceit, your exile in the woods, and the woes of Krishna.

15. Through good fortune it is, that he now moves within the range of your arrows. By good luck it is that, staying before you, he is striving to thwart you in the fulfilment of your purposes.

16. By good luck it is that he has come to know that he will have to fight with you! By good luck it is that all your desires, though not at present eagerly cherished, will meet with their fruition, O Pritha's son.

17. For these reasons, O Partha, slay you this disgrace to the race of Dhritarastra, even as Indra slew the Asura Jambha in days gone by, in the battle between the celestials and the Asuras.

18. If this one be slain by you, you can penetrate through this array that will be then masterless. Let the Avabhritha of these hostilities be performed now; cut the root of these wretches of wicked souls.

Sanjaya said :—

19. Thus spoken to, Pritha's son answered him saying :—"Let it be so. Even this will I do. Unmindful of anything else, drive where Duryodhana stands.

20. Putting forth all my prowess in battle, I will, in this day's battle, cut off the head of this wretch, who had enjoyed our dominions for a long period, without a single thorn in his side.

21. O Kesava, shall I not be successful in avenging the wrongs inflicted on Draupadi by her being dragged by the hair, undeserving as she was of such treatment?"

22. Thus speaking to each other and filled with delight, the two Krishnas urged on their steeds of white hue and best breed, with a view to get at the ruler of the Kurus via king Duryodhana.

23. Your son, O foremost of the Bharatas, approaching them entertained no fear, although, O sire, there were reasons enough to fill him with terror.

24. Then all the Kshatriyas present there applauded him, inasmuch as he ventured to rush against Arjuna and Hrishikesa with a view to oppose them.

25. Then beholding the king proceed to the battle, all your troops, O ruler of men, raised a loud uproar.

26. When that loud and dreadful uproar was set up by your people, your son pressing his foe hard, began to impede his progress.

27. Opposed by that illustrious bowmen viz., your son, the son of Kunti became excited to the highest pitch of fury; also that afflicter of foes, your son, became highly angry upon Dhananjaya.

28. Then beholding Duryodhana and Dhananjaya, both enraged against each other, all the royal warriors of fierce appearance, began to look at them from all sides.

29. Beholding Partha and Vasudeva both filled with wrath, your son desirous of fighting with them, smiling, challenged them to the combat.

30. Thereupon he of the Dasarha race and Dhananjaya the son of Pandu filled with delight, uttered loud shouts, and blew their best of conchs.

31. The Kourava warriors then beholding their appearance reflect joy, became hopeless of the life of your son.

32. Then many among the enemies and the Kurus were filled with grief, as they then considered your son to be like a libation poured into the mouth of fire.

33. Then your warriors beholding Krishna and Pandu's son filled with joy, out of fear, began to exclaim saying "the king is slain, the king is slain."

34. But Duryodhana, hearing that confusion created by his own men, said:—'Let all your apprehensions be dispelled; I will send the two Krishnas to the abode of Death."

35. Having thus spoken to the soldiers, the king desirous of victory, addressing Pritha's son, out of anger, said these words:—

36. 'O son of Pritha, if you are begotten by Pandu, then quickly display against me all weapons the use of which you learned from the celestials, or on this Earth?

37. Exert all your might and prowess and let also Kesava do so, against me. I want to see your manliness.

38. Men speak of many feats achieved by you out of our view. Show all those feats to me that have rendered you worthy of the applause and reverence of others."

Thus ends the one hundred and second chapter, the boastful words of Duryodhana, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CIII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)

Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Having thus spoken, the king pierced Arjuna with three shafts capable of penetrating to the very vitals; and then with another four arrows of great velocity, he pierced the latter's four steeds.

2. He also pierced the son of Vasudeva with ten arrows between his breasts. Then cutting off the whip of the latter, he felled it on the ground.

3. Thereupon with perfect coolness, Pritha's son quickly sped at him four shafts of variegated wings and whetted on stone; but all these shafts were baffled by Duryodhana's armour.

4. Beholding those shafts repelled, Partha once more struck Duryodhana with another nine and seven arrows of exceeding sharpness; but these also became baffled by Duryodhana's armour.

5. Then seeing those twenty shafts of Arjuna repelled, that slayer of hostile warriors Krishna, addressing Arjuna, said these words:—

6. "O Partha, now I see a sight never before seen by me, which is as wonderful as the moving about of hills. Winged shafts shot by yourself, are becoming abortive!

7. Is everything right with the toughness of the Gandiva, O foremost of the Bharatas? Are your grasp and the prowess of arms, as firm and strong as before?

8. Is not this to be the last time that you shall meet with Duryodhana your foe? Tell me all this; O son of Pritha, for I ask you.

9. Seeing all these shafts of yours falling upon Duryodhana's chariots without producing the least effect, O Partha, I have been filled with great surprise.

10. O son of Pritha what misfortune is this that your arrows, dreadful like the bolt of Heaven and capable of piercing through the body of the enemy, produce no effect today?"

Arjuna said:—

11. I think, O Krishna, that Drona has donned this armour on Duryodhana. This armour, tied as it has been, is invulnerable by my weapons.

12. O Krishna, this armour contains in it the might of the three worlds. Drona only knows the mode of donning it, and from that foremost of men, I also have learnt it.

13. This armour can not be penetrated by arrows. Even, O Govinda, Maghavat himself can not penetrate it in battle with his thunderbolt.

14. Knowing all this, O Krishna, why do you confound me. That which happened in the three world, that which now happens,

15. And that which will happen in the future, are all known to yourself. Indeed O slayer of Madhu, no one knows this better than yourself.

16. This Duryodhana, O Krishna, accoutered in this armour by Drona, is standing dauntlessly in battle, cased in this coat of mail.

17. But he knows not what is to be done with this armour, O Madhava, but wears this coat of mail even like a woman.

18. Behold, O Janarddana, the prowess of my arms and the strength of my bow, in as much as I will vanquish the Kuru king, protected though he is with this coat of mail.

19. T' lord of the celestials gave this effulgent armour to Angiras; from him Vrihaspati obtained it; and from him again Purandara got it.

20. The lord of the celestials once more presented it to me with Mantras to be uttered in donning it. Even if this armour were of celestial make or were forged by Brahma himself, yet it will not protect this wicked-minded wretch from the stroke of my arrows."

Sanjaya said:—

21. Having thus spoken, Arjuna inspired some shafts with Mantras and then began to draw them on the bow-string. But while he was thus drawing those arrows placed on the centre of his bow string,

22. The son of Drona cut them off with a weapon capable of baffling all other weapons. Beholding those shafts severed from a distance by that reciter of the Vedas (Aswathaman),

23. The owner of the cream-coloured steeds (Arjuna), filled with surprise, addressing Kesava thus spoke:—'O Janarddana these arrows I can not use twice.

24. Then they will slay me and my own troops." Thereafter king Duryodhana, pierced the two Krishnas, each with nine shafts,

25. Resembling snakes of virulent poison. O king, once more he poured upon Krishna and the son of Pandu in that battle,

26. A mighty shower of arrows; upon this all your troops became filled with joy and they struck up musical instruments and uttered their war-cries.

27. Thereat filled with fury, Pritha's son began to lick the corners of his mouth. He could then find no part of Duryodhana's body that was not covered by that armour.

28. Then with sharp arrows, resembling Death and duly discharged, Arjuna cut to pieces Duryodhona's horses and his two Parshni-drivers.

29. Then that highly powerful hero cut off the latter's bow and the leathern gloves quickly. Savyasachin then began to cut his car into fragments.

30. Thereafter Arjuna pierced with two sharp arrows, the two palms of Duryodhana who had been deprived of the use of his car.

31. Then your warriors, beholding Duryodhana that foremost of bowmen, involved in great danger and afflicted with the arrows of Dhananjaya, rushed to his rescue.

32. Then they surrounded Dhananjaya with thousands of duly equipped chariots and elephants and horses and numerous divisions of infantry, all inspired with wrath.

33. Thereupon, neither Govinda nor Arjuna nor their car could be seen; for they were then covered with thick showers of weapons and surrounded with large bodies of troops.

34. Then with the force of his weapons, Arjuna began to slaughter that host of your car-warriors and elephants, by hundreds. With their limbs cut off, they began to fall fast on the field of battle.

35. Slain or in the act of being stain, they succeeded not in reaching that excellent car of Arjuna, which stood immovable full two miles away from the beseiging troops on all sides.

36. Thereafter, the Vrishni hero quickly addressed Arjuna saying:—"Do you tremendously stretch your bow for I will blow this conch of mine."

37. Then stretching his toughest bow Gandiva, Arjuna went on slaughtering his foes, shooting arrowy showers and producing loud din with his palm-strokes.

38. Then the mighty Kesava loudly blew his conch Panchajanya, with his eye lashes covered with dust, and countenance shedding drops of perspiration.

39. In consequence of that twang of the Gandiva and the blast of that conch, all the Kuru-people, strong or weak, fell down on the Earth.

40. The chariot of Arjuna, thus freed from that prees, looked like a cloud driven a head by the wind. Then the protectors of Jayadratha and their followers, beholding Arjuna became filled with rage.

41. Then suddenly seeing Partha before them, those guards of Jayadratha the Sindhu-king, all mighty bowmen, uttered a fierce shout, causing the earth to tremble therewith

42. The fierce whizz of arrows became mingled with the blast of conchs and other loud noises; the illustrious soldiers your army then also uttered their war-cries resembling leonine roars.

43. Hearing that dreadful din raised by your troops, Dhananjya and the son of Vasudeva blew their two best of conchs.

44. Then, O ruler of men, with that loud sound, the earth seemed to be filled, with its mountanis seas, islands, and the subteranean regions.

45. Indeed, O foremost of the Bharatas, that sound filling the ten points of the compass, reverberated through the armies of the Kurus and the Pandavas.

46. Warriors of your host then, beholding Krishna and Dhananjaya, were very much terrified. Soon however those mighty-car-warriors recovered, and put forth their activity and prowess.

47. Then your warriors beholding the two Krishnas cased in mair became excited with rage; and they rushed upon them both. All this looked wonderful.

Thus ends the one hundred and third chapter, the defeat of Duryodhona, in the Jayadratha-badha, of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CIV.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA) —Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Your warriors, as soon as they saw those two foremost heroes of the Vrishni-Andhaka and the Kuru races, quickly advanced against them, each striving to be the first. So also, Vijaya rushed against those foes of his.

2. Mounted on their huge chariots adorned with gold, covered with tiger-skins, producing deep rattle with their car-wheels, and looking like blazing fires, they advanced, illumining the all points of the compass.

3. Armed, O monarch, with bows whose stave's were decked with gold, and which, in consequence of their splendour were incapable of being looked at, and setling up loud war-cries' and being borne by mettled horses,

4. Bhurisravas, Sala, Karna Vrishasena Jayadratha, Kripa, the ruler of the Madras, and that foremost of car-warriors viz., Drona's son,

5. These eight great car-warriors, as if devouring up the skies, illumined the ten quarters, with their excellent chariots covered with tiger-skins and decked with golden moons.

6. Accoutered in coats of mail, inflamed with rage, riding upon those chariots the rattle of whose wheels resembled the rumble of the clouds, they covered Arjuna on every side, with showers of sharp shafts.

7. Steeds of best breed and variegated hue, and endued with great fleetness, bearing those mighty car-warriors, appeared beautiful as they illumined the ten quarters of heaven.

8. Their chariots drawn by excellent horses of great fleetness born in various countries and of diverse species—some bred in hilly tracts, some in river-lands, and some in the Sindhu country,—

9. Many foremost of car-warriors among the Kurus, swiftly rushed towards Dhananjaya's car, desirous, O king, of saving your son.

10. Those foremost of men taking up their huge conchs blew them, and with the blasts they filled the welkin and the earth with her all oceans.

11. Thereupon those two foremost of all the gods, viz., Vasudeva and Dhananjaya also blew their conchs that were regarded as the best of all the conchs on the face of the earth.

12. Kunti's son blew his conch Devadatta and Kesava blew Panchajannya. The tremendous blare of the conch Devedatta, produced by Dhananjaya,

13. Filled the earth, the skies, and the ten points of the compass. So also the blast of the Panchajanna, blown by the son of Vasudeva,

14. Surpassing all other sounds, filled the welkin and the earth. And when the fierce and dreadful sound was still continuing,—

15. Sound that struck the hearts of the cowards with terror and enhanced the delight of the brave,—and while drums, Jharjhwaras, and cymbals,

16. And Mridangas, O mighty monarch, were sounded by thousands, great car-warriors, befriending the Kurus and desirous of Duryodhana's good,

17. All great bow-men, inflamed with anger and unable to bear the loud blasts of Arjuna's and Krishna's conchs,—those kings come from diverse countries and accompanied by their troops—,

18. Blew their huge conchs, desirous of answering with the blasts thus produced, the blasts produced by Kesava and Arjuna.

19. Then your army filled with the blasts of the conchs, had its car-warriors, elephants, and horses filled with anxiety. and O master, all who composed it, seemed to be ill.

20. Then that host filled with the blasts of conchs blown by heroic warriors, seemed to be like the welkin echoing with sounds of thunder and fallen down (through some natural cause),

21. That loud sound, O king, filled all the quarters with its echoes. It frightened the troops as if the end of the Yuga had come.

22. Thereafter Duryodhana and the other eight sovereigns, all mighty car-warriors, surrounded Pandu's son for effecting the safety of Jayadratha.

23. Then the son of Drona pierced Vasudeva's son with seventy-three arrows, and he also pierced Arjuna with three broad-headed shafts, and the latter's steeds and standard with five arrows.

24. Then beholding Janarddana pierced, and excited to the highest pitch of fury, Arjuna struck his foe with six hundred arrows.

25. Piercing then Karna with ten and Vrishasena with three arrows, that highly puissant hero, cut off Salya's bow with arrows fixed on the string, near the grasp.

26. Thereupon taking another bow Salya began to pierce Pandu's son. Then Bhurisrava with three arrows furnished with goeden wings and whetted on stone,

27. Karna with thirty-two, Vrishasena with seven, Jayadratha with seventy-three, and Kripa with ten shafts,

28. And the king of the Madras with ten other shafts, pierced Phalguna in that battle. Thereafter with a group of sixty arrows, Drona's son covered Partha.

29. He then pierced Vasudeva with twenty and Partha again with five arrows. Thereupon that foremost of men, that owner of white steed, who had Krishna for his charioteer,

30. Pierced them all in return displaying great lightness of hand. Piercing Karna with twelve and Vrishasena with three shafts,

31. He cut off Salya's bow, once more near the handle. Piercing Somadatta's son with three, and Salya with ten arrows,

32. He pierced Drona's son with eight shafts, well-sharpend and resembling tongues of fire. He struck the son of Gotama with twenty five and the ruler of the Siddhus with a hurdred arrows.

33. Once more he pierced Drona's son with seventy shafts. Bhurisrava then inflamed with rage, cut off the whip that Hari held.

34. And he then pierced Arjuna with a group of seventy-three arrows. Thereat Dhananjaya owning white steeds, and burning with rage, mangled those enemies of his with hundreds of shafts, like a raging tempest tearing away masses of clouds.

Thus ends the one hundred and fourth chapter, the fierce fight, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CV.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said:—

1. O Sanjaya, describe to me the numerous standards, decked beautifully, belonging both to the warriors of the Parthas, and to our warriors?

Sanjaya said:—

2. Hear from me of the diverse kinds of standards belonging to those illustrious warriors. Listen to me, as I go on describing their name, their appearance, and their hue.

3. O king on the chariots of those foremost of car-warriors were seen various kinds of standards shining like blazing fire.

4. Made of gold, or adorned with gold or decked with garlands of gold, looking like the golden peak of the mighty Meru mountain,

5. The standards of those warriors were of variegated hue, and of great beauty. Those standards also were adorned with fluttering flags on all sides.

6. Having streamers of varigated hue tied to them all round, those standards appeared highly charming. Those streamers also moved by the wind,

7. Looked like beautiful damsels dancing in the midst of arenas erected for sport. Resembling the rainbow in hue, those streamers, O best of the Bharata race,

8. Belonging to those car-warriors, fluttering in the air, beautified their cars. The standard, having for its device the ape of fierce face and lion-like tail,

9. Of Dhananjaya, seemed to strike terror into the hearts of his foes. That foremost of apes, O king, adorned as he was with banners,

10—11. That device on the standard of the wielder of Gandiva, frightened all your troops, O king. We beheld the standard-top of Drona's son, resembling the tail of the lion and effulgent like the newly-risen sun, O Bharata. Made of gold, fluttering in air, and of the effulgence of the standard of Sakra,

12. The device on the standard of Drona's son floated on high inspiring the foremost of the Kurus with delight. The standard of Adhiratha's son bore the device of an elephants-girth made of gold.

13. In that battle, it appeared O mighty king, to fire the whole firmament. The banners attached to it decked with garlands of flowers and adorned with gold,

14. And moved by the wind, seemed to dance on the top of his chariot. The preceptor of the Pandavas, that Brahman devoted to ascetic observances, viz Kripa the son of Gotama, had for his device an excellent bovine bull. O king, the illustrious Kripa with that bovine bull on his standard, looked as effulgent,

16. As the Destroyer of the three-fortresses (Mahadeva) looks with his bull. Vrishasena had for his device a peacock made of gold and decked with gems and and jewels.

17. Beautifying the van of the army it stood on his standard as if on the point of emitting its notes. With that peacock, the car of that illustrious hero appeared as beautiful,

18—19. As the car of Skanda, O king, appears, being decked by his peacock. The ruler of the Madras, we beheld, had on his standard-top, the unequalled and charming device of a plough-share, made of gold and looking like a flame of fire. O sire, that plough-share mounted on his chariot looked beautiful,

20—21. Like the Goddess of corn incarnate, endued with all beauty and producing every seed. The device of a silver boar shone on the standard of the Sindhu king; it was decked with garlands of gold and was of the splendour of the rising sun. With that device on his standard, Jayadratha appeared as beautiful,

22—23. As Pusa in the days of yore, in the battle between the celestials and the Asuras. The standard of Somadatta's son, ever devoted to the performance of sacrifices, was decked with the device of a sacrificial stake. It shone like the sun or the moon. O king, that golden sacrificial stake decorating the banner of Somadatta's son, looked effulgent,

24—25. Like the huge stake erected in that foremost of sacrifiees, called the Rajsuya. Salya's standard bearing the device of a silver-elephant, O king, was adorned on all sides with peacocks made of gold. O foremost of the Bharatas, that standard enhanced the beauty of your troops,

26. Like the prodigious white elephant adorning the host of the ruler of the celestials. On the gold-decked standard of king Duryodhana, was the device of an elephant embossed with gems.

27—29. O king, that standard stood on the chariot of that hero, tinkling with the sound of a hundred bells. Then O monarch, in that battle with that huge standard, that foremost of the Kurus viz your son appeared highly beautiful. These nine excellent standards rose high amidst your troops and they lighted up your army, even like the suns that rise at the end of a Yuga. The tenth standard there, was the mighty ape belonging to Arjuna;

30—32. With that standard Arjuna looked like a mountain lighted up by fire. Then many mighty car-warriors all afflicters of their foes, quickly took up, for opposing Arjuna, their huge, white, and variegated bows. So also Pritha's son of godly achievements took up his bow capable of slaughtering the foe, namely the Gandiva; and all this was owing to your crooked policy. Through your fault, in that battle, were slain numerous kings,

33. Invited from various countries, with their steeds and elephants and chariots. Then roaring at one another they fall upon one another,

34. Headed as they were by Duryodhana on one side and by that foremost of the Pandavas on the other. Then that son of Kunti having Krishna for his charioteer, inspired his foes with wonder,

35. Inasmuch as he, though single handed, dauntlessly encountered the numerous odds against him; then that mighty armed one appeared beautiful, stretching his bow Gandiva;

36—37. And desirous of defeating those best of men ranged against him, and of slaughtering Jayadratha the ruler of the Siudhus, that foremost of men, that scorcher of his foes, viz Arjuna discharging his arrows by thousands, made all the soldiers of your army invisible. Thereupon those mighty car-warriors, those best of men, also rendered Pritha's son

38. Invisible in that battle, with the shower of their shafts poured from all sides. Thus when that foremost of the Kurus Arjuna had been surrounded by those foremost of men, the uproar that was raised in your army was indeed very great and deafening.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifth chapter, the description of the standards, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CVI.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. When Arjuna had got the Sindhu king within reach, what, O Sanjaya, did the Panchalas, assailed by Bharadawjas's son, do, encountering the Kurus?

Sanjaya said :—

2. On that afternoon, O mighty monarch, in that hair-stirring battle that then raged between the Panchalas and the Kurus, Drona became, as it were, the stake for which they fought.

3. Filled with delight and a desire for slaying Drona, the Panchalas, O sire, poured showers of arrows and uttered loud war-cries.

4. That battle between the Kurus and the Panchalas, dreadful, confused, and wonderful, was like that which was fought between the Gods and the Asuras in days gone by.

5. Then all the Panchalas accompanied by the Pandavas, reaching Drona's chariot, displayed many mighty weapons, with a view to break through Drona's array.

6. Car-warriors mounted on their cars, causing the earth to shake under them, and pouring their arrowy showers, proceeded towards Drona's car in a medium speed.

7. Then Vrihatkshatra, that mighty car-warrior among the Kekayas, rushed upon Drona discharging whetted arrows, resembling the thunderbolt of the great Indra.

8. Thereupon Kshemadhurti of illustrious renown quickly rushed against Vrihadkshatra, shooting sharp shafts by hundreds and thousands.

9. Then again Dhristaketu that foremost among the Chedis, urged on by his great strength, quickly rushed against Kshemadhurti like the great Indra advancing upon the Asura Samvara.

10. Beholding this latter rush with great impetuousity like the Destroyer with mouth wide open, the mighty bowman, Viradwana proceeded in all haste against him.

11. Then the valarous Drona began to resist king Yudhisthira and his troops, when they were exerting themselves for obtaining victory.

12. O master, your son Vikarna endued with great might, assailed Nakula,—endued with strength and versed in the art of fighting,—who had been proceeding to fight.

13. That crusher of foes namely Durmukha, with many thousand swift-coursing arrows, covered Sahadeva who had been making towards himself.

14. Vyaghradanta held in check Satyaki that foremost of men, and he caused the latter to tremble incessantly with his sharp shafts properly whetted.

15. The son of Somadatta resisted those best of men and foremost of car warriors viz the sons of Draupadi, who filled with rage, had been shooting excellents shafts.

16. That mighty car-warrior the son of Rishyasringa, of dreadful appearance and fierce temper, opposed the enraged Bhimasena rushing upon Drona.

17. Then between that man and that Rakshasa, raged a fight that resembled, O king, the one that took place between Rama and Ravana in days gone by.

18. Then, O Bharata, that best of the Bharatas, viz king Yudhisthira pierced Drona on all his vital limbs with ninety shafts of depressed knots.

19. Thus exasperated by the illustrious son of Kunti, O foremost of the Bharatas, Drona struck him on the chest with twenty-five arrows.

20. Then once more, with twenty shafts, Drona peirced him and his steeds, charioteer and standard, before the very eyes of all the bowmen present.

21. Then that son of Pandu, of virtuous soul, with his own showers of arrows checked those discharged by Drona, displaying great lightness of hands.

22. Then that best of bowman viz Drona excited to the highest pitch of fury, in that fight with the very virtuous king Yudhisthira, cut off the bow of that illustrious warrior.

23. Thus depriving Yudhisthira of the use of his bow, that mighty warrior Drona quickly filled the pores of the latter's body with many thousand shafts.

24. Then beholding the king rendered invinsible by the arrows of Bharadwaja's son, all creatures took him to be slain in battle.

25. Some thought that he had been compelled to turn his face away from the field. Some exclaimed saying :—"That foremost of the king has been slain by the illustrious Brahmana."

26. Thus the very virtuous king Yudhisthira was put in a very dangerous position. Then leaving aside his bow cut off by Bharadwaja's son in that battle, he

27. Took up another effulgent bow of celestial make and endued with greater toughness. Then all those arrows shot by thousands by Drona,

28. That hero cut off in battle. Indeed this looked wonderful. O king, having cut off all those arrows, and with his eyes rendered coppery in rage,

29. He took up a lance capable of penetrating even though the very mountains—lance, of which the stave was of gold, which was terror-inspiring, dreadful and furnished with eight bells.

30. Wielding that lance that mighty warrior became filled with rage and uttered a loud war-cry. And O Bharata, with that war-cry of his, he seemed to frighten all creatures.

31. Beholding that lance raised by the very virtuous king in that battle, all creatures present, pronounced benedictions on Drona.

32. Then that lance hurled by the arms of the king, resembling a snake that has cast off its slough, and illumining the cardinal and subsidiary quaters,

33. Coursed towards Drona's division like a she-snake of fiery mouth. Then O ruler off men, beholding that lance coursing towards himself with great force,

34. Drona that foremost of all warrior versed in the use of weapons, invoked into existence the Brahma weapon. That weapon, having burnt into ashes that terrible-looking lance

35—36. Flew quickly towards the chariot of the illustrious son of Pandu. Thereupon king Yudhisthira endued with great prudence, O sire, baffled that weapon of Drona flying at himself, by invoking the Brahma weapon. Then also piercing Drona with five depressed-knotted,

37. Razor-headed shafts of great sharpness, he cut off his mighty bow. Thereupon Drona, that crusher of foes, leaving aside the severed bow,

38. Hurled, O sire, quickly a mace upon the son of Dharma (Yudhisthira). Then beholding that mace fall quickly upon himself, king Yudhisthira,

39. Took up another mace, and O afflicter of your foes, he also hurled it. Those two maces hurled with force, clashing against one another, 40-41. Emitted fire in consequence of the dash and then fell on the ground. Then highly enraged, O sire, Drona slew the horses of the very virtuous king Yudhisthira, with four excellent sharp shafts of keen-points. With another broad-headed shaft he cut off the latter's bow that resembled the rain-bow.

42. He cut down his standard with a single arrow and affiicted Pandu's son with another three. Then quickly jumping down from the chariot whose horses had been slain, Yudhisthira

43. Stood on the field, weaponless and with his arms upraised. O foremost of the Bharatas, beholding him carless, and specially, weaponless,

44. Drona of firm vow and great lightness of hands held in bay all the enemy's soldiers, O lord, by discharging numerous sharp arrows.

45. And like a fierce lion assailing a deer, he then assailed the king. Beholding the king assailed by Drona that slayer of foes,

46. The Pandavas began to exclaim saying, 'Alas Oh', the king is captured, the kihg is seized by the son of Bharadwaja.

47. Even these were the cries that were then uttered by the Pandava troops, O Bharata. Then ascending with quickness on the chariot of Sahadeva, king Yudhisthira the son of Kunti, fled away from the field of battle, being borne away by fleetest steeds.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixth chapter, the escape of Yudhisthira, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CVIII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then, O mighty monarch, Kshemadhurti, with numerous shafts pierced the advancing Vrihatkshatra, that valorous prince of the Kekayas, on the breast.

2. Thereupon king Vrihadkshatra, O monarch, desirous of breaking Drona's array, quickly pierced Kshemadhurti with ninety shafts of depressed knots.

3. Thereat Kshemadhurti excited to the highest pitch of fury, cut off the bow of the illustrious ruler of the Kekayas with a well-tempered and well-sharpened arrow.

4. Then having cut off his bow, he pierced that foremost wielder of the bow quickly in that battle with shafts of depressed knots.

5. After this Vrihadkshatra smilingly taking up another bow deprived the mighty car-warrior Kshemadhurti of the use of his car, steed, and charioteer.

6. Thereafter with a well-sharpened and well-tempered arrow he severed from the trunk of that king his head graced with resplendent ear-rings.

7. That head graced with curling locks and a beautiful diadem, suddenly cut off, fell on the earth and shone like a meteor dropped down from the heavens.

8. Thus having slain his adversary, the mighty car-warrior Vrihadkshatra became filled with delight; and he rushed quickly upon your troops, desirous of doing good to the Parthas.

9. The fierce bowman,, Viradhwanan endued with great prowess, began, O Bharata, to oppose Dhristaketu proceeding against Drona.

10. Those two warriors, having arrows for their teeth and endued with activity, meeting each other began to strike each-other with many thousand shafts.

11. Then these two foremost of men fought on with each other like two elephant leaders in rut, in a deep wood.

12. Then those two heroes endued with great prowess fought with each other out of desire for slaying each other, like two ferocious tigers fighting inside a mountain cave.

13. That awful fight, O ruler of men, indeed became a sight to look at; and Siddhas and Charanas, by thousands witnessed it with eyes expanded in wonder.

14. Then, O Bharata, Viradhwanan excited with rage, smilingly cut off the bow of Dhristaketu in twain with a broad-headed shaft.

15. Thereupon that mighty car-warrioe the ruler of the Chedis, leaving aside thr severed bow took up a huge lance of golden staff and iron head.

16. Then, O Bharata, balancing the lance of fierce energy with both his hands, he hurled it quickly at the car of Viradhanwan.

17. Wounded sore with that lance capable of killing all creatures, the latter with his heart rent open, quickly fell down on the Earth from his car.

18. When that heroic and mighty car-warrior of the Trigarttas had been slain, O master, your army was completely broken and routed by the Pandavas.

19. Durmukha then hurled sixty shafts at Sahadeva, and he uttered a loud war-cry defying in that battle that son of Pandu.

20. Thereupon the son of Madri excited with rage, smilingly pierced the advancing Durmukha, with many sharp arrows, the brother striking the brother.

21. Then beholding the mighty Durmukha fight with fury, Sahadeva struck him, O Bharata, with nine arrows.

22. Then that mighty hero, cutting off with a broad-headed shaft the standard of Durmukha, slew his four steeds with four arrows of great sharpness.

23. Then with another well-tempered and sharpened shaft, he severed the head of his charioteer from his trunk,—head that was graced with effulgent ear-rings.

24. Cutting off with a sharp razor-headed arrow the mighty bow of the Kuru-descendant, Sahadeva pierced him with five arrows.

25. Thereupon the cheerless Durmukha leaving that chariot of which the horses had been slain, ascended, O king, upon the car of Niramitra.

26. Thereat the enraged Sahadeva, that slayer of hostile heroes, in that fierce battle, slew Niramitra with a broad-headed shaft, O prince.

27. Then Niramitra that son of the Trigartta king, fell down from the terrace of his car, afflicting your troops with woe.

28. Slaying him, the mighty-armed Sahadeva shone like Dasaratha's son Rama after he had killed the mighty Rakshasa Khara.

29. O ruler of men, beholding the son of their king, the mighty car-warrior Nira-mitra slain, the Trigarttas uttered loud cries of Oh and Alas.

30. O king, Nakula then vanquished in a moment your son Vikarna of expanded eyes; that indeed seemed marvellous, O king.

31. Then in the midst of the troops Vyarghradutta rendered Satyaki, his horses, charioteer and standard, invisible, with numerous shafts of depressed knots.

32. Then the heroic grandson of Sini baffling those arrows like one accomplished in the art of fighting, felled with his arrows Vyaghradatta together with his horses, charioteer and standard.

33. Upon the fall of their prince the Magadhas, striving their best assailed Yuyudhana, O king.

34. Discharging arrows and Tomaras by thousands, as also Vindipalas, lancesi and mallets and bludgeons,

35—36, Those heroes fought on with the invincible Satwata hero, in battle. Then the indomitable Satyaki, that foremost of men endued with great strength without the slightest difficulty, smiling the while vanquished the Magadhas, and the few that survived, fled in all directions.

37. Beholding this, O master, your troops already afflicted with the shafts of Yuyudhana, broke and fled. Then that best of the descendants of Madhu's race, slaughtering in battle your warriors,

38, And stretching his mighty bow shone beautiful, endued as he was with great renown. Then, O king, the army routed by the illustrious Satwata hero,

39. Refused to return to the fight, frightened as they were by that mighty-armed hero. Thereat Drona, highly enraged, quickly casting his glance on Satyaki, himself rushed upon that hero of wonderful feat, incapable of being defeated.

Thus ends the one hundred and seventh chapter, the fight of Satyaki, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CVIII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. The illustrious son of Somadatta piercing each of those mighty bow men, the sons of Drupadi with five shafts, again pierced them with seven.

2. Thus deeply afflicted by that fierce warrior, the sons of Draupadi, O king, became confounded and knew not what to do in that fight.

3. Thereafter that crusher of foes, namely Nakula's son Satanika piercing that best of men viz Somadatta's son with two arrows, became filled with joy, and uttered a loud roar.

4. The rest of the brothers, then exerting their best in battle, pierced the irate son of Somadatta, each with ten straight-flying arrows.

5. Thereupon, O mighty monarch, the illnstrious son of Somadatta sped at them five arrows, and with each of those struck each of the brothers on the chest.

6. Thereupon those five brothers pierced by the arrows of that high-souled one, surrounding the hero, wounded him soon with their arrows.

7. Then the son of Arjuna filled with rage despatched the four horses of him to the region of Death with four whetted shafts.

8. The son of Bhimasena cutting of the bow of the illustrious son of Somadatta, uttered a fierce roar and pierced the latter with numerous sharp arrows.

9. The son of Yudhisthira felled his standard having at first cut it off; so also Nakula's son felled his charioteer from its place on the chariot.

10. Sahadeva's, son, then knowing him to be already vanquished by his brothers, cut off, O king, his head with a razor-headed arrow.

11. Then that head fell down on ground beautifying the field of battle—head that was adorned with gold and that equalled in effulgence the newly-risen sun.

12. Beholding the illustrious son of Somadatta slain, and his head roll on the ground, your troops, O king, greatly frightened, began to fly in all directions.

13. Alamvusha filled with rage, fought on with the highly powerful Bhimasena, like the son of Ravana fighting with Lakshamana.

14. Beholding then that man and that Rakshasa engaged in fight with each other, all creatures were filled with delight and wonder simultaneously.

15. Then, O king, with nine shafts of depressed knots, Bhima smilingly pierced, O king, that wrathful son of Rishysringa, that foremrst of Rakshasas.

16. Thereat the Rakshasa, thus pierced, uttering aloud fierce roars in that battle, rushed, supported by all his followers, upon Bhima.

17. That Rakshasa then piercing Bhima with five arrows of depressed knots, quickly slew thiry car-warriors engaged in supporting Bhima.

18. Once more slaying four hundred warriors, he pierced Bhima with winged shafts. Then thus deeply pierced by that Rakshasa, the highly puissant Bhima,

19. Squatted down on the terrace of his car, being overwhelmed with a swoon. Regaining his senses, the son of Maruta, overwhelmed with rage,

20. Stretched his dreadful and excellent bow capable of bearing a great strain and then he wounded Alamvusha on all parts of his body with sharp shafts.

21. Thus pierced with many shafts that Rakshasa resembling a heap of antimony looked beautiful, O king like a Kinsuka tree decorated with flowers.

22. Thus struck in that battle with arrows shot from Bhima's bow, and recollecting the slaughter of his brother by that illus trious son of Pandu, the Rakshasa

23. Caused his appearance to be dreadful, and addressing Bhimasena spoke these words :—"Stay, O son of Pritha, on the field of battle, and behold to-day the prowess I am endued with.

24. O you of perverted understanding, I had a brother by name Vaka who was the foremost of the Rakshasas, and endued with great prowess. He was slain by you; but that transpired out of my sight.'

25. Having thus spoken to Bhima, he became invisible then and there; and then he covered the former with a thick shower of arrows.

26. Bhima also O king filled the welkin with arrows of depressed knots, when that Rakshasa became invinsible in battle.

27. Thus wounded by Bhima, the Rakshasa soon got inside his chariot; and soon again he entered into the bowels of the earth and soon again becoming little, flew into the sky.

28. He assumed forms countless, and large and small. Sometimes assuming a subtle, sometimes a gross and sometimes a huge form, he began to roar like the clouds.

29. He spoke diverse kinds of words and uttered speeches everywhere. From the welkin then fell thousands of arrowy showers,

30. As also darts, Kunapas lances, pikes axes, spears, rockets, spiked maces, short javelins, battle-axes,

31. Rocks, scimitars treacle and swords and thunnerbolts. That dreadful shower of weapons created by that Rakshasa,

32. Slaughtered the soldiers of Pandu's son on the field of battle. In consequence of showers of weapons, many elephants of the Pandava host were killed,

33. As also numerons steeds and foot-soldiers, O king. Slain by the shafts of the Rakshasa, many car-warriors were dislodged from their seats in the car.

34—35. The Rakshasa then caused a river to flow on the field of battle, the waters of which were constituted by blood and eddies by cars; which abounded in alligators constituted by the elephants; which had the umbrellas of car-warriors for its swans and the flesh and marrow of animals for its mire; which was infested with snakes formed by the severed arms of human beings; which was frequented by many Rakshasas and other cannibals; and O king, which carried with its currents numerous Chedis, Panchalas, and Srinjayas.

36. O monarch, seeing him careering dauntlessly on the field of battle, and beholding his prowess, the Pandavas became filled with anxious thought.

37. The soldiers of your army were then filled with delight; the musical instruments were then struck up emitting fierce and deep sound, making the hair to stand erect.

38. Then hearing that mighty uproar of delight caused by your troops, the son of Pandu (Bhima) did hot tolerate it, even like a snake not tolerating the sound of the palm-stroke.

39. Then with his eyes coppery in rage and consuming the foe like fire itself, the son of Maruta invoked the Tshtra weapon like the god Tashtri himself.

40. Thereupon a thousand shafts started into existence form all sides. Great was the carnage that was then created in your troops by those arrows of Bhima.

41. That weapon discharged by Bhimasena in battle, nullifying the mighty illusion of the Rakshasa, began to afflict the Rakshasa himself.

42. Thus that Rakshasa wounded by Bhimasena in all parts of his body, fled towards Drona's division, abandoning his antagonist.

43. Then, O king, when that foremost of the Rakshasas had been worsted by the illustrious Bhimasena, the Pandavas filled the quarters with the echoes of their war-cries.

44. Then filled with delight, they applauded the mighty son of Maruta as the Marutas themselves applauded Sakra after he had vanquished Pralhada in battle.

Thus ends the one hundred and eighth chapter, the defeat of Alamvusha, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CIX.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Alamvush then began to career dauntlessly on another part of the field. And when he was thus carreering, Hidimva's son rushed against and quickly pierced him with whetted shafts.

2. Then like the battle between Sakra and Samvara in the days of yore, the battle between those two foremost of Rakshasas became terrible, as they invoked into existence many illusions.

3. Highly excited, Alamvusha began to strike Ghototkacha. The battle between those two best and foremost of the Rakshasas that then raged,

4—6. O master, resembled that between Rama and Ravana, that took place in days gone. Thereupon Ghotatkacha piercing Alamvusha on the breast with a score of Narachas utterred incessantly lion-like roars; so also, O king, piercing the invincible son of Hidimva repeatedly, Alamvusha became filled with delight, and he roared filling the welkin with his roars. Then those two foremost of the Rakshasas, both endued with might and both excited to the hightest pitch of fury,

7. Fought on with each other, desplaying numerous illusions, and none getting any advantage over the other. Creating hundreds of illusions and therewith confounding each other,

8. Those two Rakshasas, versed in illusive combats, fought on displaying illusions O king; and in that battle whatsoever illusions Ghatotkacha created,

9—11. Alamvusha nullified them with those of his own, O ruler of men. Then beholding that foremost of the Rakshasas, that one versed in the illusive mode of warfare, viz Alamvusha fight in that manner, the Pandavas became greatly enraged. Preyed upon by anxiety and excited with rage, Bhimasena and others, supported by many best car-warriors, assailed him with force. O sire, then they having completely surrounded him with the host of their cars,

12. Covered him from all sides, with their arrows, like men covering an elephant with blazing brands. Checking the force of their weapons with the illusive weapons of his own,

13. Alamvusha freed himself from the press of those cars, like an elephant freeing himself from a forest-conflagration. Then stretching his bow the twang of which resembled the roar of Indra's thunder, he

14. Pierced Maruta's son (Bhima) with twenty-five, Bhimasena's son with five, Yudhisthira with three and Sahadeva with five arrows.

15. Then again, O sire, piercing Nakula with seventy-three, and the sons of Draupadi, each with five arrows, he uttered a loud and dreadful war-cry.

16. Thereupon Bhimasena pierced the Rakshasa with nine arrows; Sahadeva pierced him with five and Yudhisthira with a hundred shafts.

17. Nakula pierced him with four and sixty and the sons of Draupadi each with three shafts seperately. The son of Hidimva then piercing the Rakshasa (Alamvusha), with five hundred arrows,

18. Once more pierced him with seventy arrows; and that highly powerful one sent up a loud roar. In consequence of that roar of his, the earth trembled,

19. With her mountains, forests trees and watery expanses. O king, peirced deeply by those mighty car-warriors, those fierce bowmen from all sides, Aalamvusha,

20. Pierced all of them in return with five shafts each. Then the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha became thoroughly enraged upon the angry Alamvusha.

21. And the former (the son of Hidimva) then pierced the latter with seven shafts. O king that foremost of the Rakshasas, endued with might viz Alamvusha, being pierced deeply by his powerful antagonist,

22. Quickly created numerous arrows, furnished with golden wings and whetted on stone. Those shafts of depressed knots then penetrated into the body of the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha,

23—24. Like angry snakes of great strength entering into a mountain summit. Thereupon, O king, the Pandavas and Ghatotkacha the son of Hidimva, filled with anxiety, began to sped sharp shafts at Alamvusha from all sides. Wounded sore in battle by the Pandavas desirous of securing victory, Alamvusha,

25. Mortal as he was, knew not what to do. Thereat that foremost combatant, the highly powerful son of Bhimasena,

26. Beholding him in that state, resolved to slay him. Then he rushed with great vehemence upon the car of that foremost of the Rakshasas (Alamvusha),

27. Car that resembled in effulgence the summit of a burning hill, or a broken heap of antimony. Burning with rage, Hidimva's son flew for his own chariot to that of his adversary, and seized the latter.

28. He then took the latter up from his chariot like Garuda taking up a snake. Then dragging him up with his arrows, and whirling him again and again,

29. Ghatotkacha dashad him against the earth like a man dashing a earthen jar full of water agninst a stone. Endued with might and agility, and possessed of prowess,

30. The son of Bhimasena inflamed with rage, began to frighten all your troops. With all his limbs crushed, his bones broken and appearing dreadful,

31. And slain by the heroic Ghatotkacha the Rakshasa Alamvsha looked like a Sala tree broken and uprooted by the wind. Upon the slaughter of that ranger of the night (Alamvusha), the Parthas, filled with delight,

32. Uttered loud roars and waived their garments in the air. Beholding that mightly foremost the Rakshasas slain,

33. And crushed like a mountain, your heroic warriors, O foremost of the Bharatas, uttered exclamations of Alas and Oh.

34. Filled with curiosity, people then came to see that Rakshasa who was lying on the field like a piece of charcoal (no longer capable of burning).

35. That best of all beings possessed of might viz the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha, slaying Alamvusha like Vasava laying Vala, uttered vey loud roars.

36. For having achieved that most difficult feat Ghototkacha was greatly praised by his sires and his other relatives. Indeed having felled his foe Alamvusha even like an Alamvusha fruit, he became filled with joy.

37. Then there arose among the pandavas a mighty din produced by the blare of conchs and the whizz of various kinds of weapons. Hearing that din the Kouravas uttered equally loud shouts in reply, filling completely the earth with their resonance.

Thus ends the one hundred and nineth chapter, the slaughter of Alamvusha in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona parva.

CHAPTER CX.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA BARVA)—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. Tell me in detail, O Sanjaya, how did Yuyudhana oppose in battle the son of Bharadwaja? I feel a great curiosity for knowing what happened then.

Sanjaya said:—

2. Hear, O highly intelligent king, the description of that hair-stirring battle that then took place between Drona on the one hand, and the Pandavas headed by Yuyudhana on the other.

3. Then, O sire, beholding the troops slaugtered by Yuyudhana, Drona himself assailed Satyaki of prowess incapable of being baffled.

4. Thereupou Satyaki pierced with five and twenty short arrows that mighty car-warrior the son of Bharadwaja, who had been advancing furiously against him.

5. Drona also, fighting heedfully, and putting forth his prowess, quickly pierced Yuyudhana, with five sharp arrows furnished with wings of gold.

6. These arrows piercing through the tough armour of Satyaki, drank the blood of Drona's enemy; and, O king, they then penetrated into the earth like snakes breathing furiously.

7. Then the long-armed Satyaki, like an elephant struck with the hook, became filled with fury; and he then pierced Drona with fifty Narachas, all resembling fire itself.

8. Pierced quickly by Yuyudhana in battle, the son of Bhardwaja, pierced Satyaki who had been fighting vigorously, with countless shafts.

9. Then again excited to the highest pitch of fury, that fierce bowman endued with great might, once more began to afflict him of the Satwata race, with arrows of depressed knots.

10. Thus repeatedly wounded by Bharadwaja's son in battle, O ruler of men, Satyaki could not decide as to what he should then do.

11. Then, O king, Yuyudhana's face became cheerless, as he saw Drona discharge numerous sharp arrows in battle.

12. Beholding Satyaki then in that plight, your sons and your troops, O ruler of men, became greatly delighted at heart and they began incessantly to roar like lions.

13. Hearing that dreadful din and seeing that descendant of Madhu's race sorely afflicted, O Bharata, king Yudhisthira addressing his troops spoke to them thus :—

14. "This foremost of the Vrishnis this hero Satyaki of indomitable prowess, is about to be destroyed in battle by the heroic Drona, like the sun by Rahu.

15. Charge and rush to the spot where Satyaki is fighting." Then that ruler of men, addressing the Panchala prince Dhristadyumna said :—

16. "Why do you tarry O son, of Prisata? Assail Drona quickly? Can you not see the great danger to ourselves that has arisen from Drona?

17. This fierce bowman Drona is playing with Yuyudhana in battle, like a boy playing with a bird bound with a string.

18. Let every one of my troops headed by Bhimasena and others and accompanied by yourself, rush to the spot where Yuyudhana's chariot is stationed.

19. Supported by my divisions, I will follow behind you. Do you all rescue Satyaki to-day who is now within the very teeth of death."

20. Having thus spoken, the king, O Bharata, supported by all his troops, charged Drona in that battle, for the sake of rescuing Yuyudhana.

21. May good betide you; the din that then arose there, when the Pandavas and the Srinjayas rushed against the single-handed Drona, was indeed very tremendous.

22. Then, O foremost of men, encountering Drona that son of Bharadwaja, that mighty car-warrior, they began to pour upon him showers of sharp arrows furnished with wings of Kanka-feathers, and the feathers of peacocks.

23. Then Drona received all those heroes similingly, even as a host receives his welcome guests with water, and the offer of seats.

24. Then like the guests becoming gratified with hospitality of their hosts, those heroes were gratified with the shafts sped at them by that bowman viz., the son of Bharadwaja.

25. They could not then behold the son of Bharadwaja, even as men cannot look at the midday sun of thousand rays, O lord.

26. Then that foremost of all wielders of weapons, viz., Drona afflicted all of them with his myriad shafts, even as the sun afflicts the objects of this earth with his myriad rays.

27. Slaughtered (ruthlessly), the Pandavas and the Srinjayas, O mighty monarch, could not find a protector, like elephants sunk in mire.

28. Like the burning rays of the sun scattering in all sides, the mighty arrows of Drona were then seen to scatter on all directions.

29. In that battle were slain twenty-five best Panchala heroes, all reckoned among Maharathas and all enjoying the favor of Dhristadyumna.

30. People then beheld the heroic Drona slay in succession the best warriors among the Pandavas and the Panchalas.

31. Slaying a hundred warriors from the Kekaya hosts and routing them conpletely, Drona stood on the field, O king, like the Destroyer with his mouth wide open.

32. Then, O ruler of men, the mighty-armed Drona vanquished hundreds and thousands of the Panchalas, the Srinjayas, the Matsyas, and the Kekayas.

33. Pierced by the arrows of Drona, the roar they then uttered, resembled that sent up by the denizen of the woods when the forest is burnt down by a conflagration.

34. Then, O king, all the celestials, the Gandharvas and the ancestral manes said :— 'Behold the Panchalas and the Pandavas, with their troops, fly away from the field of battle!"

35. Thus when Drona was slaying the Somakas in battle, none ventured to assail him and none was able to pierce him.

36. When that fight destructive of best and foremost heroes was thus raging with fury, Pritha's son Yudhisthira, suddenly heard the blast of the conch Panchajannya.

37. That prince of conchs viz., the Panchajannya, flled with the breath of Vasudeva's son, yielded loud blasts. When those heroes engaged in protecting the Sindhu ruler were thus fighting,

38. And when the Dhartarastra warriors were roaring before Vijaya's chariot, the din was so great that the twang of the Gandiva could not be heard.

39. Then the royal son of Pandu (Yudhisthira); overwhelmed with great anxiety, began to reflect thus :—'Surely everything is not well with Arjuna, as this conch-blast indicates,

40. And as the Kurus are roaring out rapturously every moment." Thus thinking and with a heart filled with anxiety,

41. Ajatasatru, the son of Kunti, addressing him of the Satwata race said these words. Though his voice was choked with the vapour of grief and though he was constantly overwhelmed with swoons, yet the king (Yudhisthira) then did not lose sight of what should be done next ; and addressing that foremost of the Sinis he then spoke thus :—

Yudhisthira said :—

42. O grandson of Sini, the hour for that duty which sages of the past have enjoined to be done towards a friend by a friend in times of need, has now arrived.

43. O foremost of the Sinis, thinking within myself, I cannot find out any one, among all my troops, who is a greater well-wisher of ours than yourself, O Satyaki.

42. He that is always well-affected, he that is always obedient, in my opinion, only he should be entrusted with the commission of a serious duty.

45. Just as Kesavas is ever devoted to the interests of the Pandavas, so also are you, O you of the Vrishni race, who are equal to Kesava himself in prowess.

46. I am now going to place a heavy burden on you ; and it befits you to bear that burden ; it behoves you not to disappoint my hopes.

47. O foremost of men, do you now assist Arjuna involved in great distress, who is your friend, brother, and your preceptor.

48. You are ever true to your vows and are endued with heroism, and the giver of assurances to your friends. In consequence of your feats, your are renowned in the worlds as one devoted to truthful speech.

49. O grandson of Sini, he that casts off this mortal frame in fighting for the cause of friends, becomes equal to him that gives away the earth as a gift to the twice born ones.

50. We have heard of numerous monarchs who attained to heaven having duly given away this earth as a gift to the Brahmanas.

51. O virtuous-souled one, with folded palms, I do beg of you even this, viz., that you attain, O master, the merit of giving away the earth as a gift, or of something better than that (by incurring the risk of beeing killed for the sake of Arjuna, your friend).

52. There is only one person, namely Krishna, that giver of assurances of safety to his friends, who is ever prepared to lay down his life for the sake of his friends. You, O Satyaki, are the second.

53. None but a hero volunteers to render help to another hero fighting courageously from a desire of winning fame. An ordinary man cannot do so.

54. O descendant of Madhu's race, when this is the course to be followed, I do not find any one else save yourself, who can become a help to Arjuna.

55. On one occasion, Arjuna applauding your achievements and repeatedly reciting them afforded me great pleasure.

56. He said—'Satyaki is endued with great lightness of hands; he is versed in all modes of warfare ; he is very agile, prudent, acquainted with the use of all weapons and endowed with bravery. He is never confounded in the course of a fight.

57. That high-souled and mighty car-warrior possesses broad shoulders, broad chest, long arms, large jaws, great strength and unrivalled prowess.

58. He is both my pupil and friend. I am dear to him and he is dear to me. And if Yududhana renders me help, I can then crush the whole Kuru host completely.

59. O foremost of kings, even if Keshava dons the armour for rendering us aid, or if Rama, Anirudna. or the mighty car-warrior Pradyumna,

60. Or Gada, or Sarana or Samva with the Vrishnis does so, O mighty monarch, to assist us in battle,

61. Yet I shall select that foremost of men, that grandson of Sini of unbaffied prowess to assist me, in exclusion of the others, for, there is none equal to him,"

62. This is what Dhananjaya said to me in your absence in the Dawita forest while applauding your virtue's truly in an assembly of the righteous,

68. O descendant of the Vrishni race, it behoves you not to disappoint Dhananjaya and myself and Bhima.

64. When, returning from a sojourn to all the sacred places, I went to Dwaraka, I saw your reverence for Arjuna.

65. When at Upaplava, O grandson of Sini, I did not mark any one else who showed us greater love and affection, than yourself.

66—67. For showing kindness, therefore, to one who is your friend and preceptor, O mighty-armed hero, it behoves you, who are of noble lineage and who cherish reverence for us, to act in a way, O great bowman, worthy of your friendship, prowess, nobility of birth and devotion to truth, O descendant of Madhu's race.

68. Accoutered in armour by Drona himself, Suyodhana has sudnenly gone behind Arjuna. Ere this, the other mighty car-warriors of the Kouravas have pursued Arjuna.

69. We can also hear the defiant roars that the enemy is uttering against Arjuna. Therefore, O honoured hero, O grandson of Sini, it behoves you to hie yourself to Arjuna without delay.

70. Ourselves and Bhimasena supported by our troops, shall hold Drona in check if he tries to pursue you.

71. Behold, O grandson of Sini, the Bharata troops are broken and flying away; and as they fly, hear the loud wails they utter.

72. Like the very ocean in a Parva day agitated by a mighty tempest, the army of Dhirtarastra, O sire, is being agitated by Savysachin.

73. The dust raised by the swiftly moving chariots, horses, and foot soldiers, is gradually enveloping the entire army.

74. Behold the mighty Phalguna that destroyer of hostile heroes surrounded by the Sindhu-Souviras armed with lances and javelins and numbering countless heroes among their ranks.

75. Without defeating this army it will not be possible (for Arjuna) to vanquish the ruler of the Sindhus. All these warriors again are prepared to lay down their lives for the sake of the Sindhu king.

76. Behold the invincible army of the Dhritarastras, teeming with lances, arrows, excellent standards, heroes and elephants!

77. Hear the roar of their drums and the full blasts of their conchs, the uproar of war-cries and the rattle of their car-wheels!

78. Hear also the roars of elephants the yells of infantry and the cries of horsemen, as they proceed causing the earth to tremble underneath their tread.

79. In the front of Arjuna is the division of the Sindhus and in his rear is the division of Drona. The foes are so strong in number, O foremost of men, that they can even afflict the lord of the celestials.

80. Sunk in this fathomless ocean of troops, Arjuna may be deprived of his life. And if he be slain in battle, how can I live?

81. Is this great catostrophe, in the shape of Arjuna's death, to overtake me when you are alive? Of blue complexion, youthful in years, of curly locks and exceedingly beautiful, is that son of Pandu.

82. Light-handed in using the weapons, acquainted with various modes of warfare, that mighty armed hero, O sire, has entered into the ranks of the Bharata troops, at the hour of sun-rise; and the hour of sun-set is approacning fast.

83. O you of Vrishni's race, I do not know whether he lives or not. The host of the Kurus is like the mighty ocean itself.

84. O sire, single-handed has the mighty-armed Vibhatsu entered into the Bharata army which can not be encountered even by the celestials themselves in battle.

85. In this day's battle, my heart misgives me. Yonder also is Drona sorely afflicting my troops in battle.

86. You can see, O mighty-armed hero, how this twice-born one is careering in battle. When several tasks present themselves, you know perfectly which of them should be first attended to.

87. O bestower of honor, it behoves you to accomplish first that task which is the most serious, with great activity. Of all these tasks therefore, I do think the task of aiding Arjuna should be accomplished first.

88. The rescue of Arjuna therefore should be at first effected. I do not grieve for him of the Dasarha race, who is the Protector and the Lord of the universe.

89. I tell you truly that that foremost of men, is capable of vanquishing in battle all the three worlds united against him,

90. What to speak of this weak host of the sons Dhritarastra? But, O you of Vrishni's race, Arjuna is sorely pressed by numerous odds in battle.

91. He may lose his life. For this reason it is that I am so cheerless. Therefore do you follow in his track, even as men like you should do

92. For men like Arjuna, being urged on by men like myself. Of all the Vrishni heroes, two are reckoned as Atirathas in battle.

93. One among them is the mighty armed Pradyumna and the other is yourself, O Satwata hero, who both are well-known in the world. Equal to Narayana himself in the use of weapons, to Samkarsana in physical strength,

94. You are equal, O foremost of men, to Dhananjaya in bravery. You surpass Bhima and Drona and others versed in all modes of warfare.

95. The wise speak of you, O foremost of all male beings, saying—There is nothing unachievable by Satyaki.—O descendant of Madhu's race,

96. Therefore, O mighty hero, do you perform what I say to you, viz carry out the wishes of myself and of Arjuna and of all present here.

97. O mighty-armed one, it behoves you not to falsify our expectations. Disregardful of your dear life, do you begin to career like a hero in battle.

98. O grandson of Sini, the descendants of the Dasarha race never care for their lives in the course of fight. Avoidance of fight, indecision or hesitation to fight, and flying away from fight,

99. These practices of the coward and the mean, are never resorted to by the scions of the Dasarha race. O foremost of the Sinis, the illustrious Arjuna is your preceptor, O sire.

100. Vasudeva again is superior both to yourself and to Arjuna of great intelligence. Knowing this, I speak to you these words.

101. Do not disregard my words, for I am superior to all your superiors. Whatever I say to you, know that to be approved of by Vasudeva and by Arjuna.

102. All this I have spoken to you in right earnestness. Proceed where Dhananjaya is, O you of prowess incapable of being baffled, following these words of command uttered by me.

103. Do you, O sire, penetrate into this army of the wicked-minded sons of Dhritarastra. Entering into it and meeting duly with mighty car-warriors in battle, display O you of the Satwata race, the feats that you are capable of achieving and that are worthy of yourself.

Thus ends the one-hundred and tenth chapter, the words of Yudhisthira, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXI.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA—) Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1—2. Then that foremost of the Sinis viz Satyaki, hearing those words of the very virtuous king Yudhisthira,—words that were agreeable, salutary, fraught with sweet sounds, opportune, delightful and equitable,—replied, O foremost of the Bharatas, to him, saying:—

3. "O you of unfading glory, I have heard all the words you have spoken for Arjuna's sake—words that are delightful, equitable and conducive to fame.

4. At a time like the present, beholding one devoted to you like me, it behoves you, O mighty monarch, to command me as much as you can command Partha himself.

5. For the sake of Dhananjaya, I am ever prepared to sacrifice my very life. Commanded by you, what is there that I would not do in this great battle.

6. O ruler of men, commanded by you, I am ready to fight even with the three worlds with the Gods, Asuras and mortals therein, what to speak of this weak host of the Kurus?

7. I will, this day, fight with the entire army of Suyodhana and vanquish it in battle, O king. This I tell you for sooth.

8. Safely shall I reach Dhananjaya who is also safe, and after the slaughter of Jayadratha, we both shall come back to you, O king.

9. But, O foremost of men, I think it a duty to remind you of the words which were spoken to me by Vasudeva and the highly intelligent Phalguna.

10. I was repeatedly and strongly solicited by Arjuna in the very midst of all our troops, and at the hearing of Vasudeva's son, in these words.

11. "O you of Madhus race, to-day, with a cool understanding and resolving to fight nobly and resolutely, do you protect the king, till I succeed in slaying Jayadratha.

12. O mighty-armed hero, making over the monarch to you or to the mighty car-warrior Pradyumna only, can I go to slaughter Jayadratha, with an easy heart.

13. You know how formidable Drona is in battle,—Drona who is regarded as the foremost of the Kuru warriors. You also know the vow he made before the eyes of all, O master.

14. The son of Bharadwaja, eagerly longs to capture the very virtuous king Yudhisthira. Drona also is competent enough to afflict Yudhisthira in battle.

15. Now, making over the charge of the very virtuous king Yudhisthira, that best of men to you, I am to-day going to slaughter the ruler of the Sindhus.

16. Slaying Jayadratha in battle, I will return as soon as possible; O descendant of Madhu's race, meanwhile see that Drona may not capture Yudhisthira, by force.

17. O scion of Madhu's race, if that foremost of men Yudhisthira be captured by the son of Bharadwaja, I shall not be able to accomplish the slaughter of the king of the Sindhus, and my grief will be great.

18. If the truthful son of Pandu, that foremost of the Pandavas (Yudhisthira) be captured by Drona, it is evident that we shall have to go the forest in exile once more.

19. If Drona inflamed with rage succeeds in capturing Yudhisthira, it is evident my victory over Jayadratha will be productive of no good.

20, Thereupon, O scion of Madhu's race, O mighty-armed one, do you undertake to protect the king in battle, for my sake, and for the sake of winning victory and fame."

21. Thus do you see, O king, that you have been made over to me as a sacred trust by Savyasachin, afraid as he ever is of the son of Bharadwaja, on your account.

22. I see every day, O mighty-armed one that except Rukmini's son there is no one who can be a match for Drona in battle, O master.

23—24. I also am regarded to be a match for the intelligent son of Bharadwaja. So it is evident, I cannot falsify that reputation which I enjoy, or disregard the behests of my preceptor Arjuna, or leave you, O king, alone. The preceptor Drona, covered with impenetrable armour as he is, and endued with great lightness of hands,

25. Obtaining you in battle, will sport with you as boy with an innocent bird. If that son of Krishna bearing the Makara as a device on his banner, were here with his bow,

26. I could have made you over to his protection and he could have protected, you like Arjuna himself. You should look after your own protection. Who shall protect you when I am gone ?

27. Who will advance against Drona for protecting you, when I shall proceed towards Arjuna ? Let no fear, O king, assail your heart to-day on Arjana's account.

28. That mighty-armed one will never succumb under the heaviest of burdens. Those warriors that are ranged against him, viz. the Souvirakas, the Sindhus, the Pouravas,

29. The Northerners, the Southerners and all other mighty car-wariors, and O king, they that are headed by Karna, and are regarded to be most excellent warriors,

30. All these warriors, taken together, can not equal the sixteenth part of Arjuna, when he becomes angry. The whole earth rising against him, with her gods, Asuras, and men,

31. And the Rakshasas, the Kinnaras and the reptiles, O king, in fact, with all the mobile and immobile creatures, can not withstand Pritha's son Arjuna in battle.

32. Knowing this, O king, let your apprehension on Dhananjaya's account be discarded, O mighty-monarch. Where the two heroic Krishnas, both fierce bowmen and both of prowess incapable of being baffled are present,

33. There can not happen the slightest impedement to their purpose. Think of the celestial prowess, the accomplishment in the use of weapons, the vast resources, the fierceness, the gratefulness and the kind-heartedness of your brother in battle. When I shall leave this place for proceeding towards Arjuna,

35. Think also of Drona, of the worderful know- ledge of weapons he will display in battle; O king, the preceptor earnestly longs to capture you in battle.

36. And, O Bharata, he endeavours to keep his vow inviolate and true. Would you be able to protect yourself ? Who shall protect you when I am gone ?

37. Who is he, whom I may entrust with your protection and then go towrads Arjuna, O king ? O mighty monarch, without making over the charge of protecting you in this battle, to sombody else,

38. I can not go away, O you of Kuru's race. This I tell you truly; O foremost of persons gifted with intelligence, considering the matter thoroughly from every point of view with the help of your understanding and ascertaining your highest good, do you commaud me, O king.

Yndhisthira said :—

39. O descendant of Madhu's race, O mighty-armed one, it is even so as you say. But inspite of all this, my mind is not very sanguine regarding Arjuna that owner of white horses, O sire.

40. I shall try my best to protect myself. Do you go, commanded by me, to the spot where Dhananjaya has gone.

41. The protection of myself in battle and the necessity of rendering aid to Dhananjaya, weighing these two propositions in the balance of my understanding, I prefer that you should do the latter.

42. Therefore prepare yourself for proceeding to the spot where Dhananjaya has gone. The highly powerful Bhima will look after my protection.

43. The son of Prisata with his uterine brothers, these mighty kings, and the sons of Draupadi, O sire, will certainly, protect me.

44. The five Kekaya brothers, the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha, and Virata, Drupada, and the mighty car-warrior Sikhandin,

45. Dhristaketu, the puissant Kuntivoja and O sire, Nakula, Sahadeva, and the Srinjayas,

46. These warriors all, with great care, will surely exert themselves for protecting me. Neither Drona at the head of his troops, nor Kritavarman,

47—48. Will be able to defeat or afflict us. Dhristadyumna also that scorcher of foes, putting forth all his prowess in battle will hold the enraged Drona in check like the banks resisting the mighty main. In battle, where that slayer of foes viz the son of Prisata will present him,

49. There Drona will not be able to pierce with force, our troops. For the destruction of Drona, Dhristadyumna has come out of fire,

50. Cased in mail, armed with shafts, swords, bow and decked with many ornaments. Therefore, O grandson of Sini, go with an easy heart, and entertain no anxiety on my account. Dhristadyumna himself will resist the enraged Drona in battle.

Thus ends the one-hundred and eleventh chapter, the words of Yudhisthira, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona parva.

CHAPTER CXII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Hearing those words of the very virtuous king Yudhisthira, that foremost of the Sinis, became afraid of the reproach he would incur at Arjuna's hands, if he would leave the king.

2. But seeing the certainty of an imputation of cowardice by the people (if he were to disobey the words of Yudhisthira), he thus thought within himself. "Let not men say that I am afraid of proceeding to the rescue of Arjuna."

3. Thus thinking over the matter in various ways, that foremost of men, the invincible Satyaki, spoke these words to the very virtuous king Yudhisthira.

4. "May good betide you, O king. If you think that these arrangements will be sufficient to ensure your safety, O ruler of men, then I shall go towards Vibhatsu and carry out your command.

5. There is nothing dearer to my soul in the three worlds, than that son of Pandu (Arjuna). This I tell you in all earnestness.

6. O bestower of honor, with your permission, I will follow his track. There is nothing that I shall not do for your sake.

7. O best of men, the commands of my preceptor are ever worthy of my attention. But your words are all the more so.

8. The brothers Krishna and Arjuna are ever engaged in achieving your good ; O best of all kings, know me also to be devoted to your welfare.

9. Holding your behest on my head, I will, O lord, proceed piercing this impenetrable army, for rendering help, O best of men, to that son of Pandu.

10. Here shall, I plunge into the divisions of Drona, excited as I am with rage. I shall then dart through it like a fish through the ocean, O king, to the spot where king Jayadratha

11. Stays, protected by his troops and trembling in fear of the son of Pandu, and depending upon those foremost of car-warriors viz Drona's son, Karna, Kripa and others.

12. This distance, O king, between this place and the spot where Arjuna is exerting himself for the slaughter of Jayadratha, measures full three Yojanas.

13. But though Partha is three Yojanas away from this place, yet I shall pursue his track with a firm heart, and support him till the slaughter of Jayadratha is accomplished.

14. Unless commanded by his preceptors, what man goes to battle with his enemies? When again commanded, O king, like myself, by his preceptors, what man is there that would not fight?

15. I know the spot, O king, whither I have to go. Teeming as it does with plough-shares, lances, maces darts, bludgeons,

16. Arrows, and other weapons, I shall still agitate this ocean-like host. This elephant division, numbering a thousand elephants strong, that you see,

17. All belonging to the breed known as Anjana, and all possessed of great prowess, and ridden by numerous Mlechchas delighting in battle and skilled in smiting down,

18. These elephants shedding the temporal juice like clouds pouring rain,—they never turn back when goaded on by those on their backs.

19. They can not be defeated unless they are slaughtered, O king. Then again yon car-warriors thousands strong in number, whom you can see,

20. Are of royal extraction and are all recongnised as Maharathas. All of them are owners of golden chariots. They are accomplished in the use of weapons, in fighting upon cars and on the backs of elephants, O king !

21. Masters in the art of bowmanship, they are well-skilled in fighting with their fist also. They are skilled in fighting with maces and also in close quarters.

22. They are eqnally active in fighting with the sword and falling upon the foe with sword and buckler. They are courageous, learned and insprired with a desire for outvieing one another.

23. O king, they every day conquer countless warriors. They are under Karna's commmand and devotedly follow Dussasana.

24. Even Vasudeva's son praises these men as mighty car-warriors. Always solicitious of doing good to the Kurus, they are obedient to Karna.

25. Returning, at Karna's command, from their pursuit of Arjuna of white steeds, and so unfatigued and in-exhausted, those brave warriors, accoutered in impenetrable mail, and armed with tough bows,

26. Are made to wait for me at Duryodhana's command. For your good, O foremost descendant of the Kuru race, crushing these warriors in battle,

27. I will follow from behind the track laid open by Savyasachin. Those other elephants, O monarch, full seven hundred in nunber,

28—29. That you can see, all covered with armours, ridden by Kiratas, and adorned with ornaments, were formerly presented by the king of the Kiratas, together with many servants, to Savyasachin; O King these were at first engaged in doing your good.

30. Behold the changes brought about by time, in as much as, they are now ranged to fight against you. The Kiratas indomitable, in battle are their guides.

31. Skilful in guiding elephants and all sprung from fire, they were all unitedly defeated in battle by Savyasachin.

32. Obedient to the commands of Duryodhana, they are now waiting unitedly to receive me. Slaying, O king, these Kiratas indomitable in battle, by means of these shafts,

33. I will follow in the track of Pundu's son intent on the slaughter of the Sindhu king. Those other elephants sprung from the race of the Anjanas,

34. Of tough hide, well-trained, and shedding secretions from their temples and mouth, and covered with armours made entirely of gold,

35. Those elephants are all very useful in battle and equal to Airavat himself. These have come from the northern hills and are mounted by fierce robbers,

36. Possessed of strong limbs, cased in armours, and all excellent fighters. There are, amongst them persons born of the cow, of the ape,

37—38. Or of diverse other creatures, including those born of men; that division of the sinful Mlechchas assembled together, and come from the strongholds of the Himavat hill, appear to be like volumes of smoke from this distance. Obtaining these and numerous other Kshatriyas,

39. As also Kripa, and Somadatta's son and that foremost of car-warriors viz. Drona, and the ruler of the Sindhus and Karna, as partisans, Duryodhana disregards the Pandavas.

40. He also thinks himself to be already crowned with success, being impelled by Fate. But to-day, all these warriors, coming within the reach of my Narachas,

41. Will not escape alive, O son of Kunti, even if they be gifted with the fleetness of the mind. Always held in honour by king Duryodhana ever-depending on the prowess of others,

42. They shall to-day meet with their destruction, being sorely afflicted by my arrowy showers. O king, those other warrior owning golden standards, whom you can see,

43. They are known as the irresistible Kamvojas. They are brave, learned, and practised in the use of the bow;

44. They are arranged in serried file and are resolved to stand firmly by one another. These Akshauhini of troops belonging to the sons of Dhritarastra, all inspired with rage,

45. And expectantly looking for me, are awaiting my arrival, being supported by numerous Kuru heroes. They are all cool-headed, O monarch, and long to receive me.

46—47. Them shall I consume, like fire consuming a heap of grass. Let, therefore, O king, those who are versed in equipping chariots, equip my chariot with numerous quivers and all other implements of war, and let these weapons be placed in porper places. Weapons of diverse kinds will have to be used in the terrible fight that will commence, ere long.

48. Let the chariot be stuffed with necessaries, five times more than what the professors of military science direct, in as much as, I shall have to encounter the united Kamvojas resembling fierce snakes of virulent poison.

49. I shall also have to engage with the Kiratas armed with various implements of war, who resemble virulent poison, who are accomplished in striking down,

50. Who have been favoured by the king and who in consequence, ever desire to achieve the good of Duryodhana. I shall also encounter the Sakas who resemble Indra himself in prowess,

51. Who are fierce as fire and difficult of being repressed like a raging conflagration. I shall have also to meet numerous other warriors, all irresistible and resembling Death himself.

52. I shall have to encounter, O king, countless indomitable warriors. For these reasons, let excellent steeds of the best breed and graced with auspicious marks be harnessed to my chariot, after they had drank their fill and been groomed properly.

Sanjaya said :—

53. Then king Yudhisthira directed quivers full of shafts, and various other kinds of weapons, and all other necessaries, to be placed in the chariot of Satyaki.

54. Then people caused the four excellent steeds yoked to his car to drink juicy and intoxicating liquors.

55. Having caused those four steeds to slake their thirsts, and walk and bathe and eat, and having decked them with garlands of gold, men plucked the arrows out of their bodies;

56. Those animals that had been unharnessed for these operations, that were of golden hue, well-trained, endued with great fleetness, cheerful and extremely docile, were gain properly yoked to his chariot.

57—58. On the top of that chariot was mounted a tall standard bearing the device of a lion of golden manes. The standard was decked with bannerets of the hue of white clouds and it was graced with golden circles and pearls and corals. An umbrella with a huge golden staff was also placed upon that car that was groaning under the burden of weapons.

59. When those horses decked with golden caparisons had been yoked to the car, the younger brother of Daruka, who was Satyaki's friend and charioteer,

60. Came and represented to him that the car was ready, even as Matali informs Indra about the equipment of his car. Then Satyaki, having taken a bath and having purified himself and having under gone every auspicious ceremony,

61. Gave away unto the Snataka Brahmanas thousands of golden Nikshasas. Then blessed with the benedictions the latter pronounced upon him, that foremost of handsome-looking men,

62. That hero worthy of adoration, having drunk Kailataka honey, appeared exceedidgly beautiful with reddened eyes rolling in intoxication.

63. Having touched a brazen mirror, and being highly delighted, he became filled with double his ordinary energy and looked like the blazing fire.

64. Taking upon his shoulder his bow and arrows that best of car-warriors, covered in mail and adorned with ornaments, made the twice-born ones perform the rites of propitiation on his behalf.

65. Handsome damsels then adored him by covering him with a shower of fried paddy, perfumes and garlands of flowers. Thereafter that brave warrior with folded palms worshipped Yudhisthira's feet;

66. Whereupon the latter smelt his head. Having undergone all these ceremonies he mounted his chariot. Thereafter those horses, cheerful, plump, of the fleetness of the wind,

67. Invincible in battle, and of the Sindhu breed, were on the point of dragging that excellent chariot of Satyaki. Bhimasena also, similarly, honored by the very virtuous king Yudhisthira,

68. Set out with Satyaki, after having duly saluted the king (Yudhisthira). Beholding these two scorchers of foes cast their glances on your army,

69. All your warriors ranged against them with Drona at their head, stood still and motionless. Then beholding Bhima accoutered in mail follow him from behind,

70. The heroic Satyaki saluting him said these delightful words. Then Satyaki with his person filled with delight, spoke these very words addressing Bhima :—

71. "O Bhima, do you protect the king, even this is your duty. I will proceed alone penetrating through this host whose hour has come ;

72. At present and in all future periods, it should be your first duty to protect the king. You know my prowess and I all know yours, O Subduer of foes,

73. Therefore, O Bhima, turn back, if you, desire to do my good." Thus spoken to Bhima replied to Satyaki saying : "Go you then and be victorious and successful !

74. O foremost of men, I will protect the king to the best of my prowes." Being thus adddressed he of Madhu's race, replied to Bhimasena saying :

75. "Turn back, turn back, O son of Pritha ; my victory to-day is certain in as much as you, won over by my merits, are now intent to carry out my wishes.

76. These auspicious omens also indicate my victory. When the sinful ruler of the Sindhus will be slain by the high-souled son of Pandu (Arjuna)

77. I shall embrace the illustrious king viz Yudhisthira." Having thus spoken to Bhima, the high-famed Satyaki left him.

78. He then cast his eyes on your troops like a tiger looking at herds of deer. O ruler of men, beholding him look at your army,

79. Your soldiers became once more confounded and they began to tremble. Thereafter Satyaki suddenly assailed your troops, desirous of meeting Arjuna, commanded by the virtuous king Yudhisthira to do so.

Thus ends the one-hundred and twelfth chapter, the penetration of Satynki into the Kourava troops, in the Jayadratha-badha, of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXIII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O monarch, when desirous of battle, Yuyudhana had proceeded against your army, king Yudhisthira the virtuous, supported by his troops,

2. Followed Yuyudhana from behind, with a view to reach the chariot of Drona, Thereafter, the son of the king of the Panchalas, that invincible warrior,

3. And king Vasudeva began to shout loudly amidst the Pandava troops. 'Come, strike, rush upon the foe quickly,

4. So that the invincible Satyaki may proceed easily. Many mighty car-warriors will strive hard for vanquishing him.'

5. Thus speaking, the mighty car-warriors of the Pandavas impetuously dashed against us. Indeed they then fell upon us exlaiming 'we will conquer those who will, rush against ourselves.'

6. Then a mighty uproar was heard near the car of Yuyudhana. Your son's troops, then covered with the shafts of Satyaki, began to run away from the field of battle.

7. O mighty monarch, your troops were then broken to hundred straggling bodies by that hero of the Satwata race. While that army was thus confused, that mighty car-warrior, the grandson of Sini,

8—9. Crushed down seven fierce bowmen all endued with heroism in the vanguard of our army. He also, O monarch, despatched, with his arrows resembling the tongues of fire, to the abode of death, many heroic rulers of diverse realms. Some times he pierced hundred warriors with a single shaft and sometimes a single warrior with a hundred shafts.

10. Elephant-riders and elephants, horsemen and horses, and car-warriors and their steeds and charioteers, Satyaki slew like Rudra slaying the beasts.

11. None of your troops then ventured to encounter Satyaki who was achieving many feats with extreme lightness and showering torrents of arrows.

12. They were then seized with panic being crushed and mangled by that long-armed hero ; and beholding that proud hero, they then began to run quickly away from the field of battle.

13. Although Satyaki was alone yet, your troop thought him to be multiplied into many. They were then confounded by his energy. Then with shattered chariots and crushed car-niches,

14. With Anukarshas, bannerets, golden helmets, broken wheels, torn umbrellas, and fallen standards,

15—16. And O ruler of men, with arms decked with sandal-paste, adorned with Angadas, with human thighs, resembling rtunks of elephants or the plump bodies of of snakes, the earth became literally covered over. With faces resembling the moon and with heads graced with beautiful ear-rings

17. Of warriors possessed of expansive eyes, the earth appeared exceedingly charming. With the mountain-like bodies of huge elephants cut to pieces and fallen on the field,

18—19. The earth appeared beautiful as if strewn over with hillocks. Crushed by that hero of long arms, horses, deprived of life and prostrate on the field of battle, appeared charming with their traces of burnished gold decked with strings of pearls and with their breastplates of excellent make.

20. Then he of the Satwata race penetrated into the ranks of your army slaying troops of diverse kinds and crushing your army completely.

21. Then Satyaki desired to go by the very track by which Dhananjaya had gone But he was there opposed by Drona.

22. Then the war-like Satyaki, inflamed as he was with rage, did not recede getting Drona as an opponent, even as the waters of the ocean does not recede encountering an embankment.

23. Resisting that mighty car-warrior Yuyudhana in battle, Drona pierced him with five sharp arrows all capable of penetrating to the very vitals.

24. Thereupon, O king, Satyaki in that battle, pierced Drona with seven arrows whetted on stone and furnished with golden wings as well as with wings made of the feathers of the Kanka and the peacock.

25. Drona in return, with six arrows, afflicted him and his steeds and charioteer. Then that mighty car-warrior Yuyudhana could not brook that act of Drona.

26. Uttering his war-cry aloud, Satyaki then pierced Drona at first with ten, then with six and again with eight arrrows.

27. Once more Yuyndhana pierced Drona with ten shafts, his charioteer with one, his four steeds with four other arrows.

28—29. O sire in that batte, he pierced Drona's standard with another arrow. Thereupon Drona quickly discharging his swift-flying arrows that resembled flights of locusts, covered Satyaki together with his steeds, charioteer, chariot and standard. So also Yuyudhana with countless swift-coursing shafts,

30. Covered Drona fearlessly; then Drona addressing him said: "Your preceptor has gone before, shunning me in battle as a veritable coward.

31. He avoided me though I was fighting, and proceeded keeping me in his right. You shall not, escape me to-day with life, provided you also do not shun me fighting, like your cowardly preceptor.

Satyaki said:—

32. At the command of the very virtuous king Yudhisthira, I am proceeding in the track of Dhananjaya. Good betide you, O Brahman. Let me lose no time.

33. The path which the preceptor follows is that which the pupil should follow. Therefore, I shall quickly follow that which my preceptor has followed.

Sanjaya said:—

34. Having thus spoken, that grandson of Sini, dashed forward avoiding the preceptor; and O king, then addressing his charioteer he said:—

35. "Drona will put forth every effort to check me in battle. So proceed very carefully. Hear also these words of mine of grave import.

36. Yonder is seen the highly resplendent division of the Avantis. Next to them is the mighty host composed of the warriors from the south.

37. Beyond this latter array is the division of the Valhikas, beyond which again stands the division of Karna, firmly resolved to fight.

38. O charioteer, though these divisions are distinct from one another, yet depending on one another, they are supporting one another.

39. Penetrating into these divisions, do you cheerfully urge the steeds on. O charioteer, carry me in a medium speed to the spot

40. Where the Valhikas are seen stationed with weapons uplifted, where stand the numerous Southerners headed by Suta's son Karna;

41. And where stands that division teeming with elephants horses and cars and foot-soldiers recruited from various realms."

42. Having thus spoken, and avoiding the Brahmana, he advanced addressing his charioteer thus, 'Pass through the breach between those two divisions towards the mighty and fierce host of Karna,'

43. Thereupon, inflamed with rage, Drona began to pursue the illustrious Yuyudhana who was proceeding steadily, discharging numerous arrows.

44. Then Satyaki afflicting Karna's mighty host with his sharp arrows, plunged into the infinite host of the Bharatas.

45. When Yuyudhana had thus entered into the ranks of your soldiers and when your soldiers were breaking away, Kritavarman inspired with rage opposed Satyaki.

46. The highly-puissant Satyaki struck him as he was advancing with six arrows; and then with four other shafts, he slew the latter's four steeds.

47. Then again Satyaki pierced Kritavarman on the breast, with sixteen swift-flying arrows of depressed knots.

48. O mighty monarch, thus pierced with numerous arrows of great fierceness by that Satwata hero, Kritavarman did not brook it.

49. Placing a Vatsadantha, capable of flying straight and resembling-fire, O king, on the string of his bow, Kritavarman drew it back to his very ears, and with that arrow then pierced Satyaki on the breast.

50. That arrow furnished with beautiful feathery wings, penetrating through the armour and body of Satyaki, entered the earth, being steeped in blood.

51. O monarch, then Kritavarman acquainted with many excellent weapons, cut off by means of his arrows, the bow of Satyaki having arrows fixed on its string.

52. Then again inflamed with rage, he pierced, O king, Satyaki of indomitable prowess on the chest, with ten shafts of great sharpness.

53. Thereat that foremost of all creatures endued with prowess, viz. Satyaki, seeing his bow cut asunder, wounded the right arm of Kritavarman with an excellent lance.

54. Then taking up and stretching a bow of toughter make, Yuyudhana swiftly discharged at his enemy hundreds and thousands of shafts;

55. And with that arrowy shower, he then completely covered Kritavarman and his chariot. Thus covering the son of Hridika, O monarch, Satyaki in that battle

56. Cut off with a Valla the head of the charioteer of his opponent, from his trunk. Thus slain, the driver of Kritavarman fell down from his niche on the chariot.

57. At this, the steeds of Kritavarman no longer guided by the driver's reins, flew away with great speed, from the field of battle. Thereat, greatly annoyed, the ruler of the Bhojas, himself checked his horses.

58. Then that heroic warrior stood bow in hand, ready once more for fight, seeing which your warriors applauded him highly. Taking respite for a moment only, Kritavarman urged his steeds on.

59. Himself quite undaunted, he struck terror into the hearts of his enemies. By this time however, Satyaki had proceeded leaving him behind; whereupon Kritavarman fell upon Bhimasena.

60. O mighty monarch, Yuyudhana also emerging out of the divisions of the Bhojas, quickly proceeded against the strong host of the Kamvojas.

61. There he was opposed by many heroic car-warriors; in consequence whereof, Satyaki of unbaffled prowess could not move even one step forward.

62. Thereafter uniting his troops, and vesting the ruler of the Bhoja's with their command, Drona with a firm resolve for fighting with Yuyudhana, rushed against him.

63. Then beholding Drona follow Yuyudhana from behind, the foremost warriors among the Kurus filled with delight began to impede his progress.

64. Meanwhile the Panchalas commanded by Bhimasena, encountering that foremost of car-warriors viz. Hridika's son, became greatly depressed at heart.

65. O king, then putting forth his energy, the heroic Kritavarman resisted all his foes who though depressed at first were then exerting vigorously.

66. With the shower of his arrows Kritavarman then checked the vehicles of his foes standing before him. The Pandava warriors though thus afflicted by the Bhoja king, yet stood like noble heroes, desirous of encountering the divisions of the Bhojas and of winning great renown in battle.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirteenth chapter, the penetration of the Kourava host by Satyaki, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXIV,

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. Our army is possessed of many excellencies; and it is composed of various kinds of troops; its efficiency is great. O Sanjaya, it is disposed of in order in perfect accordance to the rules of military science and it is strong in numbers.

2. The warriors therein are ever well-treated by us and they are attached to us very much. The army is not newly recruited and its aspect is wonderful. Its efficiency has been tested previously.

3. The warriors belonging to it are neither very old, nor very young; they are neither lean nor very corpulent. They are of active habits, well-built, strong-bodied and free from any disease.

4. They are clad in cuirasses, and well-epuipped with offensive weapons. They are accomplished in the use of various weapons, and are well practised in the exercise of all kinds of weapons.

5. They are experts in mounting upon and descending from vehicles, in moving forward and in falling back, in striking down effectually and in advancing and retreating.

6. They have before been examined in the management of steeds, elephants and cars; and after due examination, they have been employed on pay,

7. And not for the sake of family relationship, nor from favour, nor from kinship. They have not come uncalled for, nor are they unpaid soldiers.

8. They are high-born, respectable, ever-contented, well-fed, and submissive. They have been duly honoured and rewarded by ourselves. They are all endued with fame and intelligence.

9. They again, O sire, are defended by our best warriors, and others of pious practices, all of whom are foremost men and resemble the Lokapalas themselves.

10. Numerous kings solicitious of our welfare, who have, out of their own accord, joined us with all their forces and followers, also defend them.

11. Truly our army is like the vast ocean swelling with the waters of various streams flowing into it from all sides. It teems with chariots and steeds, which though devoid of wings are still capable of moving through the air like the winged rangers of the sky.

12. My army abounds in elephants with the temporal juice flowing down their cheeks. Then to what else, but Destiny, can the slaughter of such an army be attributed?

13. (Ocean-like as our army is), numerous warriors constitute its waters; and the various vehicles constitute its dreadful and surging waves. Innumerable maces, swords, darts, shafts and javelins constitute the oars plied on it.

14. Teeming with standards and ornaments, the cambatants form the lotuses on it. The swift-moving steeds and elephants and chargers constitute the tempest that lashes it into fury.

15. Drona forms its fathomless cave, Kritavarman its minghty lake, and Jalasandha its dreadful alligator and Karna, the rising of the moon that makes it swell with pride and energy.

16. O Sanjaya, on a single car that foremost of the Pandavas viz. Arjuna has gone piercing through my ocean-like host, and Yuyudhana also has followed him;

17. And O Sanjaya, when Savyasachin has thus penetrated into my host and also that excellent car-warrior Satyaki of the Satwata race has done so, I do not think that any one of my troops will be able to escape with his life.

18. Beholding those two heroes dash with speed through the vanguards of my troops and seeing the ruler of the Sindhus come within range of arrows shot from the Gandiva bow,

19. What course of action did the Kurus, goaded on to destruction by Fate, then adopt? What became of them at that hour when the battle raged with fury?

20. O son, I consider the assembled Kourava host already within the jaws of Death. Their prowess in battle is no longer seen to be what it once was.

21. Krishna and the son of Pandu have both entered into our troops, receiving not even the slightest wound. O Sanjaya, there is none also who can resist them.

22. Many mighty car-warriors and combatants have been admitted into our army after due examination. They all have been gratified by us with due remunerations and agreeable speeches.

23. There is none among my troops who has been mal-treated. Every one receives his pay and ration, according to his abilities.

24. O Sanjaya, there is none who is not a good warrior, none who receives renumeration less than what he deserves, or none who receives no pay.

25. The soldiers are honoured by me to the best of my resources, with gifs, honors, and seats. My sons, relatives, and my kinsmen, O son, all treat them in the same respectful manner as I do.

26. Even such troops, encountering Savayasachin in battle, are being vanquished by him; they are also being crushed by the grand son of Sini; what can it be but Destiny?

27. Those who are protecting and those who are protected, are following the same road, the defender and the defended!

28. Beholding Arjuna stand before the ruler of the Sindhus in hostile attiude, what measure did my highly foolish son adopt?

29. Beholding also Satyaki dash thorugh his troops like one fearless, what measures also did Duryodhana consider to be suitable to the situation?

30. Beholding those two foremost of car-warriors, both beyond the reach of all weapons, thus penetrate into my host, what resolution did my troops then form?

31. Meseems, beholding Krishna of the Dasarha race and that foremost of the Sinis, both exerting for the sake of Arjuna, my sons are giving way to grief.

32. Beholding him of the Satwata race and Arjuna pass through my divisions, and beholding the Kurus fly in all directions, meseems, my sons are giving way to grief.

33. Meseems, my sons are giving way to grief, beholding the car-warriors routed and hopeless of conquering their foes, and exert themselves in flying away.

34. Meseems my sons are giving way to grief, beholding the terraces of cars made empty by Satwata and Arjuna, and also beholding the warriors slain (by thousands).

35. Meseems my sons are lamenting beholding the steeds, the chariots, the elephants, and thousands of heroic soldiers flying away in haste from the field of battle.

36. Meseems my sons are lamenting, beholding the huge elephants of my army fly away smitten by the arrows of Arjuna, and also beholding them fallen and falling.

37. Meseems my sons are lamenting seeing steeds deprived of riders and warriors deprived of chariots, by Arjnna and Satyaki.

38. Meseems my sons are lamenting seeing large bodies of steeds slain and routed in all directions in battle, by the son of Pritha and the descendant of Madhu's race.

39. Meseems my sons are lamenting, hopeless of their victory, by seeing the divisions of infantry fly with haste in all direction.

40. Meseems my sons are lamenting beholding those two invincible heroes pass in a moment through the division of Drona.

41. O son, I am indeed overwhelmed with a stupor upon hearing that Krishna and Arjuna of unfading glory together with Satyaki of the Satwata race, have entered into my divisions.

42. When that foremost of car-warriors among the Sinis had plunged into my host and when he had passed through the Bhoja divi sion, what, O Sanjaya, did the Kurus do?

43. O Sanjaya, relate to me also, how the battle raged there where Drona began to crush the Pandava host in battle.

44. Drona was a warrior of superior skill; he was endued with strength, accomplished in the use of weapons and indomitable in battle. How was it then possible for the Panchalas to pierce that hero in battle?

45. Solicitious of Dhananjaya's victory, the Panchalas were Drona's implacable foes, so also that mighty car-warrior the son of Bharadwaja was an inveterate enemy of theirs.

46. O Sanjaya, skilful as you are in narration, tell me all that in detail which Arjuna did for bringing about the slaughter of the Sindhu king.

Sanjaya said:—

47. O foremost of the Bharatas, it behoves you not to lament like an ordinary person, when you are overtaken, O hero, by a calamity which owes its origin to your own misconduct.

48. Formerly, many of your well-wishers including the wise Vidura, advised you saying, 'O king do not forsake the sons of Pandu'; but to those advices you paid no heed.

49. He that sets at nought the advices of well-wishing friends, weeps like yourself when a calamity overtakes him.

50. O king, the descendant of the Dasarha race entreated you for the conclusion of peace. But the highly-renowned Krishna then did not obtain that boon at your hands.

51. Knowing your worthlessness, your partiality for your sons, your duplicity in in virtue, your animosity against the sons of Pandu, and

52. Ascertaining your crooked intentions against them, and listening to many of your incoherent and delerious bewailings, O foremost of kings,

53. That puissant lord of all the worlds, that one conversant with the truth of every thing in the worlds, namely, the son of Vasudeva, caused the drums of war to be sounded among the Kurus.

54. This awful destruction has overtaken you through your own faults; O giver of honor, it behoves you not to lay all blames on the shoulders of Duryodhana.

55. As these incidents developed themselves, no good action was performed by you either in the beginning, in the middle, or in the end, O Bharata. The defeat that can be anticipated now, is entirely owing to your fault.

56. Therefore, knowing as you do, the fate of this world, quietly and attentively hear how the battle that resembled that between the gods and the Asuras, took place.

57. When Sini's grandson of invincible prowess had entered into your troops, the troops of the Parthas headed by Bhimasena, fell upon your troops.

58. Then the mighty car-warrior Kritavarman, single-handed, received in that battle, the enraged Pandava troops who had been rushing to the battle with their followers.

59. Just as the banks resist the surging waves of the sea, so did the son of Hridika resist the Pandava troops in battle.

60. Then we beheld the wonderful prowess of Hridika's son inasmuch as the united divisions of the Parthas were unable to bear him down in battle.

61. Thereupon the mighty-armed Bhima piercing Kritavarman with three swift-coursing arrows, blew his conch-shell, imparting thereby delight unto the Pandava troops.

62. Then Sahadeva pierced Hridika's son with twenty, Yudhisthira the virtuous with five, and Nakula with a hundred shafts.

63. The sons of Draupadi pierced him with three and seventy, Ghatotkacha with seven, and Dhristadyumna pierced Kritavarman with three arrows.

64. Virata, Drupada, and Yajnaseni each pierced him with five shafts, Sikhandin also pierced Hridika's son with five swift flying arrows.

65—66. He then once more smilingly pierced him with twenty shafts. Thereupon, O king, Kritavarman piercing each of these mighty car-warriors separately with five shafts, pierced Bhima with another seven shafts. Then he felled from the latter's car his standard and cut off his bow.

67. Then that mighty car-warrior making haste and burning with rage, pierced Bhima whose bow had been severed, on the breast, with seventy sharp arrows.

68. That hero (Bhima) endued with prowess, thus deeply pierced by the excellent shafts of Hridika's son, began to tremble in the terrace of his car, like a mountain shaking during an earthquake.

69. Beholding Bhima thus involved in a dangerous situation, O king, the Pandava warriors headed by Yudhisthira, began to afflict Kritavarman by shooting numerous arrows.

70. Then impaling Kritavarman within a circle of chariots, the Pandava warriors, O sire, filled with delight, began to wound him with their arrows, out of a desire for rescuing the son of Maruta.

71. Thereafter the highly puissant Bhimasena regaining his senses, grasped, in that battle, a dreadful lance of golden staff and iron head.

72. Then he hurled from his own car that lance at the car of Kritavarman, with great force. That lance hurled by the arm of Bhima and resembling a snake that had recently cast off its slough,

73. Began to burn dreadfully as it coursed towards Kritavarman. Then as that lance, effulgent like the fiire that appears at the end of a Yuga, was coursing swiftly towards,

74. The son of Hridika, he cut it in twain with a couple of arrows. That dart decked with golden ornaments, thus severed, fell down on the earth,

75. And, O king, it there began to illumine the points of the compass like a mighty meteor dropping from the heavens. Thereat Bhima beholding his lance baffled, became excited to the highest pitch of fury.

76. Thereafter, taking up another bow of great toughness and emitting loud twang, the enraged Bhimasena in that battle began to resist the son of Hridika.

77. Then, O king, Bhima of awful prowess, pierced Kritavarman, on the centre of his breast, with five arrows. All this is the result of your wicked policy.

78. Then, O sire, the ruler of the Bhojas wounded on all parts of his body, appeared on the field of battle like a red Asoka tree covered with blossoms.

79. Thereafter Kritavarman inflamed with rage, smilingly striking Bhimasena with three arrows, began, in return, to pierce the other warriors (with his arrows).

80. That mighty bowman then pierced those car-warriors exerting] their best in battle, each with three shafts. They then also pierced him in return, each with seven shafts.

81. Then that mighty car-warrior of the Satwata race, inflamed with rage, smilingly cut off the bow of Sikhandin with a razor-headed arrow.

82. Thereupon on the severance of his bow, Sikhandin burning with rage and hastening as much as possible, took up a sword and a buckler decked with hundreds of moons.

83. Whirling that mighty sword decked with gold, Sikhandin hurled it at the chariot of Kritavarman.

84. O king, then that mighty sword, cutting off his bow with arrows placed on its string, dropped, O king, on the gronnd like a luminous body falling down from the skies.

85. Meanwhile many mighty car-warriors, making haste began to pierce Kritavarman deeply and quickly with their arrows.

86. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, taking up a fresh bow, and leaving the one cut off, that slayer of hostile heroes, namely Hridika's son,

87. Pierced the Pandavas in battle, each with three straight-flying arrows. He then pierced Sikhandin at first with three and then with five arrows.

88. Then the highly renowned Sikhandin also, taking up another bow, covered the son of Hridika with swift-flying arrows furnished with heads resembling the month of tortoises.

89. Then, O king, the son of Hridika, excited with wrath, in that battle, quickly rushed upon that mighty car-warrior that son of Yajnasena,

90. Who had been, O king, the cause of death of the illustrious Bhisma. Then the heroic Kritavarman displaying his prowess fell upon Sikhandin like a tiger falling upon an elephant.

91. Then those to subduers of foes, resembling two elephants guarding the points of the compass and looking like two blazing fires, attacked each other with their showers of arrows.

92. They stretched their two excellent bows, and placed many arrows on their bow-strings. Like two suns shooting numerous rays, they also shot myriad arrows.

93. Those two mighty car-worriors afflicting one another with their sharp-arrows, appeared beautiful like two suns that rise at the end of a Yuga.

94. In that battle then, Kritavarman pierced that mighty car-warrior the son of Yajanasena at first with seventy three, and then again with seven arrows.

95. Thus deeply pierced and extremely pained, the latter squatted down on the terrace of his car; and he lost hold of his arrows and bow and was overwhelmed with a swoon.

96. Then your troops, O foremost of men, beholding Sikhandin cheerless in battle, began to applaud Hridika's son, and they waived their garments in the air.

97. Then knowing Sikhandin to be afflicted sore with the arrows of the son of Hridika, his driver, in all haste, carried that mighty car-warrior away from the field of battle.

98. Beholding Sikhandin overthrown on the terrace of his car, the Parthas in that battle quickly surrounded Kritavarman with their chariots.

99. Then the mighty car-warrior Kritavarman filled his enemies with wonder, in asmuch as he alone succeeded in resisting the sons of Pritha and their followers in battle.

100. Conquering the Parthas, the mighty car-warrior Kritavarman vanquished the Chedis, the Panchalas, the Srinjayas and the valourous Kekayas.

101. Thus slaughtered by Hridika's son in battle, the Pandavas began to run hither and thither, and they could not then fight steadily.

102. Conquering the son of Pandu viz. Bhimasena in battle, Hridika's son then remained on the field, like a blazing fire free from even a single curl of smoke.

103. Those mighty car-warriors routed by the son of Hridika, were compelled to turn their faces leack, afflicted as they were with incessant showers of arrows.

Thus ends the one hundred and fourteenth chapter, the display of the prowess of Kritavarman, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXV.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Hear, O king, with undivided attention, the reply to the questions you have asked me. When the Pandava troops had been routed by the illustrious son of Hridika,

2. When the Parthas had been shamefully humiliated, and when your troops were filled with delight, it was Satyaki that became the protector of the Pandavas solicitous of protection, for their king was then in the fathomless depth of distress.

3. That hero viz. the grandson of Sini, hearing that fierce uproar of your army in that dreadful battle, quickly, O monarch, turned back and advanced against Kritavaman.

4. Then Hridika's son Kritavarman inflamed with wrath, covered the grandson of Sini with clouds of whetted arrows. Thereupon Satyki also became excited with rage.

5. Thereafter the grandson of Sini quickly sped at Kritavarman a whetted valla and four other shafts in that battle.

6. These arrows slew the steeds of Kritavarman and his bow was cut off by the valla. Thereafter Satyaki pierced his charioteer and the supporter of his rear, with numerous sharp arrows.

7. Thereafter depriving Kritavarman of the use of his chariot, Satyaki of prowess incapble of being baffled, began to afflict his divisions with arrows of depressed knots.

8. Afflicted with the arrows shot by the gandson of Sini, the army then began to break away. Then Satyaki of unbaffled prowess proceeded with great velocity.

9. Hear, O king, what feats were achieved by that hero endued with great prowess, at the cost of your troops. O mighty monarch, passing through the ocean-like host of Drona,

10. And vanquishing Kritavarman in battle, that hero Satyaki filled with joy, addressed his charioteer saying "Proceed slowly without fear."

11. Then beholding that army of yours teeming with car-warriors, horses, elephants, and foot-soldiers, he again addressed his charioteer saying :—

12. 'Yonder is the mighty division of elephants which you see on the left of Drona's host and which appears like a dark mass of clouds, and which is headed by Rukmaratha ;

13. O charioteer, they number many and are irrestible in battle. They have been deputed by Duryodhana to oppose me and are ready to cast off their lives any moment.

14. They are mounted by princely combatants who are all great bowmen, and capable of displaying great prowees in battle. Born in the Trigartta country, they are all illustrious car-warriors owning golden standards.

15. Those brave combatants with their faces turned towards me, are waiting for me desirous of battling with me. O charioteer drive the horses, quickly take me to that spot.

16. Before the very eyes of the son of Bharadwaja, I shall fight with the Trigarttas." Then that charioteer obedient to the behests of that hero of the Satwata race, began to proceed as directed.

17. The excellent steeds obedient to the reins of the charioteer, then bore Satyaki to the battle, on an effulgent chariot decked with standards and looking like the solar disc.

18. The steeds yoked to Satyaki's car resembled the wind in fleetness and were of the effulgence of silver, or the moon or the lotus. Then as Satyaki advanced in battle being borne by excellent steeds of the hue of conch-shells,

19. The brave Kourava warriors surrounded him with their elephant division, shooting sharp arrows of various kinds, all capable of penetrating through every thing.

20. Satyaki of the Satwata race then fought on with that elephant division, discharging many whetted shafts ; and he covered it with his arrows like clouds at the end of summer covering the mountain-breast with torrents of rain.

21. Wounded with arrows resembling in touch the thunderbolt of Indra shot by the heroic grandson of Sini, those elephants began to fly away leaving the field of battle.

22. With their tusks broken, bodies drenched with blood, heads and frontal globes rent open, and ears, faces and trunks cut off, and themselves deprived of their drivers and standards,

23. With their skin lacerated, their bells broken and their mighty standards cut off and blankets thrown off, those elephants, O king, having none to ride them, began to fly away in all directions.

24. They uttered various yells and roars that resembled the rumble of rain clouds. With Narachas, with Vatsadants, with Vallas, with Anja-likas,

25. With Kshurapras and cressentshaped arrows, they were then ript open by that hero of the Satwata race. Discharging urine and excreta, and shedding blood copiously, they then began to fly away.

26. Some then began to roll about, some limped, some fell down and some became pale and cheerless. Thus that elephant division afflicted by Yuyudhana

27. With his arrows that resembled the sun or the fire, began to fly away in all directions. When that elephant division was being thus slaughtered, the highly powerful Jalasandha,

28. With great force goaded the elephant he rode to words the car of Yuyudhana yoked with steeds of argentine hue. That nero then covered in a golden coat of mail, adorned with golden Angadas, and purified,

29. And graced with Kundalas and a diadem, and armed with a sword and anointed with red sandal paste, and wearing round his head an effulgent garland of gold,

30. And bearing on his breast a Niska hanging by a lustrous chain round the neck, and stretching his golden bow sitting on the back the elephants,

31. Appeared as beautiful, O mighty, monarch, as a mass of clouds surcharged with lightning. Then that elephant of the Magadha king, that was advancing with fury,

32. Satyaki checked like the continent resisting the surging waves of the sea. Then beholding the career of his elephant checked by the excellent arrows shot by Sini's grandson,

33—34. The highly puissant Jalasandha, O king, became greatly enraged. Then O mighty monarch, excited with rage, Jalason of pierced with tough arrows the grandsandha Sini on his broad breast. Thereafter with a valla, well whetted and tempered,

35—36. He cut off the bow of that Vrishni hero (Satyaki). Then O Bharata, the heroic ruler of the Magadhas pierced with five sharp arrows, Satyaki whose bow had been burst open. Then that highly powerful Satyaki being thus pierced with numerous arrows by Jalasandha,

37. Did not tremble in the least; that indeed appeared wonderful. Then that powerlul hero thought fearlessly of the shafts he should use.

38. Then takiug up another bow he said —wait wait. Having spoken these two words only, the grandson of Sini pierced Jalasandha on his broad chest,

39-40. With a group of sixty arrows, smiling all the while. Then with a razor-headed arrow of great sharpness, he cut off the mignty bow of Jalasandha and then pierced him with three shafts, thereat Jalasandha casting off that severed bow and the arrows fixed on its string,

41. Quickly hurled a Tomara at Satyaki O sire. That Tomora piercing through the left arm of the illustrious Madhava in that battle,

42. Entered the earth, like a mighty and dreadful snake breathing fiercely. When his left arm had been thus pierced Satyaki of prowess incapable of being baffled,

43. Wounded Jalasandha with thirty extremely sharp arrows. Thereupon the mighty Jalasandha grasped a sword,

44. And a shield made of bull's hide and decked with a hundred moons. Then whirling that sword in the air, he let it go towards the grandson of Sini.

45. Cutting off the bow of Sini's grandson, that sword then fell on the ground; and lying on the surface of the earth, it then appeared beautiful like a circle of fire.

46. Then taking up another bow capable of piercing all kinds of things, large as a Sala offshoot, and emitting twang resembling the rumble of Indra's thunder,

47—48. Satyaki inflamed with rage, began to stretch it; and then he pierced Jalasandha with the shafts shot from that bow. Then Satyaki that illustrious descendant of Madhu's race smilingly cut off the two arms of Jalasandha, decked with various ornaments. Then those arms resembling two bludgeons were seen to fall down from the back of the elephant,

49—50. Like a couple of five-hooded snakes dropping down from a mountain. Then with another razor-headed arrow Satyaki lopped off his adversary head graced with beautiful teeth and with a pair of charming ear-rings. The headless and armless trunk of dreadful aspect,

51. Then drenched Jalasandha's elephant with blood. Having slain Jalasandha in battle, he of the Satwata race speedily

52. Brought down the wooden structure from the back of that elephant. O king, steeped in blood, that elephant of Jalasandha,

53. Bore that precious seat hanging down from its back. Afflicted with the shafts of the Satwata hero, the huge animal crushed the ranks of its own party,

54. As it careered wildly uttering fierce yells of agony. Then, O sire, loud lamentations arose in the ranks of your soldiers,

55. At the sight of Jalasandha slain by that foremost of the Vrishnis. Your troops then turning away their faces began to fly away in all directions.

56. But hopeless of obtaining victory over the foe they immediately after resolved to fight to the bitter end. Meanwhile, Drona that foremost of all wielders of bow,

57. Approached the mighty car-warrior Yuyudhana, born by his flect steeds. Many best warriors of the Kuru host, then beholding the grandson of Sini inspired (with pride and fury),

58. Rushed at him in rage, accompanied by Drona himself. Then, O king, there ensued a fight between the Kurus headed by Drona on one side and Yuyudhana on the other, that resembled the dreadful battle that was fought in days gone by, between the Gods and the Asuras.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifteenth chapter, the slaughter of Jalasandha, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXVI.

(JAYADRATHA-BADH PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then, O mighty monarch, all those warriors accomplished in smiting down the foe and united together, began to fight with Yuyudhana quickly discharging numerous arrows.

2. Then Drona pierced Satyaki with seven and seventy shafts of great sharpness; Durmursana pierced him with twelve, and Dussaha with ten shafts.

3. Vikarna pierced Satyaki with thirty whetted shafts furnished with wings of Kanka feather, on his left side and on the centre of his chest.

4. O sire, Durmukha then pierced Sini's grandson with ten shafts, Dussasana pierced him with eight and Chitrasena with a couple of arrows.

5. Then with a mighty shower of arrows Duryodhana, O king, afflicted that mighty car-warrior the descendant of Madhu's race. O king, other heroic warriors followed his example.

6. Thus opposed on all sides by your sons, all mighty car-warriors, he of the Vrishni race began to pierce them all in return with distinct groups of straight-going shafts.

7. Satyaki pierced the son of Bharadwaja with three arrows, Dussaha with nine, Vikarna with twenty-five, Chitrasena with seven,

8. Durmarsena with twelve, Vivinsati with eight, Satyavrata with nine, and Vijaya with ten shafts.

9. Then that mighty car-warrior Satyaki, having pierced Rukmangada, stretching his bow puickly assailed your son Duryodhana who also was a mighty car-warrior.

10. Then with his arrows Satyaki deeply pierced the king of all creatures who is regarded as the best car-warrior in all the worlds. Thereupon a battle commenced between them.

11. Then those two mighty car-warriors discharging sharp arrows and placing other arrows on the bow-string, rendered each other invisible in battle.

12. Satyaki then pierced sore by the king of the Kurus, appeared highly beautiful. He shed blood copiously like a sandal tree discharging its sap.

13. Pierced with myriads of shafts by him of the Satwata race, your son appeared beautiful like a golden stake set up at a sacrifice.

14. Thereafter, O king, that descendant of Madhu's race, with a razor-headed shaft, cut off in battle the bow of the Kuru king that best weilder of the bow, smiling all the while.

15. Then he pierced the king whose bow had been severed, with numerous shafts. Thereat mangled with the arrows of his light-handed enemy,

16. In that battle, he could not bear this sign of the success of his enemy. Then taking up another bow of great toughness and golden staff,

17. He pierced Satyaki quickly with a group of hundred arrows. Pierced deeply by that great bowman endued with might, viz your son, Satyaki,

18. Under the influence of wrath began to afflict your son severely. Beholding the king thus afflicted, your other sons all mighty car-warriors,

19. Covered Satyaki with a shower of mighty arrows. Thus covered by your sons, all mighty car-warriors,

20. Satyaki piercing each with five arrows, again pierced each with seven shafts. He then quickly pierced Duryodhana with eight swift-coursing arrows.

21. Then smiling he cut off Duryodhana's bow that used to inspire terror into the hearts of the enemy. Then with his arrows, he cut down the latter's standard and the elephant of pearls embossed thereon.

22. Then slaying with four sharp arrows the four horses of Duryodhana, that illustrious warrior felled the charioteer of the latter with a razor-headed arrow.

23. After this, filled with delight he began to cover the king of the Kurus, that mighty car-warrior, with numerous arrows, all capable of penetrating to the very vitals.

24. Thus pierced by the excellent shafts of the grandson of Sini, O king, your son Duryodhana suddenly fled away from the field of battle.

25. He then ascended the car of Chitrasena that great bowman. Then cries of Alas and Oh were uttered by your troops as they beheld the king in that battle,

26. Devoured by Satyaki, like Soma in the skies devoured by Rahu. Then hearing that woeful exclamation, the mighty car-warrior Kritavarman,

27. Quickly proceeded to the spot where that mighty-descendant of Madhus's race, was fighting. He came stretching his bow and urging his steeds,

28. And encouraging his charioteer with the words 'Proceed in haste, Proceed in haste'. Beholding him come like the Destroyer himself with mouth wide open,

29. O mighty monarch, Yuyudana addressed his charioteer saying:—"Yonder is the heroic Kritavarman rushing at me on his chariot.

30. Encounter this foremost of all wielder of bow and drive your car before him." Then urging to the top of their speed those horses duly equipped,

31. The charioteer drove the car towards the king of the Bhojas held in high honor by all bowmen. Then highly excited and looking like two blazing fires,

32. Those two foremost of men encountered one another like two tigers endued with great agility. Then Kritavarman wounded the grandson of Sini with twenty-six

33—34. Sharp arrows all well-whetted; and his charioteer with five shafts. With four excellent shafts he pierced the four steeds of the Satwata hero,—steeds whose teeth were graceful and that were of the Sindhu breed. Then stretching his mighty-bow of golden back, that one of golden standards,

35—36. Decked with golden Andagas and clad in a golden mail, covered Satyaki with arrows of golden wings. Thereafter the grandson of Sini quickly sped numerous shafts at Kritavarman, as he was longing to have a sight of Dhananjaya. Pierced deeply by his powerful adversary, that scorcher of foes,

37—38. Bagan to tremble like a mountain during an earth-quake. Then Satyaki of prowess incapable of being baffled quickly pierced his four steeds with sixty-three and his charioteer with seven sharp arrows. Then Satyaki placed on his bow string a shaft furnished with golden wings,

39. That emitted great effulgence and looked like an enraged snake; that arrow that resembled the dart of Death, wounded Kritavarman sorely.

40. Then that fierce arrow, penetrating through the effulgent and gold-decked armour of Kritavarman, fell down on the ground, steepsd completely in blood.

41. Covered all over with blood, and afflicted with the arrows of the Satwata hero, Kritavarman, throwing aside his bow and arrow, fell upon his niche on the chariot.

42. That one of infinite prowess, and of teeth resembling those of the lion, that foremost of men, then fell on his knees on the terrace of his car, being afflicted by the arrows of Satyaki.

43. Thereafter Satyaki having successfully checked Kritavarman who resembled the thousand-armed Arjuna or the unagitable ocean itself, quickly advanced onwards.

44—45. Then passing through the division of Kritavarman, bristling with swords, lances and javelins, and teeming with elephants, steeds and cars, and shedding blood copiously, before the very eyes of all the troops that foremost of the descendants of Sini moved forwards like the slayer of Vritra passing through the Asura host.

46. Meanwhile the son of Hridika regaining his composure and grasping another mighty bow, stood on the field of battle checking the mighty Pandava hosts.

Thus ends the one hunded and sixteenth chapter, the defeat of Kritavarman, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXVII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA).

—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. When the troops on those parts of the field through which Sini's grandson had passed were compelled by him to tremble, the son of Bharadwaja covered him with a mighty shower of arrows.

2. Then a fierce fight commenced between Drona and him of the Satwata race, before the very eyes of all the troops—fight that resembled that between Vali and Vasava fought in the day's of yore.

3. Then Drona pierced Sini's grandson on the forehead with three beautiful shafts wholly made of iron and looking like so many snakes of virulent poison.

4. O mighty monarch, with those straight-going shafts struck on the forehead, Yuyudhana appeared beautiful like a mountain with three peaks.

5. Then Bharadwaja's son, ever on the watch for an opportunity for defeating his foes, once more sped at Satyaki shafts whose whizz resembled the rumble of Indra's thunder.

6. Then he of the Dasarha race conversant with many excellent weapons, cut off those shafts shot from Drona's bow and coming towards him, each with a couple of arrows equipped with excellent wings.

7. Then, O ruler of men, Drona beholding his light-handedness, smiled, and then pierced that foremost of Sini's descendant with thirty sharp arrows.

8. Then once more he pierced him with fifty and hundred shafts successively, thus surpassing with his own lightness of hands the lightness displayed by Yuyudhana.

9. Just as, O king, mighty snakes excited to fury, plunge off from the ant-hills,so from the car of Drona numerous shafts were seen to fly.

10. Similarly hundreds and thousands of shafts all capable of drinking blood, covered the car of Drona being discharged by Yuyudhana.

11. O sire, we were then not able to detect which of the two, that foremost of the Brahmanas, or he of the Satwata race, excelled the other in lightness of hands; but both of those best of men appeared to be equal.

12. Then excited to the highest pitch of fury, Satyaki struck Drona in battle with mine shafts of depressed knots. He also struck with sharp shafts, the standard,

13. And charioteer of Drona, before his very eyes. Then beholding the lightness of hands displayed by Yuyudhana, the mighty car-warrior Drona,

14. Piercing the charioteer of him of Madhu's race with seventy arrows, and the horses with three arrows each, cut off his standard with a single arrow.

15. Then with another broad-headed shaft equipped with golden wings, he cut off the bow of that illustrious descendant of Madhu's race.

16. Thereat that mighty car-warrior Satyaki highly excited with rage, laid aside his bow, and taking up a mighty mace, hurled it at the son of Bhardwaja.

17. Then Drona with numerous shafts of various appearance, baffled that mace made of iron and covered with silken cloth, as it coursed vehemently towards him.

18. Thereafter Satyaki of prowess incapable of being baffled taking up another bow, pierced the heroic son of Bharadwaja with numerous shafts whetted on stone.

19. Thus wounding Drona in battle he sent up his war-cry. But Drona that foremost of all wielders of weapons did not brook that war-cry of his.

20. Then taking up a lance of golden staff and iron-head, Drona hurled it vehemently at the car of that descendant of Madhu's race (Satyaki).

21. That lance resembling the Destroyer himself, without reaching the grandson of Sini, penetrated through his chariot and then fell on the ground, looking fierce and emitting a loud noise.

22. Thereafter, O king, Sini's grandson pierced Drona on his right arm with many winged shafts. Thus, O foremost of the Bharatas, Drona was greatly afflicted.

23. In that battle Drona also, O king, with a crescent-shaped arrow cut off the mighty bow of that descendant of Madhava; and he smote the latter's driver with a lance.

24. Satyaki's charioteer was then overwhelmed with a swoon in consequence of his being struck with that dart. For a while, he lay senseless on his niche on the car.

25. Then, O king, Satyaki achieved a super-human feat, in as much as he fought on with Drona and held the reins of his horses like his driver simultaneously.

26. Then, O ruler of men, with a cheerful appearance, the mighty car-warrior Yuyudhana, pierced in that battle that Brahmana with a set of hundred arrows.

27. At him then Drona sped, O Bharata, five shafts and those dreadful shafts penetrating through his armour drank his life-blood.

28. Pierced deeply with those fierce arrows Satayki became excited to the highest pitch of wrath; and then that hero began to shoot numerous arrows at him of the golden car.

29. He then felled Drona's driver by striking him with a single arrow; then with other arrows, he compelled his horses to run away from the field.

30. That resplendent chariot, O king, dragged over all parts of the field, began to describe various circles like the Sun in motion.

31. 'Rush,' 'seize the running steeds of Drona,'—these were the words that were then uttered loudly by the kings and princes of the Kourava host.

32. O king, then all those mighty car-warriors, leaving Satyaki in battle, proceeded to the spot where Drona was carried away by his horses.

33. Then once more seeing all those heroes routed and afflicted by the scion of the Satwate race, your troops once more began to give way, being overwhelmed with fear.

34. Drona, once more proceeding to the gate of the array of his troops, stationed himself there, borne away, as he was, by those steeds of the fleetness of the wind, that had been afflicted by the shafts of the Vrishni hero.

35. Then that highly puissant Drona, seeing his array shattered by the Pandavas and the Panchalas, did not try to check the grandson of Sini, but began to re-arrange his broken array.

36. Resisting the Pandavas and the Panchalas, the Drona-fire then, burning in rage, stationed himself there, consuming everything like the Sun that rises at the end of a Yuga.

Thus ends the one-hundred and seventeenth chapter, the display of Satyaki's prowess, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXVIII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Having defeated in battle Drona and other warriors of your army headed by Hridika's son, that foremost of men, that best scion of the Sini race, addressing smilingly his charioteer, said, O best of the Kurus, these words :—

2. "O charioteer, our opponents have already been consumed by Kesava and Phalguna. In defeating them again, we have only been (secondarily) instrumentral. Slaying them already slain by that foremost of men, viz the son of the celestial chief, we have but slain the slain."

3. Saying these words to his driver, that best of the Sinis, that illustrious bowman, that slayer of hostile heroes, that highly puissant warrior, shooting vehemently his arrows in all directions pounced upon the Kourava host like a hawk swooping down upon a piece of meat.

4. The warriors of the Kourava army, although they assailed him from all sides, were unable to resist that best of car-warriors resembling the thousand-rayed sun himself, that foremost of men, who having penetrated through the Kourava array, was advancing, borne by his excellent steeds that were white like the moon or the conch-shell.

5. O Bharata, none amongst your warriors was then able to resist Yuyudhana of prowess incapable of being withstood, of unmitigating energy, of heroism equal to that of the thousand-eyed deity, and looking like the autumnal sun in the firmament.

6. Thereupon that foremost of kings, named Sudarsana, versed in all modes of warfare, clad in golden armour, armed with the bow and the arrows, and inspired with wrath, proceeded against the dashing Satyaki and strove to check his carreer.

7. The encounter that then commenced between them was extremely awful. Both your warriors and the Somakas applauded it highly; and the immortals compared it to the one that took place in days gone by between Vritra and Indra.

8. Sudarsana striving hard sped at that foremost descendant of the Satwata race, hundreds of sharp arrows, but O king, that illustrious scion of the Sini race, cut down all those arrows, before they could even reach him.

9. So also did, Sudarsana, riding on his own chariot of excellent make, severed, by means of his own arrows, in two or three parts, all the arrows sped at him by Satyaki who resembled Indra himself.

10. Then beholding his own arrows repulsed by the force of those shot by Satyaki, Sudarsana of fierce energy in order to burn down his adversary, angrily shot some beautiful shafts equipped with wings of gold.

11. Then he pierced his adversary with three beatiful arrows resembling fire itself, and furnished with golden wings,discharged from the bowstring drawn back to the very ear. These arrows penetrating through Satyakis's armour mangled his body.

12. Once more that prince Sudarsana, fixing on his bowstring another four resplendent shafts, struck therewith the four steeds of Satyaki that were of argentine hue.

13. Thus afflicted by him, Sini's grandson, possessed of great agility and endowed with might equal to that of Indra himself, quichly slew with his own arrows the steeds of Sudarsana and sent up (then) a a loud war-cry.

14—15. Then lopping off with a Valla charged with the vehemence of Indra's thunder-bolt, the head of Sudarsana's charioteer, that best of the Sinis, with a razor-headed arrow resembling the fire that appears at the end of a Yuga, cut off from Sudarsana's trunk his head graced with ear-rings, resembling the full moon and decked with an exceedingly charming face, like the wielder of the thunder-bolt, O king, forcibly cutting off in day's gone by, the head of the Asura Vala in battle.

16. Thus having slain that grandson of a prince, that illustrious Scion of the Yadu race became inspired with joy, and shone resplendent, O king, like the chief of the celestials himself.

17. Then that best hero among men viz Yuyudhana proceeded along the track by which Arjuna had gone before him, resisting, as he advanced, by means of his myriad shafts, all your warriors, and riding on that excellent chariot of his, O king, to which were yoked those best steeds and filling every body with wonder.

18. Then all the excellent warriors assembled on the field of battle, applauded that wonderful feat achieved by Satyaki, inasmuch as he consumed all opponents that came within the range of his arrows, like a blazing conflagration burning every thing that falls in its way.

Thus ends the one hundred and eighteenth chapter, the slaughter of Sudarsana, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXIX.

JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA,—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thereafter that illustrious scion of the Vrishni race, the high-souled and intelligent Satyaki, having slain Sudarsana in battle, addressing his charioteer thus spoke.

2—5. "Having crossed the almost uncrossable ocean of Drona's division abounding with chariots and steeds and elephants—ocean of which the waves are constituted by arrows and darts, fishes by swords and scimitars, and alligators by the maces; which roars with the whizz of arrows, and the clash of diverse weapons; an ocean that is fierce and destructive of life, and resounds with the din created by diverse musical instruments; of which the touch is disagreeable and unbearable to warriors longing to have victory, and of which the banks are infested by flesh-eaters represented by the forces of Jalasandha,—I consider that the remaining of the array yet to be crossed, can be crossed with great ease, like a stream-let of shallow water. Therefore do you dauntlessly drive the steeds forwards.

6. I think I am now within a hand's distance from Savyasachin. Having vanquished in battle, the indomitable Drona together with his followers,

7. As also that best of all warriors namely, the son of Hridika, I think I have already reached Dhananjaya. Though I see these numerous divisions of troops before me, fear does not assail my heart,

8. For, a raging forests conflagration shrinks not at the sight of numerous heaps of dried grass. Behold the ground through which the diadem-decked Arjuna, that best of the Pandavas has passed,

9. Rendered uneven by the slain foot-soldiers, horses, car-warriors and elephants. Yonder the Kourava array is giving way being routed by that high-souled warrior.

10. O charioteer, behold a thick tawny cloud of dust raised by the flying cars, elephants and steeds.

11. I think myself to be very near to that one of white steeds whose charioteer is Krishna, inasmuch as I hear the twang of the bow Gandiva wielded by that one of infinite prowess.

12. From the omens that are revealing themselves to me, I can judge that Arjuna will slay the ruler of the Sindhus before the sun to-day goes below the horizon.

13. Without exhausting their strength, drive the steeds slowly to the spot where the hostile ranks are staying, that is, to the spot where yonder warriors headed by Duryodhana, their hands cased in leathern fences,

14. And yonder Kamvoja's of dreadful deeds, cased in mail and defficult of defeat in battle, and these Yavanas armed with bows and arrows and accomplished in smiting,

15. And yonder Sakas and Kiratas, and Daradas, and Barbaras and Tamraliptakas, and numerous other Mlechchas armed with diverse weapons are staying.

16. To the spot (I repeat) where yonder warriors headed by Duryodhana, their hands defended by leathern gloves,—are standing with their faces turned towards me and inspired with the resolution of encountering me.

17. Consider me, O charioteer as already passed through this dreadful stronghold, having slain in battle all these warriors and cars, elephants, horses and foot-soldiers that are among them.

The Charioteer said :—

18. O scion of the Vrishni race, fear I have none, O you of prowess incapable of being withstood! If you had before you the enraged son of Yamadagni,

19. Or Drona that foremost of car-warriors, or Kripa or the ruler of the Madras himself, even then fear would not enter my heart, O you of mighty arms, as long as I am under the shadow of your protection.

20. O slayer of hostile heroes, numerous Kamvojas covered in coats of mail, of dreadful deeds and difficult of defeat in battle, have already been worsted by you;

21. As also numerous Yavanas armed with bow and arrows and accomplished in smiting, including Sakas, Kiratas, Daradas Barbaras, Tamraliptakas,

22. And many other Mlechchas, armed with various weapons. Never did I feel fear in any battle.

23. O you of great courage, why shall I then experience any fear in this battle, which is like the vestige of a cow's hoof. O long-lived one, by which track shall I carry you to the spot where Dhananjaya is?

24. On whom have you been angry, O you of the Vrishni race? Who are they for whom death is waiting? Who are they that are destined to repair to the mansion of death to-day?

25. Who are they that will fly away from the field of battle beholding you endowed with such prowess, resembling the Destroyer himself as he appears at the end of the yuga, and putting forth that prowess of yours? O you of mighty arms, who are they whom king Vaivaswat, has remembered to-day?

Satyaki said :—

26. I will slay these warriors with sharpened shafts like Vasava slaying the Danavas. Slaying the Kamvojas, I will fulfil my vow. Carry me thither.

27. To-day crushing the foe I shall repair to that son of Pandu who is dearly loved by me. To-day the Kurus with Suyodhana at their head, will behold my prowess in battle,

28—33. When this division of the Mlechchas of shaved heads will be exterminated and the entire Kourava army put to great distress. Hearing the loud lamentation of the Kourava host to-day lacerated and shattered by me in battle, Suyodhana will be filled with great fear. Today I shall show to my preceptor, the high-souled Pandava of white horses, the skill in the use of weapons acquired by me from him. Beholding to-day thousands of foremost warriors slain with my arrows, king Duryodhana will be overwhelmed with grief. The Kouravas will this day behold the bow in my hand to resemble a circle of fire when, light-handed as I am, I will draw back my bow-string for discharging my numerous arrows. Beholding the continuous carnage of his troops bathed in blood and many filled all over with shafts, Suyodhana to-day will be filled with great grief. When I shall slay the best of the Kuru warriors wrathfully, 34—36. Suyodhana will to-day behold the world to contain two Arjunas. Beholding thousands of kings slain by me in battle, king Duryodhana will be overwhelmed with grief in this day's great fight. Slaying thousands of monarchs to-day, I will show love and devotion to those high-souled ones viz., the sons of Pandu. To-day the Kouravas will know the extent of my prowess and energy and my gratefulness to the Pandavas.

Sanjaya continued :—

37. Thus spoken to, the charioteer quickly drove those well-trained steeds resembling the moon in hue and carrying the warrior Satyaki well.

38. Those excellent steeds, possessed of the fleetnes of the wind or the mind, dashed forward seeming to devour the very skies and bore Yuyudhana to the spot where those Yavanas were.

39. Then those Yavanas endued with great lightness of hands obtaining in their midst the unretreating Satyaki, began to cover him with mighty showers of arrows.

40. Then Satyaki who was moving with great celerity, cut off their arrows and weapons with his shafts of deprassed knots. Indeed the arrows discharged by them could not then reach him.

41. The fierce Satyaki then began to lop off the heads and arms of the Yavanas, with sharp arrows equipt with golden wings, or wings made of vulterine feathers, all-flying straight.

42. Those arrows, penetrating through the iron or brass armours of the Yavanas as also their bodies, then fell down on the earth.

43. Thus slaughterd by the heroic Satyaki in that battle, the Mlechchas began to fall by hundreds on the ground deprived of their lives.

44. With his arrows discharged from his bow drawn to the fullest extent, and flying in a continuous line, that brave warrior began to slay, five, six, seven or eight Yavanas at a time.

45. With the dead bodies of hundreds and thousands of Kamvojas, Sakas, Souviras, Trigartas, and Barbaras, O ruler of men,

46. The earth became impassable; and it was slippery with the flesh and blood that then constituted its mire. The grandson of Sini then caused a great carnage among your troops.

47. The ground was then strewn over with the head-gears of those robbers and the shaved heads that looked like unfledged birds in consequence of their long beards.

48. The field of battle overspread with headless trunks bathed in blood, appeared charming like the firmament overspread with coppery clouds.

49. Slain with the shafts of the horoic Satyaki,—shafts whose touch resembled the thunder-bolt's stroke and whose knots were well-pressed and which were flying in straight lines, the Yavanas covered the field of battle over.

50. The handful remnant of those mail-covered soldiers, defeated, O king, by the Satwata hero, became cheerless; and finding their lives on the point of being snatched away from them, they broke,

51. And fled away, urging their steeds to the top of their speed, with their whips, goads &c out of great fear that then overwhelmed them.

52. Routing in battle the invicible Kamvoja troops, and O Bharata, the troops of the Yavanas and the mighty host of the Sakas,

53. That foremost of men, viz., Satyaki of prowess incapable of being baffled, penetrated into the heart of your troops, vanquishing them and urging his charioteer saying, "Proceed."

54. Beholding that feat achieved in battle by him—feat that nobody before ever performed,—the Charanas and the Gandharvas began to applaud him highly.

55. Then, O ruler of men, beholding him proceeding as the rear-guard of Arjuna, the Charanas were filled with delight. Even your troops then began to applaud him.

Thus ends the one-hundred and nineteenth chapter, the defeat of the Javanas; in the Jayadrath-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXX.

(JAYADRPTHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Having defeated the Yavanas and the Kamvojas that foremost of car-warriors Yuyudhana advanced after Arjuna right through the centre of your troops.

2. Then like a huntsman slaying deer, that foremost of men, viz., Satyaki, graced with beautiful teeth, cased in excellent armour, and owning a beatiful standard, slew the Kourava troops and struck terror into their hearts.

3. Advancing on his chariot, he began to shake his bow with force,—bow the back of which was decked with gold, the toughness of which was great and which was beautified with may golden moons.

4. His arms adorned with golden Angadas, his turban decked with gold, his body covered with a golden armour, his standard and bow variegated with gold, that hero appeared resplendent like the crest of the Meru-mountain.

5. Himself emitting great effulgence, and wielding that bow drawn to a circle in his hands, he appeared like another autumnal sun.

6. That foremost of men graced with shoulders, tread, and eyes, resembling those of the moon, appeared in the centre of your army, like a bull in the midst of a cowpen.

7. Him looking like and possessing the graceful tread of, an infuriate elephant and appearing like an elephant leader with open temples, standing in their midst,

8. Your troops desirous of slaying assailed with fury. After Satyaki had passed through Drona's division and the uncrossable ocean-like division of the Bhojas,

9. After he had passed through the son of Jalasandha's troops, as also the host of the Kamvojos, after he had escaped the alligator constituted by Hridika's son, after he had forded through that ocean like host,

10. Many car-warriors of your army inflamed with fury encompassed Satyaki on all sides. Duryodhana, Chitrasena, Dussasana, Vininsati,

11. Sakuni, Dussaha, the youthful Durmarsana, Kratha and many other brave warriors, all well-versed in the use of weapons and difficult of being defeated,

12. Angrily followed Satyaki from behind as he proceeded onwards. Then, O sire, tremendous was the din that arose among your army,

13. Resembling the roar of the ocean in a Parva-day when it is lashed into fury by the wind. Beholding them all rush towards himself, that foremost of the Sinis,

14. Addressing his charioteer smilingly said :—" Proceed slowly : this army of the sons of Dhritarastra, swelling with fury,

15. And abounding in elephants, horses, chariots and infantry, is rushing at me with vehemence, O charioteer, filling all the quarters with the clatter of its cars,

16. And causing the earth, the conclave dome and oceans to tremble. O Suta, this ocean like host I shall resist in battle,

17. Like the banks resisting the mighty main when it swells in the day of the full moon. Behold O charioteer, my prowess in battle which resembles that of Indra himself.

18. Behold me crush these hostile forces with my own sharp arrows. Behold these foot-soldiers, horses, car-warriors and elephants of the hostile force slain,

19. And mangled, by my sharp shafts whose touch resemble that of fire itself." When Satyaki of immeasurable prowess was thus speaking,

20. You warriors quickly approached him desirous of battling with him, saying, 'Slay' 'Rush,' "Wait" 'Look look' &c.

21. Satyaki then fell to slaughter those heroes even when they were thus speaking, with his sharp arrows. He slew three hundred steeds and four hundred elephants.

22. That battle between Satyaki on the one hand and your warriors on the others, became awful like that between the Gods and tne Asuras fought in the days of yore. The carnage that attended it, was fierce in the extreme,

23. O sire, the grandson of Sini received the assault of your son's divisions resembling thick masses of clouds, with his shafts resembling snakes of virulent poison.

24. That valorous hero then covered over with net-work of arrows, O king, began to slay your troops by hundreds,nothing daunted.

25. O king, I then beheld an extremely wonderful sight there, inasmuch as, O lord, I saw not one shaft of Satyaki fail in striking its aim.

26. That ocean constituted by the troops of Duryodhana, teeming with cars, elephants and steeds, and surging with waves constituted by cars, as soon as it came in contact with the bank formed by Sinis grandson,

27. That host consisting of terrified warriors, elephants, and horses, carnaged on all sides by the arrows of Satyaki, began to turn round repeatedly,

28. And wandered hither and thither like kine afflicted with the chill of winter. Among foot-soldiers, car-warriors, elephants and horse-men and horses,

29. We then beheld none who was not pierced with the arrows of Yuyudhana. Even Phalguna himself, O king, spread not such carnage in your troops,

30. As was done by Satyaki in your ranks. O foremost of men, Sini's grandson then fought, surpassing even Arjuna himself,

31. Completely fearless, and displaying his lightness of hands and skill in the use of weapons. Thereafter king Duryodhana, with three arrows,

32. Pierced the charioteer of that Satwata horo ; and then with another four sharp shafts, he pierced the latter's four steeds. Next piercing Satyaki himself with three arrows, he pierced him with a set of another eight shafts.

33. Then Dussasana pierced that foremost scion of the Sini dynasty with sixteen shafts, Sakuni pierced him with twenty-five and Chitrasena with five arrows.

34. Dussaha then pierced Satyaki on the centre of his chest with fifteen arrows. Then thus struck with those numerous shafts, that foremost hero among the Vrishnis, smiled,

35. And, O mighty monarch, pierced each of his assailers with three shafts. Thus piercing his foes with darts of fierce energy,

36. That grandson of Sini endued with great celerity, began to move about the field of battle, even like a hawk. Cutting off the bow of Suvalas son and severing his gloves,

37. He pierced Duryodhana on the centre of his chest with three arrows; he pierced Chitrasena with hundred and Dussaha with ten arrows.

38. That illustrious grandson of Sini next pierced Dussasana with twenty arrows. Thereafter O ruler of men, your brother-in-law, taking up another bow,

39. Pierced Satyaki first with eight and then with another five arrows. Then O king, Dussasana pierced Satyaki with ten, Dussaha with three, and Durmukha with welve shafts. O Bharata, then Duryodhana, pierced that scion of Madhu's race with seventy-three arrows,

41. Next he pierced the latter's charioteer with three sharp arrrows. Then all those mighty car-warriors who were fighting unitedly and heedfully,

42—43. Were pierced each with five arrows by Satyaki. Then that foremost of warriors struck the driver of your son with a broad-headed shaft. The latter then fell down on the ground slain. When his charioteer had been laid low, O master, that car-warrior, your son,

44. Was borne away from the field of battle by his steeds of the fleetness of the wind. Thereupon, your other sons and the troops, O king,

45. Looking at the chariot of the king, began to break away by hundreds. Then O Bharata, beholding the divisions routed, Satyaki,

46, Covered them with keen pointed arrows furnished with golden wings and whetted on stone. Thus, O king, crushing all the warriors of your army by thousands,

47. Satyaki flew towards the chariot of Arjuna owning cream-colored steeds. Even your troops then applauded him as they beheld him proceed shooting arrows and protecting himself and his charioteer.

Thus ends the one hundred and twentieth chapter the defeat of Duryodhana, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXI.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. What, O Sanjaya, did my shameless sons do, when they beheld the grandson of Sini proceed towards Arjuna, crushing as he advanced my troops?

2. How indeed did those dying wretches set their heart on fight, when Sini's grandson who is equal to Savyasachin himself appeared before them?

3. What indeed, did the Kshatriyas defeated in battle do? How indeed did the illustrious Satyaki penetrate through their ranks?

4. O Sanjaya, tell me also, how could the grandson of Sini proceed to battle when all my sons were alive and fighting?

5. What I have heard from you, O son, appears to be exceedingly wonderful viz the battle between the one and the many, the latter counting many mighty car-warrior among them.

6. O Suta, I think Destiny is adverse to the interests of my sons, in as much as they are now being slaughtered by that mighty car-warrior of the Satwata race.

7. Even all my troops united together were not competent enough to withstand the enraged Yuyudhana; not to speak of the sons of Pandu.

8. Like a lion slaying other inferior beasts Satyaki is slaughtering my sons, having first vanquished in battle Drona that warrior accomplished in weapons and versed in all modes of warfare.

9. Countless heroes headed by Kritavarman himself, fighting heedfully, were not able to slay Satyaki in battle; so it is certain that the latter will vanquish my sons single-handed.

10. Even Phalguna himself did not fight in the manner in which the illustrious grandson of Sini has fought.

Sanjaya said:—

11. All this has been brought about by your wicked policy and by the vile deeds of Duryodhana O king. O Bharata, now hear attentively what I am going to say to you.

12. At the command of your son, all those warriors then taking tremendous vows to fight to the last, rallied and resolved upon fighting fierce.

13. Three thousand bowmen, commanded by Duryodhana himself and supported by a numerous body of Sakas, Kamvojas Valhikas, Yavanas, Paradas,

14. Kaligas, Tanganas, Amvartas, Pisachas, Barbaras, and mountaineers, O king, all inspired with rage, and armed with stones,

15. Rushed against Sini's grandson like flights of insects falling upon a blazing fire. Five hundred other warriors united together, O king, then also assailed Satyaki.

16—17. Another large division consisting of a thousand chariots, a hundred mighty car-warriors, a thousand elephants, two thousand horse and innumerable foots soldiers, also assailed the grandson of Sini.

18. Then, O Bharata, Dussasana, urged those troop saying,—'slay him' and encompassed Satyaki there with.

19. Then we beheld the marvellous character of the prowess of Sini's grandson, in as much as single handed as he was he fearlessly fought on with the odds against him.

20. He then continually went on slaying the divisions of car-warriors elephants and horsemen and the robbers.

21—23. Like the autumnal sky bespangled with stars, the field of battle then became covered with car wheels broken and smashed by means of his mighty weapons with innumerable Akshas and beautiful car-shafts crushed to pieces with mangled elephants and broken standards with coats of mail and bucklers scattered all about and O sire, with garlands and ornaments and attires and Anukarshas.

24—28. Many best elephants prodigious or mountainous and of the Anjanors, of the Vamana breed, O Bharata or of the Supratika Mahapadmat or Airavata or other breeds, many excellent tuskers, O king, lay prostrate on the ground, deprived of life. Satyaki then slew, O king, many foremost of steeds of the Vanaya, the mountain, the Kamvoja and the Valhika breeds. The grandson of Sini also slaughtered foot soldiers there, in hundreds and thousands, born in various realms and belonging to various nationalities. Whilst those troops were being thus carnaged, Dussasana addressing the robbers said.—

29. 'Ye heroes, ignorant of the rules of fighting, fight on." Why do you retreat? But seeing them break away in spite of all his commands your son Dussasana

30. Urged on the heroic mountaineers skilled in fighting with stones saying:—"You are all skillul in fighting with the stones. But Satyaki is ignorant of this mode of warfare.

31. Do you slay then this hero who, desirous as he is of battle, is unacquainted with your manner of fighting. The Kouravas also are all ignorant of this mode of battle.

32. Rush upon Satyaki, and fear not for he will not be able to reach you in battle." Thereupon all those mountain kings, all accomplished in fighting with stones,

33. Rushed upon the grandson ol Sini like so many counsellors rushing in the train of a king. Then all those denizens of the mountains, armed with hollicks looking like the heads of the elephants,

34. Stood before Yuyudhana in that battle ready to strike others desirous of compassing the slaughter of the Satwata hero with their missiles.

35. They obstructed all the points of the compass, urged as they were by your son. Then as they rushed desirous of fighting with their stones,

36, Satyaki sped at them sharp arrows fixing them on his bow string. That aweful shower of stones then discharged by the Mountaineers,

37. The foremost scion of the Sini race baffled with his Narachas resembling venomous reptiles. Then with those lustrous fragments of stones looking like a flight of fire flies,

38. Many of our soldiers were slaughtered; and O sire, cries of alas and Oh were heard in all directions. Then with heavy stones uplifted, five hundred heroic warriors,

39. Fell down, O king with their arms severed. Again a thousand warriors and other hundred thousand warriors,

40. Encountering Satyaki fell down with their arms bearing stones lopped off. Then many heroic warriors, accomplished in fighting with stones, began to fall down, with their purposes unsettled.

41. Satyaki then slew them by thousands and that appeared indeed wonderful. Then again many of them, returning to the charge, hurled at Satyaki showers of stones.

42. With swords and lances in their grasp, many Daradar, Tanjanas, Thasus, Lampakas and Pulindas, hurled their weapons at Satyaki.

43. But the latter well accomplished in the use of weapons cut all of them in pieces with his Narachas. Then as the stones were being broken in the air by sharp arrows,

44. The sound, that was created, caused many car-warriors, horses, el phants and foot-soldiers to fly away. Pelted in all directions by fragments of stones, men, elephants and horses,

45. Were unable to stand in the field of battle, in as much as they felt as if bit by bees. The survivors, bathed in blood and with their heads and frontal globes shattered,

46. Of the elephant hosts, then began to break away leaning the car of Yuyudhana. Then the noise that your troops created, O sire,

47. Afflicted as they were with the shafts of that descendant of Madhu's race, was tremendous like that of the Ocean in a Parvadayi. Then hearing the cry and that tremendous din, Drona, addressing his charioteer, said:—

48. "O charioteer, this mighty car-warrior, of the Satwata race inflamed with wrath, has shattered the host in many places and is now careering like the Destroyer in the field of battle.

49. O charioteer, drive my car to the spot whence this noise is coming. Surely Yuyudhna has now encountered these heroes that fight with the stones.

50. Yonder the car-warriors are leaving Satyaki being borne away by their flying steeds. Behold some are falling down on the spot with their bodies mangled.

51. Their drivers are not able to restrain their wild horses." The charioteer hearing these words of Bharadwaja's son,

52. Replied unto Drona that foremost of all wielders of weapons saying :—O long-lived one, behold the army of the Kouravas routed in all directions.

53. Behold the warriors rush in all directions deserting their ranks! But in fact you behold those heroic Panchalas and Pandavas,

54. Advance desirous of encountering yourself. O subduer of foes, now behave yourself in the manner one should behave on such occasions.

55. Shall we proceed or stay here? Satyaki has gone far ahead of us." While the charioteer was thus speaking to the son of Bharadwaja, O sire,

56. The grandson of Sini suddenly came to view, engaged in slaughtering a large number of car-warriors. Those soldiers of yours while being thus slaughtered by Yuyudhana in battle,

57. They fled away from Yuyudhana's chariot towards the spot where Drona's division was placed. Those other car-warriors accompanied by Dussasana, all struck with panic, also rushed to the place where Drona's chariot was seen.

Thus ends the one hundred and twentys first chapter the defeat of the mountaineers in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA—)
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Beholding then the chariot of Dussana stationed near him, the son of Bharadwaja addressing him said these words :—

2. O Dussana, why are all these car-warriors, flying away? Is every thing right with the king? Does the king of the Sindhus still live?

3. You are the son of a king, the brother of a king and a mighty car-warrior; why then do you fly away? Constitute yourself the Prince-regent (by making your brother the king)?

4. "You are our slave; you have been won by us as a stake in the game of dice; become you a courtezan; and engage yourself as a bearer of attires to the king, my elder brother.

5. Your husbands do not live; they are like sesamum seeds without the kernel." O Dussasana, it was you who spoke those words to Draupadi. Why then do you now fly away.

6. Having yourself provoked inveterate enmity with the Panchalas and the Pundavas, why do you now fly, out of fear, obtaining Satyaki alone in battle for your opponent?

7. In days gone by, at the game of dice having taken up the dice, you did not divine that they would be changed into dreadful darts resembling snakes of virulent poison.

8. It were you who formerly abused the Pandavas in filthy language; you were the cause of all the woes of Draupadi.

9. Where are now your pride, your haughtiness and brag? Having provoked the Parthas who are like so may snakes of virulent poison, where do you intend to fly?

10. Both this army of the Bharatas, and king Suyodhana are to be pitied, in asmuch as the latter own you who are now flying away as his brave brother.

11. Indeed, O hero, this army, shattered and afflicted with fear as it is, ought to be protected by you, by your own strength of arms.

12. But you now, leaving the fight, are affording delight unto your foes. O slayer of foes, when you, the leader of the host, are flying away,

13. Who, seized with panic as he is, will care to remain, in the field of battle? Encountering that single-handed warrior of the Satwata race,

14. Your heart is inclined to fly away from battle. What then, O Kourava, wil you do when you will see the wielder of th Gandiva in battle, or Bhimasena or the twins, Nakula and Sahadeva. The arrowe of Satyaki, afraid of which you are seeking to fly away, are scarcely equal to those of Arjuna, that resemble the sun or the fire in effulgence? If your heart is intent on flying away,

17. Then let the sovereignty of the earth be given to king Yudhisthira the virtuous when peace will be concluded. Before the shafts of Phalguna looking like snakes divested of their slough,

18. Penetrate into your body, let peace be concluded. Before the illustrious son of Pritha slaying your hundred brothers snatch the earth away by force, conclude peace with the Pandavas. Before king Yudhisthira is excited with wrath,

20. And Krishna also, that giver of joy, conclude peace with the Pandavas. Before the mighty-armed Bhima, piercing through this vast array of yours,

21. Seizes (and slays) your brothers, conclude peace with the Pandavas. Formerly Bhisma told your brother Suyodhana.

22. "The Pandavas are incapable of being vanquished in battle. O Gentle one, make peace with them." Your perverted brother Suyodhana however did not listen to him.

23. Therefore firmly resolved to fight, battle on heedfully with the Pandavas. Proceed quickly on you car, where Satyaki is?

24. Deprived of your help, this host will fly away. For your own sake, fight with Satyaki of indomitable prowess."

25. Thus spoken to by Drona, your son spoke nothing in reply. Feigning as if he has not heard the words of Drona, Dussasana advanced to the spot where Satyaki was.

26. Supported by a mighty division of unretreating Mlelachas, Dussasana fell upon Satyaki and fought on vigorously.

27. Drona also, that best of car-warriors, inflamed with rage, proceeded against the Panchalas and the Pandavas in medium speed.

28. Then Drona, engaging himself in battle, began to crush the Pandava army slaying heroes by hundreds and thousands.

29. Thereafter, O mighty monarch, proclaiming his name in battle, he began to spread havoc among the ranks of the Pandavas, Panchalas and the Matsyas.

30. Thereat the effulgent Viraketu, the Panchala prince, encountered Drona the son of Bharadawaja who had been vanquishing his troops.

31. Piercing Drona with five shafts of depressed knots, he cut down his standard with one and wounded his charioteer with seven shafts.

32. Then O mighty monarch, we beheld a wonderful sight in that battle, in as much Drona striving hard could not approach the Panchala prince.

33. O sire, then beholding Drona held in check, the Panchalas surrounded him O king, on all sides, desirous as they were of securing victory to the very virtuous king Yudhisthira.

34. They then began to pour upon Drona darts resembling fire, thick showers of Tomaras and numerous other weapons, O king.

35. Then baffling those thick showers of arrows by means of his own, like the wind scattering away mighty rain-clouds on the sky, Drona appeared exceedingly beautiful.

36. Thereafter that slayer of hostile heroes viz Drona aimed at the chariot of Viraketu a dreadful shaft, resembling the sun or fire in splendaur.

37. O king, then that shaft penetrating through that scion of the Panchala dynasty entered the earth, steeped in blood and burning like a flame of fire.

38. Thereupon that delighter of the Panchala race, quickly fell down from his chariot like a Champaka falling down from the crest of a mountain, being uprooted by the force of the wind.

39. When that highly puissant and fierce bowmen, that prince of the Panchalas, had been slain, the Panchalas, in all haste, surrounded Drona on all sides.

40. Chitraketu, Sudhanwan, Chitravarman, and O Bharata, also Chitraratha,—all afflicted with greif at the calamity that had befallen their brother,

41. Unitedly and with a desire for fighting, rushed against the son of Bharadwaja, discharging their showers of shafts like so many clouds discharging their contents at the expiration of the summer season.

42. Thus wounded by those princes, all mighty car-warriors, that foremost of the regenarate wrought himself up with anger, for putting an end to their existence.

43. Thereafter Drona hurled at them a net-work of arrows. Those princes, then pierced with those shafts of Drona shot from the bow string drawn back to the very ear,

44. Became embarassed as to what they should do, O foremost of kings. Then when they were thus confounded, Drona with perfect ease,

45. Inflamed as he was with rage, deprived those princes of their chariots, charioteers and steeds. Thereafter that hero of world-wide fame, with his sharp arrows and vallas,

46. Felled their heads, like one culling flowers. O king, those radiant heroes then fell down slain from their respective cars,

47. Even as the Daityas and Danavas fell, in the battle between the gods and th

Asuras fought in the days of yore. Slaying them in battle, the valorous son of Bharadwaja,

48. Began to shake his excellent bow whose staff was golden and which was incapable of being approached. Then beholding those Panchala princes all mighty car-warrior, and resembling the Pandavas themselves, slain,

49. Dhristadyumna was filled with rage and tears trickled down from his eyes. Then burning with rage, he rushed at the car of Drona.

50. Thereupon, O king, suddenly cries of Alas and Oh were heard there, for, then Drona was seen covered with the shafts of the Panchala prince Dhristadyumna.

51. Though covered on all sides by the illustrious son of Prisata, yet Drona flinched not, but fought on smilingly.

52. Then, O mighty monarch, the Panchala prince, overwhelmed with rage, pierced Drona on the breast with ninety shafts of depressed knots.

53. Pierced deeply by that powerful hero, the illustrious son of Bharadwaja, squatted down on the terrace of his chariot and fainted away in a swoon.

54. Then beholding him in that plight, Dhristadyumna, of fierce energy and great might, grasped his sword and left aside his bow.

55. Then that mighty car-warrior, jumping down from his chariot with quickness, O sire, ascended with agility upon the car of the son of Bharadwaja,

56. With his eyes rolling in rage and urged on by a desire for cutting off Drona's head from the trunk. Meanwhile the puissant Drona, recovering from the swoon, took np his bow.

57—58. But beholding Dhristadyumna inflamed with a desire for slaughtering him so near, he began to pierce him with arrows measuring a span only and so fit to be used in close quarter. Those arrows known by the name of Vaitastika and fit to be used in close quarters,

59. Were known to Drona only, and by means of them, he succeeded in weakening Dhristadyumna's powers. Then the puissant Dhristadyumna wounded with those arrows,

60. Swifty came down from Drona's chariot. That hero of fierce energy was then greatly robbed of his strength. Thereafter ascending his car, and taking up a mighty bow,

61. The mighty car-warrior Dhristadyumna began to pierce Drona in battle; Drona also, O mighty monarch, pierced the son of Prisata with numerous shafts in battle.

62. Then a wonderful fight was fought between Drona and the Panchala prince, like what was fought between Sakra and and Pralhada, both longing to enjoy the sovereignty of the three worlds.

63. Both versed in various modes of warfare, they careered over the field, desplaying various motions with their chariots and mangling one another with their shafts.

64. Then confounding the minds of the other warriors, Drona and Prisata's son began to pour their arrowy showers like rain-clouds pouring their contents in the rainy season.

65. Those two high-souled warriors then covered the conclave dome, the earth, and the quarters with their shafts. The creatures assembled there, then began to applaud that battle that was fought between them.

66. So also, O mighty monarch, the Kshatriyas, and other soldiers praised that battle. "Meeting Dhristadyumna in battle Drona will surely.

67—68. Succumb to him." The Panchalas exclaimed, O king, speaking thus. Then Drona fighting with great agility cut off the head of Dhristadyumna's charioteer, like one felling ripe fruits from a tree. Thereupon O king, the steeds of the illustrious Dhrishtadyumna ran away wildly.

69. When those steeds thus ran away bearing Dhristadyumna away, Drona of great might began to crush the Panchalas and Srinjayas (mercilessly).

70. Then the highly puissant son of Bharadwaja having vanquished the Pandavas and the Panchalas and having reformed his array of troops, stood at its mouth. O master the Pandavas then ventured not to vanquish him in battle.

Thus ends the one-hundred and twenty second chapter, the display of Drona's prowess, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXIII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)
—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Meanwhile, O king, Dussasana advanced upon the grandson of Sini, shooting thousands of arrows, like a mighty raincloud pouring its contents.

2. Having pierced Satyaki first with sixty shafts and next with sixteen, he could not make him tremble who was fighting steadily like the immovable Mainaka mountain.

3. Then that foremost of the Bharatas surrounded Satyaki with a mighty division of car-warriors born in various realms; he shot numerous arrows,

4. And filled the ten quarters with the clatter of his car wheels, that resembled the rumble of rain clouds. Beholding that Kourava hero advance upon him Satyaki,

5. Possessed of mighty arms, rushed against him, and covered him with his own shafts. Then those warriors headed by Dussasana being thus covered by those arrowy showers

6. Became seized with panic and began to fly away even before the very eyes of your son. O monarch, when those warriors were thus flying, your son Dussasana,

7. Stood fearlessly before Satyaki afflicting him with his arrows. He then pierced the latter's charioteer with three and his steeds with four arrows;

8. Then piercing Satyaki himself with a set of hundred arrows, he uttered his war-cry. Thereupon O mighty monarch, that descendant of Madhu's race, being worked up with rage

9. Rendered Dussasana's car, charioteer, and standard invisible with his swift flying arrows. He then entirely shrouded the heroic Dussasana with his shafts.

10. That subduer of foes then quickly covered Dussasana with his arrows like a spider entangling a gnat in its web.

11. Beholding Dussasana thus covered by the shafts of Satyaki, king Duryodhana urged the Trigarttas towards the car of Yuyudhana.

12. Then three thousand warriors of the Trigartta clan versed in battling and of cruel deeds, reaching the car of Yuyudhana,

13. Surrounded the latter with the mighty division of their cars. They set their hearts firmly on fighting and took terrible oaths.

14. As they rushed to battle discharging showers of arrows, Yuyudhana crushed five hundred of their foremost warriors that marched in their front.

15. They then began to fall down slain quickly by the arrows of that foremost of Sinis, like trees broken by the force of the wind falling down from the top of the mountain.

16. The field of battle, overspread with mangled elephants, O king, and broken standards, and fallen bodies of horses furnished with golden traces, and wounded and cut by the arrows of Sini's grandson and rolling in their blood, looked beautiful like a plain covered over with Kinsuka trees decked with blossoms.

18. Then all those warriors of yours, slain in battle by Yuyudhana, were unable to find out a protector like elephants sunk in deep mire.

19. Thereafter terrified all of them proceeded towards the car of Drona like mighty snakes entering their holes from fear of the king of birds (Garuda).

20. Slaying five hundred warriors with his arrows resembling snakes of virulent poison, the heroic Satyaki proceeded slowly towards the car of Dhananjaya.

21. Then as that foremost of men was proceeding your son Dussasana pierced him quickly with nine shafts of depressed knots.

22. Him the fierce bowmen Satyaki pierced in return with five sharp shafts, all straight flying, and furnished with golden as well as vulterine wings.

23. But O Bharata, Dussasana, smiling a little, pierced Satyaki O king, first with three and then with five shafts.

24. Thereupon the grandson of Sini wounding your son with five swift-coursing arrows cut off the latter's bow and then smiling a little proceeded towards Arjuna.

25. Therat Dussasana, highly enraged and desirous of slaying the Vrishni hero as he was proceeding, hurled at him a lance capable of penetrating through all things.

26. But that dreadful lance hurled by your son, Satyaki cut off, O king, with whetted shafts furnished with wings of the Kanka bird.

27. O ruler of men, then your son taking up another bow pierced Satyaki with his arrows and then uttered a loud war-cry.

28. Thereat Satyaki waxing wroth, stupified your son, and struck him on the centre of his chest with arrows resembling tongues of fire.

29. He then once more pierced Dussasana with eight arrows made completely of iron and of sharp heads. Dussasana in return pierced Satyaki with twenty shafts of eminent parts.

30. He of the Satwata race of eminent parts O mighty monarch, again pierced him on the breast with three arrows of straight knots.

31. Then that mighty car-warrior, highly inflamed with rage, slew Dussasana's steeds with sharp arrows, and his charioteer with numerous shafts of depressed knots.

32. Versed in the use of many excellent weapons Satyaki then cut off Dussasana's bow with a single valla, his gloves with five and his chariot and chariot shaft, with a couple of broad-headed arrows.

33. With sharp shafts he cut off his two Parshni drivers. Then Dussasana, deprived of his car, with his bow burst open, his charioteer and steeds slain,

34. Was carried away by the commander of the Trigartta divisions on his own chariot. O Bharata, then the grandson of Sini once more assailed him.

35.—36. But he refrained from slaying him remembering the words of Bhimasena. O Bharata, amidst the assembly Bhimasena before swore to slay your sons. Then Satyaki, vanquishing Dussasana, quickly proceeded in the track in which Dhananjaya had proceeded, O king.

Thus ends the one hundred twent-third chapter the defeat of Dussasana, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXIV.

(JAYADRATHA BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. Was there then, O Sanjaya, no mighty car-warrior in my entire army who could resist or slay Satyaki as he proceeded forward ?

2. Of indomitable prowess and possessed of strength equal to that of Indra himself, single-handed he achieved feats amidst my troops like Indra achieving feats amidst the Danavas.

3. Perhaps the track through which Satyaki passed was empty. Possessed of prowess in the true sense of the term, he alone has crushed numerous hosts, of mine,

4. Tell me O Sanjaya, how the single-handed grandson Sini passed through that host of mine, which was fighting vigorously against him ?

Sanjaya said :—

5. O monarch, the exertion and din that were then made by your troops, O king, teeming with cars, elephants, foot-soldiers, resembled that which occurs at the end of a Yuga.

6. O bestower of honor, when your assembled host daily increased in numerical strength before, I thought that another muster like that of your army had never been on earth.

7. The Gods and the Charanas that then came there said—"this muster will be the last of its kind on the earth."

8. O king, the array, which was formed by Drona in view of a slaughter of Jayadratha, was such that its equal had never been formed on the face of the earth.

9. Then the din that was made by the armies as they rushed to battle with one another, was as tremendous as one created by the ocean agitated with the vehemence of a mighty tempest.

10. In those two assembled hosts of the Pandavas and the Kurus, O foremost of men, innumerable rulers of earth, numbering by hundred, and thousand, were enrolled.

11. Horripilating, dreadful and defeaning was the uproar set up by those enraged heroes of resolute deeds, as they proceeded to battle.

12. Then Bhimasena, Dhristadyumna, Nakula, Sahadeva, the virtuous king Yudhisthira, O sire, exclaimed saying :—

13. "Come, strike, rush quickly ; the two heroes, the scion of Madhu's race and the son of Pandu, have entered into the Kuru army.

14. Do you so act, as they may proceed easily towards the chariot of Jayadratha. Speaking thus, they urged their troops on.

15—16. (They again said)—"If those two heroes be slain, then the Kurus will have their objects fulfilled and we shall be defeated. Therefore do you united exert yourselves for agitating this host, like the tempest of tremendous vehemence agitating the ocean. O king, urged on by the Panchala prince and by Bhimasena,

17—18. They fell to slaughter the Kurus thoroughly disregarding their own dear lives. Possessed of great energy, all of them desiring death in battle, at the edge of weapons, with a view to attain to heaven, showed not the least regard for their lives in fighting for the good of their friends, so also, O monarch, your warriors, desirous of great renown,

19. And setting their hearts resolutely on battle, remained on the field, determined to fight to the bitter end. In that dreadful and horible battle, 20—22. Satyaki having vanquished all the warriors advanded towards Arjuna. The combatants were compelled to turn their eyes away from the coats of mails covering the warriors, as they reflected the rays of the sun directly. O monarch, Duryodhana then penetrated through the mighty host of the illustrious sons of Pandu striving hard in battle. Then the battle that was there fought between him and them was extremely terrible and the carnage horrible.

Dhritarastra said :—

23. When the Pandava host was thus advancing and when he was involved in great danger, I hope, O son of a charioteer, Duryodhana did not turn his back on the field of battle.

24. That battle between the one and the many, that one again being a king by birth, seems to me to be very unfair.

25. Brought up in great luxury, attended with great prosperity and the ruler of the worlds, that single-handed son of mine, I hope, did not turn his face away from the field of battle, encountering odds in battle.

Sanjaya said :—

26. The battle, O king, that was then fought, between your son on the one side, and the numerous Pandavas on the other, was indeed wonderful. Hear me as I relate it.

27. Then the Pandava troops were completely crushed by Duryodhana like a forest of lotuses destroyed by an elephant.

28. Then, O king, beholding the troops shattered by your son, the Panchalas headed by Bhimasena, rushed upon Duryodhana.

29. Thereupon your son pierced Bhimasena, the son of Pandu, with ten shafts and each of the twins Nakula and Sahadeva with three and the virtuous king Yudhisthira with seven.

30. He pierced Virata and Drupada with six, Sikhadin with a hundred, Dhristadyumna with twenty and the sons of Draupadi with three arrows each.

31. He then cut off many other warriors hundreds in number, and elephants and cars in battle with his fierce shafts, like the wrathful god of Death slaying the created beings.

32. Owing to his skill acquired through practies and to the powers of his weapons, he appeared, when striking down his foes, to weild his bow, continuously [illegible] to a circle, whether when aiming or disch[illegible] his shafts.

33. Then men beheld his mighty bow of golden staff, as he slew his foes, to be always drawn to a circle.

34. Thereafter king Yudhisthira cut off with a Pair of Vallas the bow of your son, who had been exerting to the best of his prowess in battle, O foremost of the Kurus.

35. He then pierced the latter with ten excellent shafts all well-directed. But striking against Duryodhana's armour they were shattered into pieces and fell down on the earth.

36. Then the Parthas filled with delight surrounded Yudhisthira, like the celestials and the sages surrounding Sakra on the occasion of the slaughter of Vritra.

37. Thereafter your highly puissant son Duryodhana taking up another bow and addressing king Yudhisthira saying "wait wait" rushed against that son of Pandu.

38. Then beholding your son rush to battle with fury, the Panchalas always intent on securing victory received him with delight.

39. Drona then encountered that division of the Panchalas, from a desire for rescuring the king, like a mountain withstanding masses of rain-charged clouds driven by the tempest.

40. Thereupon, O king, there commenced a awful cambat making the hair stand erect between the Pandavas and your troops, O mighty-armed one.

41. The carnage was terrible like that when Rudra slays in sport all creatures at the end of a Yuga. Then arose a loud uproar at the place where Dhananjaya was.

42. That sound surpassed all other sounds and O lord, made the hairs stand erect. Thus, O mighty-armed one, the battle between Arjuna and your warriors went on (with unmitigated fury).

43. Thus progressed the battle between Satyaki and your men, in the centre of your army and there also raged the battle between Drona and his enemies at the head of his array.

44. Thus continued that dreadful destruction of creatures when, O ruler of men, Arjuna, Drona and the mighty car-warrior Satyaki were excited with wrath.

Thus end, the one hundred and twenty-fourth chapter, the fierce fight, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXV.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. On the afternoon, O mighty monarch, a terrible battle was fought between Drona and the Somakas,—battle whose din resembled the rumble of the rain cloud Parjannya itself.

2. That best of heroes among men, mounted on his chariot to which were yoked red steeds, viz Drona then assailed the Pandavas, firmly resolved to fight with them.

3—4. That fierce bowman, endued with great might and energy, that hero ever engaged in doing good to yourself, that one born in an excellent jar, that puissant son of Bharadwaja, slaying, O king, many best of heroes among the enemy, appeared O Bharata, to sport on the field of battle.

5. Him encountered Vrihadkshatra that mighty car-warrior among the Kekayas, the eldest of his five brothers and difficult of being resisted in battle.

6. Discharging sharp arrows incessantly, he afflicted the preceptor sorely, like a mighty cloud afflicting the mountain Gandhamadana by pouring its watery contents on it.

7. At him, O mighty monarch, excited with wrath Drona sped ten and five shafts, all whetted on stone, and furnished with wings of gold.

8. Then Vrihadkshatra cheerfully cut off each of those arrows shot by Drona and looking like] so many enraged snakes of virulent poison, with five shafts of his own.

9. Then seeing his lightness of hands, that foremost of the regenerate ones smiled and once more, sped at him eight shafts of depressed knots.

10. Beholding those shafts shot from Drona's bow coursing swiftly towards himself, Vrihadkshatra baffled them in battle with an equal number of sharp arrows shot by himself.

11. Then your troops, O mighty monarch were filled with surprise, beholding Vrihadkshatra achieve that very difficut feat.

12. Thereupon, O king, applauding Vrihadkshatra, Drona invoked into existence the invincible Bramha-weapon of celestial make.

13. Beholding that woapon discharged by Drona in battle, the Kekaya prince, O foremost of kings, cut down that weapon with his own Brahma weapon.

14. Then O Bharata, when the Brahma weapon had been baffled, Vrihadkshatra pierced the Brahmana with sixty shafts, whetted on stone, and fnrnished with wings of gold.

15. Then that foremost of men Drona directed several Nacharas at him; these Naracharas penetrating through his armour entered the earth.

16. Like, O best of kings, black snakes freed from their sloughs, entering into their holes in anthills, those arrows penetrating through the Kekaya prince entered the earth.

17. Then, O mighty monarch, deeply pierced with the arrows of Drona, the Kaikaya prince excited to the highest pitch of fury began to roll his charming eyes.

18. He then pierced Drona with seventy shafts whetted on stone and furnished with golden wings; he pierced the latter's charioteer in his vital parts with (fierce) darts.

19. O sire, Drona then pierced with numerous arrows by the Kekaya prince Vrihatkshatra, sped at his car many arrows of extreme sharpness.

20. Then confounding that mighty car-warrior Vrihatkshatra, Drona slew his four steeds with four winged shafts.

21. He then felled the former's charioteer from his niche on the car, with a single arrow. Cutting off his standard and umbrella with another two arrows, he felled them on the ground.

22. Then that foremost among the regenerate ones, with a well directed Naracha pierced Vrihatkshatra on his breast, whereupon the latter then fell down, with his heart torn open.

23. When Vrihatkshatra that mighty car-warrior was thus slain, O king the son of Sisupala highly enraged addressing his charioteer said:

24. "O charioteer, proceed to the spot where the cuirassed Drona stands, slaughtering the Kekaya, and Panchala divisions."

25. Hearing those words of that foremost of car-warriors, the charioteer took him to the spot where Drona was, by means of his fleet steeds of Kamvoja breed.

26. Then swelling with his might, that foremost of the Chedis, viz. Dhristaketu rushed upon Drona for slaughtering him, like a fly falling upon fire.

27. He then pierced Drona and his steeds, chariot and standard, with sixty shafts.. And once more he struck his adversary with sharp arrows, like a man rousing a sleeping tiger.

28. Then Drona, with a sharp razor-faced arrow winged with feathers of vultures, cut off in the middle, the bow of that mighty warrior striving in battle.

29. Thereupon that son of Sisupala, that mighty car-warrior, taking up another bow pierced Drona with numerous shafts equipped with wings of the feather of the peacock and the Kanka bird.

30. Then Drona slaying with four arrows his four steeds, smilingly severed the head of his charioteer from his trunk.

31. He then pierced Dhristaketu himself with twenty five arrows. The prince of the Chedis then leaping off from his chariot, grasped a mace, 32—33. And hurled it at the son of Bharadwaja like an enraged she-snake. Beholding that heavy mace endued with the strength of adamant and adorned with gold, course towards himself like the last night of a man's existence, the son of Bharadwaja cut it off with many thousands of whetted arrows.

34. Cut off by numerous shafts by the son of Bharadwaja that mace, O sire, fell down, O Kourava, filling the earth with the noise it created.

35. Beholding the mace repulsed, the valiant Dhristaketu hurled at Drona first a lance and then a javelin decked with gold.

36. Drona then cutting off that lance with five shafts, cut off the dart with another five. Then both those missiles cut off, dropped on the ground like two snakes torn to pieces by Garuda.

37. Thereafter the highly puissant son of Bharadwaja shot a shaft for the destruction of Dhristaketn who was striving to slay him.

38. Penetratlng through the breast-plate and the breast of Dhristaketu of infinite energy, that dart entered the earth like a swan diving into a lake overgrown with lotuses.

39. Like a hungry jay catching and devouring a little insect, Drona of great heroism devoured Dhristaketu in that battle.

40. When the Chedi ruler was thus slain, his son versed in the use of excellent weapons became excited with wrath and sought to achieve the task his father left undone.

41. Him also Drona smilingly despatched to the mansion of Death by means of his shafts, like a large and ferocious tiger slaying a young deer in the deep forest.

42. While the Pandava troops were being thus reduced in number, O Bharata, the brave son of Jarasandha rushed against Drona.

43. Then with his arrowy showers he quickly rendered Drona in visible, like the clouds rendering the sun invisible.

44. Beholding that lightness of hands displayed by him, Drona, that crusher of Kshatriyas, began to discharge arrows by hundreds and thousands.

45. Then Drona completely covering that foremost of car-warriors nam-l. Jarasandha's son riding on a golden chariot, quickly slew him, before the very eyes of all the warriors.

46. Whoever then was carried before Drona, he became his destroyer. And like Death at the time of the dissolution, he wrested the lives out of all creatures.

47. Thereupon, O mighty monarch, proclaiming his name in the battle, Drona began to cover the Pandava troops with his thousands of shafts.

48. Shot by Drona, those arrows with his name engraved on them and whetted on stone, began to despatch men, elephants, and horses by hundreds in that battle.

49. Then like mighty Asuras slain by Takra, they were being slaughtered by Drona. The Panchalas then began to tremble like kine afflicted with the chill of winter.

50. When, O foremost of the Bharatas, the Pandava troops were thus being slaughtered by Drona, a loud wail of agony was uttered by them.

51. Scorched with the rays of the sun and wounded with the arrows of Drona, the Panchalas, panic struck as they were, became seized with anxiety.

52. Confounded by the net-work of arrows shot by Bharadwaja's son, the Panchala warriors then thought themselves to be seized by the thighs by alligators.

53. But after a while, O mighty monarch, the Chedis, the Srinjayas the Kasis, and the Kosalas, cheerfully rushed against the son of Bharadwaja from a desire for battle.

54. The Chedis, the Pandavas, and the Panchalas then addressed one another saying—Drona is slain, Drona is slain. Thus speaking they assailed Drona.

55. Then those foremost of men fell upon Drona of great effulgence in that battle, desirous of despatching the latter to the abodes of Death.

56. As those heroes were struggling against him, the son of Bharadwaja with his arrows, despatched them to the regions of Death, specially those foremost among the Chedis.

57. When the best warrior of the Chedis were becoming reduced in number, the Panchalas began to tremble, being afflicted by the shaftsof Drona.

58. Beholding those terrible feats of Drona, O sire they began to exclaim aloud saying, 'O Bharata,' 'Oh Bhimasena,' 'O Dhristadyumna,'

59. They said :—Surely this Brahmana has practised mighty ascetic austerit es, by virtue of which enraged in battle he is consuming these foremost of Kshatriyas.

60. The duty of a Kshatriya is to fight, and that of a Brahmana to practise severe austerities. He has practised austerities and is skilled in the use of weapons and so he burns d wn by his very glances.

61. The foremost of the Kshatriyas entering into the blazing fire of Drona, dreadful and unquenchable, are being burnt down, O Bharat .

62. The highly effulgent Drona putting forth his prowess and his strength, is confounding all creatures and is slaying all our troops.'

63—64. Hearing those words of the Panchalas, Kshatradharma withstood Drona. Then the mighty Kshatradharma filled with rage, cut off with a crescent-shaped arrow Drona's bow with shafts fixed on its string. Thereat excited to the highest pitch of fury that crusher of Kshatriyas viz Drona,

65. Took up another bow, resplendent and capable of bearing great strain. Placing on its string a sharp arrow fatal to the foe,

66. The puissant Preceptor let it go drawing the bow-string back to the very ears. That arrow then killing Kshatradharman fell down on the Earth's surface.

67. With his heart cleft open, he fell down on the ground from his vehicle. Upon the death of Dhrishtadyumna's son, the troops began to tremble (in fear).

68. Thereafter the mighty Chekitana encountered Drona, and piercing the latter with ten arrows, once more wounded him on the breast.

69. He wounded Drona's charioteer with four and his four steeds with another four arrows. The preceptor then pierced the right arm of his adversary with sixteen arrows.

70. He pierced his standard with sixteen and his charioteer with seven shafts. When Chekitana's charioteer was killed, the horses ran wildly dragging the car along with them.

71. Then, O sire, beholding the horseless and the driverless chariot of Chekitana covered with Drona's arrow in battle,

72—73. The Pandavas and the Panchalas were seized with a great panic; then routing completely those assembled host of heroes consisting of Chedis, Panchalas and the Srinjayas, Drona appeared highly beautiful, O sire. With his hoary locks flowing down to the ear, blue in complexion, full eighty-five years of age,

74. The venerable Drona, though burdened with the weight of years then moved on the field like a youth of sixteen. Then O mighty monarch, as Drona careered fearlessly on the field of battle,

75. His adversaries considere' him to be none other than Indra himself armed with the thunder. Then, O king, the intelligent, Drupada thus spoke :—

76. 'Like a hungry tiger slaying inferior animals, Drona is slaying these Kshatriyas. Surely the wicked Duryodhana will obtain very miserable regions after Death.

77. It is through his co etousness that these foremost of the Kshatryas are lying prostrate on the field of battle being slain by hundreds, like so many quartered bovine bulls,

78. Weltering in blood and being the food of the jackals and the dogs." O mighty monarch, thus speaking, that commander of a Aukshauhini, Drupada, placing the Parthas before him, quickly rushed against Drona.

Thus ends the one hundaed and twenty fifth chapter, the desplay of Drona's prowess, in the Jayadratha-badha of th Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXVI.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When the armies of the Pandavas were thus being agitated on all sides, the Pandavas and the Panchalas, together with the Somakas retreated to a great distance.

2. When, O Bharata, that fierce and horripilating battle was raging furiously, it appeared that the hour of the world's dreadful dissolution had arrived.

3. When Drona was desplaying his prowess in battle, and constantly roaring, and when the Pandus, the Panchalas were being slaughtered and reduced in number,

4. King Yudhisthira the virtuous could not find any protector for himself. And O foremost of kings, he thought—'how will it end'.

5. Then longingly looking on all directions with the desire of having a sight of Partha, Yudhisthira was disappointed, and saw neither Arjuna nor Madhava

6. He could not then find that foremost of men having the monkey-chief for the device on his banner ; and could not also hear the twang of the Gandiva bow. He therefore became greatly depressed.

7. Without finding also that foremost of the Vrishnis namely Satyaki, that great car-warrior, king Yudhisthira the virtuous became overwhelmed with anxious thought and his limbs became weak.

8. Then getting no information whatever of those two best of men, the very virtuous king Yudhisthira obtained no peace of mind. The high-souled king then afraid of the reproaches of the world,

9. Began to think of the car of Sini's grandson :—"In the track of Phalguna, I have sent

10. Sini's grandson Satyaki, that one of true prowess, that giver of assurances to his friends. My anxiety that was for one only, is now for two, Satyaki and Arjuna.

11. I should now get information both of Satyaki and of Dhananjaya. Having sent Satyaki in the track of Pandu's son Arjuna,

12. Whom shall I now sent in the track of that Satwata hero. If now I strive to get information of my brother only,

13. Not taking any care for Yuyudhana, the world will blame me and say :—"King Yudhisthira the virtuous enquiring after his brother,

14—15. Neglects Satyaki of the Vrishni race, that hero of infallible prowess. Afraid as I am of the reproaches of men, I shall send Pritha's son Vrikodara in the track of the illustrious scion of Madhu's race. The affection I bear for that slayer of foes viz. Arjuna,

16. Is in no way greater than that I bear for that invincible hero of the Satwata race. That delighter of Sini's race has been entrusted with a commission on my behalf.

17. That mighty-warrior has either for the sake of a friend's words, or for the sake of his honor, has plunged into the Bharata host, like Makara entering into the ocean.

18. Hark the loud noise of the battle that the unretreating heroes are fighting with that intelligent champion of the Vrishni race !

19—20. Surely the odds are too many for him. It is therefore high time that I should think of rescuing him. It appears proper to me that armed with the bow, the son of Pandu viz Bhimasena should proceed to the spot where those two mighty car-warriors are. There is scarcely anything on earth that Bhima can not bear.

21. Exerting his best, he can alone withstand all the bowmen of the world. Depending on the prowess of his own arms, he can make head against all enemies.

22. With the help of the strength of arms of that hero of illustrious soul, we have been able to come back from our exile, and have never been defeated in battle.

23. If now Bhimasena goes to their rescue, Satwata and Phalguna will find a competent protector in his self.

24. Surely I should not cherish any anxiety for those two heroes, as both of them are versed in the use of all weapons and are protected by the son of Vasudeva himself.

25. However, it is my duty to make myself altogether unaxious on their account. Therefore should I engage Bhima to follow in the track of the Satwata hero.

26. Having done this, I should thaink my arrangements for the protection of Satyaki complete." Thus resolving in his mind, king Yudhisthira the virtuous,

27. Thus spoke to his charioteer :—Take me to the spot where Bhima is." Hearing the words of the virtuous king Yudhisthira, the charioteer versed in the art of horse-driving,

28. Drove that chariot adorned with gold, near where Bhimas was. Reaching Bhima, the king remembering the exegencies of the hour,

29. Became totally overwhelmed with grief, and entreated Bhima with numerous prayers. Then overwhelmed as he was with grief, the king summoned Bhima, near him.

30—31. Then Yudhisthira the son of Kunti addressing him said:—"O Bhima, I do not see the banner-device of that younger brother of mine, who on a single car vanquished the celestials, the Gandharvas and the Daityas in battle." Thereupon Bhima addressing the virtuous Yudhisthira who was in that pitiable plight said:—

32. "Never before did I see you afflicted with such great grief. In days gone by, you were our only comforter when we were afflicted with extreme distress.

33. Arise, arise, O foremost of kings! Command me what act of yours shall I do? O giver of honors, there is nothing which I can not accomplish.

34-35. O foremost of the Kurus, command me! Let not your heart give way to grief." Then king Yudhisthira, with a cheerless countenance and tearful eyes, said these words to Bhimasena sighing like a snake. 'In as much as I do hear the blast of the conch Pancha[illegible]nya,

36. Filled [illegible]h the breath of the illustrious and hig[illegible]ly courageous son of Vasudeva, I infer that your brother Dhananjaya today is slain on the field of battle.

37. Upon the slaughter of Arjuna, surely Janarddana is fighting. That hero on whose indomitable prowess the Pandavas rely,

38. He to whom we turn for help, like the celestials turning to the thousand-eyed deity at the times of our sorest calamities, surely that hero is now agitating the Bharata hosts in search of the ruler of the Sindhus.

39. O Bhima, we have seen him (Arjuna) gone, but we shall never see him return! Alas for Arjuna of dark-blue complexion, who is youthful in years, possessed of curling locks exceedingly charming, handsome and a mighty car-warrior,

40. Of broad breast, mighty arms, possessed of the tread of an infuriate elephant, of eyes like those of the Chakara, that inspirer of terror into the heart of the foes!

41. Good betide you! O slayer of foes, this indeed is the cause of my grief, O mighty armed one, for the sake of Arjuna and for that of the Satwata hero,

42. My grief is ever increasing, like fire increasing when libation of clarified butter is poured on it. I do not see the device on his banner, and this adds to my grief and anxiety all the more.

43. Upon the slaughter of your brother, surely Krishna conversant with all modes of warfare, is battling with the Kurus. Bring me the intelligence of that foremost of men, and of that mighty car-warrior of the Vrishni race,

44. Who has ere now followed in the track of your brother that mighty car-warrior. I am also overwhelmed with distress on account of this last-mentioned mighty arm-hered.

45. O son of Kunti do you hie yoursel[f] to the spot where Dhananjaya and Satyaki of great energy, have gone! This indeed is your duty.

46. O my most dutiful brother, carry out my behests as I am your elder brother. Think that Satyaki is dearer to you than your brother Arjuna (so try to help Satyaki the more).

47. O son of Pritha, desirous of doing me good, he has gone in search of Dhananjaya in an impassable track dreadful and in capable of being followed upon by warriors of inferior skill.

48. Beholding Krishna and Arjuna and the Satwata hero Satyaki sound and alive, inform me of the fact, O son of Pandu, by uttering your war-cry aloud.

Thus ends the one hundred and twenty sixth chapter, the anxiety of Yudhisthira, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXVII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—

Bhima said:—

1. Riding on the chariot formerly ridden by Brahma, Ishana, Indra and Varuna, Arjuna and Krishna have proceeded to battle! They can have no fear.

2. However, placing your command on my head, behold, I proceed. Do not give way to grief. Returning, I shall bring you intelligence of those foremost of men.

Sanjaya said:—

3. Having thus spoken, the highly powerful Bhimasena prepared to go having given over the charge of protecting Yudhisthira to Dhristadyumna and other friends of the Pandavas.

4. The puissant Bhima then addressing Dhristadyumna said these words. "O mighty-armed one, it is all known to you, that Drona the mighty car-warrior."

5. Is ever watchful for capturing the very virtuous king Yudhisthira. O son of Prisata, when I am gone, there should be no other duty of yours,

6. Graver than that which enjoins you to look after the king—a duty which is vitally important to ourselves. King Yudhisthira, the son of Pritha, has commanded me to go. I venture not to contradict him.

7. Now I am proceeding to the spot where the doomed ruler of the Sindhus is. It is my duty to carry out the commands of the very virtuous king Yudhisthira to the very letters.

8. I am proceeding in the track of my brother and that intelligent scion of the Satwata race, namely Satyaki. So to-day, do you protect king Yudhisthira the son of Pritha in battle, exerting to the best of your prowess.

9. This indeed should be your foremost duty in the course of this fight." O mighty monarch, Dhristadyumna then replied to Vrikodara saying :—

10. "I will do, O Pritha's son, what you desire me to do. Go you with your heart at rest. Without slaying Dhrishtadyumna in battle, Drona

11. Will never succeed in humiliating king Yudhisthira the virtuous," Thereafter making the charge of protecting the royal son of Pandu over to Dhristadyumna,

12. And saluting his superiors and elder brother, Bhima proceeded in the track of Phalguna. That son of Kunti was then, O Bharata, embraced by the virtuous king Yudhisthira.

13. The latter then smelt the crown of his head, and pronounced blessings on him. Then circumambulating hosts of Brahmanas gratified and worshipped with presents,

14. And touching the eight kinds of auspicious articles, and drinking Kailataka honey, that hero with his eyes rolling and red in intoxication, felt his strength to be doubled.

15. The Vipras performed propitiatory rites for his benefit. Omens indicative of victory greeted his sight. Beholding these indications he experienced the pleasures of victory in anticipation.

16. Auspicious winds began to blow indicating his success in the coming encounter. Then the mighty-armed Bhimasena covered with armour, graced with beautiful ear-rings,

17. Adorned with Angadas, and his hands protected with leathern gloves, mounted on his car. His precious armour made of steel and adorned with gold,

18. Looked beautiful like a mighty cloud fringed with streaks of lightning. Attired beautifully in yellow, red, white and sable garments,

19. And with his neck protected with a neck-protector, he looked beautiful like a mass of cloud bearing the bow of Indra (rainbow). When Bhima was on the point of proceeding to battle against your troops,

90. The fierce blare of the conch Panchajannya, O ruler of men, was once more heard. Hea ing that dreadful blast capable of inspiring terror into the three worlds,

21. The very virtuous king Yudhisthira once more addressing Bhima of mighty arms said :—'Hark the sound of the conch (water-born) blown by the foremost of the Vrishni race,

22. Reverberating through the terrestrial and the aerial regions! Surely Savyasachin having been involved in great danger,

23—24. The wilder of the mace and the discus is battling with the Kurus! Surely numerous inauspicious omens are to-day being seen by the venerable Kunti, and Drupadi and Subhadra and all their friends. Therefore, O Bhima, at the top of your speed, proceed to the spot where Dhananjaya is.

25. O son of Pritha, the cardinal and subsidiary quarter appear to me to be void, in consiquence of my unsatisfied desire to see Dhananjaya and that hero of the Satwata race."

26. Then Vrikodara was repeatedly urged on by his elder brother, with the words "Proceed Proceed." Therefore O king, that highly puissant son of Pandu namely Bhimasena,

27. Covering his fingers with protectors made of leather, took up his bow. Urged on by his elder brother, that brother Bhimasena devoted as he was to the interests of his brothers,

28. Caused drums to be struck up. Then he blew his conch with great force, and uttering his war-cries, began to twang his bow.

29. With that sound, causing the hearts of his enemies to be depressed, he rushed upon the foe, assuming a dreadful aspect.

30. Fleet steeds, obedient to the reins, and of the foremost breed, neighing furiously, bore him. Those steeds of the fleetness of the wind or the mind, were driven by Visoka himself.

31. Drawing and rubbing and stretching with his hands the string of his bow, that son of Pritha began to crush and kill the vanguard of the enemy.

32. Then as that mighty-armed one proceeded onwards, the Panchalas together with the Somakas, all endued with heroism, followed him from behind, like the celestials following Maghavat.

33—35. Then, O mighty monarch, the brothers, Dussala, Chitrasena, Kundavedhi, Vivinsati, Durmukha, Dussaha, Vikarna, Sala, Vindu and Anuvindu, Sumukha, Dirghavahu, Sudarsana, Mandurakas, Suhasta, Susena, Dirghavahu, Abhaya, Raudrakaman, Suvarman, and Durvimochana, approaching Bhimasena, surrounded him from all sides.

36. Those foremost of car-warriors, those heroes and their following troops fighting heedfully and falling upon Bhimasena appeared highly beautiful.

37. Then that mighty car-warrior endued with heroism was surrounded by those warriors. Beholding them, the son of Kunti the highly powerful Bhimasena,

38. Furiously fell upon them like a lion attacking other inferior animals. Then those heroes displaying mighty weapons of celestial make,

39. Covered Bhima with their arrows like the clouds covering the sun. Passing through all those divisions, Bhima then rushed against that of Drona.

40. Then he poured his arrowy shower on the elephant division that was stationed in the front.

41. The son of the wind-god, mangling in no time that division of elephants, with his shafts, caused it to give way in all directions. Like beasts terrified at the roar of a Sarabha in the forest,

42. Those elephants began to fly away uttering distressful cries. Transgressing that division, he quickly assailed that of Drona.

43. Him then the preceptor checked like the continent checking the surging waves of the ocean; and then the latter smilingly pierced the former on his forehead with a Naracha.

44. Thereupon that son of Pandu appeared beautiful like the sun shooting his rays only in an upward direction. Then the Preceptor considering that, like Phalguna,

45. Bhima would also worship him, addressed the latter saying :—'O Bhimasena, you shall never succeed in penetrating into the host of your enemies,

46. Without, in the first instance defeating myself, O mighty one, who is now your foe. It was with my permission that your younger brother, with Krishna, has penetrated into this array.

47. But you shall never be able (or allowed) to enter into this division of mine." Thereupon the dauntless Bhima, hearing those words of the preceptor, 48-49. And waxing wroth, quickly replied to Drona with his eyes looking like burnished copper :—"O vilest of Brahmanas, it can not be that Arjuna has entered this array with your permission. He is invincible and is competent even to penetrate through the army of Sakra himself. It was only for honoring you that he offered you worship.

50. But, O Drona, I am no linient Arjuna. I am Bhimasena your enemy. We used to regard you as our father, preceptor and friend, and we were like your sons.

51. Thinking thus we used to humble ourselves to you. But as you speak such words to-day, it seems that all that has been changed.

52. If you take yourself to be our enemy, let it be as you think. Myself am Bhima and shall do towards you what should be done towards a foe."

53. Then Bhima whirling his mace that resembled the mace of the Destroyer, let it go, O king, at Drona; but Drona had quickly jumped down from his car.

54. The mace then crushed Drona's chariot with his horses, charioteer and standard; then Bhima grinded numerous warriors, like the tempest crushing mighty trees.

55. But once more your sons surrounded that foremost of car warriors. Meanwhile that foremost of smiters, Drona mounting on another car,

56. Stationed himself at the gate of the array ready to fight with Bhima. O mighty monarch, thereupon the puissant Bhimasena waxing wroth,

57. Covered the car division that was then placed before him, with a downpour of arrows. Then those mighty car-warriors, your sons, thus wounded in battle,

58. Endued as they were with great strength, fought on with Bhima, inspired with the hope of victory. Then Dussasana excited with wrath, hurled a lance at Bhima.

59. Desirous of slaying the son of Pandu, he then threw that lance at the former—lance that was made entirely of steel and that was exceedingly sharp. Then the mighty lance hurled by your son when it was coursing towards Bhima,

60—63. Was cut in twain by the latter and that appeared indeed very wonderful. Then the son of Pandu endued with great prowess, with three sharp arrows, slew the three warriors, Kundavedhin, Susena and Dirghanetra. Then again he slew the heroic Manduraka the bravest of your sons and the enhancer of the glory of the Kurus; then Bhima with another three arrows slew three other of your sons viz Abhaya, Rudrakarman and Durvimochana. Thus slaughtered by the puissant Bhima, your sons ,O mighty monarch,

64. Once more surrounded Bhima that foremost of smiters. Then they poured their arrows on Pandu's son of fearful deeds,

65-69. Like clouds drenching the mountain breast with their contents at the end of summer. Like a mountain receiving a shower of stones, the son of Pandu then received that arrowy shower, and that slayer of foes was none the less worse for it. Then the son of Kunti, as if smiling, despatched with his arrows, Vinda and Anuvinda together with Suvarman, to the abode of Death. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas,he pierced in battle, your heroic son Sudarsana, who fell down, and died on the spot. Then in no time, the son of Pandu, casting his eyes on all directions, began to agitate that car-host with his (fierce) arrows. Then like a herd of deer, terrified at the loud clatter of car-wheels,

70. Your sons, O ruler of men, began to desert their ranks; and afflicted with the fear of Bhima, they fled with all the speed at their command.

71. The son of Kunti pursued that mighty army of your sons from behind and, O king, he began to pierce the Kourava hosts right and left.

72 O mighty monarch, your soldiers then thus slaughtered by Bhima, shunning him began to fly away, urging their excellent steeds to the top of their speed.

73. Vanquishing them in battle, the highly puissant Bhimasena that son of Pandu, sent up a loud war-cry and began to strike his palms against his arms.

74. The mighty Bhima then having caused that great slapping sound and there by striking terror into the host of the enemy and slaying many best warriors and passing through that division, hied towards the division of Drona.

Thus ends the one hundred and twenty-seventh chapter, the entrance of Bhima in the Kourava host and the display of his prowess, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXVIII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA—)

Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. The Preceptor then, desirous of checking the progress of the son of Pandu, who had now crossed the car-host, began to cover him smilingly with his arrows.

2. Then seeming to dirnk in the arrowy showers shot from Drona's bow and confounding your troops by his illusive powers, he began to rush against your sons.

3. Urged on by your sons, many kinge all foremost bowmen, rushing with forcs began to surround Bhima from all sides.

4. Then, O Bharata, surrounded by them, Bhima smiling and roaring like a lion, took up a dreadful mace.

5. He then with force hurled at them that mace capable of destroying the foe, like Indra hurling his thunder against his enemies. Hurled with force and of great strength,

6. That mace began to crush, O king, your troops in battle; and O king, it seemed to fill the earth with its loud noise.

7. Burning greatly, that dreadful mace terrified your sons. Then beholding that mace of great momentum wrapt up in blazing flames course towards themselves,

8. Your troops began to fly away uttering cries. At the unbearable sound of that mace, O sire,

9. Men began to fall down on the spot they stood; and many car-warriors dropped down from their cars. Slaughtered by Bhima armed with a mace in his hands, your troops,

10—11. Began to fly away terrified from the field of battle, like deer attacked by a tiger. The son of Kunti then causing his brave adversaries to fly away, passed through that division with great force, like Suparna, that king of birds. While Bhima that leader of leaders of car hosts was thus spreading carnage in your troops,

12. O mighty monarch, the son of Bharadwaja, viz., Drona rushed upon Bhima, checking the latter with his showers of arrows.

13—14. Then he uttered a loud war-cry, inspiring there with the Pandavas with terror. Then a dreadful combat commenced between the high-souled Bhima and Drona, that resembled that between the Gods and the Asuras. Then with the sharp shafts shot from the bow of Drona,

15. Numerous heroes were slain by hundreds and by thousands. Then jumping down from his car, and rushing with fury, the son of Pandu,

16. With his eyes closed, on foot, attacked Drona. Then like a bovine bull receiving a shower of rain without any pain whatsoever,

17—18. Bhima that foremost of men received that shower of arrows, proceeding from Drona's car. O sire, although wounded by Drona in battle, that puissant hero, catching hold of the shaft of Drona's car with his hands, over-threw it. Thereupon Drona thus over-thrown with vehemence by Bhima,

19. Mounted on another car, and flew towards the gate of the array, and at that time, his driver urged his steeds to the top of their speed.

20. O foremost of the Kurus that feat achieved by Bhimasena was indeed wonderful. Then the mighty Bhimsena, ascending once more his own chariot,

21. Rushed furiously upon the division of your son ; like a tempest crushing rows of trees, he then began to crush that host of the Kshatriyas.

22. He then proceeded resisting the hostile troops like mountains checking the surging sea ; then coming upon the division of the Bhojas, protected by Hridika's son,

23. O king, Bhimasena crushed it horribly and then passed through it. Terrifying his enemies with the sound of his palm-strokes, O sire,

24. Bhima defeated them all like a tiger defeating a herd of bulls. Then passing through the Bhoja and Kamvoja divisions,

25. And through that of the countless Mlechchas, who were all accomplished in smiting, Bhima obtained sight of Satyaki, the mighty car-warrior engaged in fighting.

26. He then advanced quickly and resolutely, desirous of having a sight of Dhananjaya.

27. Passing through all your divisions then, the son of Pandu obtained a sight of Dhananjaya engaged in battle.

28. Then the highly puissant Bhima, that foremost of men, seeing Arjuna exerting vigourously for bringing about the slaughter of the king of the Sindhus, sent up a loud war-cry,

29—30. Like, O king, the clouds roaring at the rainy seasons. That dreadful roar of the roaring Bhimasena was then heard, O foremost of the Kurus, by Partha and the son of Vasudeva engaged in battle. Those two heroes hearing at the same time the war-cry of the mighty Bhima,

31. Themselves began to shout their war-cries, desirous of having a sight of Bhimasena. Then Pritha's son Arjuna and he of Madhu's race, both uttering their war-cries,

32. Rushed upon your army, O mighty monarch, like two bovine bulls. Hearing the shouts of Bhimasena and those of Phalguna the fierce bowman,

33. The very virtuous king Yudhisthira, O monarch, became greatly delighted. Hearing their shouts the king then was relieved of his burden of anxiety.

34. That sovereign then become hopeful of Dhananjaya's success in the battle. While the furious Bhima was thus roaring,

35. The mighty-armed Yudhisthira that foremost of all virtuous persons, that son of Dharma, reflected smilingly for a while and then thus worded the thought that then filled his heart.

36. "O Bhima, you have indeed sent me information ; you have truly carried out the commands of your superior. O son of Pandu, they cannot have any hope of victory in battle, whose enemy you yourself are.

37. It is indeed fortunate that Savyasachin, that conqueror of Kuvera still lives. It is also fortunate that Satyaki of indomitable prowess is sound and safe.

38. It is fortunate that I hear the roars of the roaring Vasudeva and Dhananjaya. He who having vanquished Sakra in battle, gratified the God of fire,

39. It is fortunate, that that slayer of foes Phalguna still lives. He depending upon whose prowess of arms we live,

40—44. Through good fortune, that Arjuna still lives and is slaughtering his foes. He who vanquished with a single bow the Daityas Nivata Kavacha who were incapable of being defeated even by the celestials themselves, it is indeed fortunate that that son of Pritha still lives. He, who in the city of the Matsyas defeated the united Kouravas come with the intent of seizing the cows of the Matasya king, it is indeed fortunate that that son of Pritha still lives. He who by the strength of his arms slew the fourteen thousand Kekayas in battle, it is fortunate that that son of Pritha still lives. He who for the sake of rescuing Duryodhana had vanquished with the force of his weapons the mighty king of the Gandharvas, it is fortunate that that son of Pritha still lives. Decked with the diadem, and garlands, endued with prowess, owning white steeds and having Krishna for his charioteer,

45. That Arjuna, ever dear to me, through good fortune still lives. Afflicted as he is sorely with the grief caused by the death of his son, and striving to achieve a most difficult feat,

46. And even now endeavouring to compass the death of Jayadratha, he that hath made a terrible vow, viz., Dhananjaya, will he succeed in slaying the king of the Sindhus in battle ?

47. Shall I behold Arjuna again before the sun set, when he will return having fulfilled his vow through the help of Vasudeva's son ?

48. Will the ruler of the Sindhus ever anxious for achieving the good of king Duryodhana, afford delight unto his foes, being slain by Phalguna.

49. Will king Duryodhana, beholding the ruler of the Sindhus slain by Arjuna, conclude peace with ourselves ?

50. Will the wicked Duryodhana beholding his brothers slain in battle by Bhimasena, conclude peace with us ?

51. Will the wicked Duryodhana beholding many other mighty warriors slain and fallen on the field, repent for his own folly.

52. Will our enimity end with the sacrifice of Bhisma's self alone? Will Suyodhana conclude peace for the safety of the rest of the Kshatriyas ?"

53. When in his heart overflowing with compassion, king Yudhisthira was thus thinking, on the other part of the field a terrible combat raged."

Thus ends the one hundred and twenty-eighth chapter, the joy of Yudhisthira, in the Jayadrath-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXIX.

(JAYADRATHA-BADH PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. What heroes of my army resisted the mighty Bhimasena when he was thus roaring like clouds surcharged with thunder ?

2. O Sanjaya, I do not find that warrior in the three worlds, who can, stand before Bhimasena when he is excited with rage.

3. I do not, O son, find that warrior who can stand before Bhima when in battle with his mace uplifted, he stands like Death incarnate.

4. He that slays elephants with elephants, destroys cars with cars, who will stand before that Bhima not excepting Indra of hundred-sacrifices ?

5. Who amongst those devoted to the interests of Duyodhana, would withstand Bhimasena in battle, excited as he was with wrath and engaged in slaughtering my sons ?

6. What persons, stood before the Bhima-conflagration when it was engaged in consuming the heaps of straw and grass constituted by my sons ?

7. Who were they that surrounded Bhima in battle, beholding him crush my sons one after another, like Death's self-destroying all creatures ?

8. I do not fear Arjuna, or Krishna or Satyaki or him born of the sacrificial fire (Dhristadyumna) so much as I do Bhimasena.

9. O Sanjaya relate to me, what heroes advanced against the blazing Bhima-fire which so greatly consumed by sons ?

Sanjaya said :—

10. When the mighty car-warrior Bhimasena was thus roaring, the mighty Karna rushed at him, himself uttering a loud shout (in response).

11. Unable to bear the roar of Bhima, he began to twang his bow capable of withstanding a great strain. Then the mighty Karna, out of a desire for battle displaying his strength,

12. Checked the career of Bhima ; then beholding the son of Vikartana stand before him with hostile intentions, Vrikodara,

13. Became inflamed with wrath ; and that mighty hero discharged at him numerous shafts whetted on stone. Karna received all those shafts, and sped many in return.

14—15. In that battle between Bhima and Karna, hearing the sound of their palm-strokes, the limbs of on-looking and fighting warriors and horsemen and elephants, began to tremble. Hearing the defeaning roars uttered by Bhimasena on the field of battle,

16. The foremost of the Kshatriyas regarded the welkin and the earth to be filled completely by its echo. Then again at the dreadful cries uttered by the illustrious son of Pandu,

17—18. The bows of all the warriors fell down on the earth. Then, O mighty monarch, seized with panic and dejected, the steeds and elephants, repeatedly discharged urine and excreta. Numerous dreadful omens of evil then appeared to view.

19. During that fierce fight between Karna and Bhimasena, the sky became covered with flights of vultures, and Kankas.

20. Karna then pierced Bhima with twenty arrows, and next swifty pierced the latter's charioteer with five arrows.

21. Then the highly puissant Bhimasena endued with great activity smilingly sped at Karna in that battle a set of sixty-four arrows.

22. Then at him, O mighty monarch, Karna shot four arrows. But before these arrows could reach him, with nine arrows of depressed knots, Bhima,

23. Cut them in numerous parts, displaying at the same time his great lightness of hands. Karna then shrouded him in a net-work of numerous arrows.

24. Thus although shrouded by Karna on all sides, that mighty car-warrior that son of Pandu, cut off the bow of Karna near his grasp.

25. He then pierced him with ten arrows of close knots. Then taking up another bow and stringing it, the son of the charioteer

26. That mighty car-warrior of dreadful deeds, pierced Bhima in battle (with many arrows). Thereat highly enraged, with three arrows of depressed knots, Bhima

27. Struck with force on the breast of the son of the charioteer. With those arrows stuck on the centre of his breast, Karna appeared beautiful like

28 A mighty mountain with its three peaks towering high. Pierced as he was with those excellent arrows, streams of blood began to flow down his person,

29. Like streams of liquified red chalk flowing down the sides of a mountain. Afflicted with that mighty wound inflicted by Bhima, Karna was a little flurried.

30. Then fixing an arrow on his bow, O sire,he pierced Bhima therewith; and then shot arrows by hundreds and thousands.

31. Thus though then quickly covered with arrows by that resolute bowman namely Karna, yet that son of Panda smilingly cut off the bow-string of the former.

32. Then with a broad-headed shaft, Bhima despatched Karna's charioteer to the abode of Death; then that mighty car-warrior deprived the latter's steeds of their lives.

33. Jumping down from the car of which the steeds were slain, O ruler of men, the mighty car-warrior Karna ascended the chariot of Vrisasena.

34. Then the valiant Bhima, having defeated Karna uttered a loud war-cry, that resembled the roar of the rain-cloud Parjannya.

35. Hearing that roar of his, Yudhisthira became filled with delight, as he thought that Karna had been defeated, O Bharata by Bhimasena.

36. Then the Pandava troops simultaneously blew their conchs. Hearing that sound of challenge emitted by the enemy, your own troops shouted aloud.

37. Pritha's son (Arjuna) then twanged his bow, and Krishna blew his water-born conch. But drowning all those sounds, the shout of Bhima rose and

38. Was heard by all your troops, O sire. Then those two combatants, viz, Karna and Bhima each struck the other with straight-flying arrows. The son of Radha shot his shafts mildly, but the son of Pandu shot those of his with great vehemence.

Thus ends the one hundred and twenty ninth chapter, the defeat of Karna, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXX.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. When his army had been shattered and when Arjuna, Bhimasena and the Satwata hero Satyaki had all gone after the ruler of the Sindhus, your son Duryodhana proceeded towards Drona,

2. On a single car and in all haste and reflecting on the various measures to be adopted. That chariot of your son driven with great celerity,

3. And endued with the fleetness of the wind or thought, dashed towards Drona. Then your son with eyes red in rage addressing Drona said :—

4. Arjuna and Bhimasena and the invincible Satyaki and many other mighty car-warriors, having defeated all our troops,

5—6. Have succeeded in reaching near the ruler of the Sindhus, O slayer of foes. There they are fighting—all these indomitable and mighty car warriors vanquishing all our troops. But O giver of honor, how is it, that you have to-day been trangressed by Bhima and Satyaki?

7. O foremost of the Brahmanas, your defeat by that scion of the Satwata race and by Arjuna is wonderful like the drying up of the ocean itself!

8. People are saying—'How is it that Drona that master of archery has been defeated by Bhimasena

9. Indeed all warriors are thus speaking and it should be disgraceful to you. I see that the destruction of my unfortunate self is inevitable.

10—11. But when, O foremost of men, all the three mighty car-warriors have transgressed you, tell us what you have to say on the business at hand. Let by gones be by-gones. O giver of honor, now think what is to be done at present. Speak quickly what should next be done for the ruler of the Sindhus on the present crisis, and let that also be quickly carried out into action.

Drona said :—

12. O mighty monarch, there are many things to be thought of, but hear what should be done now. Three mighty car-warriors of the Pandava host have penetrated into our army.

13. We have as much cause of apprehension behind those three as we have before them. But to my mind the cause of apprehension is greater there where both Krishna and Dhananjaya are.

14. The Bharata army have simultaneously been attacked both from the van and the rear. At this crisis, I consider our foremost duty is to protect the ruler of the Sindhus.

15. Afraid as he is of the enraged Dhananjaya, he should be regarded as the primary object of our protection, O sire. The two heroes, Vrikodara and Yuyudhana have also proceeded towards the king of the Sindhus.

16. The dire result of the game of dice, planned by the ingenuity of Sakuni, has now overtaken you. There were no actual victory or defeat in the assembly in that game.

17. Now that we are engaged in this battle, we will reap victory or defeat. Those innocent things with which Sakuni played in the assembly of the Kurus,

18. And which he knew to be dice, are in reality not dice, but mighty arrows incapable of being defeated. Those dice have now been changed into shafts capable of mangling your bodies.

19. Now in this field where numerous Kurus have been assembled, know the troops to be the players, the and arrows the dice, O ruler of men.

20. In this game of dice, know the ruler of the Sindhus to be the stake. Indeed Jayadratha is the precious stake for which we are fighting to-day.

21. For these reasons, O mighty monarch, it behoves us all to effect the protection of the Sindhu king at the very cost of our own lives.

22. O sire, there indeed will our victory or defeat be known where those fierce bowmen are exerting themselves in protecting the king of the Sindhus.

23. Therefore do you hie yourself to that spot and endeavour to protect those protectors of the Sindhu king. I shall stay here and despatch others (for helping the Sindhu king).

24. I shall also engage with the Panchalas united with the Pandvas, and the Srinjayas." Then at the command of the preceptor, Duryodhana quickly proceeded to the spot indicated by the former,

25. Attened by his followers, and bent on achieving a fierce feat. Mean-while the two protectors of Arjuna's car-wheels, viz, the Panchala princes, Yudhamanyu and Uttamanjas,

26. Were proceeding towards Savyasachin, by the skirts of the Kourava troops. The two princes O monarch, were checked by Kritavarman,

27. When they were trying to find Arjuna who had penetrated into your army desirous of battle. The king of the Kurus, saw them proceeding by the skirts of his army.

28. Then the mighty Duryodhana of the Bharata race quickly began a terrible fight with those two brothers endued with great activity.

29. Then those two foremost of the Kshatriyas, both classed as Maharathas assailed Duryodhana with bows ready for use.

30. Then Yudhamanyu pierced him with thirty arrows furnished with wings of the Kanka-feathers; the former then pierced the latter's charioteer with twenty and his four horses with four arrows.

31. Then with a single arrow Duryodhana cut off the standard of Yudhamnya; and then with another arrow your son cut off the latter's bow.

32. With a Valla then he felled his adversary's charioteer from his nich in the car, and with four arrows wounded the four steeds.

33. Thereupon Yudhamanyu excited with wrath pierced your son on the breast with thirty arrows in all quickness.

34. Similarly Uttamoujas waxing wroth pierced Duryodhana's charioteer with arrows decked with gold, and despatched him to the abode of Death.

35. Duryodhana also, O foremost of kings, slew the four steeds of the Panchala prince Uttamoujas, and also both this Parshni-drivers.

36. Having his horses and his charioteer slain, Uttamoujas ascended the car of his brother Yudhamanyu with great celerity.

37. Ascending the car of his brother, he wounded the horses of Duryodhana with numerous arrows, and the horses then slain fell down dead on the ground.

38. When the steeds had fallen the puissant Yudhamanyu with a excellent shaft cut off Duryodhana's bow and his leathern gloves.

39. Then that foremost of warriors Duryodhana, jumping down from his chariot of which the steeds were slain rushed at the Panchala princes with a mace in his grasp.

40. Beholding that enraged subduer of hostile cities make towards themselves, Yudhamanya and Uttamoujas jumped down from the terrace of their cars.

41. Then that one armed with the mace, with a stroke of his weapon pressed that excellent car decked with gold to the ground together with its horses charioteer and standard.

42. Thus having slain the steeds and and charioteer of his adversaries, your son that afflicter of his foes having his own horses and charioteer slain, ascended the car of the ruler of Madras.

43. Those two foremost of Panchalas, those princes both mighty car-warriors, ascending two other cars, proceeded towards Vibhatsu.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirtieth chapter, the battle between Duryodhana and the Panchala princes, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXI.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. When that hair-stirring battle continued to be fought and when all the warriors were filled with anxiety, and were greatly afflicted,

2. O foremost of the Bharatas, Radha's son advanced against Bhima for battle, like one infuriate elephant rushing against a compeer in the same state.

Dhritarastra said:—

3. How raged the battle, near Arjuna's chariot between those two mighty car-warriors, Bhima and Karna, both possessed of great strength?

4. Once before, Karna was vanquished by Bhima in battle: how could he then again assail Bhimsena?

5. How could Bhima proceed against Suta's son, that mighty car-warriors regarded as the foremost of all warriors on earth.

6. Having worsted Bhisma and Drona, the very virtuous king Yudhisthira entertained not so much apprehension from any body else as he did from Karna.

7. Thinking of the mighty car-warrior Karna, he passes many sleepless nights from fear. How then could Bhima proceed against that son of Suta?

8. O Sanjaya, how could indeed Bhima fight with Karna, that best of all warriors, that hero devoted to the Brahmanas, endued with prowess and never flying away from fight.

9. How did those two mighty car-warriors Karna and Vrikodara fight with each other, in that combat that raged in the neighbourhood of Partha's chariot?

10. Knowing his brotherhood towards the Pandavas and possessing a compassionate temparament and remembering the words of Kunti, how could the son of Suta fight with Bhimasena?

11. How did Bhima, that hero, fight with Suta's son Karna, keeping alive the memory of the wrongs inflicted on him by the latter in days gone by?

12. O Suta, my son Duryodhana fondly cherishes the hope that Karna will obtain victory in battle over the united Pandavas.

13. How did that one, on whom my wicked son's hope of victory rested, fight with Bhimasena of fierce deeds.

14. How did Bhima also fight with that son of Suta, O sire, relying on whom my sons provoked hostilities with many mighty car-warriors?

15. How did Bhima fight with that son of a charioteer, remembering the numerous wrongs inflicted on them to have their cause in him?

16. How did Bhima fight with that highly puissant son of Suta, who on a single car had vanquished the three worlds?

17. How did Bhima then fight with that son of Suta who was born with a pair of (natural) ear-rings, and covered in a coat of mail.

18. As you are conversant with these topics, O Sanjaya, tell me truly in detail how the battle between these two heroes, was fought, and who obtained victory.

Sanjaya said:—

19. Abandoning then that foremost of car-warriors namely, the son of Radha, Bhimsena strove to reach the spot where the heroic Krishna and Dhananjaya were.

20. Then as he was proceeding, the son of Radha assailing him began to shower shafts furnished with wings of Kanka-feather on him, like clouds showering rain on the mountain.

21. Then the valorous son of Adhiratha, with his beautiful face like a blooming lotus lighted up with a smile, challenged Bhimasena as he was coursing onwards thus:—

Karna said:—

22. O Bhima! your foes never thought of your fighting even in their dreams. Why do you show me your back from a desire for seeing Arjuna?

23. O delighter of the Pandavas! this conduct is not worthy of the son of Knnti. Confronting me do you ,over me with a shower of arrows."

Sanjaya said:—

24. Bhimasena then did not put up with that challenge of Karna tamely. But wheeling his car in a semicircle, he began to fight with the son of Suta.

25. In that combat when that one conversant with all weapons and clad in mail viz Karna was proceeding against him, the illustrious Bhima pierced him with straight-flying arrows.

26. Desirous of reaching the end of all those hostilities, he began to rob Karna's strength, out of a desire for slaying him. Having slain many other Kouravas, the mighty Bhima

27. That vindictive son of Pandu, excited with wrath, that slayer of foes, O sire, began to discharge at Karna many showers of fearful arrows.

28. Then the highly puissant son of Suta, by means of the illusion of his weapon devoured up all those showers of arrows poured by that one of the gait of an infuriate elephant.

29. O mighty monarch, duly favoured by knowledge, then that fierce bowman Karna began to career on the field of battle like a teacher of the military science.

30. The wrathful son of Radha then seemed to insult with his smiles, Bhimasena who was fighting in great anger.

31 But the son of Kunti did not brook that derisive smile of Radha's, son in the midst of many other brave warriors, who were looking at that fight between them.

32. Excited to the highest pitch of rage, the mighty Bhimasena, with several Vatsadantas, pierced Karna on the centre of his chest, like a guide goring a mighty elephant with the hook.

33. Once more with twenty one whetted shafts furnished with wings, and duly dis charged, Bhimasena pierced Suta's son of variegated armour.

34. Then the heroic Karna pierced each of the steeds of Bhima with five shafts,—steeds that were decked with golden caparisons, and endued with the fleetness of the wind.

35. O king, thereafter, a net-work of arrows was woven, within the twinkling of an eye, around the car of Bhima by the mighty Karna.

36. O mighty monarch, the son of Pandu with his car, standard and charioteer, was covered all over with the arrows shot from Karna's bow.

37. Then with sixty-four arrows, Karna shattered the tough armour of Bhima to pieces; and waxing wroth he wounded Pritha's son with Narachas capable of penetrating through the very vitals.

38. Then the mighty-armed Vrikodara unmindful of all those shafts shot from Karna's bow, began to strike dauntlessly the son of Suta.

39. Bhima then with his body struck with the arrows discharged from Karna's bow,that resembled snakes of virulent poison did indeed feel no pain, O mighty monarch.

40. Then the highly puissant Bhimasena pierced Karna in that battle, with thirty-two vallas of great sharpness and energy.

41. Then Karna, indifferently covered Bhima of mighty arms and desirous of the slaughter of the Sindhu king, with a tremendous shower of arrows.

42. In that battle the son of Radha fought mildly with Bhima, but Bhima fought with the former wrathfully remem-bering all thier former hostilities.

43. Bhima excited with wrath, did not bear that insult ; and that slayer of foes quiekly sped a shower of shafts at Karna.

44. Those shafts then discharged by Bhimasena in that battle,fell upon the heroic Karna like so many humming birds.

45. Furnished with golden wings, keen points, and discharged from the bow of Bhimasena, those arrows covered Radha's son like flights of insects covering a blazing fire.

46. Then that foremost of car-warriors viz Karna covered on all sides with those arrows, O king, O Bharata, shot numerous fierce arrows at Bhima.

47. Vrikodara then cut off with many shafts all those arrows of Karna that ornament of battle,—arrows that resembled the bolt of heaven, before they could reach him.

48. But once more, O Bharata, that subduer of foes viz Vikartana's son Karna, covered Bhimasena with a shower of arrows.

49. O Bharata, we then beheld Bhimasena thus pierced all over with arrows, resemble a procupine with its quills erect.

50. Then that hero Vikodara held all those shafts, furnished with golden wings, whetted on stone and shot from the bow of Karna, like the sun holding his own myriad rays.

51. His body steeped in blood, Bhima then appeared beautiful like a Asoka tree in the spring covered all over with blossoms.

52. But the mighty armed Bhima with his eyes roiling in rage, did not for long, bear that conduct of Karna in battle patiently.

53. Thereafter he pierced Karna in battle with twenty five Narachas; pierced therewith Karna appeared beautiful like a white mountain with his sides covered over with snakes of virulent poison.

54. Then once more that one of prowess resembling that of the immortals, pierced that reckless son of a Suta in his vital limbs with two sets of arrows numbering six and eight respectively.

55. Again the valiant Bhimasena with another arrow smilingly cut off the bow of Karna with great quickness.

56. Quickly did he then slay with his arrows Karna's four steeds and charioteer. He then pierced Karna on the breast with Narachas of the effulgence of solar rays.

57. Those winged shafts piercing Karna through, fell down on the earth like the rays of the sun penetrating through masses of rain clouds.

58. Wounded with those arrows and with his bow cut open, Karna was afflicted with great pain; although proud of his manliness,he then proceeded to another part of the field.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirty-first chapter, the defeat of Karna, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drana Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)— Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. Beholding, O Sanjaya, him on whom the hope of victory of my sons rested, compelled to turn his face away from the field of battle, what did king Duryodhna say ?

2. How did the puissant Bhima ever proud of prowess, fight then ? What did then Karna do, beholding Bhima blaze forth like a mighty fire in battle ?

Sanjaya said :—

3. Riding on another duly furnished car, Karna then rushed at Pandu's son, like the ocean lashed into fury by the tempest.

4. Then, O ruler of men, beholding Adhiratha's son excited with rage, your sons considered Bhimasena to be a libation poured on fire.

5. Then dreadfully slapping his palms and producing whizzes with his arrows, the son of Radha began to shower arrows on the car of Bhimasena.

6. Once more, O king, the encounter between the heroic son of Vikartana and the high-souled Bhima, raged furiously.

7. Filled with wrath and desirous of slaying one another, O mighty-armed one, they began to look at each other as if to burn each other down with their glances.

8. Their eyes became fierce and red in rage, and they breathed like two snakes. Those two slayers of enemies, those two heroes, then began to mangle each other with their arrows.

9. They fought on with one another like two furious tigers or two swift-flying hawks or two enraged Sarabhas.

10. Then that subduer of foes, viz., Bhima remembering the hardhips undergone by him at the game of dice, during his exile in the woods, and residence in the city of Virata ;

11. And recollecting the despoliation of the kingdom swelling with prosperity and gems by yours sons, and various other injuries inflicted upon the Pandavas, by yourself and the son of Suta ;

12. And bearing in mind the fact that you had conspired to burn the innocent Kunti with her sons, and remembering the woes of Krishna in the midst of the assembly at the hands of those wretches ;

13. As also the holding of her locks by Dussasana and the abusive speech uttered by Karna, O Bharata,

14. To this effect—"Take you another husband, for, all your husbands are dead ; the sons of Pritha have merged into hell and are like sesamum seed without kernel—"

15. Remembering also those words, O descendant of the Kuru race, that were uttered by the Kouravas in your presence, and the fact that your son had been desirous of enjoying Krishna as a slave,

16. Recollecting also those words, harsh and cruel, uttered by Karna, when the sons of Pandu were about to go to the forest, clad in deer-skins ;

17. And keeping alive in his remmory the brag your vindictive and foolish son, then in prosperity, indulged in holding the woe stricken sons of Pritha in the light of mere straws—

18. Indeed the virtuous-souled Bhima that slayer of opponents recollecting all these hardships and those he had undergone since his childhood, became disregardful of his very life.

19. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, stretching his invincible and gold-decked bow, Bhima rushed at Karna, reckless of his very life.

20. Then with a net-work woven with arrows whetted on stone, lustrous like the rays of the sun spread around the car of Karna, Bhima intercepted the rays of the sun.

21. Thereupon Adhiratha's son, smiling (in contempt) tore away Bhima's net-work of arrows, by means of his own winged shafts whetted on stone.

22. Then the mighty car-warrior of mighty arms and great strength, viz., that son of Adhiratha, pierced with nine whetted and mighty shafts that mighty warrior Bhima.

23. Assailed with those winged shaft, like an elephant assailed with the hook, Vrikodara then dauntlessly rushed against Suta's son.

24. Then as that foremost of the Pandavas was rushing with fury at him, Karna, excited with wrath, rushed at him like an infuriate elephant rushing at another;

25. Then blowing his conch whose blast resembled the sound of a hundred Bheris, he agitated the hostile array that resembled the surging sea.

26. Beholding his army teeming with elephants, horses, cars and infantry then agitated, Bhima approaching Karna began to cover him with arrows.

27. Karna thereupon caused his own horses of the hue of swans to be mingled with those of Bhimasena of the hue of bears, and covered in his turn the son of Pandu, with his shafts.

28. Beholding those steeds of the hue of bears and fleet as the wind, mingled with those of Karna of the hue of swans, cries of Oh and Alas, rose among the army of your son.

29. Those horses, fleet as the wind, thus mingled together, looked exceedingly beautiful like white and black clouds, O king, mingled together in the firmament.

30. Beholding Karna and Vrikodara burning with rage with their eyes coppery therewith, your mighty car-warriors began to tremble with fear.

31. The field of battle where they fought, soon became dreadful like the abode of Yama ; and O foremost of the Bharatas, it became as repulsive to the sight as the domain of the king of departed spirits.

32. Your warriors, who were then looking upon that battle as upon a sport in an arena, could not find any of them get any advantage over the other.

33. They only then saw the clash and the mingling of the mighty weapons shot by those warriors, as the consequence brought about by the wicked policy of you and your sons, O ruler of men.

34. Those two heroes of wonderful prowess, those two slayers of their of foes, the 1-covering each other with their arrows covered next the welkin with the net-work of their arrows.

35. Desirous of slaying each other, those two mighty car-warriors shooting sharp arrows at each other became worthy of being looked at like two clouds surchrged with rain.

36. O Lord, those two subduers of foes shooting arrows decked with gold, illumined the welkin like meteors illumining the skies.

37. O king, the arrows, furnished with vulterince wings and discharged by Bhima, appeared beautiful like rows of maddened swans ranging through the welkin.

38. Then beholding Bhima that subduer of foes engaged with the son of Suta, Krishna and Dhananjaya considered a heavy burden to be placed on the former.

39. As Karna and Bhima, desirous of baffling each other shot numerous arrows, many elephants, horses and men, wounded therewith, fell down dead ;

40. And in consequence of those falling and fallen creatures, deprived of life and counting by thousands, great was the carnage that then spread in the ranks of your army.

41. O foremost of the Bharatas, the field became soon covered over with the corpses and carcarsses of slain men, horses, and elephants.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirty-second chapter, the battle between Bhima and Karna in the Jayadratha, badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXIII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. Indeed I consider Bhima's prowess to be very wonderful, inasmuch as he fought with Karna of great agility.

2. Indeed that Karna who is competent enough of resisting the celestials together with the Yakshas, Asuras and men all armed with numerous kinds of weapon,

3. How is it that that Karna could not vanquish in battle that son of Pritha, of great effulgence ? O Sanjaya tell me all you know about it in detail.

4. Tell me how the battle between them raged—battle in which each staked his very life. Meseems each of them was capable of conquering, or each might have suffered defeat, (at the hand of the other).

5. Obtaining Suta's son Karna to help him, my son Duryodhana is confindent of securing victory over the Pandavas with Govinda and the Satwatas.

6. However, hearing of the repeated defeats of Karna by Bhimasena of dreadful deeds, a swoon seems to overtake me.

7. I regard the Kouravas as already slain, in consequence of the evil policy of my son. O Sanjaya, Karna will never be able to vanquish the sons of Pritha, those illustrious bowmen.

8. In all the battles that Karna has fought with the sons of Pandu, the latter have worsted him on the field of battle.

9. The Pandavas are incapable of being vanquished even by the celestials led by Vasava himself. But my pervert son Duryodhana will not take cognisance of this fact.

10. Having robbed Yudhisthira the son of Priths who is like the Lord of wealth, of his wealth, my foolish son sees not the impending fall, like a searcher of honey (on the mountains).

11. Having robbed by means of his deceit, the kingdom of those high-souled ones, my son conversant with deceit, thinks it to be irrecoverably his own ; and so always insults the Pandavas.

12. Those high-souled sons of Pandu, who ever treaded the paths of rectitude, were also insulted by myself who am over-fondly attached to my sons, and am of selfish temperament.

13. The foresighted Yudhisthira that son of Pritha was ever desirous of peace. But my sons turned him out, taking him to be incapable (of launching on war).

14. Bearing in mind all those hardships and all other insults offered to the Pandavas, the mighty-armed Bhima fought with Suta's son.

15. O Sanjaya, relate to me, how Bhima and Karna, those two foremost of warriors fought with each other, desirous of taking each other's life.

Sanjaya said :—

16. Hear, O king, how the battle between Karna and Bhima raged like that between two elephants desirous of slaughtering each other in the forest.

17. O king, the enraged son of Vikartana then pierced with thirty arrows that chastiser of foes viz Bhimasena who excited with rage, had been putting forth his prowess.

18. O foremost of the Bharatas, Vikartana's son then wounded Bhima with many shafts of keen points, and great impetuousity and decked with gold.

19. But when Karna was engaged in wounding him, Bhima cut off his bow with three sharp shafts, and then with a Valla felled his charioteer from his niche on the car.

20, Thereupon Vikartana's son longing to compass the slaughter of Bhimasena, took a lance with a staff variegated with gold and lapises.

21. Taking up that fierce lance that resembled a second dart of Death, and tilting it and aiming it, the powerful son of Radha

22. Hurled it at Bhimasena, charging it with a force capable of taking out Bhima's life. Then like Indra hurling the bolt of heaven, hurling that lance, the son of Radha,

23. That puissant descendant of a charioteer's race, uttered a loud roar ; and then your sons hearing that loud shout uttered by Karna, became filled with delight.

24. But as that lance of the radiance of fire or the sun was coursing through the skies, Bhima cut it off with seven swift-flying arrows.

25. Cutting off that lance resembling a snake just freed from its slough, Bhima, O sire, as if looking out for the opportunity of wrenching the life-breaths out of Suta's son,

26. Wrathfully pierced the latter with many arrows furnished with wings of peacock's feathers or of gold, and whetted on stone, and resembling darts of Death.

27. Karna also then taking up another terrible bow of golden staff, began to stretch it; and then that highly energetic one began to discharge arrows at Bhima.

28. But the son of Pandu cut off those shafts, with nine shafts of depressed knots shot by himself. Having cut off, O foremost of men, those arrows shot by Karna,

29. O mighty monarch, Bhima uttered a loud war-cry. Roaring at each other like two bulls for the sake of consorting with the same cow,

30. Or like two fierce tigers for the sake of the same peace of meat; they strove vigorously to strike each other and each was desirous of finding out the laches of the other.

31. Like two mighty bulls in a herd of cows, at times they looked at each other with eyes flashing rage. At another time, like two prodigious elephants striking each other with the point of their tusks,

32. They assailed each other with their arrows shot from their bow drawn to the fullest stretch. O king, burning each other with their arrowy shower, they put forth their prowess against each other, at the same time looking at each other in great wrath.

33. Sometimes they laughed at each-other, sometimes reproached each other and sometimes blew their conchs ; and in this way they on went fighting.

34. O king, then once more Bhima cut off the bow of Karna near the grasp, and with his arrows despatched the latter's steeds of the hue of conch to the regions of Death.

35. The former then felled the latter's charioteer from his niche on the car. Thereupon Vikartana's son was preyed upon by anxious thoughts.

36. His steeds and his charioteer slain, and himself covered and compounded with a net-work of arrows, he knew what to do.

37. Beholding Karna in that predicament, king Duryodhana trembling in rage, addressing Durjaya thus commanded him :—

38. "Durjaya, hie yourself to the spot yonder where Pandu's son is on the point of devouring up as it were, the son of Radha. Slay that beardless eunuch soon and inspire strength into Karna."

39. Thus spoken to, your son Durjaya bowed assent to the words of your royal son saying 'so be it then ;' and then he rushed at Bhimasena engaged with Karna, covering the former with his arrows.

40. He wounded Bhima with nine, his horses with eight, his charioteer with six, his standard with three, then again himself (Bhima) with seven shafts.

41. Thereat excited with wrath, Bhima despatched Durjaya, his horses and steeds to the abode of Death, piercing them to the vitals with his arrows.

42. Then Karna lamentiog petiously circumambulated your son who decked with ornaments was then writhing like a slain snake on the earth.

43. Then having made that invetrate enmy of his (Karna) carless, Bhimasena smilingly covered him with numerous arrows, and made him look like a Sataghni with numerous pikes on it.

44. Although thus mangled with those arrows, that slayer of foes, the Atiratha Karna, did not avoid the enraged Bhima in battle.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirty-third chapter, the fight between Karna and Bhima, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXIV.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA) —Cnotinued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thus though deprived of his car and completely vanquished by Bhima, Karna mounting on another car began speedily to pierce the son of Pandu.

1. Then like two huge elephants goring each other with the ends of their tusks, those two heroes began to pierce each other with arrows shot from bows drawn to the fullest stretch.

3. Thereupon Karna covered Bhima with myriads of shafts and then uttered a loud war-cry, and once more pierced the latter on his breast.

4. In return, Bhima pierced him with ten straight-flying arrows and next with twenty arrows of depressed knots.

5. Karna again, O king, piercing Bhima on the centre of his chest with nine arrows, struck his enemy's standard with one sharp arrow.

6. Then with a group of sixty-three arrows Pritha's son, pierced Karna in return like a driver goring his elephant with so many hooks, or a horseman lacerating his animal with so many whips.

7. Thus deeply pierced, O king, by the high-souled son of Pandu, the heroic Karna began to lick the corners of his mouth and his eyes became red in rage.

8. Thereafter, O mighty monarch with a view to bring about the slaughter of Bhima, Karna sped at him an arrow capable of penetrating through all bodies, like Indra hurling the thunder.

9. That shaft of variegated wing shot from the bow of Suta's son, pierced through the son of Pritha, and then penetrating the earth went inside it.

10.—12. Thereupon the mighty-armed Bhima with his eyes red in rage, hurled, without thinking for a moment, at the son of Suta, a heavy six-sided mace adorned with gold, measuring full four cubits in length, and looking like the bolt of heaven. With that mace, that enraged descendant of the Bharata race slew the well-trained and excellent steeds of Adhiratha's son, like Indra slaying the Asuras with his thunderbolt. Then O mighty monarch, with a couple of razor-headed arrows, the mighty-armed Bhima

13. Cut down the standard of Adhiratha's son, and then with other shafts he slew the latter's charioteer. Leaving that car of which the steeds and the charioteer had been slain, and of which the standard had been cut down,

14. O Bharata, Karna with a cheerless heart stood before Bhimasena, stretching his bow. Then we beheld the wonderful prowess of Radha's son,

15. In as much as that foremost of car-warriors though deprived of his car, was successful in holding his enemy in check. Beholding then that foremost of men, that son of Adhiratha deprived of his car in that battle,

16. King Duryonhana, O monarch, addressing Durmukha said :—"O Durmukha yonder is the son of Radha rendered carless by Bhimasena!

17. Do you supply that mighty car-warrior, that foremost of men with a chariot." Thereupon, O Bharata, hearing the words of Duryodhana, Durmukha

18. Quickly rushed to the rescue of Karna, covering at the same time Bhima with his arrows. Beholding Durmukha approach to rescue the son of Suta in battle,

19. The son of the wind-god became filled with delight, and he began to lick the corners of his mouth. Then, O monarch, holding Karna at bay by means of his keen arrows,

20. The son of Pandu drove his chariot towards Durmukha. Then in the encounter that followed, with nine shafts of depressed knots,

21—23. And keen points, Bhima despatched Durmukha to the abode of Death. Then upon the slaughter of Durmukha, the son of Adiratha mounting in the car of this slain hero, looked beautiful like the effulgent fire, O king. Then beholding Durmukha postrate, with his vital limbs torn off, and weltering in his blood, Karna with his eyes overflowing with tears, refrained from the fight for a while. Circumambulating that slain prince and passing over him,

24—25. The heroic Karna breathed hot and heavily, and was embarassed as to what he should do. At this opportunity, O king, Bhimasena struck Suta's son with fourteen Narachas furnished with vulterine feathers. Those Narachas of great impetuousity and furnished with golden wings, pierced through Karna's armour;

26. Those blood-drinking arrows decked with gold, then illumined the ten quaters, and drank the life-blood of Suta's son.

27. Then passing through his body those arrows sank into the earth and looked like so many snakes urged on by Death, O foremost of men,

28. With only half their bodies inserted into their holes. Then the son of Radha, without a moment's reflection, pierced Bhimasena in return with fourteen fierce Narachas decked with gold. Those winged shafts piercing the left arm of Bhimasana,

30. Entered the earth, like Krouncha birds entering into a grove of trees. Entering the earth, those Narachas looked beautiful,

31. Like the burning rays of the sun while it courses towards the Western mountains. Pierced in both the arms with those Narachas capable of cutting to the very quick, Bhima

32—33. Shed blood profusely, like mountains ejecting streams of water. Then Bhima pierced Suta's son in return with three winged shafts endued with the energy of Suparna, and he then pierced the driver of his enemy with seven arrows. Thereupon, O mighty monarch, afflicted with Bhima's might and highly distressed, Karna

34. Of illustrious renown fled from the field of battle, being borne away by his fleet steeds. Then Bhimasena, that Atiratha remained the master of the field, with his bow of golden staff stretched, and looking like a burning fire.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirty-fourth chapter, the flight of Karna, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXV.

Dhristarastra said :—

1. I consider Destiny to be supreme. Fie on the useless exertions of man, inasmuch the son of Adhiratha striving vigourously, was not able to conquer Pandu's son in battle.

2. Karna is capable of conquering the Parthas together with Govinda himself; nowhere in the worlds do I find a warrior who is a match for Karna.

3. I have always heard Duryodhana speak in this strain. Karna is mighty, heroic, a resolute bowman and indefatigable in battle.

4. O Suta, thus did my wretched son Duryodhana speak to me before. "Supported as I am by the heroic Vrisashena, even the celestials themselves will not be able to conquer me in battle,

5. What to speak of the sons of Pandu, whose energy is gone and whose strength has been robbed, O king." (This was said by Duryodhana to me.) So beholding Karna crushed like a poisonless snake,

6—7. And fled from the field of battle, what did then Duryodhana say? Alas, foolishly did Duryodhana send the unsupported Durmukha to battle, ignorant though he was of the mode of fighting, like one throwing an insect upon a blazing fire. Aswathaman, the Madra-king, Kripa and Karna, all united together,

8—10. Are not capable, O Sanjaya, of standing before Bhima. They all know the dreadful prowess, equal to that of ten thousand elephants of Bhima possessed of the energy of Maruta himself. They also know his cruel purposes. Why did then those warriors, cognizant of Bhima's might, anger, and energy, incite the anger of that hero of cruel deeds, that warrior resembling Yama at the end of a Yuga? It seems that the mighty-armed Karna, relying on the strength of his own arms,

11. Encountered Bhimasena in battle, totally disregarding him. He that has conquered Karna in battle, like Purandara conquering Asuras,

12. That son of Pandu is incapable of being conquered by any one else. He that has entered into my army having vanquished Drona single-handedly,

13. What person desirous of his life will venture to stand before that Bhima when he will proceed in search of Dhananjaya? O Sanjaya, what person ventures to stand in front of Bhima,

14. For, what Danava will venture to stand before Mahendra with his thunderbolt uplifted? It is possible for a man to come back from a visit to the regions of Death;

15—17. But it is not possible for them to come back alive after an encounter with Bhima. Those who foolishly assail Bhimasena when he is inflamed with rage are like insects rushing on the blazing flames of a fire. Surely thinking what the irate Bhima of fearful deeds had said in the assembly in the hearing of the Kurus about the slaughter of my sons, and beholding the defeat of Karna,

18—19. Dussasana and his brothers ceased to meet Bhima in battle out of fear. That pervert son of mine, O Sanjaya, who repeatedly said in the assembly these words—Karna and Dussasana and I myself will vanquish the Pandavas in battle—surely beholding Karna vanquished and deprived of his car by Bhima,

20. Is now repenting his rejection of Krishna's offer for peace. Beholding his mail-clad brother's slain in battle by Bhimasena,

21. In consequence of his own fault surely my son is being greatly afflicted. What person willing to live still, will with hostile intentions, advance against Pandu's son

22. Bhima, inflamed with rage, and armed with dreadful weapons, and standing in battle like Death himself? It is possible for a man to escape from Varava fire,

23. But it is not possible for one to fly from the presence of the enraged Bhima. Indeed neither Arjuna, nor the Panchalas, nor Kesava, nor Satyaki,

24. When excited with rage in battle, pays the least regard to his life. Alas, O son of a charioteer, the very lives of my sons are in danger.

Sanjaya said :—

25. O descendant of the Kuru dynasty, why are you now lamenting for the present carnage? Surely you are the root of this destruction of the worlds.

26. Accepting the counsels of your sons, it was you who provoked all these fierce hostilities. Though advised on the contrary, you did not pay any heed to those advices, like a dying man refusing to take proper medicines.

27. O best of men, O king, having drunk the fiercest and most indegestible poison, you should now feel the consequences.

28. The warriors of your army are fighting to the best of their prowess, yet you speak depreciatingly of them. Hear now, as I go on describing how this battle raged.

29. Beholding Karna defeated by Bhimasena, the following five and mighty bowmen, all brothers,

30. Namely, Durmarsena, Dussaha. Durmada, Durdhara and Jaya, all clad in beautiful armours, rushed against the son of Pandu with hostile intentions.

31. Surrounding the mighty-armed Vrikodara on all sides, they began to cover the quarters with their arrows resembling flights of locusts.

32. Then Bhimsena smilingly received those princes of godly presence as they advanced furiously against him.

33. Then beholding your sons before the enraged Bhimasena, Radha's son rushed against the mighty-armed Bhima.

34. Although opposed by your sons, yet Bhima then quickly rushed against Karna shooting sharp arrows, furnished with golden wings and whetted on stone.

35. Thereupon the Kurus surrounding Karna, on all sides, began to shower upon Bhimasena, numerous arrows of depressed knots.

36. Then that fierce bowman Bhima, with twenty-five arrows despatched to the abode of Yama, those foremost of men, with their steeds and charioteers.

37. They then fell down dead from their cars, after their charioteers, like so many mighty trees decked with flowers, overthrown by a hurricane.

38. Then we beheld the wonderful prowess of Bhimasena, inasmuch as he succeeded in slaying your sons and withstanding Karna with his arrows simultaneously.

39. Opposed on all sides by sharp arrows shot by Bhimasena, that son of Suta, O mighty monarch, began to eye Bhima.

40. Bhimasena also, with his eyes red in anger and stretching his bow, began to look at Karna.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirty-fifth chapter, the display of Bhima's prowess, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXVI.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA).—

Sanjaya said :—

1. Beholding your sons fallen on the field, the puissant Karna, overwhelmed with rage, became regardless of his very life.

2. The son of Adhiratha then considered himself to be guilty of the slaughter of your sons, in as much as they were slain by Bhima under his very eyes.

3. Then Bhimasena waxing wroth and remembering their former enmity, dauntlessly struck Karna with numerous sharp arrows.

4. Thereupon the son of Radha smilingly piercing Bhima with five shafts, once more pierced him with seventy shafts furnished with golden wings whetted on stone.

5. Without taking into consideration those shafts shot by Karna, Vrikodara pierced him with a hundred arrows of depressed knots.

6. Once more, O sire, piercing him on his vital parts with five sharp arrows, Bhima severed the bow of Suta's son with a broad-headed shaft.

7. Thereupon, O Bharata, highly dejected, Karna took up another bow, and covered Bhima with arrows on all directions.

8. Slaying Karna's horses and his charioteer also, Bhima then laughed a tremendous laugh, having thus counterbalanced the feats of the former.

9. Then that foremost of men, cut off the bow of Karna with his arrows; and O mighty monarch, that bow of golden staff, fell down, producing a great sound.

10. Thereupon the mighty car-warrior Karna descended from his chariot, and taking up a mace hurled it at Bhimasena with great fury.

11. Beholding that mace course towards himself with great impetuousity, Vrikodara repulsed it with his arrows before the eyes of all the troops.

12. Then the puissant son of Pandu quickly shot thousands of arrows, desirous of accomplishing the death of Suta's son.

13. Checking those arrows with his own, in that battle, Karna cut down Bhima's armour with numerous arrows.

14. Then he pierced Bhima with twenty five small shafts before the eyes of all; and that seemed highly wonderful.

15. Thereupon, O sire, Bhima excited to the highest pitch of fury, sped at the son of Suta nine shafts of depressed knots.

16. Those sharp arrows penetrating through Karna's armour and piercing his right arm, sank into the earth, like so many fierce snakes entering their holes on ant hills.

17. Covered with the myriad shafts shot from Bhima's bow, Karna once more was compelled to turn away from Bhimasena.

18. Beholding the son of Suta turn away and walk on foot and covered with the arrows shot from the bow of Kunti's son, king Duryodhana thus spoke:—

19. 'Hie yourselves quickly near the car of Pandu's son." Thereupon, O king, yoursons hearing those words of your son,

20. Rushed against Pandu's son in battle shooting numerous sharp arrows. They were Chitra, Upachitra, Chitraksha, Charuchitra, Chitrasana, 21—22. Chitrayudha and Chitravarman, all versed in various modes of warfare. Then the mighty car-warrior Bhimasena slew all your sons with a single arrow, as they were quickly proceeding against him. Slain they fell down on the earth like trees broken by the vehemence of the tempest.

23. Beholding your sons all mighty car-warriors slain, O king, Karna with a tearful countenance, began to think of those words of Khatwa.

24. Then that puissant hero, mounting on anothor duly furnished car, quickly rushed at the son of Pandu.

25. Piercing each other with arrows furnished with golden wings, and whetted on stone, those two heroes appeared beuatiful like two clouds fringed with the rays of the sun.

26. Then Pandu's son, excited with rage, cut off the armour of Suta's son with thirty-six Vallas of great sharpness and energy.

27. The son of Suta, O foremost of the Bharatas, that mighty-armed hero, peirced Kunti's son with fifty arrows of depressed knots.

28. Those two combatants then, smeared with red sandal-paste, covered with many wounds caused by each other's shaft and steeped in blood, appeared charming like the sun or the moon in full splendour.

29. Then Karna and Bhima, with their bodies steeped in blood, and armour shattered with arrows appeared beautiful like snakes freed from their sloughs.

30. Assailing each other like two tigers fighting with their teeth, those two foremost of men poured their showers of arrows on each other like two mighty clouds pouring rain.

31. Like two elephants goring each other with their tusks, those two subduers of foes mangling each other with their shafts, appeared highly beautiful.

32. Roaring at each other and covering each other with their arrows, those two foremost of car-warriors seemed to play with each other, causing their chariots to describe various circles.

33. Those two powerful heroes then appeared like two hiefers roaring at each other for consorting with a cow in her season. Those two foremost of men, endued with prowess, then looked like two mighty lions engaged with one another.

34. Looking at each other with eyes red in rage, those two heroes of mighty energy fought on with each other like Indra and Virochana.

35. Then the mighty-armed Bhima stretching his bow with both his hands, appeared beautiful like a mass of clouds charged with lightning flashes.

36, Then, O mighty monarch, the Bhima-cloud, having the twang of the bow for its peal of thunder, and the arrows for showers of rain, began to drench the mountain constituted by Karna.

37. Then that son of Pandu, Bhima of terrible prowess, O Bharata, covered Karna with thousands of arrows shot from his own bow.

38. Then your sons beheld the prowess of Bhimasena, when he covered Karna with arrows decked with beautiful wings made of the feathers of the Kanka bird.

39. Thus then Bhima fought on with Karna, affording delight thereby to Arjuna and the illustrious Kesava, and Satyaki and his two protectors of car-wheels.

40. Then your sons, O mighty monarch, became dspressed, seeing the prowess, the strength of arms and the patience of Bhima, who thoroughly knew his self.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirty-six chapter, the fight between Bhima and Karna in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXVII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then the son of Radha hearing the sound of the twanging of Bhima's bow and of the slappings of his palm, did not brook it, like an infuriate elephant not brooking the roar of its rival.

2. Retiring for a moment only from the presence of Bhimasena, Karna looked at your sons felled by him.

3. O foremost of men, beholding them he became cheerless and filled with sorrow; then breathing like a snake, he once more assailed Bhima.

4. With his eyes coppery in rage and breathing like a fierce snake, Karna then shooting arrows, appeared beautiful like the sun shooting his myriad rays.

5. Vrikodara then, O foremost of the Bharatas, was covered with those shafts shot from Karna's bow, as if with the scattering rays of the blazing sun.

6. Diverse kinds of arrows furnished with wings of peacock-feathers and shot from the bow of Karna, then penetrated into the body of Pritha's son, like so many birds entering their nests on the tree.

7. Arrows of golden wings shot from the bow of Karna appeared everywhere, like rows of swans (flying through the welkin).

8. The arrows of Adhiratha's son were so numerous that they seemed to come out not only from his bow, but also, from his standard, Upaskara, umbrella, and the shafts, yoke, and bottom of his car.

9. Filling the sky, the son of Adhiratha showered arrows decked with gold and furnished with vulturine feathers, that ranged variously through the entire welkin.

10. Then reckless of his very life, Vrikodara got the better of his foe, and then pierced the latter with a shaft as he was rushing like Death incarnate at him.

11. Then beholding the unbearable charge of Karna and the shower of mighty arrows shot by him, Vrikodara flinched not in fear, inasmuch as he was possessed of mighty energy.

12. Then that son of Pandu shot networks of arrows at the son of Adhiratha. He pierced Karna with twenty sharp arrows.

13. As Pritha's son himself had been covered by Suta's son, even in the same manner was the latter now covered by the former with his arrows.

14. Beholding then the prowess of Bhimasena in battle, O Bharata, even your troops applauded him and the Charanas were filled with delight.

15. Then Bhurisravas, Kripa, the son of Drona, the ruler of the Madras, Jayadratha, Uttamoujas, Yudhamanyu, Satyaki, Kesava and Arjuna,

16. These ten best of mighty car-warriors of the Kuru and the Pandava hosts, applauding Bhima with shouts of 'well-done' 'well-done' uttered their war-cries.

17. When that dreadful and hair-stirring sound arose, your son, king Duryodhana, thus spoke,

18. Addressing the kings and princes of his army, and specially his brothers. "May good betide you. Hie yourselves to the rescue of Karna from Vrikodara.

19. Yonder, the shafts shot from Bhima's bow are piercing Karna (to the quick). O mighty bowmen, do you all now exert vigourously for protecting the son of the charioteer."

20. Commanded by Duryodhana, O sire, seven uterine (Kourava) brothers, rushing with fury at Bhimasena surrounded him on all sides.

21. Encountering the son of Kunti, they poured their arrowy torrents on him, like clouds pouring rain on the mountain breast during the rainy reason.

22. Then those seven mighty car-warriors inflamed with rage, began to afflict Bhima, like the seven planets afflicting the Sun at the time of the universal annihilation, O king.

23. Thereupon, drawing his effulgent bow with great force and firm grasp, the son of Kunti,

24. Knowing that his adversaries were nothing but men, fixed seven shafts on his bowstring. And then the mighty Bhima sped those arrows radiant like the solar rays, at them.

25. Bhimasena then keeping alive the memory of the former wrongs inflicted on them, sped those arrows as if for wrenching out the very lives out of your sons.

26. Those shafts furnished with golden wings and whetted on stone shot by Bhimasena, O Bharata, penetrating through the body of the Bharata princes, flew through the sky.

27. Those gold-decked arrows tearing their hearts, looked beautiful, O mighty monarch, like birds of beautiful plumage.

28. Those seven arrows of the effulgence of molten gold, steeped in blood, came out, O king, after having drank the life-blood of your sons.

29. With their armours shattered by those arrows, your sons then fell down from their cars on the earth, like tall trees growing on the slopes of mountains,broken down by elephants.

30. Satrunjaya, Satrusaha. Chitra, Chitrayudha, Dridha, Chitrasena, and Vikarna these seven sons of yours were then slain by Bhima.

31. Of all your sons thus slain, Vrikodara lamented piteously for Vikarna who was very dear to the Pandavas.

32. Bhima then said :—'I vowed saying, You shall all be slain by me. O Vikarna, for this vow it is that you have been slain. And thus have I kept my vow inviolate.

33. O hero, you proceeded against me with hostile intentions, bearing in mind the duties of a Kshatriya. You were ever engaged in doing our, specially the king's (Yudhisthira's) good.

34. It is therefore not fit that I should lament for you, O you of great effulgence." O mighty monarch then slaying them before the very eyes of Radha's son,

35—36. That son of Pandu uttered a dreadful war-cry. The shout of that hero, then O Bharata, carried to the very virtuous king Yudhisthira as if the intelligence of his victory. Hearing that loud cry of that fierce bowman Bhimasena, 37—40. The very virtuous king Yudhisthira obtained great delight in battle. Then highly delighted, that son of Pandu, O mighty monarch, received the sound of the war-cry of his brother with the beating of drums and other musical instruments. After Vrikodara had given him that intelligence by the hint agreed upon by both, that foremost of persons.Yudhisthira versed in the use of all weapons, joyfully rushed against Drona in that battle. On the other hand, O monarch, seeing thirty-one of your son's slain in battle, Duryodhana recalled to mind the words of Vidura thus, "those salutary words spoken by Vidura are now being realised.

41—44. Thinking thus, king Duryodhana was unable to do what he should do. All those words that your wicked-minded and foolish son, urged on by Karna, said to that princess of the Panchala race, having brought her in the assembly shall; also all those harsh words which Karna himself addressed in the assembly hall to her before yourself and the sons of Pandu, O monarch, at your and the Kouravas' hearing,—words to this effect,—'O Krishna, the Pandavas are destroyed and they have fallen into eternal hell; so do you choose a second husband'—the result of all these has now overtaken you.

45—46. Then again, O you of Kuru's race, various abusive language like sessamum kernel, without seeds were directed by your enraged sons to those illustrious ones, viz., the sons of Pandu, Bhimasena vomitting forth the fire of wrath held in check for these thirteen years, is now achieving the destruction of your sons.

47. Entreating you repeatedly, Khattwa failed to bend you towards peace. O foremost of the Bharatas, now do you, together with your son, suffer the consequences (of your folly).

48. That you old, patient and capable of foreseeing the consequences of acts as you are, would not accept the well-meaning words of your friends, is due to the influence of (adverse) fate.

49. O foremost of men, it therefore behoves you not to weep. Yours is the greatest fault in the matter. In my opinion your are the cause of the ruin of your sons.

50. O foremost of kings, Vikarna and the puissant Chetrasena, have been slain; as also numerous other mighty car-warriors and your other sons have fallen.

51. O mighty-armed one, other sons of yours, who became the objects of Bhima's sight, were slain by him in a moment.

52. It was through your fault that I had to see our army consumed in thousands by the shafts discharged by Pandu's son and by Vrisha.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirty-seventh chapter, the fight between Karna and Bhima, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXVIII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA—) Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. I see, O son of a charioteer, that mine has been the greatest fault in this matter; O Sanjaya, the consequences have now overtaken me, grieve though I may!

2. Hitherto I thought that what is gone for good. But, O Sanjaya, what measures is gone should now be adopted.

3. I have now become calm, O Sanjaya; relate to me how this slaughter of heroes is went on—slaughter that owes its origin to my evil policy.

Sanjaya said :—

4. O mighty monarch, then the two powerful heroes Karna and Bhima began to pour showers of arrows, like two rain clouds pouring their contents.

5. Then gold-winged arrows, whetted on stone and engraved with the name of Bhima, reaching Karna, penetrated through him cutting him to the very quick.

6. Similarly Bhima was pierced hundreds and thousands of times by the arrows shot by Karna, that resembled snakes of virulent poison.

7. An agitation like that produced in the ocean, was then produced in your troops by the arrows of them both, falling on all sides.

8. O subduer of foes, shot from Bhima's bow, shafts resembling dreadful snakes, began to slay your troops amidst your own army.

9. With fallen elephants, horses and men, the Earth became covered and looked as if covered with trees broken by the force of the wind.

10. Wounded with the arrows shot from Bhima's bow, your troops then began to fly away from the field saying what is it?

11. That host composed of the Sindhus, the Souviras, and the Kouravas, afflicted and wounded with the terrible shafts of Bhima and Karna, was then driven back to a great distance.

12. Then those heroes, with their ranks thinned, and their horses and elephants slain, fled in all directions, leaving Bhima and Karna on the field.

13. 'Indeed for the sake of the Parthas even the gods are robbing us of our senses, inasmuch as those arrows shot both by Bhima and Karna are slaying us.'

14. Speaking such words, your warriors, struck with panic as they were, stood at a distance out of the range of arrows, for witnessing the combat.

15, Then on the field of battle a terrible river started up into existence and began to flow there adding to the joy of heroes and to the fear of the cowards.

16. It was caused by the blood of elephants, horses and men. Covered with the lifeless bodies of men, elephants and horses;

17. With flag-staffs and car-bottoms; with ornaments of cars, elephants and steeds; with shattered chariots, wheels, axels and Kuvaras;

18. With gold-decked bows of fierce twang, and with thousands of arrows and darts furnished with wings of gold,

19. Shot by Bhima and Karna and resembling snakes just freed from their sloughs; with numerous lances, javelins, swords, and battle axes;

20. With maces and clubs and axes all adorned with gold; with standards of various descriptions and darts and piked bludgeons;

21—29. And with beautiful Sataghnis, the earth looked, O Bharata very beautiful.

Strewn all over with ear-rings and necklaces of gold and fallen-off bracelets, and rings and precious gems worn on diadems and crowns and turbans and golden ornaments of diverse kinds, and armours and leathern fences, and elephant-girths, and umbrellas dropped from their place, and chamaras, and fans ; with the mangled bodies of elephants, steeds and men ; with arrows bathed in blood, and with various other objects lying scattered about loosened from their places, the field of battle appeared beautiful like the sky bespangled with the planets. Beholding their inconceivable, wonderful and super-human feats, the Siddhas, and the Charanas were filled with surprise. The son of Adhiratha engaged with Bhima coursed on the field in the same way as fire helped on by the wind courses through an extended heap of fuel; both of them cut down numerous standards, and chariots and slew countless horses, men and elephants. They fought on like a pair of elephants crushing forests of reeds, when engaged with each other. O ruler of men, then your host looked like a mass of clouds, and the carnage caused by Karna and Bhima in that battle was terrible to the extreme.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirty-eighth chapter, the fight between Karna and Bhima, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXIX.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thereafter, O mighty monarch, Karna piercing Bhima with three arrows, began to shower torrents of arrows of various description.

2. The mighty-armed son of Pandu viz Bhimasena, though thus pierced by the son of Suta, felt no pain, like a mountain having no sensation when cleft open.

3. Then O sire, he pierced Karna on his car with a sharp arrow. Well-tempered and washed with oil,

4. That dart, O mighty monarch, cut down one of the charming golden ear-rings of great lustre belonging to Karna, and it dropped down like a luminary from the sky.

5. Then excited to the highest pitch of anger, Vrikodara with the greatest ease struck Suta's son on the breast with a broad headed arrow.

6. Then once more, O Bharata, the mighty armed Bhima sped at him with great quickness ten Narachas resembling snakes just first freed from their sloughs.

7. Shot by him, O sire, those arrows penetrating through the forehead of Suta's son entered it, like so many snakes entering their holes in the ant-hills.

8. With those shafts struck upon his forehead, the son of Suta, looked beautiful, as he did before while his forehead was encircled with a chaplet of blue lotuses.

9. Thus deeply pierced by the son of Pandu endued with great agility, Karna held the Kuvara of his car for support and then shut his eyes.

10. But within a moment, that afflicter of foes Karna regaining his senses, found his body steeped in blood and became furious with rage.

11. Inflamed with rage in consequence of his being pierced thus by the firm bowman Bhima, Karna endued with great acitivy, dashed against the car of Bhimasena.

12. Then, O king, the revengeful and enraged and mighty Karna, sped at Bhima a group of hundred arrows furnished with wings of the feathers of the vultures.

13. Thereat Pandu's son, disregarding the display of Karna's prowess, began to shower fierce arrows on him.

14. Then, O afflicter of foes, the enraged Karna, O monarch, struck the irate Bhima on the breast with nine shafts.

15. Then both those tigers among men, resembling a couple of tigers with fierce teeth, showered upon each other, in that battle, their torrents of arrows like two mighty masses of clouds.

16. They tried to terrify one another in that battle, with the sound of their palms and with showers of arrows of diverse descriptions.

17—18. Inflamed with rage, each endeavoured to counteract the feats of the other in battle. Then that slayer of hostile heroes, viz Bhima of mighty arms, O Bharata, cutting off with a razor-headed arrow the bow of Karna, uttered a loud war-cry. Then leaving aside that severed bow, the son of Suta that mighty car-warrior,

19. Took up a tougher and stronger bow. Then beholding the slaughter of the Sindhus and Souviras, and the Kurus,

20. And marking that the Earth was covered over with armours and standards and weapons lying scattered about, and seeing also the dead bodies of elephants, foot-soldiers and horsemen and car-warriors on all sides,

21. The body of Suta's son blazed up with radiance, in consequence of wrath. Thereupon stretching his terrible bow decked with gold,

22. The son of Radha, O monarch looked at Bhima with eyes flashing rage. Inflamed with rage the son of Suta, while discharging his shafts, looked beautiful,

23—26. Like the autumnal sun of burning rays at mid-day. While engaged in taking up an arrow, placing it on the bow-string, stretching the string and letting it off, no one could notice any interval between those acts of his. While Karna was shooting his arrows right and left, his bow always appeared to be drawn to a circle like a dreadful circle of fire. Arrows of sharp heads, shot from the bow of Karna, and furnished with wings of gold,

27—28. Covered, O monarch, all the quarters, intercepting the very rays of the solar orb. In the skies then were seen numerous groups of shafts, furnished with golden wings and shot from the bow of Karna. The arrows discharged from Karna's bow,

29—30. Then looked beautiful like rowe of cranes ranging through the skies. All the arrows discharged by the son of Adiratha were winged with the feathers of vultures, whetted on stone, adorned with gold, endued with great impetuousity, and furnished with exceedingly keen points. Thrown by the force of his bow-string, those gold-decked rrrows,

31—33. Coursed in continuous lines towards the chariot of Bhima; those gold-decked arrows hurled by Karna, while ranging through the skies in large numbers, looked beatiful like continuous fights of locusts. The shafts shot from the bow of the son of Adhiratha, as they flew through the heavens, appeared like one long arrow poised in the sky. Like a cloud covering the mountain breast with torrents of rain,

34—36. Karna, excited to the highest pitch of fury, poured on Bhima his arrowy showers; then O Bharata, your sons and their soldiers all beheld the mighty energy, prowess and perseverance of Bhima inasmuch as the latter, unmindful of that shower of arrows resembling the furious ocean, dashed with wrath against Karna. O monarch, Bhima then wielded a bow that was formidable and the back of which was adorned with gold.

37. In consequence of his repeated stretching, the bow looked like a circle and it resembled the bow of Indra himself. From it then were shot shafts that filled the entire welkin.

38. Then with his gold-winged arrows of depressed knots, Bhima constructed a festoon in the welkin that looked like a veritable garland of gold.

39. Then the net-work of arrows spread in the skies by Karna, began to be shattered and torn, being struck with the winged arrows of Bhimasena.

40. Shot both by Bhima and Karna, myriads of arrows of the touch of fire-sparks and straight-coursing,

41. And furnished with golden wings, entirely covered the welkin over. The sun then did not shine, nor did the wind blow.

42. The welkin being shrouded in that net-work of arrows, nothing could be then distinguished. Then the son of Suta covering Bhima with arrows of various descriptions,

43. And totally unmindful of the latter's prowess, strove to prevail over him. O sire, those myriads of arrows, discharged by both those warriors,

44. Appeared to clash against one another like two contrary currents of wind. Consequent on that clash of arrowy showers shot by those two foremost of men,

45—46. A fire, O foremost of the Bharatas, was engendered in the welkin. Desirous of slaying Bhima, Karna then, sped at the former numerous arrows, furnished with golden wings and cleansed by the forger himself. Bhima, however, with his own shafts, cut every one of Karna's arrows into three fragments,

47—48. And then obtaining some advantage over the son of Suta, he cried out saying wait, wait, then the irate and powerful son of Pandu, like an all-destroying fire once more shot excitedly showers of arrows. Then a loud sound was produced there, in consequence of the leathern gloves of the combatants striking against their bow-strings.

49. Then tremendous became the sound of their slapping palms, dreadful the sound of their war-cries, and fierce the clash of their cars and the twang of their bows.

50. Then O king, desirous of beholding the prowess of Karna and that son of Pandu who were striving to slay each other, the other combatants giving up fighting became spectators.

51. The celestial sages, the Siddhas, and the Gandharvas, applauded them both saying 'Excellent, Excellent'; and hosts of Vidyadharas then showered flowers on those two heroes.

52. Thereafter, the mighty-armed and wrathful Bhima of resolute prowess, repulsing the weapons of Karna by his own, began to pierce that son of Suta.

53. Karna also, that mighty hero, baffling Bhima's darts, wounded Bhima with nine Narachas resembling snakes of virulent venom.

54. With as many winged shafts, Bhima then cut off those Narachas sped by Suta's sons when they were coursing through the sky, and said wait, wait.

55. Then the mighty-armed Bhima possessed of great valour, shot at Adhiratha's son a shaft looking like the enraged god of Death and resembling a mace second to that wielded by Yama.

56. The son of Radha however, O king, smilingly cut off that dart of Pandu's son as it flew through the sky with three shafts of his own.

57. The son of Pandu then once more shot showers of dreadful arrows; and Karna also dauntlessly received all those weapons of his.

58—59. Inflamed with wrath, Karna, the son of Suta by virtue of the illusion of his weapons, cut off in that combat, with his straight arrows the pair of quivers and the bow-string, and the traces of the steeds of the fighting Bhima. Thereafter slaying his antagonist's steeds, Karna pierced the latter's charioteer with five shafts.

60—61. Theroupon the charioteer running in haste, ascended the car of Yudhamyu. Burning with wrath, Radha's son, whose effulgence then equalled the effulgence of the Yuga-fire, cut off the standard of Bhima and felled his banner, smiling the while. Deprived of the use of his bow, Bhima then grasped a fearful lance.

62—64. Inflamed with rage, he balanced it in his hands, and then hurled it vehemently at the chariot of Karna. Adhiratha's son then with ten shafts, cut off that gold-decked dart hurled by Bhima, as it was flying swiftly towards him like a blazing meteor; that lance then fell down, severed into fragments by those sharp arrows of Suta's son Karna, that warrior versed in all modes of warfare, then engaged in the fight for the sake of friends. Then the son of Kunti grasped a buckler adorned with gold, 65—66. And a resplendent sword, desirous of reaping either victory or death. But O Bharata, Karna again smilingly cut off that effulgent buckler of Bhima with numerous dreadful arrows. Bhima then deprived of the use of his car and his shield, became infuriate in wrath.

67. Then with great vehemence he hurled at Karna's chariot that sword; that mighty sword then cutting off the stringed bow of Suta's son,

68—70. Dropped down on the earth like O king, an angry snake from the heavens. Then the son of Adhiratha, inflamed with rage in that battle, smilingly grasped another bow destructive of foes, having a tougher string and stronger than the one that had been cut off. Desirous of slaying the son of Kunti, O king, Karna, then began to discharge by thousands, arrows furnished with golden wings and endued with great impetuosi.y. Wounded with those shafts shot from Karna's bow, the puissant Bhima,

71. Bounded up into the air, thereby filling Karna's mind with great pain. Beholding that conduct of the victory-desiring Bhima, Karna,

72. The son of Radha deceived Bhimasena by hiding himself inside his chariot. Beholding Karna hide himself in the terrace of his car with a frightened heart,

73. Bhima, catching hold of the former's flag-staff, remained on the ground. Then all the Kurus and the Charanas applauded that feat of his, viz.,

74. His attempt to snatch away Karna from his car, like Garuda snatching away a serpent (from its hole). Then Bhima, with his bow burst open, and car useless but still observant of his duties,

75. Remained on the field, keeping his car behind him and firmly resolved to continue that battle. In that combat, the son of Radha once more rushed,

76. In rage, against that son of Pandu who stood before him in the attitude of fighting. O mighty monarch, those two highly puissant heroes, looking at their respective feats, and encountering each other,

77. Began to roar at each other like two rain clouds at the end of the summer season The combat between those two foremost of men who were excited to the highest pitch of fury,

78. And who would not brook each other's feat, looked like that between the gods and the Danavas. His stock of weapons exhausted, Kunti's son (Bhima) was assailed by Karna.

79. Then deprived as he was of his weapons, beholding the huge mountain-like elephants slain by Arjuna lying on the field, he entered into their midst for impeding the progress of the car of Karna.

80. Entering into that host of elephants, that was inaccessible to a chariot, the son of Pandu desirous of saving his life, did no longer strike the son of Radha.

81. Then searching eagerly for protection, that subjugator of hostile cities, that son of Pritha, uplifting an elephant slain by the arrows of Arjuna, stayed on the field of battle,

82. Looking like Hanumat holding the (Gandhamadhana) mountain over-grown with Oshadhis. But Karna, then cut that elephant, to pieces with his sharp arrows.

83. Then the son of Pandu began to throw at Barna, limbs of slain elephants and horses and car-wheels and every thing he saw lying on the field.

84. The son of Pandu then inflamed with rage, threw at Karna, every-thing that then came within his reach. But all those things hurled at him, Karna cut off with sharp arrows.

85. Bhima also raising his clenched fists endued with the force of thunder and terrible, desired to kill Suta's son. But he then came to recollect the vow of Arjuna (for slaying Karna).

86. Thus the son of Pandu, though competent, did not slay Karna, desirous of keeping inviolate the vow that Arjuna had made.

87. But the son of Suta then repeatedly caused the already afflicted Bhima, to lose his senses by striking him with his sharp arrows.

88. Recollecting the words of Kunti, Karna then did not slay Bhima who was then weaponless but with the handle of his bow he poked and pierced him.

89. Soon as he was struck with the end of Karna's bow, Bhima was inflamed with rage, and breathing like a snake and snatching away Karna's bow, he began to strike him on the head.

90. Struck by Bhimasena, the son of Radha with his eyes red in rage smilingly spoke these words to the former,

91. Over and over again,—"Beardless eunuch, ignorant fool, glutton, without any skill in the use of weapons, do you never again venture to fight (with any one) ? You are but a boy, a laggard in battle !

92. O son of Pandu where there are various kinds of food and drink and edibles, that is really the place fit for you, and not the field of battle, O wicked-souled one !

93. Devouring esculent roots, fruits and flowers, it is proper that you should engage yourself in the observance of vows and rites, in the woods. O Bhima, you know not how to fight !

94. Vast is the difference, O Vrikodara, between fighting and the occupation of a hermit. So, do you repair to the forest O master ; you are not capable of fighting and have an inclination for dwelling in the woods.

95. Urging cooks and servants and orderlies to make haste in making your dinner ready, O Vrikodara, you are capable of striking and reproving them.

96. Becoming a hermit, O Bhima, do you begin eating fruits, O wicked-minded wretch. O son of Kunti, betake to the forest, for you are incapable of fighting.

97. You are fit, O Vrikodara, for eating large quantities of esculent roots and for receiving and welcoming guests. O Vrikodara, I do not consider you fit for wielding weapons."

98. O monarch, he was also reminded by Karna in harsh language, of all the wrongs done to him in his days of childhood.

99. And once more as Bhima greatly weakened stood there, Vrishasena poked him with horn of his bow and smilingly addressed these words to him.

100. "O child, you should fight with others and not with men like myself. Those who fight with men like myself, have to undergo this and many things else.

101. Hie yourself to the spot where the Krishnas are, and they will then protect you in battle. Or, O son of Kunti, return to your home, O child what is the good of fighting ?"

102. Then hearing those very harsh words of Karna, Bhima smilingly spoke these words to him at the presence of every body.

103. "O wicked fool you have been repeatedly defeated by me, how then can you indulge in this vain brag ? The ancients have seen the victory and defeat of the mighty Indra himself !

104. O scion of a mean family, come and wrestle with me. Then even as I have slain the mighty and luxurious Kichaka,

105. I will slay you before the very eyes of all the kings. "But knowing Bhima's intention, that foremost of intelligent beings Karna,

106. Refrained from that fight before the very eyes of the bowmen present. Thus O king, making Bhima carless, Karna reproved him in such harsh language,

107—108. In the presence of that best of the Vrishnis and the son of Pritha. Then O king, the ape-bannered Arjuna, being urged on by Kesava, sped at the son of Suta numerous arrows whetted on stone. Then those gold-decked arrows hurled by the force of Partha's arm,

109. And issuing out of the Gandiva, penetrated into Karna's body like so many cranes entering into the Krouncha mountains. Wounding Karna with those arrows shot from the Gandiva, that entered his body like so many snakes,

110. Dhananjaya, drove away the son of Suta from the vicinity of Bhimasena. Then with his bow burst open by Bhima and pierced sore with the arrows of Dhananjaya,

111. Karna fled away from Bhima being borne hastily on his swit-coursing car. Bhima also, O foremost of men, ascending Satyaki's Vehicle,

112—113. Followed his brother Savyasachin the son of Pandu in battle. Then Dhananjaya with his eyes red in rage, and with great celerity sped at Karna a Naracha like the Destroyer urging death forward. Then like Garuda ranging through the welkin in quest of a mighty snake,

114. That Naracha shot from the Gandiva, flew through the sky towards Karna in all quickness. Then the son of Drona cut off that Naracha as it coursed through the sky, with a winged arrow,

115. Desirous as he was of freeing Karna from his fear of Dhananjaya. Thereupon Arjuna inflamed with rage, pierced Drona's son with sixty-four arrows

116—119. Whetted on stone,and O monarch addressed the latter saying 'Fly not'. But afflicted with the arrows of Dhananjaya, Drona's son quickly entered into the army teeming with infuriated elephants and numerous chariots. Then the puissant son of Kunti drowned the sound of the other twangs of bows decked with goid, with the tremendous twang ot his own bow Gandiva. Then the mighty Dhananjaya pursued Drona's son from behind who was thus flying and who had not then proceeded to a long way, frightening him all the way with his shafts. Tearing open the body of men, elephants and steeds with his Narachas

120. Furnished with wings made of the feathers of the peacock and the Kanka, Arjuna began to agitate that army of yours. O foremost of the Bharatas, Partha, the son of Pakasasani (Indra) then began to carnage that host of yours, consisting of horses elephants and men.

Thus ends the one-hundred and thirty-ninth chapter, the fight between Karna and Bhima, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXL.

JAYADRATHA BADHA-PARVA.—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. Day by day, O Sanjaya, my blazing fame is dwindling away. Numerous warriors of my side are being slain. I consider all this to be due to the adverse influence of Fate.

2. Inflamed with wrath, Dhananjaya has entered into my host which is protected by Drona's son and Karna and which is therefore incapable of being penetrated into by the very celestials.

3. Dhananjayas's prowess has increased in consequence of his being united with that foremost of the Sinis and those two of burning energy, namely Krishna and Bhima.

4. Like fire burning down a heap of dry grass, grief is corroding my heart since I have heard of Dhananjaya's entrance into my army. I see that all the king's of the earth with the ruler of the Sindhus amongst them, are under the influence of adverse Fate.

5. Having inflicted a terrlble injury to the diamem-cheked Arjuna, how could the ruler of the Sindhu's escape with his life, when he would become the object of Arjuna's sight ?

6. O Sanjaya, I can imagine even now that the king of the Sindhus no longer lives. Therefore, tell me how in reality did that battle rage then.

7. He that had single-handed and unsuported entered into and agitated my army, even as an infuriate elephant enters and crushes a group of lotuses,

8. Tell me of the feats of that Vrishnipero, as he achieved them, strugging to help Dhananjaya in battle. O Sanjaya, you are an expert in narration.

Sanjaya said :—

9. Seeing that foremost of men namely Bhima, proceed, although pierced with the arrows of Vikartana's son in the midst of so many heroes, O monarch, that excellent warrior of the Sini race, followed him on his chariot.

10. Uttering thundering roars like the clouds at the expiration of the summer season, or burning like the sun at the end of the rainy season, he began to slaughter his foes by means of his tough bow and caused the troops of your son repeatedly to tremble.

11. When that foremost of Madhu's race careered on the field on his chariot drawn by horses of argentine hue and roared fiercely, O Bharata, there was none amongst your troops who could then check him.

12. Then that foremost of kings namely Alamvusha excited with wrath, untreatreating in battle, armed with a bow and covered in a golden coat of mail, advancing against Satyaki checked his carreer in battle.

13. The encounter that thereupon raged between them was unparalleled. Your soldiers and the enemy's troops, giving up the fight became spectators of that battle battle.

14. The foremost of all kings viz king Alamvusha, then sped at Satyaki ten shafts; but that foremost of scions of the Sini race, cut off all those shafts, with those of his own, before they could reach him.

15. Thereupon, Alamvasha pierced Satyaki with three sharp arrows furnished with beautiful wings blazing as fire and discharged from the bow drawn back to the very ear. These arrows penetrating through Satyaki's coat of mail mangled his body.

16. Then piercing Satyaki's body with those keenpointed and effulgent arrows, poisened and of the energy of fire or the wind, Alamvusha, with four other shafts, struck the four silver-white steeds of Satyaki with great force.

17. Possessing prowess and activity equal to those of that bearer of the discus (Krishna), the tgrandson of Sini, thus struck by Alamvasha, slew the latter's fours steeds with four keen arrows.

18. Then cutting off the head of Alamvusha's charioteer, he severed with a broad-headed arrow fierce as the yoga-fire from the former's trunk his head graced with excellent ear-rings and beatiful as the full moon.

19. Having slain that scion of a race whose descendants are all kings, the illustrious descendant of the Yadu race that hero capable of crushing the hostile army, advanced towards Arjuna, O king, checking in his progress the soldiers of the enemy.

20. O monarch, thus careering amongst his enemies, the Vrishni hero, when following in the track of Arjuna, was seen with his shafts to destroy repeadly the Kuru host, like the raging tempest scattering masses of clouds.

21. Where-ever that foremost of men desired to go, he was borne thither by those best steeds of his that were of Sindhu breed, well-broken, tame, white as milk, or the Kunda flower, or the moon or the snow, and that were decked with housings and traces of gold.

22. Then, O descendant of Ajamidas race, yours sons, united with other soldiers of your army, quickly rushed against Satyaki, making that foremost of warrior's viz Dussasana their leader.

23. Those commanders of divisions surrounding the grandson of Sini on all sides, began to wound him viz that foremost of the Satwata's; that hero Satyaki resisted them with showers of his atrows.

24. Resisting them all quickly with his shafts of fiery energy, that slayer of hostile heroes, the grandson of Sini uplifting his bow, slew the horses of Dussasana's chariot; then Arjuna and Krishna seeing that foremost of men Satyaki thus fight in battle became highly delighted.

Thus ends the one hundred and fortieth chapter, the slaughter of Alamvusha in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXLI.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1—2. Then the mighty archers of the Trigartta clan, all owning gold-decked standards, surrounded on all sides the mighty-armed Satyaki—that hero who performed with activity everything that demanded promptness, and who having penetrated into that host fathomless as the ocean, was advancing against Dussasana's chariot, for giving victory to Dhananjaya.

3. Then all those excellent bowmen waxing wroth and surrounding him with hosts of cars on all sides, began to pour their arrowy showers on them.

4. But the unsupported Satyaki of prowess incapable of being baffled, then alone conquered his fifty antagonists, all princes of the Trigartta race looking very beautiful in battle.

5. Then he reached the centre of the Bharata host, echoing with the sound of palm-strokes and abounding in swords, lances and maces and looking like the unfordable ocean itself.

6. We then behold the wonderful conduct of Sini's grandson, for beholding him now in the Western direction, we immediately after beheld him in the Eastern direction, so great indeed was his lightness of movements.

7. Then as if dancing and resembling, although alone,a hundred car-warriors, that hero careered in the East, West, North and South, and all the subsidiary directions.

8. Beholding that conduct of that one of lion-like prowess and tread, the Trigartta warriors greatly afflicted, fell back upon the division of their clansmen.

9. Thereafter the brave warriors viz the Surasenas tried to resist Satyaki wounding him with arrowy showers, like a guide percing his mad elephant with the goad.

10. The illustrious Satyaki fought with them only for a while and then that hero of inconceivable prowess commenced his fight with the Kalingas.

11. Passing through the division of the Kalingas that was incabable being passed through, the mighty-armed Satyaki approached Dhananjaya the son of Pritha.

12. Then like an exhausted swimmer reaching land, the heroic Yuyudhana became comforted on obtaining sight of Dhananjaya that foremost of men.

13. Beholding Satyaki come near them, Kesava addressing Arjuna said :—"There comes the grandson of Sini, O son of Pritha, pursuing the track (opened by you).

14. O you of true prowess, Satyaki is your friend and pupil. That foremost of men, holding all the warriors of the hostile host at a pins fee, has vanquished them all.

15. Inflicting dreadful loss upon the Kouravas, Satyaki dear unto you like your own life, is coming towards you, O diadem-decked one!

16. Having worsted with his arrows, Drona and Kritavarman of the Bhoja race, this Satyaki is approaching you, O Phalguna.

17. Having slain numerous warriors at best of their class, the valorous Satyaki ever solicitous of the welfare of Yudhisthira, and accomplished in the use of weapons, is approaching you, O Arjuna.

18. O son of Pandu, the puissant Satya- is coming to you having achieved numerous difficult feats in the midst of the Kourava host.

19. Having encountered on a single car many mighty car-warriors having Drona at their head, the heroic Satyaki is approaching you, O Arjuna.

20. Deputed by the very virtuous king Yudhisthira, O Pratha, this Satyaki is coming to you, having penetrated through the Kourava army, depending upon the might of his arms.

21. Invincible in battle, that Satyaki who has no match for him in the whole Kourava army, is now coming to you, O son of Kunti!

22. Freed from the press of the Kourava troops, like a lion from amidst a herd of kine, Satyaki is now approaching you, after having slain numerous hostile soldiers.

23. O son of Pritha, here comes Satyaki in all quickness, having covered the earth with the heads of thousand's of kings, graced with faces resembling blooming lotuses.

24. Yonder comes Satyaki, having conquered Duryodhana with his brothers, and having slain Jalasandha in battle.

25. Yonder comes Satyaki, having created a river of blood with clots of blood for its mire, and having disregarded the Kouravas like some any straws."

26. Hearing these words of Kesava Kunti's son although filled with delight replied to the former saying :—"O mighty-armed one, I am not pleased to find that Satyaki is coming to me.

27. O Kesava, I do not know the whereabouts of the very virtuous king Yudhisthira. I am doubtful whether he lives or not, being deprived of the help of this Satwata hero.

28. O mighty-armed one, it should have been this one's first duty to protect the king in battle. O Krishna, wherefore has then this one abandoning him has followed in my wake?

29. The king has been left to the mercy of Drona; the ruler of the Sindhus is still unslain, and yonder does Bhurisravas rush against Satyaki in battle.

30. I have still the heavies tburden hanging on me, in the shape of my vow to slay the Sindhu king. It is my duty to inform myself of the where-abouts of the king. It is also my duty to protect Satyaki.

31. It is also my (self-imposed) duty to slay Jayadratha. Yonder is the sun going down (the horizon). As regards the mighty-armed Satyaki he is fatigued and his stock of weapons is also exhausted.

32. His horses are tired, and O Madhava his driver is worn out with fatigue. On the other hand, O Kesava, Bhurisrava is not at all fatigued, and moreover he is well supported.

33. Will Satyaki reap victory in this encounter? Having crossed the ocean itself will Satyaki of prowess incapable of being vanquished,

34—36. Will that foremost of the scion of the Sini race, will that highly energetic one, succumb in crossing the little water contained in the vestige of a cow's hoof? Will Satyaki obtain good fortune having encountered Bhurisravas that foremost of the Kurus, who is high-souled and accomplished in the use of weapons? That he should despatch Satyaki after me, dismissing all his fears from Drona, O Kesava, I think this to be a mistake committed by the very virtuous kingj Yudhisthira. Like a hawk when ranging through the skies, ever trying to pounce upon a piece of meat, Drona is ever endeavouring to effect the capture of the very virtuous king. Will the king fare well?

Thus ends the one hundred and forty-first chapter, Satyaki's seeing of Arjuna, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXLII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Beholding that warrior indomitable in battle, that scion of the Sini race rush furiously to battle, O king, Bhurisravas, inflamed with wrath, assailed him.

2. Then, O mighty monarch, that foremost of the Kurus (Bhurisravas) addressing Sini's grandson thus spoke:—"By good luck it is that you have to-day come within the range of my sight;

3. To-day, I shall realise in battle my long-cherished hope; you shall not escape me alive if indeed you do not fly away from the battle.

4. O scion of the Dasarha race, to-day slaying you who ever boast of your prowess, I shall afford delight to Suyodhana, the king of the Kurus.

5. To-day the heroes, Kesava and Arjuna, will both behold you prostrate on the field of battle, consumed with the fire of my barrows.

To-day Dharma's son king Yudhisthira hearing you slain by me, would be covered with shame, for it was he who despatched you on this mission.

7. To-day Pritha's son Dhananjaya will come to know of my prowess when he will see you slain by me and lie weltering in your blood.

8. This encounter with you has long been desired by me, like that desired by Sakra with Vali, in the battle between the Gods and the Asuras in days gone by.

9. To-day, O descendant of the Satwata race, I shall fight a terrible fight with you, whence you shall know my great might and manliness.

10. Slain by me in battle, you shall to-day go to the domains of the Samyamani, like the son ofRavana slain by the younger brother of Rama (Lakshmana.)

11. To-day Krishna, Partha, and the virtuous king Yudhisthira, O Madhava, will abandon fighting, and become despondent, in consequence of your slaughter.

12. O Madhava, to-day, slaying you with my sharp arrows, I shall afford delight to the wives of those who have been slain by you.

13. Just as a small deer coming within the range of a lion's sight cannot escape, so O descendant of Madhu's race, you shall not escape me alive, having come within the range of my sight."

14. Thereupon, O king, Yuyudhana smilingly replied to him saying:—"O illustrious descendant of the Kuru race, I have no fear in fight.

15. I am not to be terrified by empty words. He will slay me in battle who will be competent to deprive me of my weapons.

16. He that will slay me in battle will ever be victorious. What is the use of vain boasts. Achieve in deeds what you say in words.

17. Like the rumble of autumnal clouds, your roars are barren. So hearing your empty roars nothing best my laughter is being excited.

18. O Kourava, let the encounter which you looked so eargrly for, to-day take place; O sire, my heart that longs for the combat with you, can not tolerate any more delay.

19. O wretch, I shall not abstain from the fight to-day without having slain you in battle." Thus those two formost of men, stirring each other with their biting words,

20. And waxing wroth, and desirous of slaying each other in battle began to smite each other. Then those two mighty bowmen both boastful of their prowess and both challenging each other,

21. Appeared like two infuriate elephants encountering each other, with a desire to consort with a she-elephant. Then those two subduers of foes, Bhurisravas and Satyaky began to pour,

22. On each other, dreadful showers of arrows like two mighty-clouds. Covering Sini's grandson with swift-coursing arrows, Somadatts's son,

23. O foremost of the Bharatas, desirous of slaying the former, pierced him with sharp arrows. Having pierced Satyaki then with ten arrows, Somadatta's son,

24—25. Out of a desire for slaying that illustrious scion of the Sini race, sped other sharp shafts at him. Then, O ruler of men, Satyaki with the illusion of his weapons devoured up all those arrows, O lord, when they were ranging through the skies and before they had even reached him (Satyaki). Then those two heroes began to pour upon one another their showers of weapons.

26. Those two heroes, of noble extraction both enhancers of the fame of the Kurus and the Vrisknis respectively, began to fight with each other like two tigers fighting with claws, or two elephants fighting with their tusks.

27. With lances and with darts and javelins they inflicted wounds on each other. They mangled their bodies and shed blood profusely.

28. Then those two heroes checked each other in that battle which was like a gambling match in which their lives were the stakes. Thus those two enhancers of the glory of the Kuru and the Vrishni races (respectively),

29—31. Fought on with each other like two huge elephants, the leaders of two herds. Those two warriors, both desirous of attaining the highest of regions both longing to attain to the region of Brahma, thus roared at each other. Indeed Satyaki and Somadatta's son continued to cover each with their arrowy downpour in the sight of the delighted Dhartarastras. The people then witnessed that encounter between those two foremost of warriors,

32. Who were fighting like two leaders of elephant herds for the sake of consorting with a she-elaphant in her season. Then each slaying the other's steeds and cutting off the other's bow

33. And thus deprived of the use of their cars, encountered each other for sword fighting. Taking up two large and beautiful and variegated shields made of bull's hide,

34. And drawing out their swords out of their scabbards, they appeared beautiful on the field of battle. They moved in various motions and described in their montions, various circles.

35. Those two subduers of foes incessantly then began to strike one another out of rage. With their swords and covered in variegated coats of mail and adorned with Nikas and Angadas,

36. Those two renowned warriors displayed various kinds of motions. They wheeled about and jumped on high, made side thirsts, leapt forward, whirled on high, ran and dashed forward and advanced upwards.

37. Those two subduers of foes began to smite each other with their swords, and each was on the alert for finding the weakness of other. Both of those two heroes jumped up superbly,

38. And both displayed their training agility and skill. Those foremost of warriors in that battle, made many skilful thirst at each other.

39. Then, O foremost of men, striking each other, they took respite only for a moment before the presence of all the troop.

40. Having, with their respective swords cut off the variegated buckler of each other decked with hundred moons, those foremost of men engaged in a wrestling encounter, O ruler of men.

41. Possessed of expanded chests, long arms, and both versed in wrestling, they fought on with each other with their arms that resembled iron-piked bludgeons.

42. They struck and seized each other with their arms, and each seized the others neck with his arms. The skill that they had acquired by practice, afforded great delight to other warriors who then were turned into mere spectators.

43. Then, O king, as those two foremost of men fought on with each other, the sound that then arose, was like that caused by the striking of thunder against a mountain.

44—46. Like two elephants fighting with each other with the ends of their tusks, or like two bulls with their horns, those two high-souled and foremost warriors of the Kuru and the Satwata races, fought with each other, sometimes twining each other with their arms, sometimes striking each other with their heads, sometimes binding each other with their legs, sometimes slapping their arm-pits, sometimes scraching each other with their nails, sometimes embracing each other tightly, sometimes twining their legs round each others loins, sometimes rolling on the ground, sometimes going forward and sometime falling back, sometimes challenging each other, sometimes throwing each other down, sometimes rising up and sometimes jumping on high.

47. Then those two puissant combatant's displayed in that encounter all the thirty kinds of manœuvers and acts that are the principal features of these kinds of encounters.

48. When during that encounter, the stock of Satwata's weapons was exhausted, Vasudeva's son addressing Arjuna said :—"Behold this carless hero, viz., Satyaki, this foremost of all weilders of bow, engaged in fight!

49. O son of Pandu, he has followed you having penetrated into the Bharata host. O Bharata, he has fought with many mighty warriors of the Bharata host.

50. Bhurisravas who has made great sacrificial presents, rushing upon that foremost of warriors viz., Satyaki exhausted with fatigue, has now encountered him. This is indeed very unfair."

51. Then the indomitable Bhurisravas inflamed with rage, uplifting his sword struck Satyaki like a mad elephant striking another in the same state.

52. Those two foremost of car-warriors, both riding in their cars, and both rushing with rage fought on with each other, Arjuna and Krishna being their witnesses.

53. Thereupon the mighty-armed Krishna addressing Arjuna said. "Behold the foremost of the Vrishni and Andhaka races, viz., Satyaki succumb to the son of Somadatta.

54. Having achieved many difficult feats he is now laid low on the field in consequence of his great exhaustion. O Arjuna protect the heroic Satyaki, your (renowned) pupil.

55. O foremost of men, O Arjuna, do you soon take that measure by which Satyaki may not succumb to Bhurisravas the performer of numerous sacrifices, O lord."

56. Then Dhananjaya, with a cheerful heart addressing Vasudeva's son said :—" Behold that foremost among the Kurus, and that best hero among the Vrishni's, sport with each other,

57. Like a huge and enfuriate elephant sporting in the woods with a mighty lion." While Pandu's son Dhananjaya was thus speaking,

58. Loud cries of Oh and Alas arose among the troops, O foremost of the Bharatas, as the mighty-armed (Bhurisravas) striking vigorously had brought Satyaki down on the earth.

59. Then like a lion dragging an elephant, that foremost of the Kuru race, namely Bhurisravas, that destroyer of darkness, looked beautiful in that battle as he dragged that foremost one of the Satwatas.

60. Then drawing his sword out of the scabbard and holding Satyaki by the hair, Bhurisravas struck the former on the breast with his legs.

61. Bhurisravas was then about to sever from Satyaki's trunk his head greaced with earrings. For sometime, that hero of the Satwata race rapidly whirled his head,

62. Together with the arm of Bhurisravas that held it by the hair, like a potters wheel whirling round with the rod.

63. Beholding the Satwata hero thus dragged by Bhurisravas, Vasudeva once more addressing Arjuna said :—

64. 'Behold O mighty-armed one, that foremost hero among the Vrishnis and Andhakas, that disciple of yours who is not inferior to you in bowmanship, succumb to the son of Somadatta.

65. Behold, O son of Pritha, the weak Bhurisravas obtain advantage over the Vrishni hero Satyaki of prowess incapable of being baffled."

66. The mighty-armed son of Pandu thus spoken to by Vasudeva (Krishna), worshipped Bhurisravas in his minds,

67. (He then said to himself). 'Dragging this foremost of the Satwata race as if in sport, the enhancer of the glory of the Kurus (Bhurisravas) is filling me with delight.

68. Without slaying that foremost of the Vrishni heroes viz Satyaki he is only dragging the former like the king of the beasts dragging a mighty elephant in the woods.'

69. Having thus mentally applauded that foremost of the Kouravas, Pritha's son, O king, the mighty Arjuna thus replied to Vasudeva saying :—

70. "O Madhava, my eyes being fixed on the ruler of the Sindhus, I can not see Bhurisravas; but for the sake of that descendant of Yadu's, race, I shall perform a very difficult feat."

71. Having thus spoken and desirous of carrying out the words of Vasudeva, the son of Pandu placed a sharp razor-headed arrow on the bowstring.

72. That arrow shot by the force of Partha's arms and looking like a meteor dropping from the skies, cut off the arm of that one devoted to the performance of sacrifice —arm that was decked with Angadas and had a sword in its grasp.

Thus ends the one hundred and forty-second chapter, the lopping of Bhurisrava's arm, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXLIII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then that arm with the sword in grasp and decked with beautiful Angadas, fell down on the earth, thereby inflicting great grief on the living creation.

2. In the act of striking, that arm was lopped off by the diadem-decked Arjuna, who himself remained invisible to Bhurisravas; thus cut off, it fell down vehlmently on the earth, like a five-hooded snake.

3. Then that descendant of the Kuru race, beholding himself incapacitated by Pritha's son, began, out of rage, to reprove the son of Pandu, having abandoned Satyaki.

Bhurisravas said :—

4. Alas, O son of Kunti, you have committed a cruel and heartless deed, in as much as, not being engaged with me, and covertly, you have cut off my arm.

5. Shall you have not to say to king Yudhisthira, the son of Dharma—'Bhurisravas when engaged with another was slain by me in battle ?'

6. Was it for this that you learnt the use of weapons from the illustrious Indra, or Rudra, or Drona or Kripa, O son of Pritha!

7. It is said that you are better acquainted with the rules about the use of weapons than many others. Why then have you lopped off the arm of one who was not fighting with you?

8. The righteous never strike him who is careless, or who is frightened, or who is made carless, or who implores mercy, or who is involved in a calamity.

9. Why then, O son of Pritha, have you perpetrated this vile and difficult deed, that is only worthy of a mean fellow and is practised only by wicked people.

10. O Dhananjaya, respectable people look upon respectable deeds to be very easy of being accomplished. But a disrespectable deed is difficult of being perpetrated by a respectable person.

11. Men quickly imbibe the behaviours of those among whom they live, O Bartha, the truth of this proposition is verified in you.

12. Of royal extraction and specially descendant as you are of the Kuru race, how could you transgress the duties of the Kshatriya race, although you were well-behaved and observant of vows.

13. This vile act that you have to-day perpetrated for the sake of the Vrishni hero, is surely the result of Vasudeva's instigations. And it can not possibly be reconciled to your nature.

14. What man, except he that calls himself a friened of Krishna would inflict such an injury on another who is engaged deeply in fighting with his adversary ?

15. The Vrishnis and the Andhakas are vile Kshatriyas, ever engaged in perpetrating low deeds and are by nature wedded to shameful conduct. Why, O Partha, have you chosen them to be your model ?"

Sanjaya said :—

Being thus spoken to Partha then replied to Bhurisravas saying :—

16. 'Now it is clear that with the decay of the body, the intellect of men also suffer decay, since, O master, you have uselessly directed all these reproaches to me.

17. Knowing myself and Hrishikesha perfectly well, how is it that you reproach us both ? I am conversant perfectly with the rules of fair combat and I am acquainted with the meaning of all moral precepts.

18. So, it is impossible that I should commit a sinful act. Knowing this also, you are reproaching me. The Kshatriyas fight with their foes, being supported by their own men,

19. Such as their brothers, their fathers their sons, and relatives and friends, and kinsmen and companions, and also relying on the strength of their arms.

20. Why then should I not protec, Satyaki my disciple and my dear relativet who is fighting in this battle on our behali reckless of his very life that is so difficult of being laid down ?

21. Why should I not protect Satyakf who is, O king, like my own right arm to me ? In battle, one should not look after his own protection only.

22. O ruler of men, he that is engaged on behalf of another, should surely be protected by that other. When such men are themselves protected they can look after the protection of the king (on whose behalf they fight).

23. If indeed I had passivsly beheld Satyaki's slaughter in this great encounter, then, at Satyaki's death, sin would have hanged on me for my negligence.

24—28. Why do you wax wroth upon me for my having protected him, who in every way deserves my protection? You are reproaching me, O king, saying, 'When engaged with another, I have yet been incapacitated by you.' In respect to this, I submit that I committed an error in my judgment. Satyaki was shaking his armour against you and was riding on his own car, (drawing his bow-string he was fighting with the foes, in the midst of his enemies abounding in steeds and foot-soldier and teeming with cars and elephants and echoing with the war-cries of combatants. Amongst friends and foes engaged with one another, how could it be possible that the Satwata hero was engaged with one person only? Having encountered many warriors, and vanquished many mighty car-warrior,

29. Satyaki was fatigued and afflicted with weapon-wounds and cheerless in mind; his horses also were exhausted. Having, under these circumstances, defeated the mighty car-warrior Satyaki,

30. And having thus obtained advantage over him, you seek to establish your superiority. You desired to cut off with your sword the head of Satyaki.

31. I could not possibly behold passively Satyaki reduced to that plight. It is proper that you should reproach your own self in as much as you neglected to protect yourself (when trying to injure another). Indeed O hero, how would you yourself have behaved towards one who would be your dependent."

Sanjaya said :—

32. Thus spoken to (by Arjuna), the illustrious and mighty-armed Bhurisravas bearing the device of a scrificial stake on his banner, let Yuyudhana go, and desired to enter upon the performance of Praya-Yoga.

33. Distinguished by many pious deeds, he then spread with his left hand a bed of arrows, and out of a desire for going to the regions of Brahman, he committed his vital breaths to the care of the gods presiding over them.

34. Steadying his eyes on the sun, setting his mind on the purified water and meditating the Mantras contained in the Upanishadas, Bhurisravas betaking himself to yoga, became reticent.

35. Then all the men in the army began to rebuke Krishna and Dhanajaya, and applaud that foremost of men viz Bhurisravas.

36. Though thus reproached by the general voice, the two Krishnas uttered not a single word, nor did the stake-bannered Bhurisravas feel any joy in consequence of those encomiums.

37—38. Then Dhananjaya otherwise called Phalguna, that son of Pandu unable to tolerate your sons speaking in that strain as also to put up with their words and the words of Bhurisravas, O Bharata, in sorrow and not at all angry, spoke these words, as if for reminding them all.

39. "All kings know of this my great vow, that no one shall slay any body of our party so long as the latter is within the range of my arrows.

40. Knowing this, O stake-bannerd, one it befits you not to reproach me; without yourself knowing the rules of morality, you should not censure others.

41. That I have lopped off your arm while you, armed to the teeth, were on the point of slaying the unarmed Satyaki, is not at all against the rules of fair combat.

42. But what righteous man is there who will not condemn the slaughter of the body Abhimanyu specially when he was deprived of his weapons, his car and his armour?"

43. Thus addressed by Pritha's son, Bhurisravas touched the ground with his head and offered with his left arm the right one that had been severed.

44. Then the stake-bannered Bhurisravas of great effulgence O king having heard those words of Partha, became silent with his face turned towards the earth.

Arjuna said :—

45. O eldest brother of Sala, the love I bear for you is equal even to that I bear for king Yudhisthira the virtuous, or Bhima that foremost of all mighty persons, or Nakula or Sahadeva.

46. With my permission as also with that of the high-souled Krishna do you go to the regions of the righteous where Sivi the son of Usinara is.

Vasudeva said :—

47. You are ever devoted to the performance of sacrifices and Agnihotras; therefore repair quickly to those holy regions of mine that constantly burn with effulgence and that are coveted by the foremost of gods with Brahman as their head, and becoming equal to myself be you carried on the back of Garuda.

Sanjaya said :—

48. Liberated from the grasp of Somadatta's son, the grandson of Sini rose, and with a view to cut off the head of that illustrious hero, drew his sword.

49. Satyaki then desired to slay the sinless Bhurisravas, the eldest brother of Saila that giver of profuse presents at sacrifices, who was staying with his senses drawn back from the battle and who had already been slain by Arjuna the son of Pandu ;

50. Who was sitting with his arm lopped off, like an elephant with his trunk cut off. Then all the warriors reproached him loudly for his intention. But destitute of reason,

51. And although forbidden by the high-souled Partha and Krishna and Bhima and the two wheel protectors of Arjuna's car, and Aswathaman and Kripa,

52. And Karna and Vrishasena and the king of the Sindhus, and while the soldiers were still uttering loud shouts of denunciation, Satyaki slew Bhurisravas while engaged in the observanoe of the vow.

53. Indeed with his sword Satyaki lopped off the head of the Kuru warrior who had been deprived of his arm by Partha and who was then engaged in the Praya for liberating his soul from the body.

54. The soldiers then did not praise Satyaki for that act of his, viz the slaughter of the perpetuator of the Kuru race, who had already been slain by Pritha's son.

55—56. Then the Siddhas, the Charanas, and the men present, as also the celestials, seeing the Indra-like Bhurisravas slain in battle when sitting in the observance of the vow Praya, began to praise him, struck with wonder at the feats achieved by him. Your troops also argued the matter saying :

57. 'In this matter no blame should be attributed to the Vrishni hero. What has been ordained must happen. Therefore we should not cherish wrath ; since again wrath is the cause of a man's grief.

58. It was doomed that Bhurisravas would be slain by the heroic Satyaki. We need not judge of its propriety or otherwise. Satyaki has been made the instrument of Bhurisrava's death by the Creator himself.

Satyaki said :—

59. You, sinful Kouravas, vested in outward garments of virtue, you are telling me in words of virtue, that Bhurisravas should not have been slain.

60. Where did this righteousness of yours fly when you ruthlessly slew in battle that child viz Subadra's son when he was deprived to the use of his weapons ;

61. In a certain fit of haughtiness I had vowed that he who would throw me down in battle alive, and strike me in wrath with his knees,

62. Would be slain by me even though that antagonist of mine should adopt the vow of asceticism. Though I was fighting in battle with my arms and eyes in tact,

63. Yet you had taken me as already slain. It is indeed a great foolishness on your part. You foremost of the Kurus, the slaughter of Bhnrisravas achieved by me, is indeed very proper.

64. Partha by lopping off the arm of this one, with sword in grasp, has fulfilled his vow of protecting his own partisans, and has thereby robbed me of my glory.

65. What is ordained must come to pass It is the hand of fate that works. Bhurisravas has been slain in the course of this battle. What sin have I perpetrated ?

66. In days gone by, Valmiki sang this verse on earth viz—"You say, O ape, that women should not be slain !

67. In all times however men should always with resolute care do that which would give pain to thei foes."

Sanjaya said :—

68. After Satyaki had said these words, none amongst the Pandavas and the Kouravas, O king, said anything ; on the other hand they praised Bhurisravas in their mind.

69. Nobody present there countenanced the slaughter of Somadatta's illustrious son, who resembled an hermit of the woods and who had given away thousands of golden coins.

70. The head of that brave hero graced with beautiful blue locks and eyes red like those of pegions looked like the head of a horse cut off in a horse sacrifice and placed on the sacrificial altar.

71. Purified through his prowess and the death by the edge of weapons, and in consequenee of the boon accorded to him, Bhurisravas worthy of every boon went to the regions on high, shuffling off his mortal coil and filling the heavens with his illustrious fame.

Thus ends the one hundred and forty-third chapter, the slaughter of Bhurisravas in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXLIV.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. Having promised to Yudhisthira to do so, the heroic Satyaki crossed the ocean of my troops, unvavquished even by Drona, Radha's son, Vikarna and Kritavarman.

2. How was it then that Satyaki checked and humiliated by that scion of the Kurus namely Bhurisravas, was brought down on the ground with force.

Sanjaya said :—

3. Hear, O monarch, how the grandson of Sini came to being in days gone by as also how Bhurisravas was descended. O ruler of men, this will explain all your doubts.

4. Atri had Soma for his son, and Soma's son was called Budha. Budha's son was Pururava whose effulgence was like that of the great Indra.

5. Pururava had a son called Ayush ; and Ayush's son was Nahusha. Nahusha had Yayati for his son who was a royal sage equal to a celestial.

6. By his wife Devayani Yayati had Yadu for his eldest son. In the dynasty of Yadu was born a son called by the name of Devamida.

7. Devamida of Yadu's race had Sura for his son, who was highly esteemed in all the three worlds. Sura had for his son that foremost of men namely the illustrious Vasudeva.

8. Foremost of all weilders of bows, Sura was equal to Kartikeya in battle. O king, in his race and equal to him in energy was born Sini, O monarch.

9. At this time, O monarch the Sayamvara of the daughter of the illustrious Devaka took place in which numerous Kshatriyas were present.

10. In that Sayamvara, Sini having vanquished the kings, placed the princess Devaki on his car, with a view to marry her to Vasudeva.

11. O foremost of men, O king, then beholding the princess Devaki on the car of Sini of Sura's line, the highly puissant Somadatta could not brook it.

12. Thereupon, O king, a battle was fought between them, that occupied half a day and was beautiful to look at. O foremost of men, a wrestling encounter then took place between those heroes endued with great heroism.

13. Somadatta then was seized upon and felled on the ground by Sini ; and the latter raising his sword and holding the former by the hair, struck him with his legs,

14. In the midst of thousands of kings who were witnessing the combat, from all sides. Then out of mercy ; the latter abandoned the former saying 'go, live.'

15. Reduced to that humiliatory condition, O sire, Somadatta, influeneed by ang r began to offer worship to Mahadeva in order to propitiate him.

16. That foremost of all boon-giving deities namely Mahadeva became pleased with him and requested him to ask for his desired boon. The royal son of Somadatta then asked for this boon :—

17. "I wish to have a son, O master, who will strike down Sini's son in the midst of thousands of kings in battle and who will strike the latter with his leg."

18. Hearing these words of Somadatta O king, the god disappeared then and there saying 'so be it.'

19. Through the virtue of that boon Somadatta afterwards got the liberal-minded and munificient Bhurisravas for his son ; and it was thus that Somadatta's son succeeded in throwing down the descendant of Sini, 20, And in striking him with his legs in in the presence of the whole army. O king now I have related to you what you asked me.

21. Indeed that scion of the Satwata race (Satyaki) can not be worsted in battle by even the foremost of men, The Vrishni heroes are all of sure aim and are acquainted with all modes of warfare.

22. They can defeat the very gods the Danavas and the Gandharvas. They are never confounded ; they fight depending totally on their own energy. They never seek other's help.

23. O lord, there is none in this world equal to the Vrishnis. O foremost of the Bharata's none, has been, are, or will be a match for the Vrishnis in might.

24, They never contemn their kinsmen, and are ever observant of the commands of the elders. Neither the gods nor the Asuras, nor the Gandharvas, nor the Yakshas nor the Rakshasas,

25. Can conquer the Vrishni heroes, what to speak of men! They never cast covetous-glances on the things or possessions of their kinsmen, preceptor or those of the Brahmanas.

26. They never covet also the properties of those that render them help on any time of distress. Devoted to the Brahmanas, and truthful in speech, they never show any pride although they are wealthy.

27. Those who are really strong are regarded as weak by the Vrishnis, and are rescued by them when involved in any danger. Ever devoted to the worship of gods, the Vrishnis are self-controlled munificent and shorn of pride.

28. For this it is that prowess of the Vrishni heroes are never thwarted. It is possible for one to carry on his shoulders the Meru mountain or to swim across the very ocean,

29-30. But it is impossible for him to obtain advantage over the Vrishnis in an encounter with them. O lord, I have now explained to you every thing in respect of which you entertained doubts. After all, O king of the Kurus, O foremost of men, yours is the great fault (that has bred this war).

Thus ends the one hundred and forty-fourth chapter, the praise of Satyaki, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXLV.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. When under these circumstances the Kurn warrior Bhurisravas had been slain, relate to me, O Sanjaya how the battle progressed.

Sanjaya said:—

2. After Bhurisravas had gone to the regions of the departed, O Bharata, the mighty-armed Arjuna urged Vasudeva saying:—

3. "O Krishna, urge the steeds to the top of their speed, so that they may soon carry me to spot where king Jayadratha is, O sinless one it behoves you, to help me in the fulfilment of my vow!

4—7. O mighty-armed one, the orb of the day, is quickly going towards the Western hills. O foremost of men, I have undertaken to achieve a mighty task. But the ruler of the Sindhus on the other hand is protected by many foremost warriors among the Kurus. O Krishna, do you drive the horses in such a manner that my vow may be fulfilled before sunset and that Jayadratha may be slain."

Sanjaya said:—

Then the mighty-armed Krishna versed in horse-lore, urged those horses of argentine hue towards the car of Jayadratha. Then as Arjuna proceeded shooting swift-flying arrows ever hitting their marks,

8. O mighty monarch, the formemost warriors of yours troops quickly proceeded to meet him. They were Duryodhana, Karna, Vrishasena, the king of the Madras,

9. Aswathaman, Kripa, and the ruler of the Sindhus himself; encountering the Sindhu king who was standing before him, Vibhatsu,

10. Cast his eyes burning with rage on him and seemed to burn the former there with. Thereupon king Duryodhana addressing Radha's son quickly said:—

11. 'Behold Arjuna exert himself for compassing the slaughter of Jayadratha." O king, your royal son Suyodhana spoke these very words to Karna.

12. "O son of Vikartana, the crisis in the battle has arrived. O high-souled warrior, now show your own strength. O Karna, do you so act as Jayadratha may not be slain in battle by Arjuna.

13. O foremost hero among men, very little remains of the day. Thwart the enemy now with the waves of your arrows. O foremost of men, if we can safely reach the expiry of the day, victory will certainly be ours.

14. If the ruler of the Sindhus can be saved till the sun sets, then the son of Kunti, in consequence of his vow being baffled, will fall upon fire.

15. O giver of honor, the brothers and the followers of Arjuna will not be able to live for a moment on the face of the earth, when he passes away from it.

16. When the Pandavas will be destroyed, O Karna, we shall enjoy this earth with its mountains, gardens and forests, without a thorn in our sides.

17. O bestower of honor, confounded by adverse Destiny, and through the perversion of his judgement, Arjuna has made this vow without judging what is practicable and what impracticable.

18. [Surely, O Karna, the diadem-decked son of Pandu had vowed the slaughter of Jayadratha for encompassing his own destruction.

19. O son of Radha, how can Phalguna succeed in slaying the ruler of the Sindhus, before sunset, when yourself indomitable in battle, is still alive?

20. How can Dhananjaya succeed in slaying in battle Jayadratha who is protected by the king of the Madras and the illustrious Kripa himself?

21. How can Vibhatsu, who it appears is urged on by Fate, reach the Sindhu-king, who is protected by Drona's son and myself and Dussasana?

22. Numerous heroic warriors are fighting for the sake of Jayadratha, and the sun is also hanging low. O giver of honors, Partha will not be able to reach the ruler of the Sindhus in battle.

23. Now, O Karna, supported by myself, by other heroic mighty car-warriors, by Drona's son, by the king of the Madras and Kripa himself,

24. Do you fight with Pritha's son in battle, exerting to the best of your capabilities." Having been thus spoken to by your son, O sire, the son of Radha,

25—26. Replied to Duryodhana that fore-most of the Kurus in these words;—My body has been mangled with numerous net-works of arrows in the battle by the heroic Bhimasena of resolute aim and of skilful bowmanship. O bestower of honors, I now stay in battle-field, only because it is my duty to do so.

27. Afflicted with mighty shafts there is not a single limb of mine that is not suffering excruciating pain; still I shall fight to the best of my abilities. My very life is for you.

28. I shall do that by which this foremost of the Pandavas will not succeed in slaying the Sindhu-king. So long as I shall fight discharging sharp arrows,

29. The brave Dhananjaya, who can shoot weapons even with his left hand, will not be able to reach the ruler of the Sindhus. Everything that a man bearing love and devotion to you and always anxious for your welfare, ought to do for you,

30. Shall be done by me, O you of Kuru's race. As regards our victory it is under the disposal of Destiny. I shall exert myself in battle to-day to the best of my abilities, for the sake of the Sindhu king,

31. And also for accomplishing what would conduce to your good, O monarch. But, O king, victory depends upon Destiny. Relying on my prowess, I shall to-day fight with Arjuna,

32—33. For your sake, O foremost of men, but victory is dependent on Destiny. O foremost of the Kurus, let all the troops to-day witness the horripilating and fierce encounter that shall take place between myself and Pritha's son." When Karna, and the king of the Kurus were thus talking to each other on the field,

34—35. Arjuna was engaged in slaughtering your army with his sharp arrows. He then cut off with sharp Vallas the arms of unretreating heroes, arms that resembled bludgeons or trunks of elephants. That mighty-armed hero also severed many heads from the trunks of men with his arrows.

36—37. Vibhatsu also cut off the trunks of elephants, the necks of steeds, the axels of cars, and also horses, and men steeped in blood, and armed with lances, in two or three fragments with his Kshurapras. And horses and excellent elephants,

38. And standards and umbrellas and bows and chamaras and heads began to fall fast on all sides. Then consuming your troops like fire consuming a heap of dry grass,

39—40.—Partha soon made the earth deluged with blood. The mighty and indomitable son of Pritha of prowess incapable of being baffled, spreading a terrible carnage in that host of yours, soon reached the ruler of the Sindhus. Protected by Bhimasena and by Satwata, Vibhatsu,

41—42. O foremost of the Bharatas, appeared effulgent like a blazing fire. Then seeing Arjuna in that condition, all the fierce bowmen of your army, those foremost of men, possessed of the wealth of energy, could not brook him. Thereupon Duryodhana, Karna, Vrishasena, the ruler of the Madras,

43. Aswathaman, Kripa, and the ruler of the Sindhus surrounded the diadem-decked Arjuna on all sides.

44—45. Then all those combatants skilled in fighting, placing the ruler Sindhus at their back and impelled by a desire for slaying Arjuna and Krishna, dauntlessly surrounded Partha, that hero versed in all modes of warfare, who then appared to dance in the terrace of this chariot, emitting fierce sounds, with his bow-string and his palms, and resembling the Destroyer himself with mouth agape.

46. Meanwhile the sun and the heavens had assumed a crimson hue. Desirous of the speedy setting of the sun, the Kourava warriors bending their bows with arms resembling the tapering bodies of serpents,

47—48. Discharged their arrows by hundreds, towards Phalguna,—arrows, that resembled the rays of the sun. Cutting off all those shafts thus sped towards him, into two, three or eight fragments, the diadem-decked Arjuna, indomitable in battle, pierced them all (with his arrows). Then Aswathaman owning the device of a lion's tail in his banner, displaying his might,

49. Began, O monarch, to resist Arjuna. Indeed the son of the daughter of Saradwata, piercing Partha with ten shafts and Krishna with seven,

50—51. Impeded the progress of Arjuna's chariot, with a view to protect the ruler of the Sindhus. Then many foremost one among the Kurus all great car-warriors, surrounded Arjuna on all sides with a large number of chariots; stretching their bows and discharging numerous arrows,

52. They began to exert themselves for protecting the ruler of the Sindhus, at the command of your son. We then beheld the strength of the heroic Partha's arms,

53. The inexhaustibility of his shafts and the strength also of his bow Gandiva. Repulsing with his own weapons, those of Drona's son and of Kripa,

54. He pierced every one of your warriors with nine arrows. Thereupon Drona's son pierced him with twenty-five arrows and Vrishasena pierced him with seven.

55. Duryodhana pierced him with twenty, Karna with three shafts. And all of them roared at him and went on piercing him without remission.

56. Shaking their bows, they encompassed him on all sides and they also made their chariots to be drawn in a compact circle around him.

57. Desirous of the speedy setting of the sun, those mighty fighters of the Kuru host possessed of great agility, began to roar at Arjuna, and shaking their bows,

58—59. Covered him with showers of sharp arrows like clouds pouring rain over the mountain-breast; those brave warriors, having arms like heavy bludgeons, also showed on that occasion, O monarch, on Dhananjaya's body their celestials weapons. Having spread a great carnage in your army, the mighty,

60. And indomitable Dhananjaya, of prowess incapable of beinng baffled, came upon the ruler of the Sindhus. Karna however, O king, with his arrows, resisted him in that battle,

61—62. Before the very eyes, O Bharata of Bhimasena and Satwata. The mighty armed son of Pritha in the very sight of all the troops pierced the son of Suta, in return, with ten arrows, on the field of battle. Then Satwata, O sire, pierced Karna with three arrows.

63. Bhimasena pierced him with three and Partha again with seven arrows. Then Karna that mighty car-warrior pierced each of them with sixty shafts.

64. O king, then a terrible battle raged between Karna on one side and the many on the other; then, O sire, we beheld the wonderful prowess of the son of Suta,

65. In asmuchas single-handed, he succeeded in checking the three mighty warriors in battle; then the mighty armed Phalguna struck Karna on his vital limbs with a group of hundred arrows. Thereupon the puissant son of Suta, steeped all over his body with blood,

67. Pierced the heroic Phalguna in return with fifty arrows. Beholding that lightness of hands displayed by him, Arjuna did not brook him.

68. Then Pritha's son bursting his bow open, pierced him on his chariot with nine arrows of depressed knots, with great speed.

69. Then with great lightness at a time when lightness was necessary, Dhananjaya in order to slay Karna, sped at hin an arrow of the effulgence of the solar rays.

70. As that arrow was coursing with vehemance through the sky, Drona's son with a sharp crescent-shaped arrow cut it off; thus cut down it fell down, on the ground.

71. Then the highly puissant son of Suta taking up another bow, covered Pandu's son with thousands of arrows.

72. Then with his arrows, Pritha's son scattered the unrivalled shower of arrows that proceeded from Karna's bow, like the tempest scattering masses of clouds.

73. Then again Arjuna covered him with arrows, before the eyes of all warriors, displaying great lightness of hands.

74. Karna also that slayer of foes, desirous of counteracting the feats of his antagonist, covered Phalguna with thousands of arrows.

75. Roaring at each other like two bulls, those foremost of men, those two mighty car-warriors, covered the welkin with clouds of straight-going shafts.

76. Each made invisible by the other's arrowy downpour, they went on striking each other; they roared at each other and wounded each other with their sharp arrows respectively saying, I am Partha wait, or I am Karna, wait, O Phalguna. Indeed those two heroes fought with each wonderfully, displaying great skill and agility.

78. The sight they then presented was such that all the other combatants became spectators of the battle. Then praised by the Siddhas and the Charanas and the Pannagas,

79. They fought on with each other desirous of slaying each other. Then Duryodhana addressing your warriors said :—

80. "Heedfully protect the son of Radha. Without slaying Arjuna in battle, he will not abstain. Even these words had Vrisha said to me."

81—82. In the meantime, O king, beholding the prowess of Karna, Arjuna of white horses, with four shafts shot from the bow-string drawn back to the ear, despatched the four horses of Karna to the regions of Death. Then with a Valla he felled Karna's charioteer from his niche in the car.

83. Then he covered Karna himself with with a net-work of arrows, even before the very eyes of your son. Thus covered with arrows, the steedless and driverless Karna, 84—85. Confounded with arrowy showers was completely embarassed. Beholding him made carless, Aswathaman, O monarch, caused him to ride on his own chariot, and went on fighting with Arjuna. Then the king of the Madras pierced the son of Kunti with thirty arrows.

86. The son of Saradwata pierced Vasudeva with twenty arrows; he then struck Dhananjaya with twelve arrows,

87. The king of the Sindhus with four. Vrishasena with Karna, separately pierced O mighty monarch, Krishna and Pritha's son.

88. Dhananjaya, the son of Kunti then in return peirced Drona's son with sixty-four and the king of the Madras with a hundred arrows.

89. He pierced the Sindhu ruler with Vallas and Vrishasena with three arrows, and then piercing the son of Saradwata, Pritha's son uttered a loud war-cry.

90. Then your troops desirous of baffling the fulfilment of Savayasachin's vow, quickly fell upon him, all inflamed with rage.

91. Then striking terror into the hearts of the Dritarastra's troops, Arjuna invoked into existence the Varuna weapon. Then Karna riding on his precious chariot, pouring showers of arrows, proceeded against the son of Pritha.

92. But, O Bharata, as that fierce stupifying and terrible battle progressed, the diadem-decked Arjuna reaching the Sindhu king did not loose his senses and sped his arrows continuously.

93. Desirous of getting back the kingdom and keeping in mind all the wrongs inflicted by the Kurus on them during twelve years past, the high-souled Savyasachin of immeasurable prowess, shrouded all the points of the compass with shafts shot from the Gandiva.

94. The welkin then seemed to be illumined by blazing meteors; countless crows began to shoot down on the bodies of the troops. Meanwhile the diadem-decked Arjuna continued to slay the foe with his Gandiva of twany string like the wrathful Mahadeva slaying creatures with his Ajagara bow.

95. Then the highly-renowned Arjuna that subduer of hostile troops, scattering away the arrows of the son of Drona by means of those shot from his own bow, slew many foremost warriors of the Kurus, mounted on their excellent steeds and elephants.

96. Then numerous monarchs taking up heavy maces and clubs of iron and swords and darts and many other kinds of strong weapons, and assuming frightful appearances, advanced furiously upon Partha in that battle.

97. Arjuna bending his with the force of his arms, his terrible bow the Gandiva that resembled the bow of Indra, and of which the twang was as loud as roar of clouds at the end of a Yuga, went on carnaging your soldiers and adding to the population of Death's domain.

98. Then that brave warrior caused those furious warriors with their cars and elephants and foot soldiers and bowmen supporting them, to be deprived of their arms and lives, and thus considerably added to the population of Yama's kingdom.

Thus ends the one hundred and forty-fifth chapter, the fierce fight between Arjuna and Karna, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXLVI.

JAYADRATHA BADHA-PARVA.—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Hearing the twang of Dhananjaya's bow, that ressembled the loud call of Death or the sonorous rumble of the thunder,

2—3. Your troop, O monarch, agitated with fear and greatly confounded, became like the waters of the sea, with the fishes and Makaras within them, ruffled into huge waves and lashed to fury by the storm that blows at the end of a Yuga. Then the handsome son of Pritha, by name Dhananjaya began to career on the field of battle,

4—7. Displaying mighty weapons and simultaneously showing his presence in all the different directions. O mighty monarch, indeed we could not then discern when the son of Pandu took out his arrows, placed them on the bowstring, drew the string back and let them off, so great was his lightness of hands. Thereafter the mighty-armed one, excited to the highest pitch of fury, invoked into existence the terrible Indra weapon, and mighty monarch thereby inspired the Bharatas with terror. Hundreds and thousands of blazing arrows, of fiery heads and inspired with Mantras then began to start up into existence. Then with those shafts, shot from a string drawn back to the ear and resembling the rays of the sun or the flame of fire,

8. The sky became incapable of being looked at, as if covered with flashing meteors. Thereupon the darkness that the Kouravas had created with their arrows,

9. And that was incapable of being dispersed by other men even in their imagination, the son of Pandu, traversing the field and displaying his energy, dispelled by means of his arrows inspired by Mantras with the energy of celestial weapons,

10—11. Like the sun dispelling at day-break the darkness of night with his light-rays. Then with those blazing arrowy rays of his, the puissant son of Pritha sucked the lives of your warriors, like the summer sun sucking with his scorching rays the waters of tanks and lakes. Then those arrows sped by him conversant in the use of celestial weapons,

12. Covered over the hostile troops, like the rays of the sun covering over the earth. Similarly other arrows of fierce energy shot by Arjuna,

13. Entered into the hearts of heroes, as if they were their intimate friends. Those of your warriors who, boastful of their heroism then ventured to encounter Arjuna,

14. Were destroyed like so many insects falling upon a blazing lamp flame. Thus crushing the lives and fame of his enemies,

15. Pritha's son careered on the field like Death incarnate. Heads decked with diadems, huge arms adorned with Angadas,

16. And ears graced with pairs of ear-rings, of his enemies, Pritha's son cut off with his shafts. The arms of elephant-riders, with Tomaras; those of horsemen, with Prasas;

17. Those of foot-soldiers with shields; those of car-warriors with bows; and those of drivers, with whips and hooks, the son of Pandu then cut off.

18. Dhananjaya then shone resplendent with his arrows of glittering tips that seemed to constitute his rays, like a blazing fire with incessant scintillations and raging flames.

18—21. The hostile kings then inspite of all their endeavours, could not even secure a sight of the handsome Dhananjaya, that foremost of all weilders of weapons, that hero equal to the king of the celestials, that best of men, seen at the same time in all directions on his chariot, shooting his terrible weapons, dancing in the terrace of his car, and producing deafening sounds with his bow-string and palms, and resembling the mid-day sun of burning rays in the heavens.

22. The diadem-decked Arjuna, armed with arrows of glittering tips shone resplendent like a mighty mass of cloud swelling with rain and bearing the rainbow on its bosom.

23. Then when that veritable flood of mighty weapons was created by Jishnu, many foremost warriors sank in that dreadful and uncrossable sea of weapons.

24. Strewn over with mangled faces and bodies and limbs, with lacerated arms, with arms deprived of palms and palms deprived of fingers,

25. With infuriate elephants having trunks and tusks severed and broken respectively, with horses deprived of riders and necks; with shattered chariots,

26. With bodies having entrails drawn out, legs cut off and severed remaining still or moving unconsciously and with hundreds and thousands of corpses and carcasses,

27. The field where Partha fought was seen by us to resemble an area ravaged by Death, and to enhance, O ruler of men, the fears of the cowards.

28. Or it then appeared like the sporting ground of Rudra where he slew creatures in days gone by. Portions of the field covered over with trunks of elephants, severed by Kshurapras, appeared as if covered by snakes.

29. Portions again strewn over with the heads of warriors graced with lotus-like countenances, looked as if covered with garlands of flower. With beautiful headgears and crowns, with Keyuras, Angadas and Kundalas,

30. With armours decked with gold, with the caparisons and trappings of elephants and horses, and with hundreds of diadems, —strewn all over with these things,

31. The earth, highly beautified, appeared like a newly married bride. Having the marrow and fat (of slain creatures) for its mire, having blood for its current,

32. Full of limbs and bones and fathomless in depth, having the hair of creatures for its moss and weeds, and heads and arms for stones on its shore ;

33. Decked with variegated standards and banners ; having umbrellas and bows for its huge waves ; stagnant with the huge carcasses of elephants ;

34. Having innumerable cars for rafts to cross it ; infested with the dead bodies of horses ; rendered unfordable with car wheels, yokes, axels and Kuvaras ;

35. Infested with snakes constituted by by lances, darts, axes, and arrows ; having crows, and Kankas for its sharks, and jackals for its Makaras,

36. And vultures for its fierce aquatic animals ; echoing with the yells of jackals ; infested with daneing ghosts and Pisachas and Pretas, thonsands in number,

37. Carrying away many, corpses of slain warriors, highly dreadful,and fierce and awful, and resembling the Vaitarani itself—

38. Such a river capable of striking terror into the hearts of the cowards, was then caused to flow on the field of battle. Then beholding the prowess of Arjuna, whose appearance then resembled that of the Destroyer,

39. A panic, such as had never occoured before, prevailed among the Kuru ranks. Thereupon the son of Pandu, receiving the weapons of heroes, with those of his own,

40. And achieving wonderful feats, proclaimed h' self to be a warrior of terrible deeds. Then, O king, Arjuna passed leaving all those foremost car-warriors of your army behind.

41. Then all the creatures were unable to look at Pandu's son, who then resembled the sun shining on the meridian.

42. Arrows shooting out of the Gandiva bow of that illustrious hero, were then seen by us to resemble rows of cranes ranging through the firmament.

43. Repulsing everywhere the weapons of heroes with those of his own, and displaying his fierce feats, Arjuna then continued to acheive terrible deeds.

44. Then impelled by the desire for killing Jayadratha, O king, Arjuna passed throuh the car-division, compounding your warriors with his Narachas.

45. Then the handsome Dhananjaya having Krishna for his charioteer, began quickly to career on the field, shooting his shafts in all directions.

46. Then hundreds and thousands of shafts shot by the heroic Arjuna of illustrious soul, appeared in the sky, flying in all directions and incessantly.

47. We then could not discern when that mighty bowmen, that son of Pandu begotten upon Kunti, took out his shafts, placed them on the bow-string, and let them off.

48. Thereafter, O king, covering all the points of the compass with his arrows, and afflicting all the car-warriors in battle, the son of Kunti dashed towards Jayadratha,

49. And pierced him with four and sixty straight-going shafts. The Kuru warriors then seeing Pandu's son rush upon Jayadratha,

50. Gave up fighting, becoming hopeless of Jayadratha's life. Whoever amongst your troops then rushed to encounter the son of Pandu in that battle,

51—53. Had his body pierced deep with the latter's arrows. Then the mighty car-warrior Arjuna, that foremost of victorious heroes made your ranks headless by means of his arrows resembling the flames of fire. Thus then, O foremost of kings, sorely afflicting your troops consisting of four kinds of forces,the son of Kunti rushed upon Jayadratha. He then pierced Drona's son with five hundred, and Vrishasena with three arrows ;

54. Compassionate as the son of Kunti was, he pierced Kripa with nine arrows. He pierced Salya with sixteen and Karna with thirty two arrows.

55. Then piercing the ruler of the Sindhus with sixty-four arrows, he uttered a roar like that of the lion. Then the ruler of the Sindhus, being pierced with the arrows shot from the bow of the weilder of the Gandiva,

56—57. And excited to the highest pitch of fury, did not to brook it, even like an elephant struck with the goad. Then that one bearing the boar as a device on his standard quickly shot at the car of Phalguna straight-flying arrows furnished with vulturine feathers, rubbed by the smith, and looking like so many enraged snakes, and hurled from a string dawn back to the very ears.

58. He then pierced Govinda with three Narachas, Arjuna with six, their horses with eight and their standard with one winged shaft.

59—60. Thereupon Arjuna, repulsing the sharp shafts shot by the ruler of the Sindhus, cut off at the same time, with a couple of arrows, the head of Jayadratha's driver and his well-decked standard. Its stay cut off and itself shattered and struck with arrows, that boars bearing standard of the Sindhu king fell down like a flash of fire. Meanwhile the sun was rapidly going towards the western hills.

62. Janarddana quickly addressing Pandu's son said :—"O son of Pritha, this Jayadratha has been placed in their midst by these heroic and mighty car-warriors.

63. O mighty-armed one, Jayadratha desirous of saving his life, is standing in the rear in their midst. O foremost of men, without vanquishing in battle these six mighty car-warriors,

64. You shall not be able to slay the ruler of the Sindhus, even if you exert yourself to the best of your power, O Arjnna. Now I shall put forth my Yoga prowess for covering over the Sun,

65. In consequence of which the ruler of the Sindhus only shall behold the sun as already set. Filled with delight and sanguine of his life and desirous of seeing your destruction,

66. That wicked creature will no longer conceal himself. Taking advantage of that opportunity you should, O foremost of the Kurus, strike him.

67. You should not then give up the entreprise thinking the sun to have already set." Then Vibhatsu replied to Kesava saying "let it be so."

68. Thereafter that lord of the kings viz Krishna created a veil of darkness for covering the sun, by means of his Yoga prowess.

66. When Krishna had created that veil of darkness, thinking the sun to have set, your troops became delighted, O king, in view of the destruction of Pritha's son Arjuna.

70. Highly delighted, O king, your troops and king Jayadratha could not see the sun though they all stood with their heads thrown back.

71. When the ruler of the Sindhus was beholding the setting sun, once more did Krishna spoke these words to Arjuna.

72. "Behold, O foremost of the Bharatas, the heroic ruler of the Sindhus looking at the sun, freed from the fear he entertained of you.

73. O mighty-armed one this is the opportune moment to slay the wicked-souled wight. Now quickly lop off the head of this fellow and fulfil your vow."

74. Thus spoken to by Kesava the puissant son of Pandu, began to carnage your troops with arrows resembling the rays of the sun or the flame of fire.

75. He pierced Kripa with twenty and Karna with fifty shafts ; he then wounded Salya and Duryodhana each with six shafts.

76. He pierced Vrishasena with eight and the ruler of the Sindhus with sixty shafts. The mighty-armed son of Pandu,

77. Piercing your troops with his arrows, O king, assailed Jayadratha. Then beholding him within measurable distance like a swelling tongue of fire,

78. The protectors of Jayadratha became highly anxious (about his life). Then O mighty monarch, all your warriors desirous of victory,

79—81. Began to pour their arrowy showers on Pakasasani in that battle. Then that delight of the Kurus (Arjuna) was covered over. Thereafter, that foremost of men, Pakasasani began to shoot terrible net-works of arrows with a view to slaughter your troops. Then those warriors of yours mangled by that hero in battle,

82. Were greatly frightened and they abandoned the ruler of the Sindhus. They were so much confused that no two persons were seen to fly together. Then we beheld the wonderfnl prowess of Kunti's son,

83. Inasmuch as that high-souled warrior then achieved feats whose equals had never before been achieved or will be achieved in future. Elephants and elephant-riders, and horses and horsemen,

84. And car-drivers,—these then Arjuna began to slaughter like Rudra slaying the creatures. I could not find in that battle, O king,

85. A single elephant, or horse or men that was not struck with the arrows of Partha. The vision of warriors were blinded with dust and darkness.

86. They were dreadfully confused and could not recognise one another. Your troops urged on by fate, having their vitals torn open by arrows,

87. Began to wander, or limp or fall down. Some became paralysed and some became pale. During that terrible carnage of creatures,

88—89. In that awful and fierce battle from which few escaped alive, the earth became deluged with blood, and the dust that had then arisen disappeared inconsequence of the showers of blood, and the gale that blew over the field of battle ; so great was the shower of blood that car wheel sank in the mire caused thereby up to their naves.

90. Thousands of mad elephants possessed of great energy, O king, of your army, their riders slain and limbs mangled,

91. Began to fly away uttering shrieks of pain, and crushing their own ranks under neath their feat. Riderless steeds, and foot-soldiers also, O monarch,

92—93. Fled away in fright, struck with the arrows of Dhananjaya. Indeed your troop with dishevelled hairs and shattered armours, with blood streaming out of their wounds, fled away from the from the field of battle, forsaking it out of fear. Some again deprived of the power of moving, remained there as if their lower limbs had been seized by alligators.

94. Some hid themselves behind and under the carcarses of slain elephants. Thus causing your troop to fly, O monarch, Dhananjaya

5—97. Began to wound with dreadful shafts the protectors of the Sindhu ruler. The son of Pandu then covered with his arrowy showers Karna, Drona's son, Kripa, Salya, Vrishasena, and Duryodhana. Arjuna was so quick in the the use of weapons that none was able to notice when he took out his arrows, fixed them on the bow-string, and stretched the bow and discharged them. Thus when he was engaged in wounding the foe, his bow was seen incessantly drawn to a circle. Thousands of shafts were seen to issue out from his bow and to scatter in all directions. Then severing off Karna's and Vrishasena's bow,

99—100. Arjuna with a broad-headed arrow felled Salya's charioteer from his niche on the car. Then that foremost of victorious heroes viz Dhananjaya, pierced with many arrows in that battle Kripa and Aswathaman, related to each other as uncle and nephew. Thus sorely afflicting the mighty car-warriors of your army,

101. Pandu's son took up a terrible shaft of the splendour of fire. Appearing like the thunderbolt of Indra and inspired with sacred Mantras,

102. That dreadful arrow became capable of bearing any strain. It used always to be worshipped with perfumes and garlands of flowers. Duly charging it with the impetuousity of the thunderbolt, that descendant of Kuru,

103. Namely the mighty-armed Arjuna, placed it on the Gandiva's string. When that shaft of fiery effulgence was fixed on the bow string,

104. Loud shouts were heard, O king, in the welkin. Then Janardana once more quickly addressing Arjuna said :—

105. "O Dhananjaya quickly cut off the head of the wicked-souled ruler of the Sindhus. The sun is on the point of going to the Western hills.

106. Listen however to the words that I am going to speak about the slaughter of Jayadratha. The father of Jayadratha is Vridhakshatra known all over the world.

107—109. It was after a long time that he got Jayadratha that slayer of enemies, for his son ; on the occasion of his son's birth, a disembodied and unseen voice, deep as the rumble of clouds or the beat of the drums,said unto king Vridhakshatra :—'This your son, O master among men, in this world, will become worthy of the two races (the solar and the lunar) in respect of lineage, conduct, self-possession and such other attributes. He will become one of the foremost of Kshatriyas and will always obtain adoration from the heroes.

110. But while struggling in battle, some one foremost among the Kshatriyas, some well-known person in the world, worked up with anger, will cut off his head.'

111. That subduer of foes,viz the old ruler of the Sindhus having heard these words became thoughtful for a while ; filled with affection for his son, he summoned all his kinsmen and told them so.

112. 'That man who will cause the head of my sons to fall on the earth, struggling in battle, will be bearing a great burden.

113. I say that the head of that man will crack into a hundred pieces.' Having spoken these words, and having installed Jayadratha on the throne,

114. Vridhakshatra, retired into the woods, and devoted himself to ascetic austerities. Possessed of great energy, he is still engaged in the observance of the austerest of penances,

115. Outside the precincts of the Samantapanchaka, O ape-bonoured one. Therefore, severing Jayadratha's head in this terrible fight, you

116—117. O slayer of foes, should, O Bharata, by your fierce heaven-made weapons capable of achieving great feats, quickly throw that head adorned with ear-ring upon the lap of Vridhakshatra himself, O younger brother of the son of the wind-god. If you cause Jayadratha's head to fall on the earth,

118—20. Then your own head will certainly crack into hundred pieces. By me an of your weapons of celestial make do you accomplish your vow in such a way, that that ruler of earth, viz, the old Sindhu king, may not know that it is done. O Arjuna, indeed their is nothing which you cannot achieve or perform, O son of Vasava." Having heard these words of Krishna, Dhananjaya licking the corners of his mouth,

121—123. Shot the shaft he had taken up for slaughtering Jayadratha,—shaft whose touch resembled that of Indra's thunder, which was inspired with Mantras, which was of celestial make, which was capable of bearing any strain and which had ever been worshipped with perfumes and garlands. That swift-coursing arrow shot from the Gandiva bow, snatched away the head of the ruler of the Sindhus like a hawk snatching away a little bird from the top of a tree. Dhananjaya then discharging other arrows carried that head along in the heavens.

124—125. Then that son of Pandu imparting delight to his friends and grief to his foes, carried that head beyond the precincts of the Samantapanchaka by means of his continuous groups of arrows. Meanwhile king Vridhakshatra,

126—128. The father of your son-in-law, possessed of great energy, was engaged in performing his evening Sandhya. Adorned with sable locks, and graced with ear-rings, that head of Jayadratha was thrown upon his lap as he was uttering his prayers in a sitting posture. O subduer of foes, thus thrown in his lap, that head graced with beautiful ear-rings was not perceived by king Vridhakshatra, so when the intelligent Vridhakshatra, having finished his evening prayers,

129. Was rising up, the head fell down on the earth. And as the head of that king's son fell down on earth,

130. The head of that king also was cracked into thousand pieces, O subduer of foes. Then all creatures were greatly filled with wonder;

131. They then highly applauded Vasudeva and the mighty son of Pritha. Thus O king, when the king of the Sindhus was slain by the diadem-decked Arjuna,

132. The darkness that Vasudevas's son had caused was withdrawn, O foremost of the Bharatas. O ruler of earth, thus your sons and their followers, afterwards came to know that

133. That veil of darkness was only an illusion caused by Vasudeva's son, O foremost of men. Thus, O king, was your son-in-law, the ruler of the Sindhus slain by Arjuna of infinite energy, having caused the slaughter of eight Akshouhini of troops. Then beholding Jayadratha the ruler of the Sindhus's slain,

135. Tears of sorrow gushed out from the eyes of your sons. Thereafter, O king, when Jayadratha had been slain by Pritha's son, Kesava

136. Blew his conch, as also the mighty Arjuna that afflicter of his foes. Bhimasena also, as if for informing Yudhisthira of that joyful news,

137. Filled the welkin with a mighty war-cry. Hearing that formidable war-cry, the very virtuous king Yudhisthira,

138. Considered the ruler of the Sindhus to be slain by the high-souled Phalguna. Then he imparted delight to his own warriors by means of the sound of his musical instruments.

139. He then rushed furiously against the son of Bharadwaja for slaying him. Then, O king, as the sun was hanging down the horizon,

140. A fierce battle between Drona and the Somakas commenced, capable making the hair to stand erect. Then putting forth all their energies for slaughtering the son of Bharadwaja,

141. The mighty car-warriors of the Pandavas fought on, O king, delighted at the slaughter of the Sindhu king. The Pandavas then obtaining victory and having slain the ruler of the Sindhus,

142. Fought on with Drona litterally intoxicated with their good luck. O king, having slain the ruler of the Sindhus, Arjuna also (cheerfully) fought on with those foremost of your car-warriors.

143. Then the heroic Arjuna decked with a diadem and garlands, having fulfilled his principal vow, began to slaughter your troops, even like the king of the celestials destroying the darkness of night.

Thus ends the one hundred and forty-sixth chapter, the slaughter of Jayadratha, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXLVII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA [PARVA)—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. The heroic king of Sindhu being killed by that one who could draw the bow with his left hand (i e Arjuna), relate to me O Sanjaya, what the warriors on my side did—

Sanjaya said :—

2. O king, seeing the king of Sindhu slain in battle by Partha, Kripa, the son of Saradwat, waxing wrath,

3. Surrounded the son of Pandu by a mighty discharge of arrows. The son of Drona too, seated on his car, rushed against Phalguna the son of Pritha.

4. Those two best and most excellent of car-warriors from two sides, began to shower keen darts, from their cars (upon Arjuna).

5. That mighty-armed one, the best of car-warriors, sore oppressed by those mighty showers of arrows, experienced a great pain.

6. Dhananjaya, the son of Kunti, not liking to slay his preceptor (i.e. Kripa) and his (other) preceptor's son (i.e. Aswathama) in battle began to act like a preceptor (teaching the science of arms to his pupil),

7. And unwillingly warded off the weapons of the sons of Drona and Saradwat, by means of his own weapons and discharged at them arrows of milder speed.

8. Overcome by the numbers of arrows though discharged mildly by Arjuna, those two (warriors) were greatly afflicted.

9. Then, O monarch, the son of Saradwat, pained by the darts of the son of Kunti, lost all strength and fainted away on the terrace of his car.

10. Seeing his master afflicted with darts and devoid of senses, and taking him for dead his charioteer carried him off (from the field of battle).

11. Then, O great king, Kripa being thus borne away from (the field of battle), Aswathama too fled away in terror from the son of Pandu.

12. (Then), seeing the son of Saradwat faint away and afflicted with arrows, the mighty bowman Partha, (seated) on his car, gave way to doleful cries.

13. And with his face full of tears and in dejected spirit he said these words:— "Anticipating all this, the greatly wise Kshatta (Vidura) said to the king (Dhritarashtra)

14. As soon as the destroyer of his race, the vile Suyodhana was born, 'Make away with this destroyer of your race.

15. (Or), through him a great disaster will befall the best of the Kuru race.' Now the words of that truthful one have proved true.

16. It is on his account, that I behold to-day my preceptor lying on an arrowy bed. Curse on the practices of the Kshatryas and on my strength and manliness!

17. (For) is there any body, who is, like me, hostile to a Brahmana who is his preceptor as well? He is (moreover) the son of a sage, my preceptor and the dear friend of Drona.

18. Such a one lies (insensible) on the terrace of his car smitten with my darts. Although I did not wish it, (still), through me he has been crushed with the arrows.

19. (The sight of his) lying insensible on the terrace of his car greatly afflicts my heart. Though sorely afflicted with his arrows, I should have looked at that one of great splendour (without striking him).

20. Afflicted with various darts he has gone to the way of all creatures. I grieve more over this than on the slaughter of my son.

21. O Krishna, behold what a sad plight he is in, lying senseless on his car! Those most excellent of men, who after acquiring knowledge from their preceptors,

22. Bestow on them what they desire, attain to Godhead. (But) those basest of men who after acquiring knowledge from their preceptors.

23. Destroy them, are doomed to hell. Surely, what I have done to-day will lead me to hell,

24. In as much as I have overpowered my preceptor with showers of arrows. Formerly when teaching me the science of weapons, Kripa said to me,

25. "O scion of Kuru's race, on no account strike thy preceptor." (But, those words of my virtuous and high-souled preceptor,

26. I have disregarded and have struck him with showers of arrows. I bow down to that worshipful son of Goutama, who never flies away (from the field of battle).

27. O scion of Vrishni's race, fie on me who have struck him. While that one who could draw his bow as well with the left hand (i. e. Arjuna) was thus grieving for him,

28. The son of Radha beholding the king of Sindhu dead rushed against him. (Seeing) the son of Radha make for the car of Arjuna,

29. The two Panchala princes and Satyaki came up to him. Seeing the son of Radha rush (against him), the mighty car-warrior Partha, 30, Said these words to the son of Devaki with a smile :—"(Behold !) the son of Adhiratha is making for the car of Satyaki.

31. Surely, he cannot endure the destruction of Bhurisrava in battle. O Janardana, drive the horses towards the place whither he goes.

32. Have a care that Vrisha can not send the Satwata hero to the path of Somadatta." Thus addressed by that one who could draw his bow as well with the left hand, Keshava, possessed of mighty arms,

33. And great energy, replied (to him) in words suited to the occasion "O Pandava, this mighty armed one (Satyaki) is alone capable of fighting with Karna.

34. (And), much more so, since this most exalted of the Satwattas is joined by the two sons of Drupada. O Partha, you need (therefore, not fight with Karna at present.

35. He has with him the blazing dart, like a terrible meteor, granted to him by Vasava. O destroyer of hostile warriors, he has preserved it (carefully) for (slaying) you and worships it.

36. Let, therefore, Karna march against the scion of Satwatta's race as he wills. I am, O son of Kunti, conscious of the hour when this wicked-souled one will be struck down on the ground from his car (pierced) by keen darts.

Dhritarashtra said :—

37. How, after Bhurisrava and the king of Sindhu being slain, the heroic Karna and the scion of Vrishni's race, came in-contact with each other,

38. And on what cars the carless Satyaki and the two Panchala princes, the protectors of (Arjuna's) car-wheels (respectively) mounted, relate to me, O Sanjaya.

Sanjaya said :—

39. I will relate to you faithfully all that took place in that terrible encounter. Listen calmly to (the consequences of) your own culpable conduct.

40. My Lord, Krishna knew it before hand, in his mind that the heroic Satyaki would be defeated by Yupaketu (i.e. Bhurisrava).

41—42. O king, Janardana is conversant with the past and the future alike. Therefore, O king, that highly-powerful one summoned Daruka and ordered him thus :—" Get my car ready to-morrow." Neither the Gods nor the Gandharvas nor the Yakshas, nor the Uragas, nor the Rakshas,

43—44. Nor men can conquer Krishna and Arjuna. Even the celestials with the (original) Grandsire (Brahma) at their head and the Siddhas are aware of the matchless strength of those two. Now hear about the battle as it took place. Seeing Satyaki without a car and Karna prepared for the encounter,

45. Madhava loudly blew his conch in the Rishava note. Hearing the loud sound of the conch, Daruka understood the hint,

46—48. And brought to him the car adorned with a lofty golden flag with Keshava's permission. The grandson of Sini ascended that car guided by Daruka and resembling in splendour the sun or the fire. (And) mounting on that car, resembling a celestial chariot yoked unto which were the foremost of horses, viz., Savya, Sugriva, Meghapuspa and Balahaka endued with great fleetness and adorned with golden trappings,

49. (Satyaki) discharging numerous arrows, rushed upon the son of Radha. Then Yudhamanwu and Uttamonja, the protectors of Arjuna's car-wheels,

50. Leaving the car of Dhananjaya, advanced against the son of Radha. (There upon) O monarch, the son of Radha too, began to discharge showers of arrows,

51. And wrathfully rushed against the undeteriorating grandson of Sini in that encounter. Neither among the celestials, the Gandharvas, the Asuras, the Uragas, nor among the Rakshas,

52. Was such a battle seen or heard in heaven or on earth as took place (between Karna and Satyaki.) The entire army consisting of cars, horses, men, and elephants,

53. Beholding their exploits, O monarch lay (as if) entranced. All of them witnessed that superhuman battle

54. Between those two best of men and the dexterity of Daruka as a charioteer. And the forward, backward, sidelong and circular movements (of the car)

55. Caused by the charioteer Daruka

the scion of Kasyapa's race, stationed on the car, struck (everybody) with wonder. The celestials, the Gandharvas and the Danavas stationed in the firmament,

56. Witnessed with rapt attention that encounter between Karna and the grandson of Sini. And for the sake of their friends those two powerful and highly-energetic ones challenged each other in that battle.

57. O mighty monarch, Karna who resembled a god and Yuyudhan Satyaki showered upon each other volleys of arrows.

58. First Karna, unable to endure the destruction of Jalasandha of the Kuru party, overpowered the grandson of Sini with downpours of shafts.

59. And heaving sighs like a mighty serpent smitten with grief and darting wrathful glances upon the grandson of Sini as if to consume him (therewith) in that encounter, Karna,

60. Rushed furiously again and again (towards him.) O chastiser of foes, seeing him greatly enraged, Satyaki smote him,

61—63. With mighty discharges of arrows as an elephant smites (with his tusks) his rival elephant. Those two most valiant of mortals, as agile as tigers, and endued with matchless strength wounded each other in that battle. Then the grandson of Sini by means of shafts made entirely of iron, pierced Karna, the chastiser of his foes, all through his body over and over again and with a broad headed arrow smote his (Karna's) charioteer from his niche in the car.

64. (And he) killed the white steeds with sharpened darts. (Then) that most exalted of the Bharatas, cutting the standard (of Karna) into a hundred pieces,

65. Made him carless in the very presence of your son. Thereupon, O king, O most exalted of the Bharatas, the warriors on your side got dispirited.

66. (Then) Vrisasena, the son of Karna and Salya, the king of Madra, and the son of Drona surrounded the grandson of Sini on all sides.

67. Then such a confusion followed (on the battlefield) that nothing could be seen. The heroic son of charioteer being thus made carless by Satyaki,

68. The whole army set up a wail, O king. And Karna too, O monarch, greatly weakened by Satwatta's darts,

69. Got to the car of Duryodhana, heaving deep sighs, remembering his friendship, O king, with your son from his very childhood,

70—71. And striving to fulfil the promise that he had made on the occasion of the bestowal of the kingdom (of Anga) on him (by Duryodhana). But O lord of the earth, the self-restrained Satyaki did not slay Karna thus made carless (by him) and your valiant son with Duswasana at their head. Desirous of not falsifying the vow made by Bhima and Partha formerly,

72. He (simply) made them carless and destitute of energy, but did not deprive them of their lives. Bhimasena vowed to slay your sons,

73. And at the second game of dice Partha swore to do away with Karna. Though the car-warriors with Karna at their head tried (their utmost) to slay,

74. Satyaki, yet those foremost of car-warriors were unable to kill him. The son of Drona, Kritavarma, and other great car-warriors,

75. And hundreds of the foremost of the Kshatriyas were defeated with only one bow by Satyaki, who was desirous of doing good to Dharmaraja and of attaining heaven.

76. Satyaki, the grinder of his foes, equal in prowess to either Krishna or Arjuna, defeated all your troops with a smile (i. e., very easily).

77. (To achieve such feats) there is no fourth to be seen, besides Krishna, the bowman Partha and that most exalted of men, the grandson of Sini.

Dhritarastra said :—

78—79. Mounting on the invincible car of Vasudeva, guided by Daruka, Satyaki, proud of the prowess of his arms and equal to Vasudeva in battle, made Karna carless. Did Satyaki ascend any other car (after the defeat of Karna) ?

80. I am desirous of listening to all this. You are a skilful narratar. I regard him invincible. O Sanjaya, relate to me this.

Sanjaya said :—

81—83. O king, listen to all this. The high-minded younger brother of Daruka soon brought (for Satyaki) another car duly furnished with all necessaries, having shafts attached to it by golden and iron chains and bands of silk, studded with a thousand stars, graced with a standard having the figure of a lion (painted on it) and to which were yoked horses fleet as the wind adorned with golden trappings, and the rattling of which resembled the roar of the clouds.

84. The grandson of Sini, having mounted on it, advanced against your forces. And Daruka also, of his own will, went over to Keshava.

85—87. Then, O great monarch, a goodly car was also brought for Karna, drawn by fleet horses of the best breed, having the colour of the milk of the cow or conch and adorned with golden trappings. (The car was also) furnished with golden maces and standards, machines and flags. It had also an expert driver and was furnished with many weapons and accoutrements. Having, O great king, mounted on this car, Karna too rushed upon his enemies. Now I have related to you all that you asked me.

88. Listen again to the (great) destruction (of creatures) brought about by your vile policy. Thirty-one of your sons have been destroyed by Bhimasena.

89. They had Durmukha at their head and they were good warriors. Satwatta and Arjuna also destroyed hundreds of warriors,

90. With Bhima at their head and Bhagadatta too (has been slain). This great destruction of creatures O king, has been brought about by your evil counsels.

Thus ends the 143th chapter, the battle between Karna and Satyaki, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. When the warriors on their side and mine remained thus on the field of) battle, what did Bhima do? Tell me, this O Sanjaya.

Sanjaya said :—

2. When Bhimasena was made carless by Karna, he was tormented with the words poignant as a dart, of the latter. Now under the influence of passion he said these words to Phalguna.

3—4. "O Dhananjaya, in your very presence, Karna has repeatedly said to me—(you are) a eunuch, fool, child, glutton, (you are) unskilled in weapons, do not fight and (you are) unable to endure (the fury of) battle. He, that would tell me so, would be my victim. O Bharata, he (Karna) has said to me these words (and therefore, he must be slain by me.)

5. I have made this vow jointly with you, O mighty armed one. O son of Kunti undoubtedly, as they (these vows) are to you so they are to me.

6. Remember, O best of men, my words and fulfil them (i.e., the vows). O Dhananjaya, act in such a way that they may prove true."

7. Thus addressed by Bhima, Arjuna of matchless prowess, coming up to Karna in that battle, said to him (thus) :

8. "O Karna, O son of a chrioteer, you are of false sight, you praise your own-self, you are of wicked intelligence. Hear what I tell you now.

9. Warriors either meet with victory or defeat in battle. O son of Radha, even these two are uncertain. Even when Vasava himself fights, the case is not otherwise.

10. You were (ere long) made carless and deprived of energy by Yujudhana and were nearly dead. Knowing, however, that I have sworn to slay you he only defeated but spared your life.

11. By freak of fate, you succeeded in making Bhimasena carless. (And) you have committed a sin by abusing Bhima, O son of Radha.

12. Men, that are heroic, virtuous, and most exalted, having defeated an enemy, neither boast of themselves with harsh words, nor indulge in abusive language.

13—14. O son of a charioteer, weak in intellect as you are, you have made use of these words. Again, the (abusive) epithets that you have hurled against the fighting Bhimasena, endued with prowess, heroic, and ever devoted to righteousness, are not true. In the very sight of the whole army of Keshava and myself,

15. You were several times, in battle, deprived of your car by Bhimasena. But the son of Pandu did never utter any harsh words to you.

16. As you have indulged in many harsh words against Vrikodara and as you have jointly with others, killed the son of Subhadra, when I was not present,

17. You will, therefore, very soon feel the consequences of your offence. O wicked minded one, it was for your own destruction that you cut off his bow.

18. It is for this reason, O fool, that I will slay you together with your attendants, forces and beast of burden. Now (while yet there is time) perform what you ought to do, because a great calamity is hanging over you.

19—21. I swear truly by my bow that I will slay, in your very sight, Vrishasena and will destroy all those other kings, who through cloudness of intellect will oppose me in battle. Fool, unwise and self-conceited that you are, the wicked Duryodhana will give way to lamentations seeing you slain on the field of battle. Arjuna having promised to kill the son of Karna,

22. There arose a great and tumultuous uproar among the car-warriors. And at the time of that dreadful battle,

23. The thousand-rayed (deity) with his rays dimmed entered into the setting hill. Then stationed at the head of the battle, O king, Hrishikesa

24. Embraced Vivatsu, who had fulfilled his promise, and addressed him thus :—"O Jhisnu, it is by good fortune that you have been able to accomplish your great vow.

25. It is by good luck, again that you have slain the wretch Vridhakshatra together with his son. O Bharata, even the general of the celestials, if engaged with the forces of Dhritarastra,

26. In battle, would be quite stupified. O Jishnu, there is no doubt of this. Even on reflection, I do not find any individual in the (three) worlds,

27—28. Capable of encountering these forces, besides you, O most valiant of men. Numerous lords of the earth, endowed with great prowess, and either equal or superior to you, have, at the command of Dhritarastra assembled together. (But) those (warriors), clad in armour, could not withstand your wrathful self in battle.

29. Your strength and prowess, (therefore), resemble those of Rudra or Sakra. No one is capable of displaying so much prowess in battle,

30. As you have singly shown this day. O tormentor of foes, when the wicked-souled Karna together with his followers shall be vanquished (by you) I will thus

31. Congratulate you again on your conquest over and destruction of your enemy." Arjuna then replied to him (thus): "O Madhava, through your favour,

32. I have fulfilled the vow, which even by the celestials can with difficulty be performed. O Keshava, it is no wonder that they, who have you for their lord, will win the victory.

33. Through your favour Yudhisthira will recover the entire earth. O descendant of Vrishnis, (as) all this is due to your power, (so) O lord, this victory is yours.

34. O destroyer of Madhu, you are (ever) concerned in our welfare and we are (always) at your service." Thus spoken to Krishna with a smile, slowly guided the steeds and showed to Partha the greatly cruel field of battle.

Krishna said :—

35. Longing for either victory or great renown, (many) heroic kings, struck dead by your shafts, are lying on earth.

36. Their weapons and ornaments lie scattered (all over the battle-field) ; their horses, elephants and cars are killed and shattered ; and with their armours perforated and cut off they are reduced to a woeful plight.

37. Some (of them) are already dead and some are still alive ; and those lords of men whose life is extinct look alive on account of their great splendour.

38. Look! the earth is entirely filled with their gold-winged shafts, their weapons of various kinds, their beasts of burden and with their arms.

39—40. (Behold! O Bharata, the earth beams with armours, necklaces of gold, heads decked with ear-rings, head-gears and diadems, floral wreaths, gems worn on the crown, Kanthasutras, Angadas, lustrous collars of gold and with various other variegated ornaments ;

41. (And with) Anukarshas and quivers, standards and flags, and Upaskaras and Adhisthanas, shafts and crests of cars,

42. With broken wheels and many variegated cars, yokes and trappings of horses, bows and arrows,

43. With elephants' trappings, Kudhas, Parighas and Ankushas, maces and Brindipalas, arrow-cases, spiked maces and Parasvadhas,

44. With Pashas and Tomaras, Kuntas and clubs, Sataghnees and Bhusandees, swords and battle-axes,

45. With Musalas and clubs, maces and Kunapas, whips decked with gold, O the most exalted of the Bharatas,

46. With the bells and many other ornaments of the best of elephants, garlands, various ornaments and costly dresses.

47. (With all these lying scattered all over the field of battle), the earth looks resplendent like the autumnal sky studded with planets and stars. Those lords of Earth who have sacrificed their lives for his sake,

48. Lie slumbering on the earth and embracing her like a beloved wife. These elephants resembling mountain-peaks and huge as Airavat,

49. Are shedding a profusion of blood through the openings caused by weapons, as mountains discharge through the caves streams of liquid chalk.

50. Behold! struck down on the earth by your arrows, these (elephants) are writhing in agonies. Behold! the steeds also, adorned with golden trappings, are lying on the ground.

51—52. Behold, O Partha, O lord, these cars resembling the city of the Gandharvas, with their lords slain and their standards, banners and Akshas cut to pieces, deprived of their wheels and charioteers, with their yokes cut to pieces, with broken shafts and crests and looking (splendid) like the celestial vehicles.

53. Hundreds and thousands of foot-soldiers, O hero, are lying slain (on the ground) in a pool of blood weilding their bows and sheilds,

54. Clasping the earth with all their limbs, and with their hair smeared with dust. Behold, O mighty-armed one, these warriors with their bodies mangled by your arrows.

55—56. Look also at the Earth—scattered all over with tails, fans, umbrellas, standards, steeds, cars, elephants, various sorts of blankets, riens of steeds, variegated robes and precious Kuthas of cars—as if overspread with embroidered tapestry.

57. Falling down (on the grouud) from elephants adorned with trappings, along with the elephant themselves, many other (warriors) are looking like lions hurled down from mountain-peaks struck down by thunder.

58. Many horse-men and foot-soldiers mangled with the horses (they rode) and bows (they weilded) lie covered with blood.

59. O best of men, behold also the surface of the earth with dead elephants and horses and (broken) cars, muddy with a profusion of blood, fat and rotten flesh, affording delight to night-wanderers, dogs, wolves and Pisachas and dreadful to look at.

60. O lord, that foremost of the celestials, the performer of a hundred sacrifices who slays in great battle the Daytas and the Danavas, and yourself only are capable of achieving such a fame-enhancing and glorious feat.

Sanjaya said:—

61. Krishna, thus showing the field of battle to Kiriti (i.e. Arjuna who wore a coronet) blew his conch Panchajanya before the gladdened army (of tha Pandavas).

62. Janardana, the destroyer of foes, having (thus) shown to Kiriti the field of battle, speedily came over to the Pandava Ajatasatru (i.e. Yudhisthira who had no enemy) and informed him of the destruction of Jayadratha.

Thus ends the one hundred and forty-eighth chapter, the showing of the field of battle, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXIX.

(JAYADRATH-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. The King of Sindhu being slain by Partha, (Krishna) then approached king Yudhisthira, the son of Dharma and worshipped him with a merry heart.

2. O king of kings, O best of men, by good luck your prosperity increases and your enemy has been slain. It is by good fortune too that your younger brother has fulfilled his promise.

3. Thus addressed by Krishna, king Yudhisthira, the conquerer of enemies' cities, got down from his car with delight, O Bharata.

4. And with his eyes full of tears of joy he embraced Krishna and Arjuna; and wiping his white face of lotus-like lusture,

5. Said to Vasudeva and the Pandava Dhananjaya (thus):—"O mighty car-warriors, it is by good fortune that I behold you both after you have performed your heavy task in battle.

6, As good luck would have it, that vilest wretch among men, the king of Sindhus, has been slain. O Krishna and Arjuna, by good luck you have filled me with supreme bliss.

7. (And) it is by good fortune that our enemies are dtowned in a sea of grief. In the three worlds there is nothing which they can not perform,

8. Who have you, that are the lord of all the worlds, for their protector, O slayer of Madhu. O Govinda, through your favour we will conquer our enemies,

9. As in days of yore, through your grace the chastiser of the Asura) Paka (i. e., Indra) did (conquer) the Danavas. Whether it be the supremacy over the three worlds,

10. Everything is certain in the case of those who are in your good graces, O bestower of honours. Neither do they incur sin nor meet with reverses,

11. With whom, you that are the lord of the celestials, are pleased, O bestower of honours. O Hrishikesha, it is through your favaur that Sakra, the lord of all the celestials,

12. Endowed with prosperity, obtained sovereignty over the three world in battle. and O lord of the celestials, it is also sandi.ugh favour that the celestials,

13. Have, O Krishna, obtained immortality and are in enjoyment of eternal regions. O destroyer of foes, it is by means of the prowess obtained through your favour,

14. That Sakra having destroyed thousands of Daityas acquired the kingship of the celestials. O Hrishikesha, it is by reason of your grace, the universe, with its mobile and immobile creatures,

15. Remaining in its own course is engaged in (religious) meditations and sacrifices. Originally, buried in darkness and one vast sheet of water,

16. As the universe was, it has become manifest through your grace, O mighty-armed one, O best of men. Those who look upon Hrishikesha as the creator of all the worlds, the Supreme Soul and as immutable are never subject to illusion. You are the Original Being, you are the Supreme God, you are the God of the gods and you are eternal,

17.* Those that take refuge with you who are the lord of the celestials, are never subject to illusion; without begining or end, divine, the lord of creation and immutable (as you are),

19. They that are your worshippers, O Hrishikesha (always) get rid of difficulties. Supreme and Ancient male being and the most exalted of the exalted as you are,

20. He that attains to your Supreme self enjoys the highest prosperity. The four Vedas sing of you and you are sung in the four Vedas.

21. By taking refuge with you, O high-souled one, I shall enjoy the most excellent prosperity. O Supreme God, O god of the highest gods, O lord of the creation, O lord of men,

22. O most supreme god of all gods, I bow down to you, that are the best of all male beings. You are the Supreme Being, you are the Lord of Lords, O Lord, O Madhava, may you prosper.

23. O Universal Soul, O large-eyed one, you are the origin of all. He that has Dhananjaya for his friend or he who is devoted to the welfare of Dhananjaya,

24. Having attained to the protector of Dhananjaya, enjoys happiness." Those high-souled ones, that is Keshava and the son of Pandu, thus addressed (by Yudhisthira),

25. Cheerfully replied to the king, the lord of Earth (thus):—"That wretch, the king Jaydratha has been consumed by the fire of your anger.

26. O Lord, this vast and proud army of the son of Dhritarastra, struck down and killed, is being (gradually) annihilated, O Bharata.

27. O destroyer of enemies, these Kouravas are killed in consequence of your ire. O hero, having incensed you that are capable of slaying with your eyes, Sujodhana,

28. Whose mind is (ever) bent on evil will have to sacrifice his life in battle together with his friends and followers. Slain before by your ire and difficult of being vanquished by the celestials themselves,

29. Bhishma, the grand-father of the Kurus now lies on an arrowy bed. O destroyer of foes, victory is difficult of achievement on their part.

30. And they are sure to meet with death who are your enemies, O Pandava; kingdom, life, dear ones, sons and several sorts of happiness,

31. O tormentor of foes, are soon lost by them with whom you are angry. I deem the Kouravas as already destroyed with their sons, cattle and friends,

32. Since, O tormentor of foes, you that are always devoted to the duties of king, are incensed at them." Then O mighty monarch, Bhima and the great car-warrior Satyaki,

34. Those two mighty wielders of bow, (with their bodies) mangled by shafts, having paid their adoration to their lord and senior, sat down on the ground surrounded by the Panchalas.

34. Seeing those two cheerful heroes—Bhima and Satyaki (remain) with joined palms before him, the son of Kunti complemented them both, saying:—

35. It is by good fortune, O heroes, that I behold you both freed from that (vast) sea of (Kourava) troops of which (sea) Drona is the invincible alligator and the son of Hridika, the shark. It is by good luck too that you too have defeated all the kings of the earth.

36. (And) as good luck would have it, I behold you victorious in battle. It is by good fortune too that Drona as well as that mighty car-warrior, the son of Hridika have been defeated in battle (by you).

37. Fortunately Karna has been defeated in battle by barbed darts and Kripa and Salya have been made to run away (from the battle-field) by you, two most valiant of men.

38. It is fortunate that I behold you both—you that are the foremost of car-warriors and skilled in battle, return safe from the encounter.

39. You two heroes are (ever) obedient to my commands and anxious to preserve my honour; it is (thereforo) fortunate that I behold you both cross safe the vast sea of (hostile) army.

40. It is (highly) fortunate that I behold you both (again), you who take pride in battle, and never run away from it and who are (as dear) to me as my (own) life."

41. O king, having spoken thus, the son of Pandu embraced those two most valiant of men Yujudhan and Vrikodara and shed tears from (excess of) joy. Then, O lord of earth, the entire army of the Pandavas became joyous and again gladly directed their minds towards battle.

Thus ends the one-hundred and forty-ninth chapter the joy of Yudhisthira (at his success) in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona-Parva.

CHAPTER CL.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. O monarch, the king of Sindhu being slain, your son Suyodhana, with his eyes full of tears, became (greatly) dejected and despaired of defeating his enemies.

2. (And) with his mind weighed down with sorrow and breathing hot sighs like a snake whose (poison) tooth has been broken that offender, against the whole world, felt excruciating agony (of mind).

3. Seeing that Jishnu, Bhimasena, and Satwatta were making a great and dreadful havoc of his army,

4. He turned thin and pale, and became (greatly) dispirited. And with his eyes filled with tears he began to think that there was no warrior on earth who might be a match for Arjuna.

5. Neither Drona, nor the son of Radha, nor Aswathama nor Kripa is capable of standing before him (Arjuna) when he is angry, O worshipful one.

6. (And Suyadhona, thought within himself). No was able to resist him when having defeated all the great car-warriors on my side, Partha slew the king of Sindhu.

7. The son of Pandu has totally destroyed my vast army. (I think) even Purandara himself in person cannot protect it.

8. Even Karna, depending upon wh[om], I had engaged in this passage at arms in battle, has been defeated in encounter and Jayadratha slain.

9. Relying upon whose prowess I regarded that undeteriorating one (i. e., Krishna) who sued for peace, (something) like a straw, that Karna has been defeated in battle.

10. Thus dejected at heart, O king, O the most exalted of the Bharatas, your son, the offender against the whole world, came to see Drona.

11. He then told (Drona) all about the great slaughter of the Kurus, the victory of the enemies and the great disaster of the followers of Dhritarastra.

12. "O Preceptor," (Duryodhana (continued), "Behold this great carnage of those whose heads have undergone the sacred coronation bath, headed by my heroic grandsire Bhisma.

13. The covetous Shiknandi, having killed him, has got his desire fulfilled and is (now) stationed at the head of his troops together with all the Panchalas.

14. Having destroyed seven Akshauhinis (of our army), another invincible disciple of yours, viz., Savyasachi has killed king Jayadratha.

15. Those allies of ours, desirous of our victory and welfare, have gone to the abode of Yama. How can I repay the debt (of obligation) that I owe to them?

16. Those lords of the earth, who desired for me the sovereignty of the earth, having abandoned all earthly prosperity, are lying on the earth.

17. Coward that I am I have caused this great slaughter of my friends: and (therefore) cannot encourage myself to believe that I shall be able to purify myself by celebrating even a hundred horse-sacrifices.

18. Desirous of securing victory (for me who am covetous and sinful and a rebel against virtue, these (kings) have gone to the abode of the sons of Vivasvata.

19. I have fallen from virtue; an evil-minded and an enemy to my friends as I am why does not the earth yield me a hole (to bury me in)!

20. Among the kings, my grandsire with blood-red eyes (lies on an arrowy bed) what will that invincible hero, who has conquered the next world, say when he will meet me?

21. See that the great bowman Jalasandha has been slain by Satyaki. That hero and mighty car-warrior exerting his utmost for my sake, has (at last) lain down his life.

22. Beholding the king of Kamyoja, Ambulusa and many other friends lose their lives, what is the good of preserving my life?

23. Those unretreating warriors after exerting their utmost to vanquish my enemies and fighting for my sake have (at last) sacrificed their lives.

24. I will to-day repay the debts I owe them by exerting my utmost (in the battle) and will then offer oblation of Jamuna water to them.

25. O the foremost of those that weild weapons, I promise truly and swear by my good acts, my prowess and my sons,

26. That I will either obtain peace of mind by destroying the Panchalas together with the Pandavas or I will depart to the regions where they (ie. my) friends have gone by being myself slain in battle.

27. I will go there whither those foremost of men, slain for my sake in battle by the fighting Kiriti, have departed.

28. Seeing they are not well protected our partizans are no longer desirous of supporting us. They deem the sons of Pandu are preferable to us, O mighty armed one.

29. That truth-abiding one (Bhishma) himself ordained his own death in battle. And your respectable self too does not exert your best because Arjuna is your disciple.

30. It is, on this account, that all those who were desirous of our victory have been slain. At present I see that Karna alone is anxious for our success.

31. That man, of dull understanding who without the exercise of proper discretion, takes one for a friend and employs him in actions which can only be performed by real friends, has his object frustrated.

32. Covetous, sinful, crooked-minded and greedy of riches that I am, this affair of mine has been managed in this way by (so-called) best friends.

33. King Jayadratha, that prowerful monarch, the son of Somadatta, the Ameeshahas, the Surasenas, the Curas and the Vysatis have (all) been slain.

34. I will to day go there whither those best of the Bharatas, slain for my sake in battle by the fighting Kiriti, have gone.

35. There is no good of my life without those foremost of men. O preceptor of the sons of Pandu, permit me to do this.

Thus ends the one hundred and fiftieth chapter, the remorse of Duryodhana in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLI.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. What, O Sanjaya, was the state of your mind when the king of Sindhu was slain in battle by Savyasachi and Bhurisrava (by Satyaki)?

2. Relate to me, O Sanjaya, what Drona did say after he had been thus addressed by Duryodhana in the midst of the Kurus.

Sanjaya said :—

3. Seeing the king of Sindhu and Bhurisrava slain, there arose a great tumult among your troops, O Bharata.

4. All of them censured the policy of your son, in virtue of which hundreds of foremost of men were destroyed.

5. Drona too, hearing those words of your son, became sad at heart. Then, O king of kings, reflecting a moment he said very sorrowfully (these words).

Drona said :—

6. O Duryodhana, why are you piercing me with words (keen) as darts? I have told you (repeatedly) that Savyasachi is uncognizable in battle.

7. We have got (sufficient) proofs of what Arjuna is, when protected by Kiriti, Sikhandi slew Bhisma in battle, O Kourava.

8. Seeing that Bhisma, who could not be defeated by the celestials and the Danavas in battle, was slain (by Sikhandi), I understood that the Bharata army was doomed.

9. That person, whom we looked upon as the foremost of all the heroes in the three worlds, being slain, who else there that can inspire us with confidence?

10. The dice with which Sakuni played in the assembly-hall of the Kurus, O affectionate one, are not (real) dice but their arrows destructive of foes.

11. Those arrows, O child, now discharged by Jaya are destroying us; you did not then understand when Vidura told you what those dice) were.

12. You did not then pay heed to those auspicious words, which the magnanimous wise Vidura with tearful eyes said for your good.

13. In consequence of your disregard for those words, O Duryodhana, this dire, terible and impending disaster has overtaken you.

14. That stupid person, who disregarding the wholesome advice of his trusted friends, follows his own inclinations, is very soon reduced to a pitiable plight.

15. (You) had dragged Krishna to the assembly hall in our very presence who was unworthy of such treatment, was born of a noble line and was devoted to every act of righteousness.

16. O son of Gandhari, this (calamity which you are now in) is the bitter fruit of that sinful act on your part. This (punishment) is but insignificant for in the world to come you will be visited with direr calamities.

17. (This disaster is also the outcome of) your deceit by means of which you defeated the Pandavas at the game of dice and exiled them to the forest clad in deer-skin.

18. Is there, in the world, any other Brahmana besides myself that would injure the (Pandavas) who are ever devoted to righteousness and are (as dear) to me as my (own) sons.

19. The wrath that you excited in the Pandavas with the assent of Dhritarastra and associated with Sakuni in the midst of the Kurus,

20. Has been fostered by Dussasana together with Karna and has been repeatedly fanned by you who never paid regard to the words of Khattwa.

21. How was it that you, who stood by the ruler by the Sindhu and tried your utmost to withstand Arjuna, were all defeated and why was he (Jayadratha) slain in your midst?

22. How is it, O Kourava prince, that when you, Karna, Kripa, Salya and Aswathama are (all) alive, the king of Sindhu has been slain?

23. How was it that the king of Sindhu was slain in their midst, since for the purpose of rescuing him all the kings fought with fiery energy.

24. That lord of the earth looked especially to yourself and me for his rescue from Arjuna, O Duryodhana,

25. But he failed to have that rescue from (the clutches of) Arjuna. I too do not find any hope for my own life.

26. I see that I am (fast) sinking into the mire of Dhristadyumna's (cunning) until I can slay the Panchalas together with Sikhandi.

27. Since I myself am tormented with grief, wherefore are you piercing me with words (poignant) as an arrow, you who failed to rescue the king of Sindhu, O Bharata.

28. How can you hope for success, since you do no longer see the golden standard of Bhishma endued with untiring energy and and (ever) firm in truth.

19. Since the ruler of Sindhu and Bhurisrava have been slain from the very midst of the mighty-car-warriors, you can (very well) anticipate what the result will be.

30. O lord of the earth, if, without following the path of the king of Sindhu, the irresistible Kripa be still alive, I praise him highly (for his escape with life).

31—32. When, O Kourava king, I behold that Bhishma, capable of achieving the most difficult exploits and unslayable even by the celestials together with Vasava in battle, was slain in your very sight and in that of your younger brother Dusasana, I thought, O king, that the earth no longer belonged to you.

33. Behold! O king, O Bharata, the troops of the Pandavas and those of the Srinjayas are jointly advancing against me.

34. I will not lay down my armour without destroying all the Panchalas; (and), O son of Dhritarastra, I will perform such acts in battle as will benefit you.

35. O monarch, tell my son Aswathama that he should not let the Somakas off in battle so long as he is alive.

36. (Tell him also). "Observe the instructions that your father has given you. Be firm in charity, self-restraint, truth and straight forwardness.

37. Be diligent in (the exercise of) religion, profit and pleasure without despising religion and profit and always perform those acts in which the exercise of religion is mostly required.

38. You should always propitiate the Brahmanas with presents and worship. Never do anything that will offend them; for, they are flames of fire.

39. O destroyer of foes, afflicted ase am with your wordy darts I will now pene trate through the enemy's line in order to engage in a furious encounter (for your sake).

40. As for you, O Duryodhana, if you are capable, go and protect your army, for both the Kurus and the Srinjayas, that are furious (with rage) will fight even during the night."

41. Having said thus, Drona, like the sun drawing out the energy of the stars, advanced against the Pandavas and the Srinjayas in order to destroy the energy of the Kshatryas.

Thus ends the hundred and fifty-first chapter, the reply of Drona, in the Jayadratha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLII.

(JAYADRATHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then king Duryodhana, thus addressed by Drona, directed his mind to battle influenced by rage.

2. Your son Duryodhana, then, spoke to Karna. "See that Kiriti, the son of Pandu with the help of Krishna,

3. Penetrated into the array drawn up by the preceptor, which (array) was difficult of being penetrated through even by the celestials themselves. Moreover, in the very presence of yourself and the high-souled Drona engaged in battle,

4. And that of many other foremost warriors the king of Sindhu was killed. Behold, O son of Radha, many kings—excellent warriors on earth,

5. Destroyed by Partha alone like numerous inferior beasts slain by a lion, even when the high-minded Drona and myself were fighting (in order to resist Arjuna).

6. My (once vast) army has been reduced to a handful of men only by the son of Sakra. How, when Drona was trying his utmost (to check him), could the Phalguna

7. Arjuna fulfil his vow by killing the king of Sindhu? O hero, how could the son of Pandu, if Drona had not wished it,

8. Penetrate through that impenetrable array in battle when the latter was trying (to resist him). Indeed Phalguna is exceedingly dear to the high-souled preceptor.

9. It is, on this account, that he allowed him to enter (into the array) without offering any opposition to him. Behold my misery now; that tormentor of foes, Drona, first, promised protection to the king of Sindhu.

10—11. (But) he afterwards allowed Kiriti to enter into the array. If he had before given permission to the king of Sindhu to return home, this dreadful havoc would never have taken place in battle. Jayadratha was for returning home in order to save his life.

12. But relying upon the promise of protection made by Drona, insensate fool that I was, I stopped him. To day my brothers Chitrasena and others, have in the very sight of our wretched selves, been destroyed by Bhimasena.

Karna said :—

13. Do not blame the preceptor. (For) the twice-born one is fighting to the best of his prowess and energy and heedless of his life.

14. If Shetavahana entered (into the array) after having overcome him the preceptor can not be found fault with in the least (for that).

15. (Again, Arjuna) is accomplished, skillful, young, heroic, accomplished in arms and quick in movements. He was armed with celestial weapons, and mounted on the ape-bannered car,

16. The steeds of which were guided by Krishna. And that puissant one was clad in impenetrable armour and wielding his celestial and undecaying bow Gandiva.

17. As Arjuna, proud of the prowess of his arms, sent forth keen darts, it was no wonder that he overcame Drona.

18. (On the other hand), O king, the preceptor is old and incapable of quick movements and O lord of men, (he is) also unable to exercise his arms (for a long time).

19. It was on this account, that Setasva with Krishna as his charioteer was able to overcome him. I can not, therefore, find any fault in Drona.

20. In my opinion the Pandavas are unconquerable in battle by Drona, (however) skilled in weapons (he may be) in as much as Shetavahena, surpassing him, entered (into our array).

21. My belief is that what is ordained by fate undergoes no alteration, when, O Suyodhona, in spite of our fighting to the very best of our power,

22. The king of Sindhu has been killed in battle. It seems that fate is supreme.

Though we have been making vigorous exertions with you on the field of battle,

23. (And though we have been) always trying (to achieve success) by means of prowess and deceit, fate makes all our efforts futile.

24. O king, whatever act, a person who is not favoured by fate, does, it is baffled by fate, in spite of all his exertions to accomplish it.

25. That, which a person having perseverance ought to do, should be performed by him in a fearless spirit, (though of course) success depends upon fate.

26. We beguiled the sons of Pritha by deciet as well as by administration of poison, O Bharata. They were (again) burnt in the lac house and defeated at dice.

27. In pursuance of state policy they were exiled to the forest; though we did all these with the utmost care, they have been frustrated by fate.

28. Hurling defiance at fate, fight with (utmost) care. Between yourself and themselves, fate will espouse the cause of the party that will make the best exertion.

29. (It does not seem) that they (i. e. the Pandavas) have done anything good by reason of superior intellect; nor (does it appear) O hero, O perpetuator of Kuru-race, you have done anythig wrong through want of understanding.

30. It is fate that always bears testimony to our acts, whether good or evil. Fate which is (ever) bent on its purpose is wide awake even when everything else sleeps.

31. When the war began your soldiers and warriors were more numerous than those of the sons of Pandu.

32. By their small force numerous warriors on your side have been destroyed. I fear it is the work of Destiny by which exertion has been baffled.

Sanjaya said :—

33. When, O monarch, they were thus conversing about many other (subjects) the army of the Pandavas was seen on the field of battle.

34. Then, O monarch, there ensued a furious encounter, the result of our evil policy, in which the infantry, cars and elephants of your party encountered those of the other.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifty-second chapter, the commencement of a fresh battle in the Jayadrath-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLIII.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA).

Sanjaya said :—

1. O monarch, that impetuous elephant squadron of yours fought everywhere getting the better of the Pandava army.

2. The Panchalas and the Kouravas, determined to go to the next world, that is, the great region of Yama, fought with one another.

3. Heroes encountering (rival) heroes smote one another with arrows, lances and darts and quickly sent one another to the region of Yama.

4. Car-warriors were engaged in terrible battle, causing a dreadful flow of blood against (rival) car-warriors and smote one another.

5. Furious elephants mad with rage, O mighty monarch, advancing against one another, mangled one another with tusks.

6. In that dreadful encounter, horsemen' solicitous of high renown, pierced (rival) horsemen with spears, darts and battle-axes.

7. O mighty-armed one, O tormentor of foes, hundreds of foot-soldiers armed with weapons rushed against one another with vigorous efforts.

8. And, O worshipful sire, (in that terrible encounter) we could only distinguish the Kurus from the Panchalas by the names of their (respective) clans and families which we heard them utter.

9. The warriors moving about fearlessly on the field of battle sent one another to the next world by arrows, darts and battle-axes.

10. The sun having gone down, the arrows, O king, shot by thousands by them, did no longer illuminate the ten points as before.

11. The Pandava army, O Bharata being thus engaged in battle Duryodhana penetrated into them, O king.

12. Afflicted with great sorrow at the destruction of the king of Sindhu, and determined to sacrifice his life, he entered into the enemy's army.

13. Causing the earth to tremble and resound with the rattle of his car, your son rushed against the Pandava army.

14. O Bharata, that dreadful clash between him and them caused a terrible slaughter of all the troops.

15. As the noon-day sun scorches (the world) with his rays, so, it seemed, that your son scorched (the Pandava army) with flaming darts.

16. In that battle the Pandavas could not even look at their brother (i e Duryodhana), and despairing of conquering their enemy, they tried to flee (from the field).

17. The Panchalas, struck with gold-winged darts of blazing points, shot by your high-souled son armed with a bow, fled away.

18. The Pandava soldiers smitten with sharpened darts fell (dead). Indeed the sons of Pandu could never perform such exploits in battle

19. As were achieved by your royal son, O lord of earth. In that encounter the Pandava army was crushed by your son,

20. As lotuses are torn and crushed by a tusker. As lotuses are shorn of their beauty in consequence of the water (over which they grow) being dried up by the sun and the wind,

21. The Pandava army became so by virtue of the prowess of your son. Seeing, O Bharata, that the Pandava army was being destroyed by your son.

22. The Panchalas led by Bhimasena advanced (against him). He then (pierced) Bhimasena wlth ten, each of the two sons of Madri with three,

23. Virata and Drupada each with six, Shikandi with hundred, Dhristadumna with hundred, the son of Dharma with seven,

24. And the Kalkeyas and the Chedies with numerous keen darts. Piercing Satwatta with five (arrows), each of the sons of Droupadi with three,

25—26. And piercing Ghatotkacha too in battle he roared like a lion. Like the wrathful destroyer slaying the created beings, he cut down hundreds of other warriors and the bodies of horses and elephants in that terrific encounter. When he was thus destroying his enemies, his great bow, plaited at the back with gold,

27. Was severed into three parts with two broad-headed shafts by the eldest Pandava, O worshipful sire. (He then) pierced him (i.e. Duryodhana) fully with ten excellent and sharpened darts.

28. All these (arrows) piercing through the vital parts of Duryodhana penetrated into the earth in an unbroken line. Then the assembled warriors encircled Yudhisthira,

29. As the celestials had surrounded Purandara for the purpose of destroying Vritra (in days of yore).

30. Then the highly irresistible king Yudhisthira, O king, shot at your son an arrow in that encounter. Deeply wounded by that dart he became insensible on his excellent car.

31. Then a great and tumultous uproar arose from among the Panchala soldiers. O king of kings, that great noise was this "the king is slain."

32. And, O Bharata, sharp whizes of arrows were also heard there. Then Drona speedily appeared there in that battle.

33. Duryodhana too with (great) joy grasping his bow firmly and shouting to the king (Yudhisthira) 'wait' 'wait' rushed against the Pandavas.

34. The Panchalas too desirous of victory speedily followed the king. In order to save the foremost of the Kurus, Drona received them (i.e. their charge)

35. And then destroyed them all like the possessor of rays destroying the clouds driven to and fro by a terrific hurricane. Then there took place, O king, a terrific battle causing great havoc between your and your enemy's assembled troops eager for fight.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifty-third chapter, the defeat of Duryodhana, in the Ghatatkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLIV.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)
—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said:—

1. When the wrathful preceptor endued with prowess, having addressed my son Duryodhana, who (even) acts in opposition to my commands, thus entered into the Pandava army,

3. How did the Pandavas oppose that mighty bowman, the heroic Drona, who having entered it (i e the hostile army) was moving about (the field of battle) stationed on his car.

3. (And) when the preceptor was engaged in the terrible slaughter of the enemy in that great battle, who did protect the right wheel (of his car) and who the left?

4. Who were the heroes that guarded the rear of that warrior engaged in fight? Who were the enemies that were stationed in front of that car-warrior?

5. It seems to me that they experienced an excessive cold chill ill-suited to the proper season or I think they shivered like cows exposed to frosts.

6. When that unvanquished and mighty wielder of bow and that foremost of the wielders of weapons, dancing on the track of his car, entered among the Panchalas,

7. Consuming all the forces of the Panschalas like an angry comet, how did that foremost of the car-warriors meet with death ?

Sanjaya said :—

8. Having killed the king of Sindhu in the evening Partha saw the king (i e Yudhisthira) and then united with the great bowman Satyaki he advanced against Drona himself.

9. Then Yudhisthira together with the Pandava Bhimasena joined by their separate squadrons soon rushed against Drona himself.

10. Similarly, Nakula endued with intelligence and Sahadeva difficult of being conquered, and Dhristadumna with his army and Tirata together with the Kekayas,

11. And the Matshas and the Salyas with their own divisions advanced against Drona for battle. Protected by the Panchachalas, Drupada,

12. The father of Dhristadumna, O king, marched against Drona. Those mighty wielders of bow viz the (five) sons of Droupadi and the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha

13. Followed by their own troops proceeded against the highly resplendent Drona. The Prabhadrakas and the Panchalas, numbering sixty thousand (efficient) smiters,

14. With Shikhandi at their head, marched against Drona. Similarly (numerous) other foremost of men and mighty car-warriors on the side of the Pandavas,

15. O best of men, jointly proceeded against Drona. O best of the Bharatas, those warriors having proceeded for the fight,

16. The night became dark increasing the terror of the cowards. (And) that dismal (night) O king, proved destructive of (numerous) warriors.

17. And it then proved fatal to elephants horses and men. On that pitchy dark night jackals setting up (terrible) yells everywhere,

18—19. And with their gaping mouths all ablaze indicated dreadful terror. Specially greatly terrible owls, screaming from the standards of the Kouravas, foreboded dreadful terror. Then, O king of kings, there arose a tumultuous uproar from among the troops.

20. (Mingling) with the loud beat of drums and sound of cymbals, the grunt of elephants and the neigh of horses

21. And the noise of hoofs (that uproar) spread everywhere. Then there took place an awfully dreadful nocturnal battle,

22. O great king, between Drona (on one hand) and all the Srinjayas (on the other). In consequence of the night being enveloped in darkness and of the dust raised by the soldiers nothing could be descerned. The blood of men, horse and elephant mingled together.

24. Stupified with unconciousness as we were we did not see any dust on the earth. Like the (creaking sounds) of a burning bamboo forest on a mountain during a night,

25. There arose a dreadful clangning noise of the clashing weapons. In consequence of the sounds of Mridangas, Anakas Vallakis and Patahas,

26. And of the thundering shouts, of the combatants and the neigh (of steeds), O lord, everything was in utter confusion. O king, on account of darkness gathering fast, friends could not be distinguished from foes.

27. And at that night every one became as if seized with madness. O king of kings, then the dust on earth (soon) disappeared on account of (the profuse) flow of blood.

28. (Then), on account of the golden armours and the ornaments (worn by the warriors) the gloom was dispersed. Adorned with gems and gold, the Bharata army then,

29. Looked like the firmament studded with stars during the night, O foremost of the Bharatas. (That field of battle) with maces and standards lying scattered all over, resounding with the howls of the the jackals,

30. Grunts of elephants and ringing with the striking of arms and shouts (of the combatants) appeared dreadful. Then there arose a great and tumultuous uproar, causing the hair to stand on end,

31. And filling all the points like the roar of Mahendra's thunder. (And) O great king, at that night the Bharata army illuminated with the Angadas, ear-rings, cuirasses, and with the weapons could be (clearly) seen. There (on the field of battle) elephants and cars decked with gold,

33. Looked like clouds with lightning playing upon them during the night. Swords, darts, maces, scimitars, clubs, lances and axes,

34. Looked like blazing sparks of fire when they fell. Duryodhana was the precursory wind, cars and elephants were the clouds.

35. Sounds of musical intruments were the thundering noise, bow and standards were the lightning flashes; Drona and the Pandavas were the clouds, swords, darts and maces were the thunder.

36. And showers, both very hot and cold, of arrows and of (other) weapons were the gusts of wind—of that dreadful, marvellous and fierce (army) which was fatal to life and from which escape was not at all possible.

37. Desirous of battle, warriors entered fearlessly into that host at that dreadful night resounding with numerous sounds.

38. And when that awfully terrible and fierce nocturnal battle was raging which struck terror into (the minds of) the cowards and increased the joy of the valiant,

39. The Pandavas and the Srinjayas united together rushed furiously against Drona. (But) O king, all those who confronted that high-souled one,

40. Were driven back and some were sent to the abode of Yama. Thousands of elephants, ten thousands of car-warriors,

41. Millions of foot-soldiers and hundreds of millions of horses were pierced with shafts by Drona alone at that night.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifty-fourth chapter fight by Drona in the Gatotkacha-Badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLV.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA) —Continued.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. When, unable to bear (the destruction of the king of Sindhu), that one of unrivalled energy and difficult of being vanquished penetrated into the Srinjyas what became (the state of) your mind?

2. Having addressed my disobedient son Duryodhona thus, when that one of immeasurable energy entered (into the Pandava army) what did Partha do?

3. (You say that) on the slaughter of the heroic king of Sindhu as well as of Bhurisrava that unvanquished one (i. e. Drona) endued with great energy rushed against the Srinjayas.

4. What did (Partha) think on that invincible scorcher of foes having so entered? What also did Duryodhana think as to the most proper step that he could adopt at that time?

5. Who were they that followed the heroic bestower of boons, the foremost of the twice-born ones? Who, O charioteer, were the warriors that remained behind that fighting hero?

6. Who were they that fought in his van when he was destroying the enemies? I think that afflicted with the darts of the son of Bharadwaja, all the Pandavas (trembled)

7. Like lean cows shivering in cold. Having entered into the Panchalas how that mighty weilder of bow, that grinder of foes and foremost of men came by his end?

8. When, on that night, all the soldiers joined together and (all) the mighty car-warriors, combined, were being separately crushed, (by Drona), who, were the intelligent men among you, that were then present?

9. (You say) that, in the encounter, my soldiers were (either) killed, driven away, or defeated and that my car-warriors were deprived of their cars in the encounter.

10. Crushed and deprived of senses by the Pandavas and buried in blinding darkness (as they were,) what was (the state of) their mind?

11. You say that the Pandavas were full of joy and elated (with success), and that my partizans were cheerless, heartless and struck with terror.

12. How, O charioteer, O Sanjaya, ou that (dark) night could you distinguish the unretreating sons of Pritha and the Kurus?

Sanjaya said:—

13. O king, when that greatly furious nocturnal battle was going on, all the Pandavas together with the Somakas rushed against Drona.

14. But Drona, by means of his swift-going darts, sent the Kekayas and sons of Dhristadumna to the region of the departed spirits.

15. And Drona sent all those mighty car-warriors, those lords of earth who confronted him to the region of Pitris, O king.

16. Then the powerful king Sibi furiously advanced against the heroic son of Bhara-dwaja, the mighty-car warrior Drona who was engaged in crushing (the enemy).

17. Seeing the great car-warrior of the Pandavas advance, Drona pierced him with ten arrows made wholly of steel.

18. Sibi (too) pierced him (i.e. Drona) in return by thirty shafts adorned with the plumes of the Kanka (bird) and struck down his charioteer with a smile by a broad-headed shaft.

19. (On the other hand) Drona, having killed the horses as well as the charioteer of that high-souled one, severed his head, adorned with a diadem, from the body.

20. Duryodhana then quickly ordered a charioteer (to guide Drona's car). The reins of the) horses being taken by him, he (i.e. Drona) again proceeded against his foes.

21. Accompanied by the Kalinga forces the son of the king of Kalinga, excited with wrath for the destruction of his father by Bhimasena, rushed towards him.

22. Having (first) pierced Bhima with five shafts and then again with seven, he struck Viseka (Bhima's charioteer) with three darts and his (i.e. Bhima's) standard with one.

23. Vrikodara, then fired with rage, leaped from (his own) car to that of the heroic prince of Kalinga, who also was (very) angry and killed him with blows from his fists.

24. All the bones of that one (i.e. the Kalinga prince) thus boxed to death by the powerful Pandava, suddenly fell down on the ground separated from one another.

25. Karna and all the brothers (of the Kalinga prince) could not bear that act on the part of Bhimasena. They (therefore) struck him with keen darts (as fierce) as poisonous snakes.

26. Bhima, then leaving the car of his enemy (i.e. dead Kalinga prince) made for the car of Dhruva and smashed Dhruva who was incessantly striking him, by a blow of his fist.

27. Thus struck by the powerful son of Pandu, he fell down (from his car). The highly powerful Bhimasena, O king, after slaying him,

28. Got up to the car of Jayadratha and repeatedly sent forth leonlne roars. While roaring he hurled him down with his left hand.

29. And he (then) killed him with a slap in the very presence of Karna himself. Karna then shot a golden dart at that Pandava.

30. But the son of Pandu seized that (dart) with a smile. And in that encounter the invincible Vrikodara hurled that very dart at Karna.

31. (Then) Sakuni cut off that dart while it was coming (towards Karna) by a shaft saturated with oil. Having performed such great exploits in battle, that one of marvellous prowess,

32. Returned to his own car and (then) rushed against your troops. When Bhima desirous of staying (your troops), was (thus) advancing furiously like the (grim) Destroyer himself,

33. Your mighty armed-sons, those great car-warriors tried to check his career by enveloping him with mighty showers of arrows.

34. Then Bhima, with a smile, sent the charioteer and the steeds of Durmada in that battle to the abode of Yama with his shafts.

35. Durmada then got to the car of Duskarna. Those two brothers, the tormentors of foes, mounted on the same car,

36. Both rushed against Bhima in the van of the battle, as the lord of the waters (i. e. Varuna) (had rushed against) Taraka, the foremost of the Daitayas (in days of yore).

37. Then your sons Durmada and Duskarna ascending the same car pierced Bhima with arrows.

38. Then in the very sight of Karna, and Duryodhana and in that of Kripa, Somadatta, and Balhika, the Pandava,

39. That chastiser of foes, buried the car of the heroic Durmada and that of Duskarna into the earth with the stroke of his foot.

40. Then striking furiously with the blows of his fits those two heroic and powerful sons of yours, Duskarna and Durmada, he crushed them (therewith) and sent forth thudering shouts.

41. Then your troops began to wail aloud and the kings seeing Bhima, said. "He is Rudra himself who assuming the shape of a Bhima is fighting with the troops of Dhritarastra."

42. O Bharata, saying this, all the kings deprived, (as it were) of their senses and urging the animals (on which they rode), fled away (from the field) and no two then (so great was their terror) did run together.

43. The army (of the Kurus) being thus greatly crushed, in that night, the heroic and highly powerful Vrikodara, enduced with full blown lotus-like eyes, being highly complemented by (many) foremost of kings, paid his regards to king Yudhisthira.

44. Then the twins (i.e., Nakula and Sahadeva), Drupada, Virata and the Keykayas as well as Yudhisthira experienced a great joy and paid high complements to Vrikodara as the celestials paid to Hara after the slaughter of Andhaka by him.

45. Then your sons resembling those of Varuna filled with wrath, and eager for battle led by (their) high-souled preceptor surrounded on all sides Vrikodara by cars foot-soldiers and elephants.

46. Then, O best of kings, on that dreadful night enveloped with darkness thick as clouds, there took place, between those high-souled ones, an awe-inspiring and terrible battle delightful to wolves, crows and vultures.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifty-fifth chapter, the prowess displayed by Bhima in the Ghatotkacha-Badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLVI.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)
—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Enraged at the slaughter of his son, while he was sitting with the desire of dying without food, Somadatta said these words to Satyki :—

2. Why, O Satwatta, without observing the Kshatriya duties as formerly laid down by the gods, have you taken to the practices of robbers ?

3. How can a wise person, practising the Kshatriya duties, strke in battle one who runs away, or is helpless or has laid aside his weapons or who begs (for his life) ?

4. O Swtatta, it is said that among the Vrishnis there are two principal and mighty car-warriors in battle, namely, the highly energetic Pradyumna and yourself.

5. Why then did you practise such a cruelty and commit such an act, that would lead to your downfall, towards one that had sat in prayer and whose arms had been cut off by Partha ?

6. O wicked one, suffer (now) the consequences of that act of yours in battle. Exerting my strength, O fool, I will to-day cut off your head with arrows ?

7. O Satwata, I swear by my two sons, by what is dear to me, and by my virtuous deeds, if before this night comes to a close I fail to destroy you, you that so much pride on your heroism, together with your sons and younger brothers, unless you are backed up by Jishnu, the son of Pritha, then, O wretch of Vrishnis, may I fall into dreadful hell.

9. The highly powerful Somadatta, excited with wrath, having said thus, blew loudly (his) conch and sent forth roars like a lion.

10. Then the greatly powerful Satyaki endued with eyes (beautiful) as lotus petals and possessed of leonine teeth greatly enraged thus addressed Somadatta.

11. "O descendant of the Kurus, I entertain not the least fear in my heart whether fighting with you or with others.

12. I shall not experience the slightest pain, even if backed up by all your forces, you fight with me, O scion of the Kuru race.

13. Observant of the practices of the Kshatriyas as I am, I can not be terrified with words smelling of battle and insulting to the virtuous.

14. If, O lord of men, you are desirous of fighting with me, strike me with sharpened arrows and I also will strike you (in return).

15. O king, your son, the mighty car-warrior Bhurisrava has been slain. Then the heroic Sala and Vrisasena too have been destroyed.

16. I will to-day destroy you also together with your sons and friends ; you are a descendant of the Kuru race and are endued with great prowess. Now remain carefully in battle.

17. King Yudhisthira is always characterised by charity, self-restraint, purity, absence of cruelty, modesty, intelligence and forgiveness and all (the virtues) that do not perish.

18. You, who have been already slain by the energy of that one whose standard bears the mark of a drum, will be destroyed in battle together with Sakuni and Souvala.

19. I swear to-day by Krishna's feet and all the meritorious acts that I had done before, that I will wrathfully kill you in battle together with your sons, with arrows.

20. If, however, you run away (from the field), you may be freed (from me)." Thus addressing each other, with eyes reddened with rage,

21. Those two foremost of men began to discharge arrows (at each other). Then with a thousand cars and ten thousand horses,

22. Duryodhana stood surrounding Somadatta. Sakuni, too excited with wrath and armed with all the weapons,

23. And surrounded by sons and grand-sons and brothers powerful as Indra him-self (followed Duryodhana's example), Your youthful brother-in-law, O king, en-dued with a body hard as the thunderbolt,

24. And gifted with wisdom and who had with him one hundred thousand steeds of the best breed, completely hemmed in that mighty bowman Somadatta.

25. Supported by those heroes, (Soma-datta) covered Satyaki with arrows. Seeing him covered with straight arrows

26. Dhristadyumna, followed by a large army, proceeded wrathfully (towards him). Like the roar of waters dashed into fury by a terrible hurricane,

27. There arose, O king, a great tumult among the (two) forces striking each other. Somadatta then pierced Satwata with nine arrows.

28. Satyaki too pierced that foremost of Kurus with nine shafts. Deeply wound-ed in battle by that powerful and firm wielder of bow,

29. (Somadatta) leaned against the terrace of his car and (then) swooned away and was deprived of consciousness. See-ing that he was deprived of consciousness, his charioteer, in great hurry,

30. Carried away the heroic and mighty car-warrior Somadatta from (the field of) battle. Beholding him deprived of senses and afflicted with the arrows of Yuyudhana,

31. Drona desirous of slaying the heroic (Yadu rushed (at him). Seeing (i.e Drona advance), Yudhisthira (putting himself) at the head (of his troops),

32. With the desire of rescuing the high-souled perpetuator of the Yadu race sur-rounded him on all sides. Then there com-menced a battle between Drona and the Pandavas,

33. Like that (which took place) in days of yore between Vali and the celestials (both) desirous of the conquest of the three worlds. Then covering the Pandava army with arrowy showers,

44. The highly-energetic son of Bhara-dwaja pierced Yudhisthira also. (Drona then struck) Satyaki with ten darts and the son of Prishata (i.e. Dhristadyumna) with twenty five darts.

35. (And he pierced) Bhimasena with nine, Nakula with five, Sahadeva with eight and Shikhandi with one hundred arrows.

36. That mighty armed one (then pierced) each of (the five) sons of Draupadi with five arrows, Virata the king of Matsyas with eight, Drupada with ten darts,

37. Yudhamanu with three and Utta-manja with six (arrows) in that battle. (Similarly) piercing many other soldiers (he) rushed against Yudhisthira.

38. (Thus) struck dy Drona, the troops of the son of Pandu with loud wails fled away in terror in ten directions, O king.

39. Seeing that the army was being slaughtered by Drona, Phalguna Partha, enraged a little, advanced speedily against his preceptor.

40. O king, beholding that Drona too was advancing against Vivatsu in that battle, the soldiers of Yudhisthira rallied again.

41. Then again commenced a battle between the sons of Bharadwaja and the Pandavas. Drona, O king, completely surrrounded by your sons,

42. Began to destroy the troops of the Pandavas, as fire (consumes) a heap of cotton. (He then) looked like the radiant sun and was endued with the resplendance of a blazing fire.

43. O king, seeing Drona incessantly discharge fierce arrows like sparks of fire from his bow drawn to a circle, and like the scorching sun,

44. Consume the evenings there was none among the army that could withstand him. Those persons who stood before Drona (in order to resist him)

45. Had their heads cut off by Drona with arrows which (then) entered into the earth. The army of the Pandavas thus slaughtered by that high-souled one,

46. Again ran away in terror (even) in the very sight of Savyasachi. Seeing his lines broken by Drona at (that) night, O Bharata,

47. Jishnu said to Govinda "proceed towards the car of Drona." Then that Dasarha (chief) drove the horses, looking like silver or milk of cows, or like the Kun-da flower, towards the car of Drona. See-ing that Phalguna was proceeding towards Drona, Bhimasena too,

48. Ordered his own charioteer to take him towards Drona's troops. Visaka (the charioteer of Bhima), hearing those words of his (master) guided the steeds

50. Behind Jushnu of unerring aim, O foremost of the Bharatas. Seeing those two brothers resolutely rush towards Drona's division,

51. The Panchalas, the Srinjayas, the Matsyas, the Chedis, the Kouravas, the Koshalas and those mighty car-warriors, the Keykayas followed suit, O great king.

52—53. Then, O king, ensued a dreadful encounter, making the hair stand erect. Vivastsu, then, attacked the right and Vrikodara the left flank of your army with innumerable cars. Seeing those twe foremost of men, viz Bhimasena and Dhananjaya, (proceed towards Drona's troops),

54. Dhrishtadyumna as well as the highly powerful Satyaki rushed (at them). like the roar of waters dashed into fury by a terrible hurricane.

55. There arose a great tumult among the combatants striking each other. Seeing Satyaki in battle and enraged at the slaughter of the son of Somadatta,

56, The son of Drona rushed furiously against Satwatta at the van of battle. (Seeing) him proceed towards the car of the grandson of Sini in battle,

57—58. That gigantic Rakshasa, the son of Bhimasena, possessed of enormous strength, rushed (at him) mounted on a huge and awfully dreadful car made of black iron covered with bear-skin, measuring thirty nalwas in height and width, furnished with various machines, and emitting thnndering roars like those of a mighty (mass of) clouds.

59. (And it was) drawn by animals looking like elephants; but they were neither elephants nor horses. With its wings and feet outstretched and with expanded eyes and emitting (terrible) shrieks,

60. A prince of vultures sat on its towering standard. (That car) was adorned with red flags furnished with rows of bones,

61—62. And with eight wheels. (And he) sat down on this car surrounded by one Akshauhini of terrible-looking Rakshasa armed with maces and clubs and carrying rocks and trees in their hands. The kings were (greatly) pained on seeing him (to advance) with upraised bow,

63. Look like the very Destroyer himself, mace in hand, at the time of universal dissolution. (And he) resembled a mountain peak, was frightful to look at, and dreadful.

64. (He) had terrible teeth, and a dread ful face, was possessed of arrow-like ears, high cheek bones, shooting hair, unnatural eyes, flaming mouth and a sunken belly.

65. His aesophagus was deep as a yawning pit and his head was furnished with a coronet. He was dreadful to all creatures and his jaws were as wide as those of the Destroyer himself.

66. Seeing Gatatkacha, the lord of the Rakshasas endued with splendour, and capable of striking terror into foes, advance upraising his great bow,

67. Your son's forces struck with panic became as much agitated as when the waves of Ganga (dashed into fury) by a tempest are agitated into whirlpools.

68. Struck with panic by the leonine roars sent forth by Ghatotkacha, the elephants began to pass urine and the kings were greatly distressed.

69. Hurled by the Rakshas who became more powerful on night-fall, there began to fall from all sides showers of stones on the ground.

70. Showers of iron, wheels, Bhushundeeds, arrows, spears, Sataghnees and axes also began to fall there incessantly.

71. Seeing that furious and terrible battle, the kings, your sons and Karna too, being (greatly) distressed, ran away (from the battle field).

72. There the haughty son, of Drona only proud of his prowess in weapons, stood without fear (and he) soon did away with the illusion created by Ghatotkach.

73. Enraged at the illusion being dispelled (by the son of Drona), Ghatotkacha began to discharge fierce arrows. Those (arrows) penetrated into (the body of) Aswathama.

74. As snakes insensible with rage furiously (enter into) an ant-hill, those arrows penetrating through (the body of) the son of Saradwata became covered with blood,

75. And then speedily entered into the earth like serpents (entering) an ant-hill. The light-handed and powerful Aswathama too, excited with wrath,

76. Furiously pierced Ghatotkacha with ten arrows. Deeply pierced in the vital parts by the son of Drona, Ghatotkacha,

77. Became greatly afflicted and then took up a wheel furnished with one hundred thousand spokes. (This wheel) the edge of which was sharp as that of a razor, and which was as resplendent as the morning sun and was studded with gems and precious stones,

78. Was hurled by the son of Bhimasena at Aswathama with the desire of slaying (him). Cut off into fragments by the son of Drona with arrows as it coursed with great speed (towards him),

79. It fell down on the ground like the purposes of an unlucky person. Seeing his wheel cut down, Ghatotkacha speedily

80. Covered the son of Drona with shafts as Sarbhanu (i. e. Rahu) swallows the creator of light (i.e. the sun). The resplendent son of Ghatotkacha resembling a mass of antimony,

81. Arrested the advance of the son of Drona as the king of mountains (checks the career of) the wind. (Struck with arrows) by the heroic Anjanaparva, the grandson of Bhimasena,

82. (The son of Drona) looked like the mountain Meru drenched with (copious) showers of rain from the clouds. Aswathama also endued with a prowess equal to that of Rudra or Upendra, becoming highly enraged,

83. Cut off the standard of Anjanaparva with one arrow, his two charioteers with two and his Trivenduka with four (arrows).

84—85. With one (arrow) he cut off his bow and with four his four steeds. Deprived of his car; as he (i.e. the son of Ghatotkach) took up a scimitar studded with golden stars, in his hand, and flourished it, (Aswathama) severed it into two parts by a keen dart. Then, O king, the grandson of Hidimva speedily (took up) a mace decked with gold;

86. And whirling it, (he) hurled (that mace at Aswathama). But the son of Drona, striking it (with arrows) felled it (to the ground). Then, leaping up in the air and roaring like black clouds,

87—88. Anjnnaparva began to pour down showers of trees from the firmament. Then the son of Drona began to pierce that one capable of (creating) illusions by means of shafts in the sky as the sun (pierces) the clouds with his rays. Seated on his car again decked with gold, when that one of great strength,

89—90. Looking like a high and beautiful mountain of antimony, descended to the earth, the son of Drona slew the son of Bhima's son, Anjanaparva, clad in armour as Maheswara (killed) the (Asura) Andhaka in days of yore. Seeing his son of enormous strength killed by Aswathama,

91. (Ghatotkacha), the ornaments of whose arms were falling down from rage, came up to the son of Drona who was consuming the Pandava army like a raging forest-fire and fearlessly said to heroic son of Saradwati these words:—

Ghatotkacha said :—

92. O son of Drona, 'wait, wait.' You will not escape alive from me. I will to-day destroy you as the son of Agni (i.e. Kartikeya) rived the (mountain) Krouncha.||

Aswathama said :—

93. O son equal in prowess to a celestial, go and fight with others. O son of Hidimva, it is not proper for the father to fight with the son.

94. O son of Hidimva, I am in no way angry with you in my mind. But when a creature is excited with rage, it may (then) kill its own self.

Sanjaya said :—

95. Hearing those words, the son of Bhimasena who was filled with grief for the loss of son and whose eyes became copper-coloured in rage, addressed Aswathama thus :—

96. "What! Am I like a common individual, unable to fight, O son of Drona, that you are terrifying me with words? These words of yours are (highly) improper.

97. I am born of Bhima in the great race of the Kurus and am the son of the Pandavas who never run away from battle.

98. I am the Emperor of the Rakshasas and equal to the ten-necked (Ravana) in prowess. O son of Drona, wait, wait, you will never escape alive from me.

99. I will, to-day, put an end to your desire for fight on the field of battle." Saying thus, that highly powerful Rakshasa, with eyes (red) as copper in wrath,

100. Rushed furiously against the son of Drona as a lion (rushes against) the king of elephants. (Then) Ghatotkacha began to discharge showers of arrows of the measure of the Aksha of a car,

101. At that foremost of car-warriors, the son of Drona, as a cloud (sends down) showers of rain. (But) the son of Drona allayed that down pour of arrows by means of his (own) shafts, before they could reach him.

102. It, then, seemed, that another fight was raging in the firmament between the arrows. In consequence of the sparks emitted forth by the clash of weapons, it seemed

103. That the firmament was studded with glow-worms during the night. Beholding his illusion destroyed by the son of Drona, proud (of his prowess) in battle,

104. Ghatotkacha then disappeared from view again and created (another) illusion (by virtue of this new illusion); he assumed the shape of a towering mountain abounding with peaks and trees,

105. And having a great fountain of water from which spears, lances, swords and heavy clubs, flowed incessantly. The son of Drona, beholding that mountain looking like a mass of antimony,

106. From which innumerable weapons were being rained down, was not at all afflicted. The son of Drona, then, as if with a smile, invoked into existence the weapon Bajra.

107. By means of that weapon he soon destroyed that prince of mountains. Then he (ie., Ghatotkacha) wearing the shape of a blue cloud adorned with rainbow in the firmament,

108. Covered the son of Drona with furious showers of stones in battle. Thereupon, aiming the Vayavya weapon, that foremost of those skilled in weapons, (viz.)

109. The son Drona destroyed that rising blue cloud covering all points completely with numerous arrows, the son of Drona,

110—111. That foremost of two-legged creatures, destroyed one hundred thousand cars. He (then) saw Ghatotkach come again fearlessiy on a car bending his bow and surrounded by a host of Rakshasas, resembling (in shape) lions and tegers, endued with the prowess of infuriated elephants,

112. Riding on elephants, cars and horses and possessed of unnatural, faces, heads and necks. Those followers of the son of Hidimva,

113. Belonged to Pulasta and Yatudhana clans, and like them, were (all) equal to Indra in prowess. (These Rakshasa) heroes weilded several (sorts of) armours,

114. Were dreadful to look at, excited with wrath, and their eyes were rolling in ire. Accompained by those Rakshasas difficult of being vanquished, (Ghatotkacha) appeared on the field of battle.

115. Seeing that your son grew (greatly) dispirited (at the sight of these Rakshasas; the son of Drona thus addressed him. "O Durjodhana, wait. You need not entertain any fear (of the Rakshasas).

116. (Remain here) with your heroic brothers and with the kings equal in prowess to Indra himself. I will destroy your enemies. You will not meet with reverse; I tell you (this) truly. (Now cheer up (your) army."

Duryodhana said :—

117. I do not deem it (i.e., what you say) wonderful, because you have a large mind, and (because), O son of Goutama's daughter, you are devotedly attached to us.

Sanjaya said :—

118. Thus addressing Aswathama, he then said to the son of Suvala :—"(Arjuna) is surrounded by one hundred thousand cars, adorning the (field of) battle.

119. Do you mark against Dhananjaya with one thousand cars, Karna, Vrisasena, Kripa as well as Nila.

120. And the warriors of the North, Kritavarma, the sons of Purumitra, Dusasana, Nikumva, Kundavedi, Purukrama,

121. And Puranjaya, Dridaratha, Pataki, Hemapusyaka, Salya, Aruni, Indrasena, Sanjaya, Vejaya, Jaya,

122. And Kamalaksha, Parakrathi, Jayadharma, Sudarsana—(all) these will follow you together with sixty thousand infantry.

123. Destroy, O uncle, Bhima, the twins (i.e., Nakula and Sahadeva) as well as the Dharmaraj, as the Asuras. My hope of success lies in you.

124. (They) are already deeply wounded, their bodies are mangled with shafts by the son of Drona. O uncle, (now) destroy the sons of Kunti, as the son of Agni (i.e., Kartikeya) slew the Asuras."

125. Thus spoken to by your son, the son of Suvala, desirous of doing your son good, marched quickly, O king, for the purpose of destroying the Pandavas.

126. Then commenced on that night a dreadful encounter between the son of Drona and the Rakshasa (Ghatotkacha) like that (which had taken place in days of yore) between Sakra and Prahrada.

127. Then Ghatatkacha, excited with, anger struck the son of the daughter of Goutama on the chest with ten strong arrows (fierce) like the venom or the fire.

128. Deeply wounded by those arrows sent by the son of Bhima, he (i.e., Aswathama), like a tree shaken by the tempest, trembled on the terrace of his car.

129. Again by means of a broad-headed shaft, Ghatotkacha soon cut off that highly lustrous bow wielded by the son of Drona.

130. Then taking up another strong bow capable of sustaining a great strain, the son of Drona poured showers of keen arrows as the clouds (pour down) showers of rain.

131. Then, O Bharata, the son of Saradvati sent gold winged and sky-ranging arrows destructive of foes against that ranger of the sky.

132. That great host of the broad-chested Rakshasas, sore oppressed with his arrows, ooked like a herd of furious elephants attacked) by a lion.

133. Like the god Agni consuming the creatures at the end of a Yuga, he began to consu..e with his arrows the Rakshasas together with (their) horses, charioteers, cars and elephants.

134. Consuming one Akshouhini of Rakshasa troops with his shafts, he shone like the divine Maheswara in heaven when the latter had burnt down (the chief of) Tripura in days of yore.

135. Having consumed the hostile forces, the son of Drona, the foremost of victors, shone like the resplendent Agni burning all the creatures at the end of a Yuga.

136. Then Ghatotkacha, greatly enraged, ordered that vast army of Rakshasas capable of achieving terrible feats, to slay the son of Drona.

137. In obedience to that order of Ghatotkacha, the Rakshasas, possessed of blazing teeth, large faces, and terrible features, capable of causing dread,

138. Having gaping mouths, long tongues, and eyes burning in ire,—causing the earth to tremble with great leonine roars,

139—142. And wielding several (sorts of) weapons rushed to slay the son of Drona. These Rakshasas, of gigantic strength and with eyes reddened with wrath, began to shower upon the head of the son of Drona hundreds and thousands of awfully terrible darts, Sataghnees, spiked maces, Asanis, lances, axes, scimitars, maces, Bhindipalas, heavy clubs, battle axes, spears, swords, lances, Kunapas, polished Kampanas, Sthulas, Bhushundees, stones, vessels of treacle, sthunas made of black iron, and clubs(all) destructive of foes.

143. Seeing that dreadful shower of weapons was falling upon the head of the son of Drona your warriors were greatly distressed (at heart).

144. (But) Drona's son dauntlessly baffled that dreadful and impending shower of weapons by means of his own shafts, hard as the thunderbolt and sharpened on stones.

145. Then that high-minded son, of Drona, quickly destroyed the Rakshasas with other gold winged shafts inspired with the mantras of celestial weapons.

146. The broad chested Rakshasa army, crushed by his arrows, looked like a herd of furious elephants oppressed by lions.

147. Sore oppressed by the son of Drona those Rakshasas, endued with enormous strength, became mad with rage and angrily rushed against Drona's son in order to slay him.

148. There, O Bharata, the son of Drona displayed such wonderful exploits as are incapable of being achieved by any other being among all the creatures.

149. In as much as single-handed the son of Drona, versed in great weapons, by means of blazing darts,burnt that Rakshasa army in a moment in the very presence of the Rakshasa king.

150. The son of Drona, while (thus burning that Rakshasa host in battle shone like the Samvartaka fire (consuming) all the creatures at the end of a yuga.

151. While engaged in consuming the forces with arrows (fierce) as poisonous snakes, among those thousands of kings on the side of the Pandavas, O Bharata,

152. None else could look at the son of Drona in that encounter except Ghatotkacha, the heroic and highly powerful king of the Rakshasas.

153. O best of the Bharatas, again he (i. e., Ghatotkacha), with eyes rolling in rage, striking his palms, and biting his lip,

154—156. Said angrily to his charioteer "Bear me towards the son of Drona." Ascending that terrible looking (car) furnished with triumphal banners, that destroyer foes again marched against the son of Drona in order to engage in a single combat with him. Sending forth a thundering roar like that of a lion, that terribly-powerful Rakshasa, whirling a highly dreadful Asani of celestial make and furnished with eight bells, hurled it in that encounter at the son of Drona.

157. Placing his bow on the car and jumping down, the son of Drona seized it and hurled it back at him (i.e. the Rakshasa, (Seeing that Asani proceed towards him) he leaped down from his car.

158. That dreadful Asani of great lustre having consumed to ashes the car together with the steeds, the driver and the standard, rived the earth and (then) penetrated into it.

159. Seeing the son of Drona achieve that (wonderful) feat all the creatures adored (him) inasmuch as leaping down from his car he seized that (Asani) made by Sankara.

160. Then, O king, riding on the car of Dhritarastra and taking up a dreadful bow like the formidable bow of Indra (himself), the son of Bhimasena,

161. Began again to discharge sharpened arrows at the high-souled son of Drona. Dhristadyumna also, nothing daunted, discharged (arrows) fierce as poisonous snakes,

162. Furnished with gold wings and excellent at the chest of the son of Drona. Thereupon Drona's son hurled at them thousands of Narachas.

163. (But) those two (i.e. Dhristadyumna and the Rakshasa) cut off with their own shafts, having the touch of fire, the arrows discharged by Drona's son). (Then an awfully terrible battle took place between those two best of men.

164. And the son of Drona caused (a great) delight to the warriors, O best of the Bharatas. Then followed by one thousand cars, three hundred elephants,

165—166. And six thousand steeds Bhimasena made his appearance at that spot (where the battle was raging.) But the virtuous-souled son of Drona, possessed of excellent prowess, continued to fight with the heroic son of Bhimsena and Dhristadyumna together with his younger brothers; there the son of Drona achieved the most marvellous exploit,

157—168. Incapable of being performed by any one among all the creatures. O Bharata, within the twinkling of an eye, he destroyed by means of arrows one Akshouhini of the Rakshasa army together with horses, drivers, cars and elephants, in the very sight of Bhimasena, the son of Hidimva, the son of Prishatha,

169. The twins, the son of Dharma, Vijaya and Achyuta. Pierced deeply with the stright-coursing shafts,

170. The tuskers fell down on earth like mountains devoid of (their) peaks with the trunks of elephants chopped off (by arrows) that were still moving about here and there.

171. The earth being strewn it looked as beautiful as if strewn around with moving snakes; with golden staves cut (to pieces) and royal umbrellas (lying scattered all over the field of battle) the earth looked like,

172. The firmament studded with (many) suns, moons and planets at the end of a yuga. Tall standards constituted the frogs, drums the large tortoises,

173. Umbrellas the rows of swans, abundance of yok-tails the foams, Kankas and vultures the crocodiles, innumerable weapons the fishes,

174. Huge elephants the stones, numerous elephants and horses the sharks, cars the unstable and great banks, flags the beautiful trees,

175. Arrows the fishes, lances, darts and swords the frightful snakes, marrow and flesh the deep mire, headless bodies, the rafters;

176—177. Profusion of hair (of men and animals) the moss, lamentations of warriors the roar, and blood flowing from the wounds formed the waves of that impetuous river of blood formed by the blood shedding from the bodies of huge elephants, horses and combatants, and inspiring the coward with terror—which the son of Drona caused to flow there.

178. (It looked) frightful with the (dead) bodies of foot soldiers and (it flowed towards) that great ocean, that is, the abode of Yama. Having destroyed the Rakshasa the son of Hidimva with shafts,

179. Waxing wroth again, Drona's son having pierced with numerous shafts those great car-warriors, the sons of Pritha including Vrikodara and the sons of Prishata,

180—181. Killed, O Lord, one of the sons of Drupada, Suratha by name. Then in that encounter he killed the younger brother of Suratha, Satrunjaya by name, and also Balmika, Jayanika and Jaya. Then again, roaring like a lion, the son of Drona, by means of sharpened arrows,

182. Slew Prishadhru and the proud Chandrasena. (Then) with ten (darts) he destroyed ten sons of Kuntibhoja.

183. With another three red-eyed arrow graced with beautiful wings he despatched O king of kings, to the abode of Yama, Strutayush.

184. (He then) sent the powerful Satrunjaya to the abode of Sakra. Aswathama, then, greatly enraged, fixed a terrible and uncrooked (arrow) (on his bowstring).

185. (And) drawing the string up to his very ear, he soon discharged from his bow that excellent and formidable (arrow) looking like Yamadanda at Ghatotkacha.

186. O Lord of earth, that great arrow furnished with beatiful wings, riving the heart of that Rakshasa, penetrated into the earth.

187. Seeing him fallen down and taking him for dead, the great car-warrior Dhristadyumna, placed him upon another car and bore him away from the presence of the son of Drona, O king of kings.

188. Thus the car-warriors ef Yudhisthira were driven back O king. Vanquishing his enemies, the heroic son of Drona uttered thundering shouts, and he was adored by all men and by your sons, O lord.

189. Scattered all over with the fallen bodies of the dead night-rangers struck down and mangled by hundreds of shafts, the earth looked dreadful and became impassable as if strewn with mountain-peaks.

190. Then the Siddhas, the Gandharvas, the Pishachas, the Nagas, the birds, the Pitris, ravens, the Rakshas, the ghosts, the Apsaras and the celestials all joined in adoring the son of Drona.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifty-sixth chapter, Aswathama's fight in the Ghatotkacha Badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLVII.

(GHATOTKACHA BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Seeing that the sons of Drupada and those of Kuntibhoja as well as thousands of Rakshasas were destroyed by the son of Drona,

2. Yudhisthira, Bhimasena, Dhristadyumna, the son of Prishata and Yuyudhan (all) united together, re-engaged their attention to battle.

3. Growing angry again at seeing Satyaki in battle, O Bharata, Somadatta covered him with a mighty discharge of arrows.

4. Then the battle that took place between your army and that of the enemy was dreadful and highly marvellous to look at, (in which) both parties were desirous of gaining the victory.

5. Bhima, for the purpose of (helping) Swattata, pierced the Kaurava (Somadatta) with ten (arrows). Somadatta too struck that hero in return with a hundred (darts).

6. (Then) Sattwata, furious with wrath, struck that old one smitten with grief for the slaughter of his son (by Satyaki) and who was, like Yayati, the son of Nahusha, possessed of every noble quality, with ten sharpened arrows having the force of the thunder. After piercing him (with these ten arrows) with great might he (i.e. Satyaki) struck him again with seven (more).

8. Bhimasena, also for the purpose of (helping) Satyaki, hurled a new and formidable Parigha at the head of Somadatta.

9. Sattwata too, in anger, discharged at the chest of Somadatta, in that encounter, a keen and excellent dart, furnished with beautiful wings and as (furious) as the fire itself.

10. Both the formidable Parigha and the arrow, having at one and the same time, fallen upon the body of the heroic Somadatta, that mighty car-warrior fell down.

11. His son being deprived of consciousness, Valhika, discharging showers of arrows like the clouds (pouring) torrents of of rain during (the rainy, season,) rushed at him.

12. Then Bhima, for the sake of Satyaki, tormented and pierced, in that encounter, the high sould Valhika with nine arrows.

13. Like Purandara hurling the thunderbolt, the mighty armed son of Pratea (i.e., Valhika), smitten with ire, struck Bhima on the chest with an arrow.

14. Thus struck (by Valhika) Bhima trembled and (then) fell into a swoon. Then that powerful one, recovering his senses, hurled a mace at him.

15. That (mace) hurled by the Pandava (Bhimasena) smashed the head of Valhika. He (then) fell down dead on the earth like a tree struck by lightning.

16—17. That foremost of men, the heroic Valhika being (thus) slain, your ten sons, viz., Nagadatta, Dridaratha, Viravahu, Ayobhuja, Dridha, Suhasta, Viraja, Pramatha and Ugrayayin; (each of whom) resembled the son of Dasharatha (*i.e.*Rama) began to torment Bhima.

18. Filled with ire on beholding them, Bhima, aiming at each of them one after the other, struck each of them in the vital parts with arrows capable of bearing much strain.

19. Pierced (with those arrows) they fell down from their cars deprived of life and energy as trees broken by a furious hurricane (fall down) from the mountain summits.

20. Having destroyed those (ten) sons of your with ten arrows Bhima covered Vrishasena, the beloved son of Karna (with downpours of shafts).

21. Then the renowned brother of Karna, Vrikaratha by name, pierced Bhima with arrows. (But) that hero (i.e. Bhima) soon slew him.

22. Then the heroic Bhima, having killed seven car-warriors among your brothers-in-law, with arrows, burried Satachandra into the earth (by main force), O Bharata.

23. Unable to put up with the destruction of that great car-warrior Satachandra, the brothers of Sakuni viz., the heroic Gavaksha, Sarava, Vibhu (and two others),

24. Rushing against Bhimasena, oppressed him with keen darts. Afflicted with those shafts like a mountain with torrents of rain, he

25. Destroyed those five kings endued with great prowess, with five arrows. Those foremost of kings (who were present in that battle) seeing the destruction of those five heroes began to waver.

26. Then Yudhisthira began angrily to crush your forces in the very presence of the Pot-born (Drona) and in that of your sons, O sinless one.

27. (And) in that battle Yudhisthira sent to the region of Death, the Ambhastas, the Malavas, the heroic Trigartas and the Sivis.

28. Chopping off the Abhishahas, the Surasenas, the Valhikas and the Vashatikas, he made the earth muddy with (their) flesh and blood.

29. (And), O king, in a moment he sent to the region of Yama, with a number of darts, the heroic Youdheyas, the Malavas and hosts of the Madrakas in battle.

30. Then a tumultuous uproar (such as) "Slay, seize, capture, pierce and cut to pieces"—arose in the direction of Yudhisthira's car.

31. Seeing Yudhisthira afflict your troops Drona, urged on by your son, surrounded him (i e Yudhisthira) with arrows.

32. Drona also, exceedingly enraged, discharged at that Pandava the weapon presided ove: by Vayu. But he (i e Yudhisthira) destroyed that celestial weapon with (another) weapon.

33. That weapon being baffled by Yudhisthira, the son of Bha adwaja, in great rage, hurled at the son of Pandu the Varuna, the Agneya, the Teshra and the Savitra weapon, with the desire of destroying him. All those weapons that were (either) hurled (or) being hurled by the Pot-born, were dauntlessly baffled by that mighty-armed and righteous one. Desirous of accomplishing his vow the Patborn,

36. Devoted to the welfare of your son, called into existence the weapons presided over by Varuna or Prajapati, in order to slay the son of Dharma, O Bharata.

37. (Then) the lord of the Kurus (i e Yudhisthira) walking like a lion or elephant endued with a broad chest, and large and red eyes and possessed of an energy not less (than that of Drona) called into existence the Mahendra weapon, by means of which he baffled the weapon of Drona.

38. All those weapons of his being baffled, Drona was filled with ire; and desirous of slaying Yudhisthira, he called into existence the weapon presided over by Brahma.

39. Being enveloped in a dismal darkness, we could not, then, diecern anything. And, O lord of the earth, all the creatures experienced a terrible horror.

40. Seeing that the Brahma weapon was uplifted, Yudhisthira, the son of Kunti, baffled that weapon by means of Brahma weapon, O king of kings.

41. Then the principal warriors (of the two armies) praised those two most exalted of men, those two great bowmen, viz Drona and the son of Pritha, who were conversant with all the (arts of) warfare.

42. Leaving the son of Kunti, Drona, then, whose eyes became as red as copper in rage, began to destroy, by means of weapons, the army of Drupada.

43. The Panchalas, (thus) destroyed by Drona fled away in terror in the very presence of Bhimasena and in that of the high-souled Pritha.

44. Then Kiriti and Bhima, rallying their own army, all on a sudden attacked, with a great car-force, your army.

45. Vivatsu attacking the right and Vrikodara the left flank (of your army), discharged at the son of Bharadwaja mighty downpours of shafts.

46. The Kakeyas, the Srinjyas, and the highly energetic Panchalas, O great king, together with the Matsyas and the Sattwata followed suit.

47. Then the Bharata army, butchered by Kiriti, and (overpowered) with sleep and darkness, despersed again.

48. Although, O great king, Drona himself and your son tried to rally them, yet they were not capable of reducing the warriors to order.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirty-seventh chapter, the battle between Drona and Yudhisthira in the Ghatatkacha-badha of the Vana Parra.

CHAPTER CLVIII.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Duryodhana, on beholding the vast army of the Pandavas—inflated with wrath and thinking it to be irresistible thus spoke to Karna,—

2. The time is now come, O you that are dovoted to your friends, for your friends (to seek your assistance). O Karna, save in battle all my soldiers and car warriors,

3. Who are now completely hemmed in by the wrathful Panchalas and the Keykeas and the Matsyas and by the mighty car-warriors of the Pandavas who are all listening like (angry) snakes.

4. These Pandavas, filled with ecstacy and desirous of victory and these numerous car-warriors of the Panchalas equal to Sakra in prowess, are (all) roaring.

Karna said :—

5. Even if Purandara himself comes here in person in order to deliver the son of Pritha, I will soon vanquish him and then slay the son of Pandu (i e Arjuna).

6. I swear this truly. Reassure yourself, O Bharata. I will destroy the sons of Pandu together with all the assembled Panchalas.

7. I will secure to you victory as the son of Pavaka (i e Kartikeya) did to Vasava himself. In this battle which is now going on, I will do good offices to you.

8. Among all the sons of Pritha, Phalguna is the most powerful. I will hurl at him the unfailing dart made by Sakra.

9. When the mighty-bowman will be slain, his brothers, O bestower of honours, will either come under your sway or depart to the forest again.

10. O lord of the Kouravas, since I am alive you need not give way to sorrow. I will, in battle, destroy all the Pandavas joined together,

11. The Panchalas, the Keykayas and the assembled Vrishnis. (And) cutting (them) off into pieces with arrows I will give the earth to you.

Sanjaya said :—

12. When Karna was saying all this the mighty-armed Kripa, the son of Saradwata smilingly said these words to the charioteer's son.

13. "Very well, very well, O Karna. If words alone were to lead to success, then O son of Radha, with yourself as his supporter, this most exalted of the Kurus could be considered as sufficiently backed.

14. Frequently in the presence of the Kourava (king) you boast (of your prowess). But neither your prowess nor the result of it has ever been witnessed.

15. You have been, on several occasions, seen to engage in battle with the sons of Pandu. But, charioteer's son, you have, on all those occasions, been defeated by the Pandavas.

16. On the son of Dhritarastra being taken prisoner by the Gandharvas, you yourself were the first to take to your heels although all the troops were fighting (to rescue the Kuru king).

17. Again, in the city of Virata, all the assembled Kouravas as well as you, O Karna, together with your younger brother were (all) defeated by Partha in battle.

18. You are, in battle, incapable of fighting with Phalguna alone. How can you, (therefore) hope to conquer all the Pandavas together with Krishna?

19. O Karna, O charioteer's son, you boast too much (of your prowess). Be engaged in fight. It is the duty of good (i e really brave) men to display their prowess without uttering (a single boastful word).

20. By roaring like the rainless autumnal clouds, O charioteer's son, O Karna, you show that you have no worth. But the king does not understand this.

21. Continue, O son Radha, to roar so long as you do not behold Partha; (for) you will cease roaring when you will see Partha near.

22. Continue to roar so long as you are out of the reach of Phalguna's arrows: (for) when you will be pierced with the shafts of Partha, your roars will grow rare.

23. It is by means of (the prowess of) their arms that the Kshyatryas are heroes. The twice-born ones display their heroism by words. It is by means of this bow that Phalguna is a hero. But Karna is a hero by the wishes (he cherishes in his heart).

24. Who can resist Partha that has gratified even Rudra himself?" Thus reviled by the son of Saradwat,

25. Karna, the foremost of smiters, spoke these words to Kripa. Heroes always roar like clouds during the rainy season,

26. And they yeild an early harvest like seeds sown into the soil (at the proper time). I do not find any fault with the warriors on the field of battle,

27. Boasting in several ways of themselves, who bear a (great) burden in war. That person, who resolves in his mind to bear a burden,

28. Is surely helped by fate in carrying out his purposes. If resolving in my mind to bear a (great) burden,

26. That is (if wishing in my mind) to slay in battle the sons of Pandu together with Krishna and Sattwata,—I roar thus, what harm is there in it to you, O Brahmana?

30. Heroes do not roar in vain like the autumnal clouds. The wise, conscious of their own-strength, indulge in roars.

31. I am, too, resolved in my mind to conquer in battle to-day the Pandavas and Krishna joined together, by exerting my best. O son of Goutama, it is on this account, that I indulge in roars.

32. O Brahmana, witness the result of these roars of mine. Having slain in battle the sons of Pandu together with Krishna, Sattwata and (all their) followers I will deliver the (entire) earth with its thorns weeded out, to Duryodhana.

Kripa said :—

33. Your intentions being like the ravings (of a mad man) can not be acceptable to me, inasmuch as you always speak depreciatingly of Krishna, Arjuna and Dharmaraj, the son of Pandu.

34—36. O Karna, victory on the part of that person is certain who has on his side Krishna and the Pandava (Arjuna) both skilled in warfare and incapable of being vanquished in battle by the celestials, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the mortals the Uragas, and the birds (even if all these fight) with their armours on). Yudhisthira the son of Dharma is devoted to the Brahmanas, (always) speaks truth, is self-restrained, worships the Pitris and the celestials, is devoted to truth and righteousness, well skilled in weapons, is possesed of intelligence and is grateful.

37. His brothers (also) are powerful, well-skilled in all the weapons, devoted to the ministrations of their elders, wise, renowned and (they) always practice righteousness.

38. His relations and kinsmen too are powerful as Indra himself, are devotedly attached (to him) and are (efficient) smiters. Dhristadyumna, Sikhandi and Janamejaya, the son of Durmuksha,

39. And Chandrasena, Bhadrasena, Kirtivarma, Dhruva, Dhara, Vasuchandra, Damachandra, Singha-Chandra, sutejana,

40. And the sons of Drupada and Drupada himself skilled in great weapons, and the king of Matsya together with his younger brothers are exerting their utmost on their behalf.

41. And Gajaneeka, Srutaneeka, Veerabhadra, Sudarsana, Srutadhwaja, Valaneeka, Jayaneeka, Jarapreya,

42. Ane Vijaya, Labhdhalaksha, Jayaswa, Rathavahana, Chandradaya, Kamaratha, the auspicious brothers of Virata

43. And the twins, the (five) sons of Droupadi, and the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha are fighting for their sake. They (therefore) cannot meet with destruction.

44—45. These and innumerable numbers of other (kinsmen and relations) are on the side of the son of Pandu. Indeed, Bhima and Phalguna, by means of the prowess of their weapons, can easily destroy the whole universe together with all the celestials, the Asuras, the human beings, and the Rakshasas, (other) created beings, the serpents and the elephants.

46—47. Yudhisthira, also by means of his angry looks, can consume the (whole). O Karna, how can you hope to vanquish these enemies in battle, for whose sake Souri of unrivalled prowess has armed himself? It is indeed a great impudence on your part, O Charioteer's son, as you always dare confronting Souri in battle.

Sanjaya said :—

48. Thus spoken to (by Kripa), Karna the son of Radha then replied smilingly to the preceptor Kripa, the son of Saradwat.

49. "O Brahmana, the words that you have (just) spoken about the Pandavas are true. Indeed the sons of Pandu are gifted with these and many other noble qualities.

50. The sons of Pritha are unconquerable in battle by the celestials together with Vasava (at their head), by the Yakshas, the Daityas and the Gandharvas (all) united together and by the Pishachas, the Uragas and the Rakshasas.

51. Still I will vanquish the Parthas by means of the dart granted to me by Vasava. This unfailing dart was given to me, O twice-born one, by Sakra.

52. By means of this dart I will slay Savyasachi in battle. When this son of Pandu will be slain, Krishna, as will as his uterine brothers (i. e., Yudhisthira and Bhima),

53. Will not be able to enjoy the earth without Arjuna. At the destruction of all these, this earth together with her seas,

54. Will come under the sway of the lord the Kurus without any trouble (on his part), O son of Goutama. There is no doubt that in this world, a sound policy leads to success in everything.

55. Well aware of this (to be certain) I give forth (these) roars. O Goutama, you are much advanced in years, a Brahmana, and unskilful in battle.

56. It is on account of your affection towards the sons of Pritha that you insult me (thus). If, O twice-born one, you speak such disagreeable words to me, as these again,

57. Then taking up my scimitar I will cut off your tongue, O wretch. O Brahmana, you are desirous of praising the Pandavas, in battle.

58. In order to strike terror into (the hearts of) all the troops and the Kouravas, O evil-mined one, O son of Goutama, hear what I say on this point.

59. Where Durjodhan, Drona, Sakuni, Durmukha, Jaya, Dussasana, Vrishasena, the king Madra, and yourself.

60. And Somadatta, Bhuri, the son of Drona and Vivingsati—all well-skilled in warfare, remain (prepared for battle) with their armours on

61. Can any foe, be he as powerful as Sakra himself, vanquish all these (heroes) in battle? All these warriors that are) heroes, efficient in weapons, endued with strength, desirous of attaining the heaven,

62. Conversant with religion, and well-skilled in battle, would slay the very gods in battle. These will remain on the field of battle for the purpose of destroying the Pandavas.

63. With their armours on, for the Kourava king, solicitous of victory I deem victory even with regard to those endued with great prowess to be dependant on fate.

64. Since the mighty-armed Bhisma lies (on the field) struck by a hundred arrows, (and since) Vikarna, Chitrasena, Valhika, Jayadratha,

65. And Bhurisrava, Jaya, Jalasandha, Sudakshina, Sala, the foremost of car-wariors, the puissant Bhagadatta,

66. These and numerous other heroes difficult of being vanquished by the very gods, and more powerful than the Pandavas themselves—lie slain in battle,

67. To what do you, that are the basest of men, attribute all this except the hand of fate? O twice-born one, as to the enemies, Duryodhana whom you always extol,

68. Hundreds and thousands of warriors on their side also have been destroyed. The troops of both the Kurus and the Pandavas are diminishing.

69. I do not see in it any prowess on the part of the Pandavas. Those whom you, you that are the basest of men, always deem powerful,

70. I will confront in battle putting forth my utmost prowess for the welfare of Duryodhana. As regards success, it is dependant on fate.

Thus ends the hundred and fifty-eigth, chapter, the colloquy between Kripa and Karna, in the Ghatctkacha Badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLIX.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Seeing his maternal uncle thus insulted by the charioteer's son, the son of Drona brandishing his scimitar ran furiously towards him.

2. Then, excited with a great rage, the son of Drona, like a lion (rushing at) an infuriate elephant, rushed against Karna, even in the very presence of the Kuru king.

Aswathama said :—

3. O basest of men, in spite of his speaking of the qualities that Aryuna is really endwed with, you, that are of very wicked understanding, have insulted my heroic maternal uncle through (sheer) malice.

4. Without reckoning any of the words of bowmen in battle, puffed up with pride as you are, you are boasting to-day of your manliness.

5. Where was your prowess and where your weapons, when defeating you in battle, the wielder of Gandiva killed Jayadratha in your very presence?

6. O wretch of a charioteer, you are in vain hoping in your mind to conquer him, who formerly fought with the very Mahadeva himself.

7. Since the combined celestials and the Asuras headed by Indra are incapable of defeating that foremost of the wielders of weapons, having Krishna for his ally,

8. How can you, O Suta, backed up by these earthly kings, indulge in hopes of vanquishing in battle, the unconquerable Arjuna, the foremost of all the heroes in the world?

9. Look, O Karna of wicked understanding, O vilest of men, stay here now. I will presently cut off your head from your body.

Sanjaya said :—

10. The highly-energetic king Duryodhana himself, and that best of men,

Kripa, prevented him (i.e. Aswathama) who was rushing furiously (at Karna).

Karna said :—

11. Let this basest of Brahmanas, who (thinks that he) is a hero, boasts of his prowess in battle and is of wicked understanding, taste of my prowess. Do leave him, O best of the Kurus.

Aswathama said :—

12. O charioteer's son of wicked understanding, we forgive you of this (fault). Phalguna will destroy this swelling pride of yours.

Duryodhana said :—

13. O Aswathawa, O bestower of honours, be gratified ; do forgive (him). O sinless one, you should not be angry with the charioteer's son.

14. To you and Karna and Kripa and Drona, and the king of Madra and to the son of Suvala, a heavy task is entrusted. O best of the twice-born ones, be gratified.

15. O Brahmana, all the Pandavas, desiring to fight with and shouting to the son of Radha (to give battle) are coming (against him) from all sides.

Sanjaya said :—

16. Thus appeased by the king, the high-minded son of Drona, O great king, who was filled with a furious rage, subdued his anger.

17. Then the large-hearted preceptor, whose mild disposition soon returned (to him) an account of his being (naturally) of a peaceful temper, said these words (to Karna).:—

Kripa said :—

18. O Charioteer's son of very wicked understanding, you are pardoned by us of this (fault). But Phalguna will (soon) destroy your swelling pride.

Sanjaya said :—

19. Then, O king, the Pandavas and the renowned Panchalas, united together and sending forth thundering roars, poured in by thousands.

20—21. The puissant and energetic Karna too taking up his bow and surrounded by the foremost of the Kouravas, like Sakra by the celestials, awaited (their charge) relying on the strength of his own arms. The battle, that then took place between Karna (on one side) and the Pandavas (on the other),

22. Was hot and furious and ruinging with thundering shouts, O great monarch. Then, O king, the Pandavas and the renowned Panchalas,

23. Seeing Karna, possessed of mighty arms, sent forth loud shouts. (And they said) :—"This is Karna ! where is Karna ! O Karna, stay in this great battle !

24. O wicked-souled one, O vilest of men, give us battle. Others, with eyes burning in ire on beholding Karna, said,

25. This arrogant son of charioteer having but a little sense should be killed by all these foremost of kings. He has no need of life.

26. This sinful person is always an inveterate enemy to the sons of Pritha, abides by the advice of Duryodhana and is the root of all these evils.

27—28. Slay him !" Thus saying, mighty Kshatriya car-warriors, at the command of the son of Pandu, rushed to slay the charioteer's son, enveloping (all the points) with a heavy downpour of arrows. Seeing all those highly powerful sons of Pandu (rush towards him),

29. The charioteer's son was neither pained nor struck with terror. Beholding that wonderful army, vast as a sea and looking like Death itself,

30. That puissant, light-handed and highly powerful one, devoted to the good of your sons and never vanquished in battle, by means of showers of arrows,

31. Began to check (the career of) that army on all sides, O most exalted of the Bharatas. Then the Pandavas also, discharging downpours of shafts checked, (him).

32. Shaking hundreds and thousands of bows, they battled with the son of Radha as the Daitayas (fought with) Sakra in days of yore.

33. That downpour, of shafts discharged by the kings on all sides, was destroyed by the puissant Karna with a heavy shower of arrows.

34. Then a marvellous battle, in which each party was desirous of warding off the blows of the other and which resembled the fight between Sakra and the Danavas in the war between the gods and the Asuras, took place between them.

35. There we beheld the wonderful lighthandness of the charioteer's son : for, all the hostile forces, exerting their utmost, could not subdue him in that battle.

36—37. That mighty car-warrior, the son of Radha, checking those downpours of arrows discharged by the (hostile) kings, shot at their yokes, umbrellas, cars and steeds, dreadful arrows marked with his own name. Then, afflicted by Karna and not knowing what to do, those (hostile) kings,

38—40. Wandered about there (on the field of battle) like cows pained with cold. Innumerable horses, elephants and car-warriors afflicted by Karna were seen to drop dead there. The entire field was strewn on all sides with the fallen heads and arms of the unretreating warriors, O king, with the dead and the dying and the waiting (combatants) lying on all sides,

41. The field of battle looked like the region of the son of Vivasvata, O king. Then, O monarch, beholding the feats of Karna, Duryodhana,

42. Approached Aswathama and then said these words:—"Yonder Karna, with his armour on, is seen (fighting) with all the (hostile) kings.

43. Behold, the (enemy's) army, oppressed with the arrows of Karna, is, like the Asura force afflicted by Kartikeya, running away (in all the directions).

44. Witnessing the defeat of his army by the intelligent Karna, Vivatsu, in order to slay the charioteer's son, is advancing (against him).

45. Adopt such measures that the son of Pandu may not kill that mighty car-warrior, i.e., the charioteer's son in battle in our very sight."

46. (Hearing these words of the king), the son of Drona, and Kripa and Salya and that mighty car-warrior, the son of Hridika, advanced against Partha in order to protect the charioteer's son,

47. Seeing that the son of Kunti was coming against them like Sakra against the Daitaya force. Then, O king of kings, Vivatsu also surrounded by the Panchalas marched against Karna like Purandara (marching against) Vritra.

Dhritarashtra said :—

48. Seeing the wrathful Phalguna looking like Yama, the destroyer of time, what measures, O charioteer, did Karna, the son of Vikartana, adopt?

49. That mighty car-warrior (i.e., Karna) always challenged Partha and hoped that he was powerful enough to vanquish Vivatsu.

50. Thus meeting all on a sudden his inveterate enemy, what measures, O charioteer, did Karna, the son of Vikartana adopt?

Sanjaya said :—

51. Seeing the son of Pandu (advance against) his rival elephant, Karna dauntlessly fell upon Dhananjaya.

52. Partha then enveloped Karna, who was thus furiously advancing against him, with straight-coursing arrows furnished with golden wings.

53. (And) the son of Pandu covered Karna with a dense shower of arrows. Then Karna greatly excited with rage pierced him wtth three darts,

54—56. The mighty car-warrior (Partha) witnessing this nimbleness on his part could not endure it. That scorcher of foes, then, shot thirty arrows sharpened on stone, having flaming points and coursing straight, at the charioteer's son. That puissant and mighty one, then, as if with a smile, pierced him angrily with another long arrow in the end of his left arm. From that hand of his which was (thus) pierced with (great) force, his bow fell down.

57. Taking up that bow within half the time of the twinking of an eye, that highly powerful one, with great nibleness of hand, covered Phalguna with downpours of arrows.

58. The arrowy shower, sent forth by the charioteer's son, was baffied by Dhananjaya with discharges of arrows, as if with a smile, O Bharata.

59. Those two mighty wielders of bow desiring to baffle each other and coming up to catch each other enveloped each other with a) perfect) deluge of arrows.

60. Then a marvellous encounter took place between Karna and the son of Pandu resembling that between two wild elephants for the sake of a she-elephant in the time of her passion.

61. Then that mighty bowman Partha, witnessing the prowess of Karna, speedily cut off that part of his bow at which it is grasped.

62. (And) that scorcher of (his) foes (i.e. Dhananjaya) sent his horses to the abode of Yama with broad headed shafts and severed the head of his charioteer from the body.

63. Then Partha, the son of Pandu pierced that one (i.e. Karna) deprived of his steeds and driver and whose bow was cut off with four arrows.

64. Afflicted with (Arjuna's) darts, that most exalted of men hastily jumped down from his steedless car and got up to the car of Kripa.

65. O best of the Bharatas, witnessing the defeat of the son of Radha, your partizans, (already) mangled by the shafts of Dhananjaya ran away in ten directions.

66. Beholding that they were running away King Duryodhana himself rallied them and spoke these words.

67. "Heroes, do not take to flight! O best of the Kshatriyas, stay! I am myself going against Partha in order to slay him in battle.

68. I will myself destroy Partha together with the Panchalas assembled (under his banners). In the battle that I will to-day fight with the wielder of Gandiva,

69. The sons of Pritha will behold my prowess resembiing that of the destroyer at the end of a Yuga. To day the arrowy showers that I will discharge by thousands,

70. In battle, will be seen by the sons of Pritha to resemble (thick) flights of locusts. To day, when wielding my bow, I will continue to rain down arrows,

71. My soldiers will behold me like a cloud discharging torrents of rain at the end of the summer. To day I will, by means of straight arrows, conquer the sons of Pritha.

72. Brave warriors, stay in battle. Shake off your fear of Phalguni. Encountering my prowess, Phalguni will not be able to stand it,

73. As the ocean, the abode of the Makaras reaching the point between the high and the low tide-marks, is unable to get beyond it." Saying this, the king, surrounded by a mighty army, marched,

74. Furiously with his eyes reddened in wrath, against Phalguni. Seeing that mighty-armed one advance (against Arjuna), the son of Saradwatta (i.e. Kripa),

75. Approaching Aswathama said these words:—"This mighty-armed king, under the influence of rage and insensible with ire

76. Resorting to the practices of the insects, (which heedless of danger rush into fire) is desiring to fight with Arjuna (heedless of his life). Prevent the Kourava king (from doing this) before he sacrifices his life in our very sight by encountering Partha in battle. So long as he does not present himself within the range of Kiriti's shafts,

78—79. The heroic Kourava king can only remain alive in battle. Prevent the king (from taking this rash step) before he is burnt to ashes by the dreadful arrows of Partha looking like snakes that have just cast off their sloughs. It looks very improper, O giver of honours, that when we are here,

80—81. The king will go in person to fight in battle like one having no support. I think it will be (as) greatly difficult for Kourava king to escape with life while fighting with Kiriti in battle, as it is in the case of an elephant (fighting with) a tiger." Thus addressed by his maternal uncle, the son of Drona, who was the foremost of those that could wield weapons,

82. Quickly approaching Duryodhana, said these words:—"O son of Gandhari so long as I am alive, it is not proper for you to fight,

83. Disregarding me who am always devoted to your welfare. O Kourava king, you need at all be anxious for vanquishing Partha. I will myself check Partha. Stay (here), O Sujodhona."

Duryodhana said:—

84. The protector protects the sons of Pandu as if they were his own children. You also never manage in right earnest with my enemies.

85. It is either owing to my ill luck or owing to your desire to do good to the Dharmaraj that your prowess diminishes in battle, though I do not know what is the true cause.
